HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 14, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a change of reference of House bill 3518 and House bill 11801 to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the titles of the bills for which change of reference is asked.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 3518. To regulate the service and fixing the hours of service for persons employed as policemen and officers in the District of Columbia.

H. R. 11801. To regulate the service and fixing the hours of service for persons employed as policemen and officers in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the request for a change of reference of the following bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 3200. For the relief of Sarah K. McLean, widow of the late Lieut. Col. Nathaniel H. McLean.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change of reference to the Committee on Military Affairs will be made.

There was no objection.

MICHAEL F. BARRY.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House joint resolution 303, granting a life-saving medal to Michael F. Barry, of New York City.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to bestow upon Michael F. Barry, of the city of New York, borough of Brooklyn, a life-saving medal in recognition of his heroic services in rescuing from drowning, at the peril of his life, several people under the most trying difficulties on several occasions between the years 1887 and 1897.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the unfinished business. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] withdraws his amendment, as I understand, and I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. LACEY. I withdraw my amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the special order and also the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Kansas, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that the bill (H. R. 11868) to provide for the acquiring of rights of way by railroad companies through Indian reservations, Indian lands, and Indian allotments, and for other purposes, pending and unfinished, being a special order for this day, be postponed until to-morrow, retaining all of its privileges under the special order of Saturday.

The following is the amendment offered by Mr. CURTIS of Kansas:

After the word "and," in line 11, page 4, strike out the following words: "The rate for carrying the United States mail may be fixed by Congress, and when not fixed by Congress may be fixed by the Postmaster-General," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The grants herein are made upon condition that the company shall transport mails whenever required to do so by the Post-Office Department."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Kansas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHARLES W. RUSSEY.

Mr. McRAE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 245, for the relief of Charles W. Russey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Charles W. Russey, of Ben Lomond, Ark., late subcontractor for route No. 29359, from Paraclifta to Norwoodville, Ark., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $436.50, that being the amount improperly deducted by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General from the amount due him for carrying the mails on said route.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. LOUD. I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. McRAE. The report is short and will give the facts. If any further information should be desired, I will be glad to give it.

The report (by Mr. GRAFF) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 245) for the relief of Charles W. Russey, have considered the same, and submit the report made in the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses for the facts, viz:

This is a claim for $436.50, deducted by the Post-Office Department from the pay of claimant Russey, subcontractor on route 29359, for failure to perform service over 12 miles of said route between Paraclifta and Norwoodville, Ark.

Upon full consideration of all the facts, your committee find that on said route, between Paraclifta and Norwoodville, there is no intervening post-office; that there is the Cossatot River between said places, impassable a great portion of the year by reason of high water and of a lack of bridge and ferry facilities, in consequence of which the prompt and regular delivery of mails made it sometimes necessary to vacate said route between the aforementioned offices; that the carrier, instead of delaying the mails, carried or had them carried over a circuitous route 12 miles longer, thereby availing himself of bridge facilities. It appears that by this circuitous and substituted route only the claimant was enabled to promptly and regularly deliver his mail at all offices.

The Government, while it lost service over 12 miles of a particular route, received the fruits of said service over another one 12 miles longer per round trip.

Your committee, therefore, are of the opinion that the claimant is equitably entitled to his full pay, and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. LOUD. What does the Department say about this bill?

Mr. McRAE. The Department officials told me several years ago that the man ought to have his money, but that in order to enforce proper discipline and good service they felt constrained to make deduction every time he went on this circuitous route and not the route prescribed by the Department.

Mr. LOUD. Is there any letter from the Department in relation to this subject?

Mr. McRAE. There is none incorporated in the report. I do not know of any letter from the Department, but I have talked with the officers there about this case, and so have other members of the Committee on Claims, and no one who has examined it has objected to it.

Mr. LOUD. Does not the gentleman himself, as an experienced legislator, see the difficulty of passing a bill here upon the mere suggestion of a member of the House, when it must be perfectly easy to get a letter from the Department?

Mr. McRAE. There may have been a letter in this case, but I have not it here before me, and do not think it necessary.

Mr. LOUD. I think there must be a letter in possession of the committee. I hope the gentleman will endeavor to get it and have it presented to the House.

Mr. McRAE. I do not know whether the committee has such a letter or not, but I know that the gentleman who reported this bill—the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF]—refused for a long time to make the report until he could consult with officers of the Department. The case is a very simple one. This contractor could, when he reached this impassable stream, have gone back without delivering the mail, and would have been regarded by the Department as entitled to his pay, but he saw fit to go around 12 miles out of the way to a bridge, and by this means was enabled to deliver the mail at the offices to which he had contracted to carry it. But the Department made deduction for every trip that he made in this roundabout way.

Mr. LOUD. That hardly seems possible.

Mr. McRAE. It is true, nevertheless.

Mr. LOUD. The report says there is no post-office between the two post-offices named; and, as I understand, the Department would not care what route he took, if he succeeded in delivering the mail promptly.

Mr. McRAE. But the Department does care. It requires the mail to be carried over the nearest route.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think so.

Mr. McRAE. The Department adopts a certain schedule; and if the postmaster reports that the mail carrier does not come in on time or fails to travel the route prescribed in that schedule, they will not pay him for the trip.

Mr. LOUD. If there is any intermediate office at which the mail should be delivered, but is not, there would, of course, be a deduction; but if the carrier delivers the mail promptly at the points designated in his contract, the Department does not care whether or not he goes around 12 miles or takes the regular route, unless he skips some office.

Mr. McRAE. This man did not skip any office, but he may have failed to meet the schedule made on a 12-mile basis.

Mr. LOUD. Does the gentleman recognize the necessity of a letter from the Department in all cases of this kind, not especially this case?

Mr. McRAE. I have understood from conversation with officers of the Department, after the facts were all understood, that Mr. Russy ought to be paid, but not under this Administration.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will allow this bill to go over, so that we may have a letter from the Department giving us further information.

Mr. McRAE. I would have no objection to that suggestion, except on account of the delay. This claim has been pending for several years. The claimant is a poor man; he rendered the service, and has been for several years without his money.

Mr. LOUD. I am willing to let the bill have every reasonable right that can be given it and ought to have it. But it would be a dangerous precedent, as I think the gentleman must himself see, to pass a bill of this kind without some writing from the Department.

Mr. McRAE. Of course, if the gentleman insists on his objection, I shall be obliged to let the bill go over, for I am asking unanimous consent and he can prevent consideration. But I know this man to be honest and fair; I know the route described, and I believe the facts stated in the report to be true.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to making the bill the regular order for to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McRAE. It will not be possible for me, before the bill comes up to-morrow morning, to go to the Department for a letter. I can hardly get to and from my hotel during this stormy weather, but I will do my best.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] is recognized to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. FARIS. If the bill goes over by unanimous consent and is made the regular order for to-morrow, would that arrangement foreclose the right to object to the bill when it comes up, although we may then have no further information?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would.

BRIDGE ACROSS CORPUS CHRISTI CHANNEL.

Mr. KLEBERG. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (S. 5355) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the Aransas Harbor Terminal Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Corpus Christi Channel, known as the Morris and Cummings Ship Channel, in Aransas County, Tex.," was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act authorizing the Aransas Harbor Terminal Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Corpus Christi Channel, known as the Morris and Cummings Ship Channel, in Aransas County, Tex.," approved May 4, 1896, is hereby reenacted; and section 5 of the said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from May 4, 1899."

Mr. SULZER. Has this bill the approval of the Secretary of War?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes, sir.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KLEBERG, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SURVEY OF PUBLIC LANDS IN CERTAIN CASES.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11971) to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause public lands to be surveyed in certain cases.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when any railroad company claiming a grant of land under any act of Congress, desiring to secure the survey of any unsurveyed lands within the limits of its grant, shall file an application therefor in writing with the surveyor-general of the State in which the lands sought to be surveyed are situated, and deposit in a proper United States depository to the credit of the United States a sum sufficient to pay for such survey it shall thereupon be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or the Director of the Geological Survey, as the case may be, to cause said lands to be surveyed.

For any deposits made by any railroad company hereunder, certificates shall be issued, which may be used by such railroad company, its successors or assigns, in payment for commutation entries of any public lands of the United States in the States where the surveys were made, or for any survey or office fees due the United States from such railroad company on account of surveys of lands within its grant.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Public Lands, were read:

In line 10, page 1, after the word "survey," insert the words "and for the examination thereof pursuant to the rules and regulations of the Department of the Interior, under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and."

Also, on page 2, line 3, strike out the words "for commutation entries of" and insert the words "to the same extent as cash is now allowed in payment of entries of public lands under existing regulations."

And also add at the end of the bill the following:

"The Secretary of the Interior shall provide such rules and regulations as may be necessary for carrying out the foregoing provisions."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. This is the bill which the gentleman offered yesterday, is it?

Mr. LACEY. This is the bill that was explained in Committee of the Whole on yesterday. The suggestion was made that unanimous consent would not be objected to by anyone. The motion was made to put this bill in as an amendment to the sundry civil bill; and in pursuance of the explanation made yesterday, I ask unanimous consent this morning. I want, however, to suggest two or three very slight verbal amendments offered after consultation with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], who is familiar with the law upon this subject. I do not deem it necessary to make another explanation to-day in view of the explanation I made yesterday.

Mr. DOCKERY. This is not a proposition to incorporate it on the sundry civil bill, but to pass it independently.

Mr. LACEY. No, this is a proposition to pass it as an independent bill. The point of order was made against it yesterday as an amendment to the sundry civil bill, but the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations stated that he would not object to unanimous consent for its consideration to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. I move also to amend, in line 11, by inserting the words "law and" before the word "the."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 11, page 1, before the word "the" insert the words "law and."

So that it will read:

Pursuant to law, and the rules and regulations, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. I ask unanimous consent that the word "and" in the amendment just adopted in line 1, page 2, be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. LACEY. Also in line 7, I move to strike out the words "in payment."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 2, line 7, strike out the words "in payment."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. Also in line 10, page 2, I move to insert the words "law and" immediately preceding the word "regulations."

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 2, line 10, before the word "regulations" insert the words "law and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. Also after the word "regulations" in the same line I move to insert the word "for."

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 10, after the word "regulations" insert the word "for."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JULIUS C. KLOENNE.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2017) for the relief of Julius C. Kloenne.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to correct the record of Julius C. Kloenne, late captain of Company K, Seventeenth Indiana Infantry Volunteers, whom the record shows was mustered out of service in that regiment on the 23d day of December, 1861, so that the same will show him to have been honorably discharged and mustered out with leave and for the purpose of recruiting and organizing other troops in the State of Indiana, and that said record be so changed and corrected instead of the record now made.

SEC. 2. That said Julius C. Kloenne be, and is hereby, declared entitled to pay as captain in said regiment from the date of the last payment made to him up to the date of his discharge as aforesaid.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MOON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MUSCLE SHOALS POWER COMPANY.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9335) granting to the Muscle Shoals Power Company the right to erect and construct a canal and power station at Muscle Shoals, Alabama.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the Muscle Shoals Power Company, a corporation created and organized under a charter granted by the legislature of the State of Alabama, its successors or assigns, to erect, construct, operate, and maintain inlet and outlet races or canals and a power station or stations at a point or points at or near the Muscle Shoals in Tennessee River, that are, and always have been, unsuitable and unused for the purposes of navigation, and to make such other improvements as may be necessary within said limits for the development of water power and transmission of the same: Provided, That the constructions hereby authorized do not in any way interfer with the Muscle Shoals Canal or with navigation of said river: Provided further, That until the plans and location of the works herein authorized, so far as they affect the interests of navigation, have been approved by the Secretary of War the improvements shall not be commenced or built.

The following amendments recommended by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors were read:

Strike out, in lines 9 and 10, the words "that are and always have been unsuitable and unused for the purpose of navigation;" and add, after line 5, page 2, the words "and the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to fix reasonable charges for use of said power."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and itwas accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BANKHEAD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

F. R. LANSON.

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1005) for the relief of F. R. Lanson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue to F. R. Lanson, of Tionesta, Pa., a duplicate of United States 4 per cent bond No. 10044, the original having been burned; but before issuing said duplicate bond the Secretary of the Treasury shall take from said Lanson a bond in the sum of $300, with two satisfactory sureties, conditioned to indemnify the United States against said original bond No. 10044 and all claims therein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PENSACOLA AND NORTHWESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11737) granting the right of way to the Pensacola and Northwestern Railroad Company over and through the public lands of the United States in the States of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee, and granting the right of way to said railroad company over and through the United States naval and military reservations near Pensacola, in the State of Florida.

The bill was read.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Public Lands were read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. The right to object is reserved.

Mr. PAYNE. Is there any provision in this bill for compensation for the land to be taken, except the 300 feet frontage to be taken for the dock?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Do you mean compensation to the Government?

Mr. PAYNE. To the Government; yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No. There is a provision which makes it incumbent upon the company to build any spur tracks which may be necessary. My recollection is that there is nothing which makes it obligatory for them to compensate the Government, except that they are required to build any spur tracks for the Government which become necessary.

Mr. PAYNE. How many miles of right of way does this propose to give?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think it is less than a mile. I can only state my recollection of the distance.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the bill to grant a right of way over Government lands aside from the reservations.

Mr. SPARKMAN. So it did; but there is already a law which makes that unnecessary. The bill was drawn and sent to me, and introduced by request. When it went before the committee they struck out the provision which the gentleman refers to, and very properly so, because the old law gave the right to any railroad company under certain conditions to go over public lands, and the committee thought it was unnecessary to give that special privilege, and hence struck that out.

Mr. PAYNE. What committee reported this bill?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to have the chairman of the committee explain this bill and give the reason for it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. So should I.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] introduced this bill granting a right of way through public lands and over a naval reserve, and also over a military reserve. The grant being through three classes of lands, either the Committee on Public Lands, the Committee on Military Affairs, or the Committee on Naval Affairs would have jurisdiction. The bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands; but under the right-of-way act of 1875 there was no necessity for the provision as to public lands. Attention was called to the fact that no relief was necessary in that respect.

But as the public lands were included in the bill, the jurisdiction still remained there. Consultation was had with members of the other committees, and it was concluded to let the bill remain where it was, and call on the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy for reports as to the propriety of granting a right of way through the naval and military reservations. Both Secretaries reported recommending the grant. Both of them, however, asked certain modifications, giving the Government right to spur tracks, sidings, and matters of that kind; and the amendments suggested by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy have been incorporated, and that part of the bill granting a right of way through the public lands has been stricken out. This will be a matter of convenience both to the Army and Navy, giving access to the shore at Barrancas, where the Government needs facilities to move supplies. The bill provides that the grant may at any time be canceled and the track removed if the ground is needed for the uses of the Government.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the committee as to the removal power reserved in the Government. It seems to be only for "structures." It provides certain structures may be removed.

Mr. LACEY. That was the exact language of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War, as I recollect it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That may be.

Mr. LACEY. We sought entirely to comply with the wishes of the Departments in the matter.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is a great deal of uncertainty whether the authority to remove a structure would authorize the removal of the track.

Mr. LACEY. I think the track is a structure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, it is a structure.

Mr. LACEY. The bill can easily be amended covering that question. The bill provides:

That the Secretaries of the Navy and War, at any time they shall deem it necessary for the public good, may cause to be removed or destroyed all or any of these structures hereby permitted on the naval and military reservations.

After the word "structures" insert "track or other structures."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Under the law in regard to mechanics' lien there have been a great many questions made whether the word "structure" includes a railroad track.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The decisions of late have been that it does.

Mr. GROSVENOR. May be.

Mr. RAY of New York. You mean "track or embankment."

Mr. LACEY. I suggest to insert, after the word "the," page 3, line 21, the words "track, embankment, or other."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. I move the amendment just suggested.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 21, page 3, after the word "the," insert the words "track, embankment, or other."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendments.

Mr. LACEY. There are committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. Unless a separate vote is requested, the question will be submitted on the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SPARKMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PUBLIC LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6551) withdrawing from entry and sale and granting unto the State of Wisconsin certain lands for use as a part of its present military reservation.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, in order to meet an objection that was made when this bill was once before called up for consideration, I offer a substitute, which I desire to have the Clerk read, in lieu of the original bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Suppose you read the original bill first.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The substitute covers the entire proposition. It was prepared at the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. I ask that the substitute be read, and I believe the gentleman from Missouri will be satisfied with that.

The SPEAKER. Pending objection, the gentleman asks the reading of the amendment which he proposes to offer as a substitute.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear what the bill was.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read again the title of the bill if there be no objection.

The title of the bill was again reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the substitute that is proposed by the gentleman in case unanimous consent is obtained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the following lands situated in the county of Juneau, in the State of Wisconsin, to wit: The southwest quarter of the northwest quarter and the west half of the southwest quarter of section 22, in township 17 north, of range 2 east, be, and the same hereby are, withdrawn from entry and sale, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause a patent therefor to be issued unto the State of Wisconsin: Provided, however, That said State shall pay to the United States therefor at the rate of $1.25 per acre: And provided further, That said State shall first procure from all claimants or persons who may have filed or made homestead entries or other claims on or to said premises, or any part thereof, proper relinquishments of all their claims thereto and cause the same to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if this bill has been before the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. GRIFFIN. It has.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Is it for the purpose of remedying a decision made by Judge Lochren, in which he held that the title to the property was not in the State of Wisconsin, but in the settlers?

Mr. GRIFFIN. It has no reference whatever to the decision named by the gentleman from Washington. It is to enable the State to acquire land which can be acquired in no other way except by legislation other than by homestead entry.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. There is no purpose of rendering certain the title to certain lands heretofore claimed by the settlers?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Not at all.

Mr. TODD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin if the bill recites that the land in question is to be used for a military reservation?

Mr. GRIFFIN. It does.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I move to amend the title to correspond with the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment to the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so as to read as follows: "A bill withdrawing from entry and sale and granting the State of Wisconsin certain lands therein described."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. GRIFFIN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CLERK FOR UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS, EASTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11160) to authorize the appointment of one or more clerks of the district courts of the United States within and for the eastern district of Virginia, to validate their acts and prescribe where the records shall be kept.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be lawful for the judge of the district court of the United States within and for the eastern district of Virginia to appoint a clerk of such court for said district, or a clerk at any one of the three places of meeting thereof; and the same person may be appointed clerk at any one or more of said places.

SEC. 2. That all acts heretofore performed by the several persons acting as the clerks of said court at its several places of meeting, and all payments heretofore made, or sums due, to any one or all of said clerks are hereby validated.

SEC. 3. That the records of said court shall be kept at the respective places of meeting thereof.

SEC. 4. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage.

With the following amendment recommended by the committee:

Strike out all of section 1 after the word "assembled," in line 2, and insert the following:

"That within and for the eastern district of Virginia there shall be one clerk only, to be appointed by the judge of the district court, and said clerk may have as many deputies as may be necessary, to be appointed as now provided by law."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I hope we shall have some explanation of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been up once before.

Mr. LAMB. I made an explanation in full the other day.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. It is a very safe bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to amend section 2.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 5, section 2, by adding after the word "made" the following: "in pursuance of law and judgment and decree of said court."

Mr. LAMB. I accept that amendment.

The amendment offered by Mr. MAXWELL was agreed to.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the title so that it shall read "one clerk" instead of "one or more clerks."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended in accordance with the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. LAMB, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LIGHT-HOUSES IN NORWALK HARBOR, CONNECTICUT.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 499) to provide for light-houses and other aids to navigation.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That light-houses and other aids to navigation be established and erected as hereinafter set forth, to wit:

A light and fog-signal station on Greens Ledge, Norwalk Harbor, Connecticut.

A light and fog-signal station on Pecks Ledge, Norwalk Harbor, Connecticut.

A light on Long Beach day beacon, Norwalk Harbor, Connecticut.

Lighted beacons at Round Beach, Fitchs Point, White Rock Reef, and Grassy Hammock, Norwalk Harbor, Connecticut.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a petition signed by 488 owners and pilots and masters of vessels on Long Island Sound. The erection of these light-houses is a matter of great importance. It has been recommended by the Treasury Department and has twice been reported favorably by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The bill has already passed the Senate at this session and the rearrangement of the light is needed in the interest of commerce, and in the interest of steam commerce especially, on Long Island Sound. It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that practically the entire commerce of Long Island Sound should have some consideration in a matter of this kind. The bill has been passed by the Senate to give the proposed relief, and I shall move to substitute the Senate bill and strike out the appropriation contained in it.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask how much this would cost?

Mr. HILL. Seventy-two thousand dollars.

Mr. COX. I object.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11867) to authorize the Georgia Pine Railway, of Georgia, to construct a bridge across the Flint River, a navigable stream in Decatur County, Ga.

The Clerk read the bill and amendments.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRIGGS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12008) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs to the buildings of the institution, including plumbing and steam heating apparatus, and for repairs to pavements within the grounds, $3,000.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, as I do not desire to occupy the time of the House when the question of appropriating $20,000,000 to carryout the treaty with Spain is raised, I simply take the floor now for the purpose of combating the idea advanced by some gentlemen on this side of the Chamber that the ratification of the treaty between the United States and Spain by the Senate of the United States creates a contract obligation on the part of the Government.

I can not and do not assent to such a proposition. I do not believe that anybody will deny that the ratification of a treaty by the Federal Senate, which has been negotiated by the President, makes that treaty the supreme law of the land. But if a provision of that treaty requires the concurrence of the House of Representatives in order to vitalize it, it is not the law of the land until this House concurs. The mere fact that this House is called upon to concur carries with it the implication that it may either concur or refuse to concur. The suggestion that the House of Representatives must necessarily, without the exercise of any volition on its part, vote $20,000,000 in order to carry out the stipulation of a treaty, as if it were a contract obligation of the Government, I do not believe to be sound.

Sir, it was contended by one of the most distinguished men this country ever produced that the concurrence of the House of Representatives should be had upon all treaties. That idea, however, has been discarded. But I do not intend for those holding the opinion which I entertain to be put in the attitude of obstructing an effort of the Government to carry out its contract obligations, nor would I vote for a bill embodying such a provision.

Speaking for my own constituency, sir, I can say that we accepted the stern arbitrament of arms, as settled at Appomattox, that human slavery should cease to exist on this continent and in the American possessions; and I am now unwilling that we should buy 10,000,000 of people at $2 a head, if every Federal Senate on earth should concur in the proposition. That is what it is—nothing more nor less than buying the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands at $2 a head. I am opposed to it. We are not only doing that, but, without the consent of Congress, the Administration is now undertaking to rivet on them the shackles of slavery and military oppression.

Even if I were satisfied as to the proposition of law advanced by some gentlemen, I believe I should have the approbation of my constituency if I refused to give my assent to this appropriation, even if it were to carry out a contract obligation of the Government; for if such a contract obligation exists it is in violation of the spirit and genius of our institutions and contrary to the teachings of the written law of the land.

Therefore, sir, when the opportunity is presented to me I shall vote against this bill and shall demand the yeas and nays, because I want to see how many members of this body there are who are willing to give their assent to paying $20,000,000 for the purchase of the Philippine Islands. I do not believe the American people approve that purchase. I do not believe it reflects the judgment of the people of this country. And I am satisfied that my position as a lawyer is sound, that as the Senate requires the concurrence of the House of Representatives in making this appropriation our free and voluntary consent is necessary in order to vitalize that provision. If we refuse to give our consent, it amounts to an acceptance of the treaty with an amendment, because that provision of the treaty can not go into effect until the House concurs. I repeat that if the House refuses to concur it is in the nature of an amendment of the treaty. That is all it does amount to.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman quote the language of the Constitution bearing upon this proposition?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The Constitution provides that the President may make treaties, by and with the consent of the Senate. That is all true. No one denies the proposition. But if the Senate sees proper to ratify a treaty——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman read the language of the Constitution?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] has expired.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. One moment more that I may answer the question of the gentleman from Texas. If the Senate sees proper to ratify a treaty embodying in it a provision which asks for the consent of the lower House of Congress, that provision does not become operative or effective until the consent of the lower House is given, and that alone can vitalize the treaty. And unless this House does concur voluntarily and freely, it is needless to take its opinion.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit this proposition to the gentleman from Kentucky. The Constitution makes the Senate and the President "the Government" in the making of treaties. Now, when the President and the Senate make a treaty with a foreign nation, that foreign nation deals with the Government. The Government, as recognized by the Constitution, obligates itself to pay a given amount of money. That obligation is complete. The Constitution itself says that the Senate and the President can make the treaty, and when made it is the supreme law of the land. Every nation in the world has a right to deal with us on the ground that the Senate and the President constitute our Government in the making of treaties.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. If the gentleman's reasoning is sound, the Senate of the United States can make a treaty that will disintegrate the Republic, and the House of Representatives will have no voice in the matter.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the gentleman——

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. As was very cogently said by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], the colleague of the gentleman who just asked the question, suppose the Senate of the United States had agreed to pay the entire expenses of the Spanish war and had said that the Congress should appropriate that amount. Would the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] contend that we were compelled to vote the appropriation?

Mr. BAILEY. Undoubtedly, if they had put it into a treaty. That is one of the weak places in any constitution. The House and the Senate by a bare majority of each could agree to pay every dollar of the Spanish debt, but I have no apprehension that we are going to do it. The President and the Senate could have contracted to pay the whole expenses of the Spanish war, but I have no fear that they will abuse that power. Now, the fact that a power might be abused is no argument against the existence of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. I took the gentleman's time in interrupting him because he is generally so clear and I so generally agree with him——

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I am very glad to have the interruption. The whole question turns upon the construction of the words in the Constitution relative to the power to make treaties. As to the provision of the Constitution giving to the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, the right to make a treaty, nobody disputes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Is it not a fact that the Constitution binds the judges to obey a treaty? And if they are bound to obey the treaty, are we not also bound to obey the treaty, which is declared to be the supreme law of the land?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I am not disputing the proposition that the Senate has a right to adopt a treaty and make it the supreme law of the land, but it has no right to adopt a treaty as the supreme law of the land which requires by its provisions the concurrence of the House of Representatives in order to vitalize it. If there had been no such proposition as the appropriation of $20,000,000, unquestionably nobody would dispute the correctness of the position taken by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. CARMACK. Does the gentleman hold, then, that the treaty is void?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. No, sir; I hold that until the House of Representatives concurs by making the appropriation, that article of the treaty is not finally ratified. Does the gentleman from Tennessee dispute that proposition?

Mr. CARMACK. I do.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Then why ask the House to vote the appropriation? Why not check from the Treasury the $20,000,000 of money upon the sole action of the Senate?

Mr. CARMACK. Of course the House has got to make the appropriation, but there can hardly be any important treaty made with a foreign power that does not require some action on the part of this House to effectuate it. The President and the Senate are the treaty-making power, and they have made the treaty.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. On the contrary, this is one of the few instances where the action of the House of Representatives has ever been required on any treaty.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Did we not pay $15,000,000 in 1848 for the territory which we then acquired from Mexico?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Certainly we paid that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And did we not pay $7,200,000 to Russia for the Territory of Alaska?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I am not opposed to an appropriation to pay for territory acquired; but I am opposed to this appropriation because we are not only going to buy the territory, but are also to buy the inhabitants of the territory.

Mr. BURKE. Did we buy the inhabitants in 1848?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. No, sir; we did not do that.

Mr. BURKE. Then why do we do it now?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. In the first place, there were very few inhabitants, and they were in favor of it, and in every acquisition of territory by the Government heretofore the instrument annexing the territory made the inhabitants citizens of this country if they so desired.

Mr. BURKE. Did we buy the inhabitants when we purchased Louisiana in 1803?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. No, sir.

Mr. BURKE. Were they consulted as to whether they would become a part of the United States?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. They sought to become a part of the United States. They wanted to become a part of the United States. But here we have an actual state of war existing, and those people over there are fighting for their liberty. Mr. Chairman, I say that one of the most affecting and humiliating sights in history is now witnessed in the Philippine Islands, where the American soldiers, under the Stars and Stripes, behind Maxim guns and Krag-Jorgensen rifles, are shooting down naked savages, who carry bows and arrows to fight for their homes and firesides. I do not propose to give my consent or sanction to such a proposition. I represent a free constituency on this floor, and I shall never give my sanction to vitalize a proposition or treaty that carries into execution such an infamous purpose as that. And I say now that the action of the Administration in shooting down those innocent islanders, with or without justification, will call down the condemnation of future generations and justify the curse of God upon any government that attempts it.

Mr. TAWNEY. How about the action of the Filipinos who shot down American citizens?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. If the actual truth could be arrived at, I suppose American citizens in the Philippine Islands forced them to assault them. I want to hear both sides of that question, I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. You ought to hear both sides before you condemn the Administration.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I know, without hearing anything, that it is wrong in principle, and it takes proof to justify the action of the Administration. If somebody should invade the fireside and home of the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota, I wot he would not be slow in taking up arms in its defense. We have no excuse or justification for it. I do not believe the American people approve it, and for my own part, sir, I do not intend to sanction it by my vote or voice.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted to me I shall speak on the currency problems of the United States.

Before proceeding with the discussion we must find some common ground to stand upon, else our facts will be ignored and our conclusions impotent.

All the data upon which I have formed what I shall say, and every fact and argument, are given more fully in part 2 of House Report 1575, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session.

THE GOLD STANDARD.

I do not second the cry for a new declaration for the gold standard, and thus admit that we were not put on a gold standard by Jackson, Benton, and a Democratic Congress in 1834, and have not had a gold standard ever since. Neither would I attempt to abolish any of our money, desirable as it may be to do so.

That would be attempting to take a second step before the first. And this notwithstanding we have four hundred millions more of gold and four hundred millions more of silver than economic conditions justify our having.

STATESMANSHIP.

Furthermore, I am of the opinion that we do not compliment our statesmanship by unnecessarily offending a single prejudice or false opinion.

SEVENTY MILLION DOLLARS WASTED.

I am for making as few changes as possible, in order to make rational fear of maintaining parity impossible, to give the South and West banking facilities, and to save the $70,000,000 per annum now needlessly wasted in maintaining parity by the Treasury.

BANKING AND CURRENCY CONDITIONS.

"The currency problems of the United States" are clearly revealed in a plain statement of our banking and currency conditions, as compared with those of France, Germany, England, and every other highly civilized nation.

While the countries named have systems varying to some degree, all may be said to be normal. That of France is built down from the top, having one bank, with branches extending into every community, like her government.

Our people insist that our banking and currency system shall be built up of units at the bottom, each bank independent of all others, as are the men in a town who together make the body politic.

FREE BANKING.

Our free banking law, allowing any five reputable citizens anywhere to form a bank by getting together the required capital, will never be abandoned, nor need it be.

A system individual as to each bank, but united into one solid structure for all purposes where union is necessary, will give us a banking and currency system as much superior to the banking and currency system of France as our institutions are on a more solid foundation.

BANKING COMPLETE IN ITSELF.

All human experience proves—

First. That it is not possible to have a sound banking and currency system in this country, as there never has been in any other, while it is not complete in itself. It must be wholly separated from any organic connection with the Government Treasury, as is that of France, Germany, England, and every other first-class country, the United States alone excepted.

UNION OF BANKS.

Second. That it is not possible to maintain the parity between paper money and gold where a multitude of independent banks exist, excepting by restricting the legal-tender coin to gold alone, as in England.

MAINTAINING PARITY.

Third. That where there are two or more kinds of legal-tender money, each differing widely from the others in intrinsic value, as paper, silver, and gold, it is impossible to maintain parity without making a union of all banks sufficiently solid to make each one and all equally responsible for maintaining the parity of all moneys in circulation and practically making all banks act together as one whole for maintaining parity, as in France, Germany, etc.

A MISERABLE FAILURE.

Nearly every government has tried the banking and currency experiment the United States is now trying, and everyone trying it has miserably failed.

There are no two opinions on our utter failure since 1893, especially in view of the fact that we are wasting $70,000,000 annually in trying the experiment. Up to 1893 it was the fashion to pronounce the financial and banking system of the United States the best the sun ever shone upon.

IMMEDIATE REFORM DEMANDED.

To-day there is scarcely a man in the country who has any interest in questions pertaining to economics, if there is even one who is not demanding its immediate reform.

WORST FINANCIAL SYSTEM IN THE WORLD.

Hon. James H. Eckels, ex-Comptroller of the Currency, in answer to a question by the chairman, said to the Banking and Currency Committee: "Yes; the United States has the worst financial and currency system of any leading nation."

Upon the above being read to Hon. Charles S. Fairchild, ex-Secretary of the Treasury, and his opinion asked, he replied: "I think it is the worst," and Secretary Gage concurred in Mr. Fairchild's statement.

NO TRUE BANK CURRENCY.

In fact, all writers on finance, banking, and currency are a unit in condemning our system, those of Europe declaring that there is not a dollar of "true bank currency" or really sound currency in the United States.

A brief examination will justify as thoroughly intelligent the unfavorable opinion of it generally held.

On January 1, 1899, we had of—

REDEMPTION GOLD.

It appears that France has gold in bank available for the current redemption of each $100 of her total of silver and paper a little over $32; Germany, $27; the United States Treasury, $19. Redemption gold in the United States Treasury, only $7.

The Secretary of the Treasury reports only $100,000,000 as "redemption gold," as he may well do, as the balance can be only ordinary money, in the Treasury, otherwise the Secretary would have only $45,000,000 free moneys.

This makes the percentage of gold to redeem $100 of silver and paper money only $7.70, instead of $19.70.

All the visible gold in this country would be "redemption gold" actually in the banks did the law require our banks to maintain parity. It would be $63.30 to each $100 of paper and silver money; double, instead of less than one-quarter, that of France.

It would be nearly twice and a half that of Germany, instead of a little more than one-quarter as now. It would give us eight and one-fifth times the redemption gold we now have. What words can be too hot in condemnation of such a condition of our finances?

But even this $100,000,000 of redemption gold in the Treasury, little as it seems as compared with the $800,000,000 we have in the country, would be ample for gold redemption were it legally liable for redemption purposes in the banking system of the country, instead of outside of it in the United States Treasury.

CAPITAL AND CASH RESERVE.

National and State banks of loan and discount have $560,000,000 of cash reserves and $1,350,000,000 of actual capital, a total of $1,910,000,000 to use in protecting $100,000,000 gold to maintain parity. They now have $532,000,000 of gold, more than twice as much as the total gold in the United States Treasury and more than five times as much gold as the Treasury has of gold to use in redemption, and yet they are under no legal obligation to redeem in gold, a dollar of paper money.

PROTECTING GOLD.

The banks have six and one-half times more funds that they can use in protecting gold than the total moneys in the United States Treasury.

They also have absolute power to protect every dollar of gold they have by raising the rates of discount, as is always done with perfect success in England, France, Germany, etc., while the United States Treasury is absolutely powerless to protect a dollar of its gold in good times or bad, from Israelite or Christian living in any part of the world.

Why do not currency reformers recommend the imposition of a straight legal obligation upon banks to redeem in gold?

The visible gold daily used is less than $10,000,000. Every empirical practice conceivable is recommended for a cure by the very men who know the only possible cure. This indubitable statement reveals what is really the most discouraging "banking and currency problem in the United States."

ENGLAND AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Only foreign commerce tests the "measure-of-value coin" in the banking system of any country that has a normal system. England, as the clearing house of the world, needs four times the gold that is needed in this country, and she has less than half as much.

BANKS SHOULD REDEEM IN GOLD.

But of the $438,000,000 of gold in Great Britain, her visible gold, viz, $235,000,000, is in her banking system, where it can be protected by her immense banking capital and cash reserves, by raising discount rates.

Her banks are required by law to bear the burden of redeeming in gold.

Our banks are absolved from this duty, which is fundamental to sound banking.

Germany has only $156,000,000 of gold in her banking system, which is protected by all the cash reserves held by banks plus their capital, and is also effectively protected by the power to increase rates on discounts.

So with France. To raise the rate of discount on loans is a quick and sure protection of gold in banks. Then why hesitate as to a remedy?

The absolute confidence, not only of every man in England but of the world, in the certainty of parity being maintained with gold of every dollar of paper money, and all banking funds as well, is not because of the amount of gold in England, for it is relatively very small, but because every dollar of her visible gold is in her banking system.

England has not one dollar in visible gold where we actually have three and a half; and, relatively to the demands on her gold, not one dollar where we have fourteen.

So with France, and so with Germany, and wholly because the visible gold is in banks, and banks are compelled by law to maintain parity by redeeming paper money in gold.

BANKS ONLY CAN MEASURE VALUES IN COIN.

There is no device known to man for legitimately using a "measure-of-value coin" excepting by banks, and that in exchanging evidences of debt, which again are titles to products; and there is no way of protecting gold in that function excepting in raising or lowering the rate of discount, a thing impossible to a public treasury.

EXPORTING AND IMPORTING GOLD.

There are hundreds of millions of dollars in the $2,500,000,000 of deposits in our banks waiting to be invested in bonds or stocks when they shall have been depreciated a little and to a price that will pay the buyer a larger income than normal.

Millions of these funds are controlled in Europe, as there are millions in European banks controlled in this country, that await investment in stocks and bonds when rates of discount are raised, so as to slightly depress the price of bonds to a point that will pay a little more than a normal income.

These stocks and bonds are always shipped from one country to another—gold only to a very slight amount. In 1891 the balance of exports over imports of gold, taking into account our gold production, only depleted our gold $700,000. In 1893 it depleted it $25,000,000. In the commercial agony of 1893 we actually gained $29,000,000 of gold. In 1894 our net loss was $41,000,000. Taking the bad years of 1893 and 1894 together, we lost only $12,000,000 of gold.

Balance of trade for or against a country is not a controlling influence in the movement of gold.

No one wants gold excepting in times when he thinks he may not be able to get it.

The certainty of getting gold "on demand," plus a higher rate of interest, will take gold to any place, regardless of whether that place has a sound or unsound currency and of every other circumstance or condition.

We increased our accumulations of gold by over $300,000,000 during suspension of specie payments.

A doubt of getting gold on demand or a lower rate of interest will send gold away from any place regardless of every other condition, as is proved by all experience.

DOUBT, FEAR, PANIC.

The seeds of doubt, fear, and financial panic inhere in and are inseparable from any system of government treasury issuing or redeeming paper money.

They may lie dormant, as they did in 1893, and as they do now, but we may be sure they are germinating.

The fury of each succeeding financial storm will exceed the previous one, even as that of 1893 did all that went before it. This is necessarily so.

The manufacturing, trading, transporting, and banking interests of the country are increasing with tremendous rapidity, and their delicacy and intricacy are increasing in a far greater ratio than their volume.

OUR INDUSTRIAL SYSTEM IN PERIL.

Every man that is so situated as to be compelled to study the situation can not help shuddering as he thinks of the peril to the whole industrial system of this country, involving billions on billions of dollars; far past human comprehension.

Their lifeblood is the two and a half billions of dollars of bank deposits, and these billions are made serviceable by $1,000,000,000 of currency, and that currency depends for its value on being instantly and certainly redeemable, and there is now only one hundred millions of gold legally liable for this redemption.

Even that gold is not in normal contact with our currency in our banking system, but stored away in the United States Treasury. It is as much outside the financial and banking system of the country as though it were held by any one of a thousand individuals, sole or corporate.

Remember the United States is only a huge business individual enterprise, with no more banking resources than any other person.

PAPER MONEY A TITLE TO PRODUCTS.

The whole theory and practice of sound paper money is that the person receiving it from the bank gives the bank a title to products in his possession, in his time note, to an amount equal to the amount of paper money he receives.

These products pay, cancel, and destroy the paper money he received for his time note when the note is paid.

The banks in this country have in their possession $2 worth of property over and above all they owe to depositors with which to redeem each dollar of silver and paper money in the country, provided they were responsible for such redemption. The United States Treasury has only 23 cents and 4 mills, supplemented by the power of taxation.

TREASURY RESPONSIBLE FOR ALL PAPER MONEY.

It will not do to reply that the Government is responsible only for the $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes.

When questioned before our committee, ex-Secretary of the Treasury Carlisle, ex-Secretary Fairchild, Secretary Gage, and Comptroller Eckles declared that, while the United States was responsible for keeping the parity between any two kinds of money in general circulation, it was inevitably responsible, in the last analysis, for keeping every dollar of existing money at a parity by gold redemption.

DUTY TO MAINTAIN PARITY INDIVISIBLE.

Again, the duty of maintaining parity is not susceptible of division. Two parties can not by any possibility be equally responsible.

NORMAL REDEMPTION ONLY POSSIBLE TO BANKS.

The very existence of sound paper money is only possible in a currency that has potential and actual daily gold redemption, and daily redemption is only possible in a "true bank circulating note," viz, a circulating note issued against their assets, and for which the bank receives the personal-property note (products) to a like amount with which to redeem the notes, such as are issued in England, France, Germany, and in every country excepting the United States.

A government is a consumer and destroyer of every dollar's worth of products it receives for the currency it issues, and in the nature of the case can legitimately have nothing with which to redeem the currency it pays out.

A bank is a preserver and increaser of every dollar's worth of products it receives in the time note of its customer for the currency it issues, and in the nature of the case must have in its possession more dollars' worth of products with which to redeem every dollar of its currency than it had when it paid it out for the personal time notes of its customers.

Currency issued by a bank is a certificate of actual deposit of products in the bank and their preservation.

Currency issued by a government is a certificate of the consumption of products.

UNSCIENTIFIC AND WASTEFUL.

Not only is our financial system the most unscientific and insecure of any ever devised that maintained its paper money at a parity with gold, but it is the most wasteful.

OPPRESSIVE TO AGRICULTURAL SECTIONS.

It especially oppresses those sections of the country that most need the fostering care of the Government, and as a consequence they voted for free silver in 1896.

Those States are nearly $500,000,000 short in banking funds as compared with the per capita in those same States in 1860, taking for a basis the nine oldest States in the group, while the New England, the Eastern, and the Middle States are overbanked by from 5 to 20 per cent. The proof of this is found in the fact that some of the banks in the richer States are obliged to buy bonds to employ their funds in excess of what they might legitimately buy as a reserve. They now hold about $600,000,000 of United States and other bonds.

Others are forced into reducing their capital, into consolidation or liquidation, by the savings banks and trust companies that own their stock.

INCREASES DISCOUNT RATES.

In the strictly agricultural States discount rates on commercial paper are from one-quarter to one-third higher than normal, and far higher than in 1860. Banks are practically prohibited in agricultural communities by the national banking law, and this because it compels abnormal banking.

Finance and banking are as old as civilization. Their present form and substance are as much the result of natural law as that of anything in animate or inanimate nature.

BANKING A NATURAL DEVELOPMENT.

The banking and currency of all nations follow the natural lines of development, varying only in minor details, excepting that of the United States. Ours departs widely from fundamental principles, and is therefore insecure and wasteful, as will appear if we examine the kinds and amount of our various forms of money.

We have of gold coin and bullion	$950,000,000
Silver coin	600,000,000
United States legal-tender notes	347,000,000
Currency certificates	20,000,000
Total money issued by the Government	1,917,000,000
National-bank notes	244,000,000
Total money in the country	2,168,000,000

Of this $1,500,000,000 of coin every dollar our people have proved they need or desire by actual use we must have. Every dollar more than that is actual waste.

Where paper money is as satisfactory to the people, 5 per cent interest is lost on every dollar of gold or silver needlessly used.

WASTEFULNESS ADMITTED.

Every one admits that where a thing costing $100 is used where a thing costing nothing will do the work as well, or better, wear and tear and interest is lost on $100. A friend of mine used 22 horses to do the work around his factories and 2 miles to the station. He put in an electric railway to the station, and now keeps only 2 horses.

For him to still incur the expense of the keeping, depreciation, and loss on the 20 horses discarded, because he once needed them, would be no more uneconomic and foolish than for this country to have a single dollar's worth of coin more than is necessary to make our currency sound plus what is demanded by our people to hoard or to use as currency, foolishly or wisely.

AMOUNT OF SILVER AND GOLD NEEDED.

We have only been able to keep in actual circulation, after spending thousands of dollars to get them into circulation, silver dollars to the amount of $65,000,000, and subsidiary silver, $70,000,000; a total of $135,000,000. Call our actual needs of silver money $200,000,000. We actually use $150,000,000 gold for hoarding and currency. One hundred million dollars redemption gold is in the Treasury, $250,000,000 only in daily legitimate use, thus leaving $700,000,000 gold absolutely out of reach of our banking system for a fundamental use, showing a chaotic condition in our banking and currency. England successfully conducted the exchanges of the world for forty years on less than $150,000,000 visible gold, but it was in bank. The Bank of England now has less than $200,000,000 with which to make the gold exchanges of the world.

HOW THE WASTE IS MADE.

Assuming we need $300,000,000 of gold in the "bank cash reserve held" in a sound banking system, we can safely have in addition $200,000,000 United States legal-tender notes and 200,000,000 silver dollars, making up the $700,000,000 cash reserve that would be needed when the South and the Northwest have the same amount of banking funds per capita they had in 1860. The exhibit under our present system and under a scientific system would be as follows:

Present gold in the country		$950,000,000
Need for hoarding and currency	$150,000,000
In cash bank reserves	300,000,000
		450,000,000
Unnecessary gold		500,000,000
We have silver	$600,000,000
Can use legitimately only	400,000,000
Unnecessary silver		200,000,000
Legal-tender notes	$346,000,000
Can use legitimately only	200,000,000
Unnecessary legal tender		146,000,000
Currency certificates		20,000,000
National-bank currency		244,000,000
Total amount of the money that should be bank paper money		1,110,000,000

Not one dollar of this is now earning a cent to the banks or saving one dollar of interest to the people by lowering discount rates.

This is an anomaly never before seen in any country where parity was maintained between paper money, silver money, and gold. In Germany, in France, and in every other country, this $1,110,000,000 would be earning full interest by keeping the rate of interest on loans down by the proportion that this $1,110,000,000 bears to the whole volume of discounts in the country, a total sum at 5 per cent on it, or $55,500,000.

LOSS OF INTEREST ON TREASURY BALANCES.

But we are also carrying in the public Treasury $291,000,000, while England, France, and Germany average about $30,000,000, leaving $260,000,000 more than is necessary, provided we had a sound financial system.

We must continue to carry this vast amount, as we have done for twenty years, in order to give the people confidence that the Treasury is able to maintain parity.

This again is worth 5 per cent in the pockets of the people before it was taken from them in taxes, or $13,000,000.

LOSS IN TREASURY ADMINISTRATION.

In addition to this it costs to administer our Treasury system, because of our violation of the principle of normal banking, about $1,500,000 more than it costs any other nation. These three items, aggregating $70,000,000, are utterly wasted.

That these things are incontestibly true, is shown by the testimony of Secretary Gage, ex-Secretary Fairchild, given on incidental matters, and the other experts who came before our committee.

AMOUNT OF PAPER MONEY NEEDED.

Assuming that there is a legitimate demand for the amount of money we have and that this $1,200,000,000 that requires gold redemption was issued by our banks, as the paper money of France and Germany is issued, our bank loanable funds would be increased by this $1,200,000,000.

HIGHER DISCOUNT RATES COMPELLED.

Interest rates now compelled in order to pay 6 per cent dividends on bank capital would then be reduced just as much as it would be by adding $1,200,000,000 to the deposits, or as this sum is to about $4,000,000,000 capital and deposits and currency, less the reserve, three-tenths of 1 per cent, or from 5 per cent to 3½ per cent.

REDUCTION IN INTEREST TO AGRICULTURAL STATES.

This reduction of present rates of discount would not come to the overbanked cities of the middle North and Northeastern States, but wholly to the agricultural sections of the country, where only currency can be used, and where the having of banks is impossible, without the privilege of issuing "true bank currency."

It would come especially in those States which voted for soft money in 1896 and which are now short of banking funds by nearly half a billion dollars.

As it is to-day, not a dollar is added to the loanable funds of our banks by this $1,200,000,000 of redeemable money.

CURRENCY AND DEPOSITS IDENTICAL.

Deposits entered on the pass book of a borrower and currency issued by a bank to a borrower are identical in substance.

In the case of deposits the check that draws out the deposit is made by the depositor.

In the case of currency, which in substance is identical with the check, it is made by the bank and given to the borrower at the time the loan to him was made.

The borrower uses currency at any time, as the check can be used at any time. The check can only be passed from man to man by each writing his name on the back of it, but, whoever holds it, it is his check on his funds in the bank.

Currency passes from man to man without indorsement, but it remains a bank check of the man who holds it against his funds in the bank.

USE OF UNITED STATES BONDS OPPRESSIVE.

There is no more sense in requiring a bank to buy United States bonds to the amount of the obligations it assumes in accepting the proceeds of a man's time note that it discounts and gives him its own currency notes for, than there would be in compelling the bank to buy United States bonds to the amount of obligations it assumes in accepting deposits and allowing the man himself to make his own currency to draw it out, viz, his own check.

When a bank discounts a time note for a customer for $1,000 and the proceeds are left on deposit, its funds are not depleted by one cent so long as the deposit remains. When a bank discounts a time note for a customer for $1,000 and the proceeds are given the customer in "true bank currency," such as banks issue in every country in the world excepting this, its funds are not depleted one cent so long as the currency is not returned to the bank for redemption.

When the bank is obliged to surrender as many dollars in buying bonds as it gets of currency, its capital is depleted by every dollar of currency it has in the bank.

CITY BANKS FAVORED—COUNTRY BANKS OPPRESSED.

Because city banks are allowed to do business by accepting the only form of deposits their customers can use, viz, bank deposits, and country banks are not allowed to do business by using the only form of deposits their customers can use, viz, currency in the hand of the borrower, interest is necessarily nearly twice as high in the country as in the central reserve cities.

If the $650,000,000 deposits now in the banks in the central reserve cities were taken off their books by the issue to their customers of $650,000,000 of currency, and their customers were compelled to use this currency instead of their own checks and drafts, it would greatly inconvenience their customers, but it would not increase the risk of the banks by the smallest fraction.

UNITED STATES, FRANCE, GERMANY.

This fact is recognized in every European country, and was acted on in this country up to 1860.

The national banks in the central reserve cities have $4.33 in deposits and 12 cents in currency to each dollar of capital. Total, $4.45. The Imperial Bank of Germany has $4.59 in deposits and $10.85 currency to each dollar of capital. Total, $15.44. The Bank of France has $2.64 in deposits and $21.05 currency to each dollar of capital. Total, $28.69. Can anyone be found so rash as to assert that the Imperial Bank of Germany is made any less secure than our banks for the reason that its deposit liability in the form of currency issued is 90 times that of our banks, or that the Bank of France is any less secure because it has a deposit liability in the form of currency issued 175 times as great as have our banks for currency issued?

Banks in cities can not issue currency. Their customers can not use it. City business requires checks, drafts, etc., identical in substance with bank currency. The customers of banks in strictly country districts can not use checks, drafts, etc. Their business requires currency.

For this reason the national banking law practically discourages banks in all strictly agricultural districts and States.

CITY AND COUNTRY RATES COMPARED.

Banks in strictly agricultural States to-day would have to charge 7.34 per cent under precisely the same conditions as to loans that New York banks can loan for 2.98 per cent, each to pay 6 per cent dividend on stock.

Under the European system, or under the best banking system the world ever saw, viz, the old New England Suffolk system, rates of discount on loans in the country districts to-day would be about 4.55 per cent.

As I have before said, four-fifths of the $70,000,000 taxation, direct and indirect, falls on the people of the States voting for soft money in 1896, not in banks charging higher rates of interest, as the few that exist surely do, but in the oppressions arising from their lack of banks, being to-day about $500,000,000 short of banking funds as compared with 1860.

If this does not justify men in voting for free coinage, in their desperation, it certainly furnishes them some excuse.

CHANGE IN SENTIMENT.

Up to the date of my address before the department of commerce and finance of the World's Fair at Chicago, on June 21, 1893, in exposition of the anomalies and hardships of our national banking law, I had always heard our banking and currency system extolled as the best the world had ever seen. In six years all this is reversed. To day there is no one well informed in the matter who does not think it the most unscientific and wasteful.

Having the facts that show its shortcomings, we are brought to the question of what is the least change in the banking law that is necessary to remedy existing evils.

SOURCE OF EXISTING EVILS.

(1) The fundamental evil is in requiring the United States Treasury to redeem any part of the money used, in order to maintain parity.

(2) The prohibition to banks of the issuing of "true bank currency," as banks do in every other country, by requiring them to buy bonds to the amount of the currency they issue, thus absorbing the capital invested in bonds.

REMEDY.

Combine our banks through clearing houses, and make them legally responsible for the maintenance of parity, and allow each bank to issue currency to the amount of its capital, without robbing it of its paid-in capital in the purchase of bonds, and our banking and currency system will be transformed from the worst in the world to the best in the world.

REMEDIES PROPOSED THAT WOULD NOT CURE.

There have been considered in the Committee on Banking and Currency five general bills:

(1) The Carlisle bill of December 11, 1894, H. R. 8149, Fifty-third Congress.

In the hearings on this bill the "Baltimore plan" of October 11, 1894, was considered.

(2) Gage bill of December 16, 1897, H. R. 5181, Fifty-fifth Congress.

(3) Indianapolis commission bill of January 6, 1898, H. R. 5855, Fifty-fifth Congress.

(4) McCleary bill of April 5, 1898, H. R. 9725, Fifty-fifth Congress.

(5) Hill-Fowler bill of May 11, 1898, H. R. 10289, Fifty-fifth Congress.

TRUE REMEDY.

In addition to these, there is the Walker bill, introduced in 1889, which has been a constant study since, and modified from time to time to May 13, 1898, and is now H. R. 10333.

I have held this bill back from formal consideration in order that all other bills might be first considered.

The result is that it never has been formally considered by the committee. I will venture first to say a few words of that bill.

First. It relieves the United States Treasury from all responsibility for the current redemption of any kind of money by putting it on the only organizations known to man that can legitimately maintain parity, viz, banks.

Second. It takes the United States bonds out of the banking system and allows banks to issue "true bank currency."

All currency is issued to banks by the Comptroller and guaranteed by the Government in case of insolvency.

A tax of one-fifth of 1 per cent is put upon the currency in actual circulation, which it is estimated will yield four times the amount necessary to the guaranty.

Third. It saves sixty of the seventy millions now lost in direct and indirect taxation.

These three things, and only these, does it propose to do, and it surely does them.

It retains every real advantage of our national system.

It makes national the old New England Suffolk bank system.

BAD STATE BANKS.

The memory of the wild-cat banks of Michigan, Illinois, and the Northwest, with a few swindling concerns in Mississippi and the extreme Southwest before 1863, together with the bond-secured system of New York, has closed the minds of our people to the excellencies of the old State banks of New England, the Atlantic States, and Louisiana.

They were as sound and as well managed as our national banks, and with less insolvency.

Of course we can not go back to State banks now, but we should incorporate into our national system all the good there was in them.

SUCCESS A DUTY.

Again, we must not forget that success in legislation is a duty in trying to secure reforms in our finances, as it is in everything else.

THINGS THAT CAN NOT BE DONE.

We must therefore ascertain what the people will not allow to be done, as well as what ought to be done, in order to know on what lines we can proceed in reform.

First. They will not allow the United States legal-tender notes to be retired either by selling bonds, using the surplus revenues, or by changing them into gold certificates; and Congressmen will not face defeat in voting for such propositions.

Second. They will not allow a law to be passed that in terms demonetizes the silver dollar by setting aside a gold fund to redeem them, and thus invite their presentation to the Treasury to be redeemed in gold.

Third. The people will never consent to allow banks to put in circulation any currency not gotten of the Comptroller of the Currency and the payment of which is not guaranteed by the United States; and this because of the memory of the few bad State banks, which has tainted the memory of all State banks, good and bad alike.

Every bill formally considered by the committee runs counter to all three of these settled convictions of the people.

REMEDIES PROPOSED AGGRAVATE ADMITTED EVILS.

As every remedy proposed in each one of the five bills formally considered by the committee is incorporated in the Hill-Fowler bill, and as that bill was adopted by the Indianapolis convention as the final result of all financial wisdom, we need consider that only.

DIVIDING TREASURY FUNDS

Its propositions are:

First. To separate the money in the Treasury into two parts, the one part to be used for general purposes and the other part to be an "issue and redemption fund" set apart to redeem legal-tender notes and silver dollars, to be administered under rigid rules embedded in statute law.

The proposed division is purely a matter of administration. It can be so done to-day without legislation.

Nothing could be worse than to bind the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury in the use of any part of his funds by rigid law.

Every business man knows that the financial manager of a corporation, in an exigency, must have every dollar of its funds at his command.

With part tied up out of reach, failure may be inevitable, when the crisis might be tided over could the last dollar of its resources be used. The same is true of the United States Treasury.

How, then, can two "tills" in which to keep the Government money instead of one avert or allay panic?

There would be two funds to watch and to alarm the people instead of one. The division of Treasury funds, in essence, can be nothing more than a question of bookkeeping as far as liability is concerned.

This ignis fatuus has its origin in the two departments of the Bank of England.

That division of funds has never been approved by a single financial institution anywhere by its example being followed.

It has confessedly intensified every panic in England, and has been suspended in emergencies.

It is condemned by every European financial writer and by most of those in England. It is treated as a matter of bookkeeping by nearly all writers on finance.

DESTROYING LEGAL-TENDER NOTES AND MAKING BANK NOTES LEGAL TENDER.

Second. It is proposed to destroy the present United States legal-tender note and allow the banks to issue the same amount in a purely bank note, and make these bank notes legal tender.

Is it conceivable that this operation can help our case? And this is to be done by compelling the banks to buy what are called "reserve bank notes" and pay United States legal-tender notes for them, the latter to be destroyed.

But the gold redemption of these reserve notes is not put on the banks that issue them, but is put on the United States Treasury.

Nowhere in the bill is the responsibility for redeeming a dollar of paper money put upon the banks. How, then, can this scheme relieve the Treasury in the slightest degree?

A GOLD RESERVE TO REDEEM SILVER DOLLARS.

Third. It is proposed ultimately to retire all United States "legal-tender notes," and these "bank-reserve notes" as well, but still to leave the United States Treasury responsible for the maintenance of parity.

The bill requires a gold reserve equal to 5 per cent of our silver money to be kept in the Treasury.

Secretary Gage, ex-Secretary Fairchild, and all witnesses before us agreed that the Treasury was really liable for the gold redemption of every dollar of the $1,200,000,000 of redeemable money.

They also said that for every dollar of Government paper withdrawn or canceled this large sum would still be kept good by the issuing of additional bank currency.

How, then, can the slightest relief come to the Treasury by retiring $346,000,000 of one kind of paper money and adding a like amount of another kind of paper money, when the Treasury is equally obliged to redeem all paper money?

How can it relieve the Treasury to withdraw the $346,000,000 legal-tender notes and pay out the $100,000,000 gold now held in the Treasury for the redemption of all moneys, and substitute by law $600,000,000 of silver for legal-tender notes as gold extractors from the Treasury, and depend upon $30,000,000 of gold instead of $100,000,000 for the redemption of all moneys?

It is true the bill proposes that no paper money shall be issued to banks under $10; but this is bad, and only bad. It deprives the country banks of their rights to the tune of $274,000,000 of the $5-note money we now have and can be no relief to the situation.

But we are told that there will be such a demand for this $600,000,000 of silver certificates that the banks can not get any of them to present to the Treasury for gold when we only have in $1, $2, and $5, in all kinds of paper money, a total of $377,000,000.

Let us see how this works out.

Paper money in common use by the people averages to be deposited in banks five times a year.

That shows that $250,000,000 of these silver certificates must necessarily be deposited in banks by retail merchants every month or they can not pay their debts.

Is there any doubt about foreign bankers and traders getting all the silver money they want to demand, any amount of gold of the Treasury they choose to ask for?

BANKS TO ISSUE TAXED PAPER MONEY WITHOUT GOVERNMENT GUARANTY.

Fourth. The next proposition is to allow all banks to issue currency secured by bonds up to the amount of 40 per cent to capital; then they may issue 60 per cent against assets.

This 60 per cent has no Government guaranty; the last 20 per cent of this 60 per cent is to be taxed at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

Remember, city banks can not use currency, because it would come back to them the next morning through the clearing house.

This tax, therefore, all falls on country banks. Our present $1,200,000,000 of redeemable money is 90 per cent of the actual capital of State and national banks. The country banks can average to circulate 80 per cent; minimum, 60; maximum, 100; average, 80 per cent.

Let us see how this bill works out as between one extreme, the central reserve city banks, and the other extreme, the strictly country banks.

OPPRESSIVE TO COUNTRY BANKS.

It requires the country banks, as a license fee to do business, to buy United States bonds to ten times the amount that the city banks must buy, and also to take out twice the amount of reserve notes the city banks buy, and pay for them in legal-tender notes.

It fails to recognize that bank currency is identical with deposits.

Why does not the bill require the central reserve city banks to pay the same tax on their deposits in excess of 80 per cent to capital; as the country banks are required to pay on their deposits in the form of currency issued?

The city banks are to pay nothing, while the country banks would have to pay $1,800,000. The Bank of Germany under this rule would be obliged to pay in taxes on the notes it issues $17,000,000, and the Bank of France $42,000,000 per annum. If the central reserve city banks were treated the same as country banks, they would have to pay in annual taxes $31,000,000.

Need any more be said to show how unscientific as well as unjust to country banks such a provision would be?

DEPRECIATES THE QUALITY OF OUR PAPER MONEY.

Fifth. The propositions, if enacted into law, would make paper money no better by making it any more safe, freely issued, abundant, uniform, or elastic than now—in many of these respects not as good.

TO BREAK THE ENDLESS CHAIN.

Again, it is claimed that this bill, if enacted, will break the "endless chain."

I really do not think, bad as it is, that the bill is as bad as that. We all know that the condition precedent to the existence of the poorest kind of promise to pay that can be called money is that it is in its circulation an "endless chain."

When it really stops moving in potential and actual gold redemption it is indeed very poor stuff. So much for the final effort at financial reform.

CITY BANKS CAN NOT KEEP THEIR CURRENCY IN CIRCULATION.

Because banks in large cities can not keep any considerable amount of currency in circulation in normal times is no reason why they should not take out true bank currency, as it would be no expense to them when not in circulation under a proper banking law.

Banks in cities doing a country business can probably keep in circulation an amount equal to 10 to 20 per cent to capital; but the average in all banks would be scarcely 5 per cent. It did not average 10 per cent in 1860, when far more could be used by city banks than now.

This would leave about $200,000,000 of currency in the reserve cities that might be deposited in the clearing houses as an "emergency fund," being contributed to the clearing house in each city pro rata to capital.

This fund could be loaned to banks to the amount of 75 per cent of face value of approved commercial paper deposited as security.

Such an arrangement would not be open to the objections that lie against a "clearing-house currency."

A LIMITED UNION OF ALL BANKS NECESSARY.

To unite all banks of loan and discount under the sanction of law, through clearing houses, is fundamental to any relief to the situation so long as we have two or more legal-tender moneys.

Let the United Kingdom wake up some fine morning and find in her legal-tender money one-half the amount of silver we have, and at 16 of silver to 1 of gold she would be on a silver basis in a week, unless her independent banks were in some way united into a solid union to maintain parity.

Let the Bank of France be divided into as many independent banks as she has branches, and she could by no possibility maintain parity between her paper money, silver, and gold.

THE UNION OF ALL BANKS NOW EXISTS.

We now do it, through the union of all the banks, in the United States Treasury, and by the Treasury being a member of the New York clearing house, but at an enormous expense and great daily peril, as I have shown.

BAD LEGISLATION SHOULD BE RESISTED.

Can I be justly criticised for not favoring a scheme that would pile up several hundred millions more than there now is in the Treasury and increase expenses by ten to fifteen millions per annum, and then leave us in a worse plight than we now are?

WHY NOT REFORM BY DEGREES?

But why not reform our currency by degrees, allowing the people the benefit of a part now?

Yes; why not build a bridge across a river, requiring four arches, by installments, building one arch and let the people use that, and a few years later the second, and so on? No relief can come to travel without a completed bridge. So with banking and currency reform.

Let me say again:

First. To abolish reasonable fear and to prevent 1893 panics the United States Treasury must be relieved from the current redemption of all paper money and of maintaining parity.

Second. The maintaining parity must be devolved by law on the only agency known to man that is capable of discharging that function, viz, banks.

Third. Securely uniting all commercial banks through clearing houses, by law, to maintain parity, and leave them as independent in all other things as now.

Fourth. Restore to banks the right to issue currency against their assets, enjoyed by all other banks the world over and by every bank in this country until the people were robbed of it in 1863 in order to levy a forced loan upon them to make a market for bonds.

THE DOMINANCE OF PETTY AMBITIONS.

Finally, no man or class of men have any moral right to force themselves between the people for their personal aggrandizement, insisting on any particular bill, and refusing to consider the array of official figures and facts conclusive in the matter that I have presented here and elsewhere.

WISDOM, PREJUDICE, ETC.

Neither must it be forgotten, as it has been thus far, that every form of wisdom, prejudice, and ignorance that pervades the masses of our people is represented in Congress, and must be reckoned with.

Any bill drawn by any man that makes sure each of the four things necessary to complete the financial bridge should have the support of every one of us.

Any bill that fails in any one of them would be an economic and political blunder equal to a crime. It would not compliment our statesmanship and should have our active opposition.

STATEMENT OF USE OF GOLD ELABORATED.

The misapprehension as to the use made of gold arises from the fact that the movement of gold is not studied upon the facts of its actual use and the ascertained facts brought to the test of inductive reasoning, but rather upon the assumption of error to be fact, and then deducing certain alleged facts from the errors and proclaiming them for truth.

TWO REALMS OF WEALTH: BANKS OF LOAN AND DISCOUNT; TRUST COMPANIES.

There are two realms of wealth, the borders of which are constantly changing and apparently intermingling, viz: Productive wealth, mostly real estate and its developments, and consumable wealth, mostly products and their making and handling.

Gold coin (as coin) can not be consumed and can earn no income. It is neither productive wealth nor consumable wealth. It simply measures the value expressed in all paper obligations.

Banks of discount, currency and coin, about $4,000,000,000, are inextricably mixed together, each being a part of the other. They handle only consumable wealth, valued at $25,000,000,000. They are very slightly affected by the handling of or the movement of productive wealth.

Saving banks, loan and trust companies, investment companies, building and loan companies, insurance companies, cooperate banks, benefit associations, etc., as well as individuals, unlike banks of discount and deposit, handle productive wealth, exclusively, valued at $40,000,000,000. Each class of moneyed institutions fails in the sphere of the other. While wealth is always in process of being transferred from one realm to the other, the percentage of transfers as compared with the whole volume, in normal conditions, is infinitesimal and of no appreciable influence. The balance in such movements only shows that the accumulations in one realm can be more profitably employed in the other.

MONETARY CRISES OR PANICS.

Monetary crises or panics always begin in the realm of consumable wealth. Demands are then immediately made on the productive realm to supply any vacuum made by a panic in the consumable realm for stocks, bonds, etc., for export, that otherwise would have to be answered by gold. Of course it is individuals embarrassed by the panic that have to furnish these so-called solid securities. The popular forms of expression are, as to particular persons, "He has gone too deeply into real estate or railroading" and "He tried to own his plant when he ought to have hired it," etc.

GOLD SCARCELY MOVES.

For the reason given gold never actually "moves" in large volumes. It is inevitable that millions of bonds and stocks take the place of gold, as all experience prove they do. The following tables establish and enforce these facts, as they show gold scarcely ever moves to any great amount.

GOLD FREE TO MOVE.

When currency and coinage laws leave gold free to move in compliance with the laws of trade, it is in accordance with all business experience that gold never moves from or into any country to any amount greater or smaller than is necessary to restrain or induce to normal conditions the business activity of the country, any more than the balls of the regulator of the engine describe a circle of more or less diameter than is necessary to keep the engine at its normal speed.

IMPORTING OR EXPORTING GOLD.

The importing or exporting of gold is regulated by the imperative demands of the foreign trade of a country, and is not actual to any extent but potential. The things really imported or exported for gold, their price being forced up or down to cause the doing of it, are stocks and bonds, titles to productive wealth brought out of the realm of productive wealth into the realm of consumable wealth to be imported or exported, as the case may be, in place of gold.

PAPER-MONEY OBLIGATIONS.

Of course every money obligation known to finance in banking, as paper money, note, or draft, is a title to the whole or some part of consumable wealth. Whether it be near or at the antipodes is wholly immaterial to the bank. The financier or banker takes no cognizance of the location or movement of products to which he has a title. He cares only for their value and safety. Therefore, whether the merchant in Chicago or Cincinnati buys products in San Francisco, New York, Liverpool, Paris, China, Japan, or Mexico, obligations of ownership of which come into possession of a banker, their payment has no influence on the movement of the world's measure of value metal between countries, whether it be silver or gold, as payment is not made in gold, but in titles to products.

NO TRADE BETWEEN COUNTRIES.

There is no trade between countries. The ocean or national boundaries are not known to trade. All trade is between individuals. The movement of gold across the ocean has no more significance than its movement across any parallel of latitude or longitude. As the world's measure is now a grain of gold, I use the word gold for brevity. The ownership of products being in any country, or the movement of products themselves from one country to another, gives no hint of what the movement of gold will be.

POPULAR BELIEF.

The law of the movement of gold is as inexorable but different from the law governing the movement of other products. That the popular belief as to how and why gold is required for shipment from one city to another, or from one country to another, has no foundation in fact is abundantly proven by the annexed tables. When, why, or how economic law, left free to act, as it is not in this country, will compel the actual shipment of gold is not easy of statement in a paper like this.

MEN STRUGGLE FOR PRODUCTS.

A struggle for gold between individuals or nations is apparent rather than real. It is really the struggle of men for products and of titles to products to adjust the balances in exchange that is seen. When the point is reached for gold shipments, increased discount rates for business paper always depreciate stocks and bonds, and these titles to fixed property are shipped instead of gold. It is the same as the repression of and the struggle of steam for release from confinement that gives power to the engine—gold acting in the movement of products as the regulator does to the engine. It is as objectionable, and no more so, as is the struggle of water to find its level that causes it to turn the water wheel that moves thousands of spindles. It is the duplicate in ethics of the struggle of conflicting truths to adjust themselves in practical and beneficent results in advancing civilization. Commercial gold is the "regulator" to commerce as surely as the engine regulator is to it.

ACTUAL SHIPMENT OF GOLD.

These tables show that an actual shipment or movement of gold does not depend upon and is not influenced by the fact that the balance of trade is for or against a city or country, or whether a city or country is a debtor or creditor city or country, but wholly upon the condition of the credit of the holder of gold, whether it is good or bad, and whether his credit is becoming better or getting worse. They also show that individuals and nations use less and less gold as they advance in intelligence, are more peaceful, and are richer.

We now use only $6,000,000 or $8,000,000 of coin a day for domestic trade and to export. Let a proper banking bill become a law, with a proper clearing-house system, and not $2,000,000 a day would be used when all banks in the country are operating under it.

INTERNATIONAL CLEARING HOUSE.

With the establishment of an international clearing house, which is soon to come, scarcely more than that sum would be used each day in the whole world. In fact, as extremes always meet, and as there is nothing new under the sun, and all things come again, the time is soon coming when all the clearings of the world's commerce will be made each day, by telephone and telegraph, at a single point. It will be simply the changing of gold at a central point from one account to another in a clearing house, as in the days when the balances of the commerce of the world were settled in the Bank of Venice, but little gold going in or coming out of that bank, and by the simple transfer from one account to another of the final balance of each merchant in all countries in the world's commerce.

THE GOLD PROBLEM.

The difficulty economists and financiers now find in the use of silver is as sure to confront us as to gold, only with tenfold more difficulty, before fifty years are passed as anything not yet proved by actual occurrence. Inventions and new methods are fast relegating nearly all the coin currency of commerce to innocuous desuetude.

It is foreign commerce only that tests the "measure-of-value metal" as to quantity in any financial system, according to the theory of those who fear gold depletion. Experience rightly settles all economic questions. England has maintained gold payments for eighty years by having from 5 to 6 per cent of visible gold to her total commerce.

The United States has had for years from 16 to 18 per cent of visible gold to her foreign commerce. Again, the United States accumulated over $300,000,000 of gold during the suspension of specie payments. India exports and imports her gold freely and in large quantities, as does Mexico, China, Japan, and all other silver countries—as to that matter, as do all gold-measure-value countries. These two facts alone confound the popular theory as to the demands for and movement of gold.

The United States, again, exports gold averaging 24 per cent of gold to the balance in her favor of exports over imports of merchandise, while England does exactly the contrary. The United States produces from her mines 33 per cent more than her excess of exports.

England, contra to the United States, imports from 4 to 8 per cent of gold to the excess of her imports over her exports. This again proves the popular theory of the movement of gold a delusion.

The figures of production and accumulation of gold are exceedingly interesting, and confusing as well, excepting to those who "know it all."

The world's production of 1891 to 1897, inclusive, was $1,254,922,600.

In that time the visible gold in England increased	$48,732,500
In that time the visible gold in France increased	118,752,900
In that time the visible gold in the United States increased	28,673,587
In that time the visible gold in Germany increased	32,250,300
Increase of visible gold in the four countries	228,409,287

Where the other $1,026,513,313 is, is only known to the wise ones who know all there is to know about the movement of gold. The world's production of gold is increasing with very great rapidity, going from $131,000,000 in 1891 up to $237,500,000 in 1897. Of course we have no means of ascertaining the amount of commercial gold in India or any other "silver measure of value" country, but India has exported more than she has imported from the years 1891 to 1894, inclusive, $22,000,000 in gold, and produces none.

With a balance of trade in favor of India in 1891 of $183,000,000, she also imported $11,000,000 of gold. In 1892, with a balance of trade in her favor of $191,000,000, she exported $13,000,000 of gold. In 1893, with a balance of trade in her favor of $134,000,000, she imported $3,000,000. With exports over imports of merchandise in 1894 of $168,000,000, she exported $23,000,000 of gold.

The United States from 1891 to 1897 has exported in excess of her imports of gold the enormous sum of $224,976,000, but she has increased in that time her store of visible gold by $73,715,000, as she has produced $298,691,000 in gold.

CAUSES OF THE MOVEMENT OF GOLD.

What, then, do these gold tables and gold figures prove, especially with the example of the Bank of England before us? Absolutely nothing, excepting that the statements made as to the causes of the actual movement of gold have not the slightest foundation in fact.

Second. That just so far as the credit of banks is above the slightest suspicion and interest rates rise above the normal level will gold flow to them, and that just so far as there is a doubt of the future ability or inclination of bankers to pay gold, or as they reduce interest below the normal level, will gold flow from them.

Third. That trade is in no wise between nations, but is always between individuals, and knows no national boundaries, tariffs or no tariffs, excepting as tariffs help or hinder trade between individuals in one country and individuals in another country; that it is arrant nonsense to talk of the boundaries of a country having any more relation to the movement of gold than do the lines of latitude or longitude.

DISPUTE EVERY POPULAR THEORY.

Space will not allow a thorough analysis of the gold tables. Studying them, any candid man will be convinced beyond question that they dispute every popular theory concerning gold and show it practically to stand still in every country, without regard to trade balances or whether the countries are what are called "debtor countries" or "creditor countries," and that each must of necessity have the gold necessary to it to carry on the foreign commerce of the country, whether silver or gold measure of value countries.

HOW GOLD MEASURES VALUE.

Gold measures value in exchanging paper obligations, which are potentially products themselves, precisely as do scales and measures in the warehouses of countries, and this regardless of whether the country is a gold measure of value country or silver measure of value country.

About 1874 every country found itself being overloaded with silver coin. Now every country is being overloaded with gold coin as well. The production of gold is also rapidly increasing, while the necessity for its use, especially in commercial transactions, is rapidly decreasing. New commercial devices, needing no coin, are very rapidly coming into use. It is therefore clear that the next generation will be confronted with a "gold problem" beside which the "silver problem" of this generation is child's play.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, January 17, 1899.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I listened with much interest to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] a few moments ago. He speaks with his usual clearness and happy facility, but in this particular I think he is wrong. As a mere matter of bare technical law he is perhaps right. While the Constitution vests in the Senate and the President the treaty-making power, it also vests in the House of Representatives the right to originate appropriations. There can be no doubt of the fact that the House has the bare legal power, if it chooses to exercise it, not to carry a treaty into execution by refusing to make the appropriations necessary for it.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman misstated the Constitution when he said that the House only has the power to originate appropriations. He means revenue bills.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, that is true, too—bills that carry money. What I meant to say was that the consent of the House is necessary to make appropriations—to take money out of the Treasury—whether to comply with the provisions of a treaty or for any other purpose. There are considerations higher, both from a national and a party standpoint, than the technical legal power of the House. The nations of the world take notice of the fact that the Senate and the President constitute the treaty-making power. When, therefore, they make a treaty, and it is necessary to make appropriations in order to carry that treaty into effect, although there is no doubt of the fact that the House must vote the appropriations in order that they may become a charge upon the Treasury, and although there is no doubt of the fact that the House has the right to refuse to vote them, still such conduct would put us, in the eyes of the nations of the world, in the attitude of repudiating an international obligation.

A treaty is a national law and an international contract.

Wisely or unwisely, the treaty was made; rightfully or wrongfully, if we refuse to make the appropriation, the world will take the view of it which I have indicated. We as a nation can not afford to put ourselves in that attitude. Now, speaking for this side of the House, as a party we can not afford to attack what I believe to be this infamous colonizing and imperial system at a false point of attack. We can not afford to make the main part of our attack on the money consideration that is involved in it. That is a mere bagatelle in comparison with the results that will follow our proposed new departure in national policy and in our international relations.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Is not the power of the House failing to make this appropriation precisely the same as the power to refuse to make appropriations for any other obligation?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Absolutely the same power; the bare legal power.

Mr. SWANSON. Suppose this House refuses to appropriate the $20,000,000 that is a part of the contract and treaty with Spain. We have failed to fulfill our part; then Spain would have the right to take the Philippine Islands back, if she felt so disposed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, of the fact that we have entered into a treaty with Spain under which there are $20,000,000 accruing from us to her and the consideration of the possession of the Philippines accruing from her to us. Should we fail to pay the consideration accruing from us to Spain, it would give Spain a just casus belli—that is, the right to declare the armistice ended, and to reinstitute war.

There is, of course, as a matter of fact, not a citizen of the United States who does not know the fact that Spain could not in her helpless and impotent condition take advantage of the fact of our breach of agreement and that she had on that account a just casus belli, and there would be no war; but that does not change the principle. So that we must live upon that important principle and must consider the question solely from the standpoint of the international obligation which rests upon us as one of the nations of the earth, and our party must consider that when we attack this infamous policy we must go to the very heart and root of the thing itself, and not waste our energies in trying to lop off one of its branches. I do not care about the $20,000,000 so far as the people of this country are concerned, although I believe that I have established a reputation here of being one of those men who favor an economic administration of the Government in all of its branches; but there are questions in comparison with which money is as the leaves that fall from the tree, and it being necessary to attack this policy we must attack it on a higher ground than the money consideration. [Loud applause.] We must not belittle our own position.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. The observations made by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky attracted my attention to a phase which is an unsettled one, I think, even to this House. Now, sir, just how far this House is engaged in point of duty to execute the obligations imposed upon the country by the Senate may remain a legal question. The distinguished gentleman from Texas, the leader on this side of the House, put the proposition in his query when he stated, "Is it not true that under the Constitution and law-making power the right and authority to make treaties is distinguishably vested in the Executive and the Senate?" The answer must be "Yes;" and yet we are reminded that upon a similar question. Mr. Clay, upon the floor of the House of Representatives, insisted that the words "by and with the advice of the Senate" meant nothing more than that the treaty should be made by the Executive, with the counsel of the Senate; but as Congress was the spokesman of the country, it always required the approving voice and action of this body. It was a memorable hour, and the debate subsequently became so serious that we find the Supreme Court of the United States had to set it at rest by legal opinions. It is important for us to look to that court for our legal guidance, for many gentlemen here, such as myself, are not agreeable to this appropriation, who would like some real legal or honorable reasons for opposing it. The Supreme Court of the United States, in three important decisions, have made it impossible for the gentleman from Kentucky—as able as he is, as shown by his statement, and lucid as usual in his expression, or any of us having such views—to go behind the settled conclusions with honor to our country and duty to ourselves.

Where there is a treaty concluded with the consent of the Senate, there remains but one alternative, as the gentleman from Mississippi has said. The Senate has advised the Executive that the treaty has met its approval. Our country, therefore, has entered into an obligation with another country to pay a certain sum of money for a consideration by the other country delivered, and we, upon the ratification of that treaty, take the delivered consideration. Why, if the possessions were to be kept and we now deny compensation, the ordinary charge of fraud could well be made against us. If we refused to fulfill that part of the treaty, we are guilty of an imposition upon the other party to the contract. So that there is nothing left for the House but to ratify the course of the Senate, as that involves an obligation of national honor.

I call the attention of the House to a memorable precedent in the historic legislation of England, of which, of course, we are all familiar. When Sir William Draper made a descent on the Philippines and combining with Admiral Cornish took Manila and the archipelago of the Philippines, as has been repeated with immortal dash by Dewey, England became possessed, by conquest, of this country. Later, by a peace treaty, the country was returned to Spain, for which Spain agreed to give to England $10,000,000 when restored to possession of the islands. Spain was subsequently put in possession, but Spain declined to pay the money agreed—the $10,000,000 consideration. She is the only country which history presents us of having violated a plighted contract, made upon the honor of her people. Surely the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky will not find it agreeable to his legal or personal convictions to ask the House to follow the example of Spain.

Lord Chatham in his place in the Commons denounced this attitude of Spain. He demanded England's resentment, stating that it was a cause of war upon Spain for having refused to execute an honorable pledge. I take it, sir, that in the light of the settled history, whatever may be the feelings of individuals, it must be the best judgment of the gentlemen in this House, sustained by the highest courts of the country, and by every sense of obligation, that there is nothing left for us in fairness of dealing, in honor of country, but to make this appropriation. [Applause.] Now, but a word referring to the gentleman's observation concerning the shooting and the warfare on the Philippines. Sir, it may not be justified by all technical rules of right. There may be many of us who had hoped and prayed against its coming. But it is upon us. It is upon our country. It is the condition which has happened and the sad event we are already experiencing.

Therefore, as far as I am concerned, I take the liberty of saying we can only view the matter, so far as actual engagement is concerned, in one light. These men who are there are American citizens [applause]; they are the sons of our brother men. They are themselves the children of this nation. If they are wrong, they are innocently so; if they are right, they are justly so. There is no other position for the American House to take but to stand unanimously by the children of its own country [applause]; to give them their wishes and their prayers.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman will remember that the Filipinos are now our citizens.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Our boys are there under orders—

> Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs but to do and die.

Therefore, sir, for the most exalted reason that in this encounter, whatever the outcome may be, whatever the technical rights may be, we should give these soldiers our unanimous approval and all encouragement in this hour which zealous men and loving Americans can afford to their own children. The merits of the contesting countries must await a more appropriate hour for their consideration.

Mr. Chairman, however much some of us may disagree with the policy which sent these men to the Philippines, in this hour this House should present an undivided support to the suffering and falling brave who are sacrificing in those islands all they have of health and life for their native land. [Loud applause.]

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I hope when the paragraph relating to the twenty millions item is reached which has been alluded to, we shall be able to arrange for a reasonable time for general debate upon it. Whether that be so or not, I will at the proper time propose an amendment to that paragraph which I now ask the Clerk to read.

Insert in line 2, page 105, after the word "dollars," the following:

"Provided, That in making this appropriation for the extinction of Spanish sovereignty over the Philippine Islands the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to permanently annex said islands to the United States, but, on the contrary, assert their determination, when an independent government by the inhabitants of said islands shall have been established therein, to transfer to said government all rights secured under the cession by Spain, and thereupon to leave the government and control of said islands to the people thereof."

Mr. CANNON. This is read simply for information.

Mr. McRAE. This is read in order that our friends on this side may understand the issue that I shall undertake to make when the item is reached.

Mr. CANNON. It is not necessary, then, to reserve any point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Arkansas simply had the proposed amendment read from the desk for the information of the committee.

Mr. MOODY. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Arkansas if he does not think it would be better to defer the consideration of this paragraph until we reach it?

Mr. McRAE. That is my purpose in having the amendment read now, so that we might postpone the debate and consideration of it until that time. However, I want to make a brief statement in doing so. Whatever we may think about the right of the constitutional provision which gives the President and two-thirds of the Senate the right to negotiate treaties, they have it, and when they make one, whatever it may be, it is as binding upon us as any law that passes with the concurrence of both Houses and has the approval of the President. I apprehend that when the ratification of this treaty has been exchanged every man throughout the length and breadth of this country will agree that we are legally bound to make payment of the amount therein agreed by our Government, whether he thought the treaty was wisely made or not. I think it was wrong to agree to pay $20,000,000, but I see no way, honorable way, to avoid the payment. We can not afford, for $20,000,000, to repudiate a legal contract nor to have the honor and good faith of this Government questioned by a nation that we have recently defeated in a contest of arms. Upon the Army bill, and other bills which seek to support the Army, which may be used against the Philippines, are the places to make this fight. This appropriation is not sought to be made to furnish supplies to any army, but is to carry out a peace treaty made with Spain, and then the question of whether we will carry on the war against the Filipinos hereafter can be considered.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire, in advance of reaching the paragraph, to indorse most earnestly the position taken by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and say that, in my opinion, they have properly stated the position of this side of the House in respect to the appropriation for the Philippines.

Mr. McRAE. I hope we may now be permitted to proceed as fast as possible with the bill under consideration, and when we reach that paragraph I shall ask my distinguished friend from Illinois to allow ample time to debate the paragraph and my amendment to it.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Telegraph to connect the Capitol with the Departments and Government Printing Office: For care and repair of existing lines, $1,500.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer to that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to construct, lay, maintain, and operate telegraph or magnetic lines of cables from a point on the Pacific coast of the United States to the Hawaiian Islands, thence to the Philippine Islands, and to such other islands in the Pacific Ocean as he shall deem to the interest of our military, naval, and commercial interests. And such sum as may be necessary to construct, lay, and fully equip such submarine telegraph communication, capable of transmitting at least fifteen words per minute, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. That when the President has completed the construction of said telegraphic cables he shall transfer the management thereof to the Secretary of War, who shall thereafter maintain and operate the same as a part of the military service of our Government.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War shall have authority to receive and transmit messages in the interest of commerce and the public, other than United States Government messages, and shall establish a rate of tolls therefor not exceeding $1 per word. All messages from individuals or telegraph companies shall be received and transmitted without preference at the same rates and with precedence according to presentation: Provided, That rates for newspaper messages of the United States, commonly known as press messages, shall not exceed one-half of the rate which shall be charged for ordinary messages.

Mr. DOCKERY. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON. One moment, I want to reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Points of order are reserved by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I will request that the consideration of this amendment may be deferred until the reading of the bill has been completed, when I will ask for five minutes to present my views on the amendment before the point of order shall be raised.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask my friend from Michigan if he is not now ready to make his presentation?

Mr. CORLISS. I should prefer to wait until the reading of the bill has been completed.

Mr. CANNON. I am willing that he should be given such reasonable time as he may want to speak on this subject now. I do not want to cut him off, but I prefer that he should do it now.

Mr. CORLISS. In view of the other matters to be presented I desire, and I trust that the gentleman will grant me the privilege of deferring consideration of the matter until the reading of the bill has been completed, when I will only ask an indulgence of five minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand the gentleman in charge of the bill, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is willing to give the gentleman now such time as he desires.

Mr. CORLISS. But I should prefer to defer the discussion until after the bill has been read.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman will see that if we postpone matters, especially important matters, in this way, everything will be crowded to the end of the bill. It seems to me that the gentleman's proposition ought to be considered, if at all, at this time.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that it is not in my power to cut him out from offering this amendment perhaps at a later stage with some alterations; but if he offered it now, it seems to me he would get more time to present his views than he would possibly later.

Mr. CORLISS. I understand that; but there are certain reasons why I desire to defer the matter. I will ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the consideration of this amendment be deferred until the completion of the reading of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I object.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman can get his time now if he wants to talk on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CORLISS. Does the Chair sustain the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule if the gentleman from Michigan does not desire to be heard.

Mr. CANNON. I want to give the gentleman a chance to make his speech if he wishes to.

Mr. DOCKERY. I simply desire to reserve the point of order, if the gentleman wishes to be heard.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I did not at this time desire to occupy the time of the House in the presentation of my views on this amendment, for the reason that I am aware of the fact that the same question will be presented to the House upon another amendment of vital importance to our country involving another public matter of like character to the one proposed in this amendment, when the subject will be fully discussed and a ruling asked for, and I trust that this House and the Chair will hold that that subject—the Nicaragua Canal—as well as the amendment which I propose may be admitted and considered and made a part of this great measure.

The appropriation of money for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal is the most important matter now before the American nation. The second important public work that our people demand is the construction of a cable from our country to Hawaii and the Philippines. The attention of Congress has been called to it, not only by the measure which was considered here on the 18th day of January last, not only by a report of the Hawaiian commissioners calling special attention to the importance of the subject, but the President of the United States, recognizing the importance of the construction of this canal, submitted to Congress only last Friday a communication urgently asking Congress to take action on the subject.

I am frank to say it will be impossible to carry out the wishes of the President, to fulfill the desires of the American people and secure to them and to commerce the blessings of this cable, unless the proposition is attached to some public measure of this character. And my purpose in offering the amendment now is to call public attention again to the importance of this measure. And I hope and expect that if it shall be ruled out here and the consideration of it denied, the Senate will recognize the demands of the public and incorporate it upon this or some other bill and send it back to this House.

I want to call the attention of the Chairman of the committee before he rules on this question to this fact: The amendment is germane to the paragraph under consideration. The appropriation now pending is for the maintenance of telegraph lines in the District of Columbia. This proposition is in consideration and furtherance of a public measure which has been undertaken in prior sessions of Congress. I hold in my hand a survey made under the authority of Congress by officers of the United States Navy, $100,000 at least having been expended in taking soundings to determine whether or not the construction of a cable between California and Hawaii could be justly undertaken. This report, made in 1892, justified the expenditure of that money and warrants the present Congress in authorizing the construction of that cable.

The President of the United States, in calling attention only last Friday to this important matter, gave his reasons; and I want to read briefly two or three words:

Such communication should be established in such a way as to be wholly under the control of the United States, whether in time of peace or war.

That is an important consideration, and has been rendered most important in consequence of our recent experience with Spain. The President also states that, in his opinion, this cable should either be built by the United States Government itself as a military cable or by private enterprise. I believe that the Government of the United States should do as many other nations have done under similar circumstances. It should go into the cable business, at least on the Pacific. The future commerce of our country must be established there, and it is all important that this great public means of communication should be established and controlled by our Government alone. I believe it ought to be constructed by our own Government, and this amendment insures its benefits to the people of our country.

I will not at this time discuss this measure further. I trust the Chairman will grant my request that a decision upon the question of order may be deferred until a later stage in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CORLISS. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understood the gentleman to refer to a survey made, I think, during the fiscal year 1892; am I correct?

Mr. CORLISS. The survey was made in 1892.

Mr. DOCKERY. And concluded, was it not?

Mr. CORLISS. The survey was concluded.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then it can not be claimed that this is "a public work or object already in progress?"

Mr. CORLISS. The survey was completed and the report made, but in anticipation of the very construction proposed by this amendment. Now, I ask unanimous consent that the decision upon the question of order may be deferred until the bill has been read.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think we had better take things as they come.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to be heard briefly on the question of order when the gentleman from Illinois is through.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. CANNON] if he desires to be heard, or the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CORLISS. I ask unanimous consent that this paragraph may be passed without prejudice. With that understanding I will withdraw the amendment and offer it later.

Mr. CANNON. We had just as well dispose of it here and now as at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. DOCKERY. There was some confusion in the Hall and I do not know that I understood the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] aright, but if I did he rested his contention that this amendment was in order upon the fact of an alleged survey made in 1892, and which, according to his subsequent statement, he admits to have been concluded. But suppose the survey was not concluded and was now in progress. Under the rules, I am at a loss to understand how the gentleman could hold the amendment to be in order, because the rule says that no appropriation shall be in order on an appropriation bill except it be authorized by previous legislation or unless in continuation of a "public object" already in progress.

Now, what was the public object in this case? The object was a simple survey. If the gentleman had offered an amendment to appropriate five or ten thousand dollars to continue the survey, assuming that the survey was now in progress, it might have been in order.

It seems, therefore, that there is no ground whatever, under clause 2 of Rule XXI, for holding this amendment to be in order, and in this connection I want to call the attention of the committee to the reason for this rule. It had its origin away back in 1837, if I remember right, and it grew out of the contentions constantly occurring and the friction constantly arising between the Senate and the House on account of legislation incorporated in appropriation bills. The result was that the great supply bills of the Government frequently failed because of legislation thus incorporated in appropriation bills, and Congress was compelled, in order to maintain the Government itself, to enact this rule prohibiting legislation upon appropriation bills.

And from 1837 until this good hour, regardless of the merits of legislative propositions, the rule has been substantially maintained under all administrations of the House, whether controlled by Democrats, Republicans, or Whigs, that legislation can not be incorporated upon general appropriation bills where a point of order is raised against it. And why? The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] and myself may differ as to the propriety of laying a cable to Hawaii and the Philippine Islands. There may be some contention between us upon that question, but we do not differ upon this fundamental proposition, that it is the duty of Congress to maintain the Government in all its integrity and power. Therefore the reason for this rule. Legislation must be excluded, and, as I said a moment ago, that rule has been maintained by all administrations of this House.

Now, I shall not at this moment enter upon a discussion of the merits of the proposition now pending, offered by the gentleman from Michigan. I have my views as to the propriety of the legislation, however, but I shall not discuss them here, because I know the Chair will be compelled to hold under the rules that the proposition is not in order at this time.

And neither, Mr. Chairman, can I be put in the attitude of hostility or friendship to this particular measure. I simply hold that it is the duty of Congress under the Constitution and the laws to maintain the Government, to support the Army and the Navy and the civil establishment, and it is the duty of Representatives if they have meritorious propositions to send them to the proper committees, let them be considered there, and reported to the House in the usual and ordinary way, and be considered in the usual old-time methods under the rules of this body.

Mr. Chairman, I realize the pressure that there is perhaps behind this particular proposition. It may be that others will be ing the few remaining days that I shall be a member of this body offered, for some of which I have most ardent sympathy; but dur- I intend to stand for the integrity of these rules and not by any vote of mine to be put into the attitude of requiring an extra session of Congress to pass the supply bills of the Government, because, forsooth, the gentleman from Michigan has a majority behind him who favor this cable proposition, or because, forsooth, somebody else may offer some other proposition sustained by a majority of this House, although contrary to the rules of this body.

Mr. BENNETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. BENNETT. I presume the gentleman from Michigan informed the House that the proposition he has just presented has not the support of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and that it is purely a minority report. The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee reported a bill to the House granting a subsidy of not more than $100,000 a year to urge construction by private parties. That has not yet been acted upon, and later will be presented in its proper shape to the House for its consideration. Until that time it seems to me to be a little previous to consider this question, and while I feel perfectly sure that the ruling of the Chair will be in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], I still wish to make the statement that the proposition presented to the House is purely a proposition coming from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS], without other legislative standing.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have some knowledge of the contention between the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS], and in a contest of that sort, as I understand it, I unhesitatingly align myself with the gentleman from Michigan against the committee.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. DOCKERY. I do.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to ask my friend from Missouri whether he is not possibly assuming too much when he announces what appears to be his view, that possibly a majority of this side of the House will favor propositions which are in violation of the rules of the House?

Mr. DOCKERY. I referred, as I remember, to the majority of the House, including both sides; but I hope the gentleman from Ohio is correct in the assumption he now makes that a majority of both sides will stand by the integrity of the rules.

Mr. BROWN. I do assume that most confidently.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, the gentleman may be right; but I confess some degree of apprehension myself on that question. I hope, however, that I may be agreeably disappointed on that proposition.

Now, as to the merits of the two propositions, the one offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] on behalf of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce——

Mr. BENNETT. That is not offered on this bill. I will say to the gentleman that I trust it may be later.

Mr. DOCKERY. No; but it was offered recently—about the 18th of last month.

Mr. BENNETT. It was offered, and the proposition made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] was presented as a minority report.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think it required some resort to the rules to prevent a vote upon the measure at that time. In fact, I think there was some filibustering resorted to to prevent a vote on that question. But according to the statement just made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT], his proposition comes sustained and reenforced by the magic suggestion of a "subsidy;" that is, money collected from the taxpayers, put into the Treasury of the United States, and taken therefrom by law and transferred to the pockets of certain favored lines of ocean steamships or certain owners of cable lines.

Now, as between the subsidy and the proposition which is pending, offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS], I should, if compelled to choose between the two evils, unhesitatingly select the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan.

But just a word now on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. Whatever may be the merits of the proposition of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce or the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan, it seems to me that every member of this body should stand for a fair, correct, just interpretation of the rule, and let us not, in the closing days of this session, in our anxiety to secure consideration for pet projects, depart from the old-time decisions, precedents, and rules of the House.

I yield back the time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I think I do not care to say anything further

Mr. CORLISS. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to speak on the point of order?

Mr. CORLISS. I want to be heard on that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that this question is precipitated here, but I desire to call the attention of the Chairman to the legislation of Congress in 1891 upon this subject-matter, and I would like the attention of the Chair while I read this law. I find attached to a general appropriation bill for the support of the Navy in 1891 this paragraph:

Telegraphic cable surveys: To enable the President to cause careful soundings to be made between San Francisco, Cal., and Honolulu, in the Kingdom of the Hawaiian Islands, for the purpose of determining the practicability of the laying of a telegraphic cable between those points, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and the President is hereby authorized to direct the use of any vessel or vessels belonging to the United States in making such survey.

That was attached to an appropriation bill. That is legislation absolutely foreign to the act appropriating money for the general maintenance of the Navy. I wonder if the point of order was made then. The rule under which this point of order is made is Rule XXI. Paragraph 2 of that rule reads:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Mr. Chairman, the construction of a cable from California to Hawaii has been undertaken by an act of Congress. The object of it was incorporated in a law. The money of our people has been expended by an act of Congress, and this is a continuation of that particular object; and I submit that unless it is ingrafted upon this measure or some other measure it will be impossible to carry out the wishes and recommendations of the President and the demands of the people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT], this amendment has never been considered by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce did have consideration of what is known as the Bennett bill, which granted a subsidy of $2,000,000 for the construction of this cable, and I regret to say that a majority of the committee voted favorably for that substitute, and I reported a minority bill—not this one. The minority bill authorized the Postmaster-General to offer to the lowest responsible bidder, United States corporation or citizen, the right to construct this cable upon the same terms as proposed by the gentleman from New York.

I submit that it is not necessary for me to submit to any committee the consideration of an amendment I may offer to the pending measure. The bill that was reported to this House by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, granting a subsidy of $2,000,000, has been repudiated by the sentiment if not the votes of this House and has been repudiated by the people at large. And I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that unless this Congress shall authorize the President to construct this cable, as it ought to do, then it must give a hearing to other public interests in our country, many of whom desire the right and the privilege to construct this cable and stand ready to bid and, with the lowest possible subsidy, to guarantee the construction of this cable at a very much reduced price from the subsidy asked by the gentleman who represents the bill now pending on the Calendar of this House.

He says that the measure will come up again in this House. I hope it may. I know of no way the gentleman can get consideration unless he can obtain unanimous consent, and if he does so I will withdraw this amendment. I will not press the amendment on this bill if it is to secure the consideration of this House and this Congress. I will then press the consideration of this amendment upon members, but I will not ask it at this time. If that be the law, and the Chairman shall rule this amendment out of order, I therefore give notice that I withdraw this amendment as a whole, and I will offer it at another period in the consideration of this measure. I withdraw the amendment for the time being.

Mr. SIMPSON. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. CORLISS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMPSON. Is the amendment that the gentleman proposes a proposition that the Government of the United States shall build this cable? Is that the proposition?

Mr. CORLISS. My amendment proposes that the President of the United States shall build this cable, and a sufficient amount of money is appropriated for it, and when it is constructed it is to be turned over to the War Department, who are to take charge of it and maintain it for military purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to the fact that after an amendment has been presented and read by the Clerk and placed before the committee it can be withdrawn only by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And if the gentleman desires to withdraw it, the Chair will suggest that he comply with the rule in that respect.

Mr. CORLISS. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest that the matter has now been discussed by the committee, and it seems to me it ought to be disposed of.

Mr. CORLISS. My friend the gentleman from Illinois kindly suggested the necessity of not acting on it at this time and not pressing it without a slight amendment. Now, I trust he will not force me in the matter.

Mr. CANNON. I will not force the gentleman.

Mr. CORLISS. It is possible that in the further consideration of this bill I will not present it. It may be that I will not, but it is my purpose to do so; and I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may now be withdrawn.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman is trying to execute a flank movement.

Mr. CANNON. The question having taken twenty or thirty minutes for discussion and the committee having listened to it, it seems to me that the best time to dispose of it is now. What the gentleman may offer subsequently I can not say.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOPKINS). The Chair is ready to rule on the amendment. The committee will observe that the bill now under consideration is a general appropriation bill, and that section 2 of Rule XXI, referred to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS], provides that in bills of this character no amendment is proper that is not authorized by existing law and germane to the subject-matter of the bill under consideration.

An examination of the amendment itself, it seems to the Chair, will satisfy any person that this amendment is not in order. The very first line provides that "the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to construct," which is an admission that under existing law the President of the United States has no such power or authority. It says he is hereby "authorized to construct, lay, maintain, and operate a magnetic line of cables from a point on the Pacific coast to the Hawaiian Islands and thence to the Philippines." This is in the first section, and every line of it provides for new legislation. It recognizes the fact that under existing law there is no authority for the President of the United States to construct such a line as is proposed in the first section of the bill, either to the Hawaiian Islands or to the Philippine Islands.

The second section is additional new legislation, because it provides that after the authority is granted to the President, and the President has exercised it in pursuance of the direction of Congress, he shall transfer the management and authority under it to the Secretary of War. Of course there is no law in existence today that authorizes the Secretary of War to provide for the management of any cable line between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands or the Philippine Islands, or any other place in the Pacific Ocean, as is provided for in section 1.

The third section directs the Secretary in what manner this line shall be governed and controlled by his Department, and also authorizes the sending of cables by individuals. So, to the Chair, it seems entirely clear that it is new legislation.

Now, if we are to adhere to the requirements contained in section 2 of Rule XXI, which provides that such an amendment as this is not in order, it seems to the Chair that it is his duty to hold that the point made by the gentleman in charge of the bill is well taken, and that the amendment is not in order, and the Chair so rules.

Mr. CORLISS. With entire respect for the Chair, I desire to state that under some law or authority the Secretary of War is to-day managing, building, constructing, and operating cable lines between the Philippine Islands and sending communications over them. I simply call the attention of the Chair to that fact, in view of the remarks of the Chairman that the Secretary of War has no such power. He is exercising it to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say, in answer to the gentleman from Michigan, that whoever prepared the amendment offered by the gentleman evidently recognized the fact that there was no authority for this line or else the provision referred to by the Chair would not have been inserted in the amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Washington Monument: For the care and maintenance of the Washington Monument, namely: For one custodian, at $100 per month; one steam engineer, at $90 per month; one assistant steam engineer, at $60 per month; one fireman, at $50 per month; one assistant fireman, at $45 per month; one conductor of elevator car, at $75 per month; one attendant on floor, at $60 per month; one attendant on top floor, at $60 per month; three night and day watchmen, at $60 per month each; in all, $3,520.

For fuel, lights, oil, waste, packing, tools, matches, paints, brushes, brooms, lanterns, rope, nails, screws, lead, electric lights, heating apparatus, oil stoves for elevator car and upper and lower floors, repairs to engines, boilers, dynamos, elevator, and repairs of all kinds connected with the monument and machinery, and purchase of all necessary articles for keeping the monument, machinery, elevator, and electric-light plant in good order, $3,000.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I take this occasion, Mr. Chairman, because under the rules I may not be permitted to be heard when the question comes up directly. I notice that the Senate yesterday passed a concurrent resolution providing that $20,000 shall be appropriated out of the Treasury for the purpose of cleaning the snow from the streets and alleys of the city. Humanity dictates that the poor of this city, as well as all others, shall be taken care of, and that the streets and sidewalks of this city should be cleared of the snow so that people may move and business proceed; but who is to do it? Should the public do it or should the city, as is done by other cities all over the Union? Other cities not only clean their own streets and sidewalks, but, if this rule prevails, they must furnish their proportion of the funds to clean this great city, $20,000 at one time, also their portion of funds that goes to the great city of New York, where there are twelve free deliveries a day, and in some other cities nearly as many, from which they have no benefit whatever; but they must go further and help clear the streets and sidewalks in this great city where the Capitol is situated.

Mr. BOTKIN. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, if it will not interrupt him.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Not at all.

Mr. BOTKIN. The only cleaning of the streets in this city that I know anything about is the cleaning of the street-car tracks. Is it the general rule over the country for cities to clean the street-car tracks and the property that belong to other corporations out of the public money?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Surely not all over the country. I am not prepared to say whether it is true in Washington City or not. All I know is that the street-car line is situated in the street, and if the appropriation is made for cleaning the streets and sidewalks, it would cover the street-car lines as well.

Mr. BOTKIN. I understand the gentleman to say that these street-car tracks are to be cleared out of this appropriation of $20,000.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. They ought not to be; and I rose only to inquire whether or not that is the purpose of this resolution which is to come to this House. At the risk of being considered a little inhumane or even parsimonious, I want to say I do not believe that other cities and towns of the Union that are compelled to clean their streets and sidewalks at their own expense ought to be by this resolution required to furnish their contribution toward cleaning the streets and sidewalks of this great city, the capital of the United States. It is relieving this city of the burden it should carry and placing it on others who are compelled to meet the demands at home.

Mr. BOTKIN. Does the gentleman know whether any of the gentlemen who are to vote on this proposition to appropriate $20,000 for that purpose are in any way interested with these street-car corporations that will derive benefits from the expenditure of the money?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I certainly know nothing about that. I would say, however, to the gentleman from Kansas that I presume not.

The point I am making is, should the streets and sidewalks of the city of Washington be cleared at the expense of the public Treasury of the United States? We voted $10,000 the other day, and $5,000 more at another time, for the purpose of clearing the Potomac, which, I think, was all right, as it would probably prevent a flood; in that sense it is right. But when you appropriate $20,000 more, making $35,000 in all, from the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of doing that which the city itself ought to do, I for one, whatever misconstruction I may subject myself to, shall vote against it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MIERS] have five minutes additional.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I do not care to speak further.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, we hear a great deal said here in this House about the laboring men. I wish to say I would rather see these unfortunate men who are out of work employed in earning their share of this $20,000 than give it to them as charity. I propose to vote for the amendment for this reason alone: We have in this city thirty or forty thousand unemployed men who are suffering for want of the necessaries of life, and I am glad to vote for this appropriation because I believe it will give many of them the opportunity to earn something for their own support. Let them have work.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Allow me to ask the gentleman this question: Is it fair to burden the people of other cities and towns and the people all over the nation who are out of employment in order to give employment to people here, out of the public Treasury? You can not put your hand in the Treasury to help one class without doing wrong to all the other people.

Mr. MAHON. I wish I could help them all, but I can not. I think this amendment is right, and with the view I have stated it is going to have my vote.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I would help all these men if I could; but I would not vote to help some of them at the expense of others equally needy. The principle is wrong.

Mr. BOTKIN. I fully agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] that we should do everything in our power to furnish employment to those who are out of work. The only question is, who shall pay the army of men who are now being put to work in clearing the street-car tracks in this city? I should like to know whether they are to be paid by the street-car corporations or out of the public funds.

Mr. MAHON. Before the sun goes down the street-car companies will have all this work done and the snow hauled out of the city.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. BOTKIN. I should like to know who is going to pay for it?

Mr. MAHON. I presume the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] can answer that question better than I can.

Mr. CANNON. I think I will call on the gentleman from Missouri. The joint resolution which has been referred to is not now before the House, but I presume it will be to-day, and I am inclined to think that the $20,000 ought to be appropriated. If it incidentally gives employment to labor, well and good, but in view of the great storm we have just had I apprehend that most if not all of the $20,000 will be necessary to remove the snow and care for the city.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Would not the same rule of making appropriations here—the relief of suffering humanity—apply to every other city in the nation? And why apply to this one city when it can not be done for others? You may give of yours, but have no right to go into the Treasury for the few.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir; if suffering humanity is to be relieved. But I am not putting the matter on that ground. The employment of labor is an incident to doing work for the general good.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. If it is not put on that ground, will the gentleman tell the country why money should be taken out of the Treasury of the United States to clear the streets of the city of Washington rather than those of any other city?

Mr. CANNON. With great pleasure I will tell the gentleman. This joint resolution, which will be called up later—a joint resolution originating in the Senate—makes an appropriation for the expenses of the District of Columbia, and, like all other District appropriations, is to be paid one-half from the revenues of the District and one-half from the Federal Treasury. So that the Common Council of the District of Columbia—namely Congress—will care for the service of the city just as the common council of any other city cares for its service.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Then $10,000 of the amount comes from the Federal Treasury?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; just as one-half of all the other District expenses does.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Then why spend that one-half upon this city rather than upon any other city of the Union?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that since 1878 we have acted on the principle, then recognized by law, that in regard to the expenses of the city of Washington and the District of Columbia, one-half should be paid from taxation on the property of the citizens of the District and the other half out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. If that policy has been pursued for twenty-one years, is not that quite long enough? And is it not time now to abandon that old rule and adopt a rule that treats all alike?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is taking a position on this question that many other people have taken, and I will say that to a certain extent I sympathize with him. Every once in a while a new Solomon comes along. I have been a new Solomon myself, so I sympathize with my friend.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The gentleman will allow me to say I do not claim to be a Solomon. I make no such pretension. I would like the gentleman to answer my question, rather than make such a remark as that. There is no argument in that.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will say that my friend on inquiry will find that, as near as can be ascertained, the Government of the United States, at the time the act of 1878 was passed, owned, as it probably owns now, one-half the property in the District of Columbia——

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me one more question?

Mr. CANNON. I hope my friend will allow me to complete my sentence, and then I will take pleasure in yielding to him. Now, whether that is true or not, it is upon that theory. It has been established and concurred in. Now, it may be that it is wrong. It may be that all the expenses ought to be paid from the revenues of the District. There are those who believe that all the expenses ought to be paid from the United States Treasury. I am not one of them. Now, I do not care about raising that question on an appropriation that will clear the city of snow, and incidentally the clearing the city of snow will give employment to the people thereof.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The gentleman said he would allow me to ask one other question.

Mr. CANNON. Two.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The gentleman answers by saying that this is a precedent or a rule long established. Do you think that binds the people of my State of Indiana, that they should carry this burden when there is nothing better to back it up than the precedent of which the gentleman speaks, and that they have carried it for twenty-one years?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will say to my friend that much can be said on each side. I can say a little on the side, however, that the gentleman indicates. Here is the Capitol, here is the Treasury, here is the White House, here is the War, State, and Navy building.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Are they a burden to the city or do they not rather make the city what it is?

Mr. CANNON. Now, I will yield five minutes and let the gentleman make his speech and then ask that I may speak for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The gentleman yields that which he has not to give, for which I thank him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask that the gentleman be allowed five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I do not care to take the time.

Mr. TODD. I should like to ask what is the amount already appropriated and now available for cleaning the snow away in this city?

Mr. CANNON. A few days ago we appropriated $8,000.

Mr. TODD. I am told that there is an appropriation of $5,000, and an additional $10,000 already appropriated.

Mr. CANNON. Not so much as that.

Mr. TODD. Let me ask the gentleman how many men can be profitably employed in this city in cleaning the streets? Can over a thousand be profitably employed?

Mr. CANNON. I really do not know.

Mr. TODD. The gentleman surely knows that less than forty-eight hours of warm sun will melt away all this snow, and that men can not work as soon as it commences to melt. I do not see how it is possible to use more than a thousand men for two or three days in removing this snow, and it seems to me that $5,000 ought to be ample.

Mr. CANNON. I would consult the Weather Bureau and find out about that if I could get an insurance policy——

Mr. TODD. Let us wait until we need the extra $5,000. You have already got $5,000, which is double what you want, possibly.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MIERS] gets himself into the RECORD for home consumption, and the gentleman from Michigan sees him and goes him one better.

Mr. BOTKIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman answer the question——

Mr. CANNON. And now my friend from Kansas is agonizing to know whether this money will be used to clean the street-car tracks.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Is it a crime for a new member to get his remarks into the RECORD?

Mr. CANNON. I understand the fact to be that the street-car tracks are cleaned by the street-car company. The selfishness of men who have plants of this kind makes them ordinarily—and I understand that is the fact here—clear away the obstruction as quickly as possible, so that they can earn the nimble nickel.

Mr. TODD. Perhaps the chairman of the District Committee [Mr. BABCOCK] will inform us on that subject. Who pays for that?

Mr. CANNON. Now, my friend from Indiana [Mr. MIERS] has just said that he thinks a new member ought to get into the RECORD. I think so, too. I wish I was a new member with my friend, with his youth and vigor, because then I would have a prospect of long service before me. Mine is behind me. I envy my friend his position. He is perfectly right. I am not criticising him unkindly.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I acquit the gentleman, knowing the fact that we go to the aged for counsel.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This question is not a very new one. It is not a discovery. There could not be a patent taken out on the subject-matter of this discussion by reason of its novelty, nor yet, in my judgment, by reason of its utility. It may be well enough, however, to state that the District of Columbia occupies a position widely different from the city of Indianapolis or the city of Columbus or the city of New York. I imagine the gentleman from Indiana could scarcely catalogue or enumerate the vast amount of real estate in this city owned by the General Government, and the other great interests that the Government has here. Now, all this enormous property of the Government is entirely exempt from those assessments that make property in Indianapolis a burden sometimes, and property in the town in which I live almost a calamity to a man. No such thing as that comes to annoy the Government.

So, after a great deal of study and consideration, it has been thought fair, first because of the immense property owned by the United States, far more in value than that of the citizens of the city, and because of the further fact that this is the capital city, that its beautification, its care, its proper policing, and all that appertain to the government of a city like this are in the interest as well of the inhabitants as of the United States—it has been deemed fair that these expenditures should be placed upon the basis of 50 per cent to each one of these great classes of property holders. Now, that is the situation precisely, and the constituents of my friend from Indiana and my constituents are directly interested in this vast body of governmental property that thus contributes indirectly to the care and preservation of the lives and health and police organization and water supply of the great city of Washington, the best governed city, the best organized city, the best cared for city among the civilized nations of the world.

Mr. TODD. The gentleman from Ohio spoke about it being a calamity to want property in his city. Is that the kind of prosperity they have out there?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will say that there is some property in all the towns in this country which, under our assessment laws, becomes a burden. The gentleman understands that as well as I do. I refer to unoccupied property, through which streets are cut and other improvements made, and assessments levied upon it. The gentleman's State of Michigan is not without contributing its share.

Mr. TODD. The gentleman, then, was not a calamity howler when he spoke of that.

Mr. BABCOCK and Mr. BOTKIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, is entitled to recognition next. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BOTKIN] after that.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word in reference to these appropriations that have been brought into the House by the Committee on Appropriations. I desire to say that the Committee on the District of Columbia fully approves of these measures and thinks they ought to pass.

The appropriation of $5,000 which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TODD] referred to was not made for the purpose of clearing the streets of snow, but to be used for clearing the river in front of the city from ice, should it get into a dangerous condition, as it has heretofore, when the whole lower part of the city has been flooded.

Now, these are of a necessity emergency appropriations, and it is not likely that they will all be used. A portion may be used, or the entire amount will be used if necessary. But after the vast amount of snow that has fallen it is absolutely necessary that the streets be cleared. The street-car companies throw the snow from their tracks onto the sides, and it is thrown out into the streets and on the sidewalks, and the streets are obstructed. You can not drive over them except on the street-car tracks to-day, and you will not be able to until the snow is removed.

Mr. TODD. What is the amount already appropriated for clearing the streets of snow?

Mr. BABCOCK. I think one appropriation of $8,000 was made for cleaning the streets.

Mr. TODD. If you have appropriated eight thousand, and the District pays eight thousand more, that will make sixteen thousand.

Mr. BABCOCK. No; that is not the way in which the appropriation is made. The city pays half of whatever Congress appropriates, and Congress having appropriated $8,000, one-half of that amount will come out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. TODD. How are you going to spend $8,000 in cleaning the streets of snow when three or four days of hot sun will melt it all away?

Mr. BABCOCK. If you can afford to wait——

Mr. TODD. Are you going to cart the snow out into the country? You can not spend $8,000 in scooping it up into snow banks. You have got to hire hacks and cart it out into the country.

Mr. BABCOCK. The snow is being hauled off the streets in carts, out of the way of traffic.

Mr. BOTKIN. I am not satisfied yet upon one question, and that is, Who pays for cleaning the snow off the street-car tracks? That is the only street cleaning that I have seen in this city this morning. Of course it is true that when that cleaning is done the street is clean; that is, that portion of the street.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does the gentleman know how that is done? Has he not seen that in operation?

Mr. BOTKIN. I have seen it in operation; but I do not know who pays for it.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, the gentleman is fully informed, I know, that the city and Government do not pay for it.

Mr. BOTKIN. That is what I wanted to find out. If the street-car company is doing that work, they are piling up snow on the sides of their tracks.

Mr. STEELE. That is for the benefit of the country.

Mr. BOTKIN. The gentleman says that is for the benefit of the country. I suppose it is for the benefit of furnishing work to these idle men to be paid for at Government expense?

Mr. BABCOCK. Would the gentleman prohibit the street-car companies from cleaning the snow off their tracks?

Mr. BOTKIN. Oh, no. I notice that the approaches to this building were not cleaned up. I had to come up from East Capitol to the main entrance and climb the steps, and it seems to me that with $8,000 appropriated we ought at least to have had the approaches to this House cleaned up by 12 o'clock to-day.

Mr. BABCOCK. That appropriation does not apply to the Capitol grounds. That is for the streets.

Mr. TODD. Does the gentleman know as a fact who these day laborers who are cleaning the snow off the tracks of the street-car companies are paid by?

Mr. BABCOCK. The Government is not paying them. I take it that the street-car companies pay their own employees.

Mr. TODD. I know the Government is not paying them now, but I suppose they have not put in their bill yet. Will the gentleman guarantee to Congress that these railroad companies will not be paid for that work?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is preposterous on the face of it to say that they will make a claim for that work.

Mr. TODD. But a lot of preposterous things get in, all right.

Mr. KNOWLES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Illinois tell us that it is not enough for this nation to bring its Capitol, its White House, its Government and its other buildings here to the city of Washington to boom the property of the land grabber, but that the people of the United States must be taxed to pay half of the city taxes. In other words, they tell us that my people, the people of my district, who are compelled to pay 5 per cent taxes on their property, are to be burdened for half of the taxes of the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEELE. Do you only have to pay 5 per cent?

Mr. KNOWLES. We pay 5 per cent taxes in our city; and I am told by the chairman of the District Committee here that the property owners of this city only pay 1½ per cent. The statement was made in this House at the last session that this city now has so much money in its treasury that they do not know what to do with it, and that therefore very little of the personal property of the city is ever found on the tax list. They tell us that the only thing found upon the tax list in this city is real estate, at a very low assessment, and that the tax rate is 1½ per cent. The property of my city, both real and personal, found upon the tax list averages 60 per cent of the actual value, and they pay 5 per cent taxes on that valuation; and yet the people of my city are burdened to pay half the taxation of this city.

I do not believe it is right or just. I believe that the property owners of this city are able to pay their own taxes. Another disastrous result of this is seen in the land grabbing in this city. Men hold property in this city out of use because the General Government is paying half of the taxes. It seems to me if they were compelled to pay their own taxes they would be forced to put the property on the market. The result would be that men could get homes for themselves, instead of giving the greater share of the products of labor to the land grabber. It is stated that less than 1 per cent of the people of this city own their own homes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KNOWLES. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is stated to be true, and does the gentleman deny the fact, that there are lots unsold in this city sufficient to locate a population of 2,000,000 people?

Mr. KNOWLES. I suppose that is so; and I will tell you upon what terms those vacant lots are offered for sale. John Sherman bought land in this city at the rate of a thousand dollars an acre. He split each acre up into 12 lots, and sold them at a thousand dollars a lot.

Mr. TODD. But he did not do that until after he had legislated to make it more valuable.

Mr. KNOWLES. Not until he had legislated to tax the people of this country to pay one-half of those taxes. Therefore, he is able to hold that property until the necessity of some one will compel him to give a thousand dollars for one of those lots, or twelve times as much as Sherman paid for it.

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. KNOWLES. Certainly.

Mr. COWHERD. This money we appropriate is largely derived from tariff taxation, and as the foreigner pays the tax, therefore there is no burden on the people of his State.

Mr. KNOWLES. Upon the theory our people pay no taxes at all.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word on this great burden of taxation. Now, if it was apportioned among all of the districts, the constituents of each Congressional district would pay, perhaps, 2½ cents for taxes for the city, which is appropriated by Congress. Under the old arrangement as made, if apportioned to the Congessional districts of the country, what would it amount to to individuals? Yet we have this question up every session of Congress. It has been the same discussion for the last fifty years over and over again. Are men willing that this Government shall plead the baby act, and say it has not property enough to pay its taxes?

What sense is there in putting onto private citizens the taxes that belong to the Government for its own property, whether here or anywhere else? We hear this in every Congress, that the people of the District of Columbia, who do not own as much property in money value as the Government of the United States owns, shall pay the Government taxes. It is a libel on the American people to say that they are not ready to pay the taxes on their own property anywhere. This 2½ cents taxes to a Congressional district we have heard for fifty years, and what a great burden it is upon the people, and Representatives think they fail in their duty to their constituents if they do not bring it up before Congress at every session.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make the suggestion that the low rate of taxation here in Washington explains the reason why the Populists are so anxious to come here. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I have observed since I have been here that there are others quite as anxious to get here as the Populists [laughter]; and there are some from Iowa that have been quite anxious to get here, but failed. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. Possibly we can exchange sympathy. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Inasmuch as we have given up the afternoon, Mr. Chairman, to filibustering against the Nicaragua Canal, I doubt not but that I can be tolerated for a few minutes on the taxation in the District of Columbia. I agree entirely with my friend from Indiana that it is an outrage on the people of the United States, who have heavy burdens of taxation of their own, to pay one-half of the taxes of this city. I think it is unjust; I think that inasmuch as the Government is located here—the fact that the Government is located here is what makes this city great. There is nothing here to induce anybody to build up a city. Out in my country we would not fence in this kind of land or use it for anything. [Great laughter.] There is nothing located here but the Government property that brings the value of the property up, so I presume it will be a conservative estimate to say that there is $5,000,000 annually of increase to the value of property that goes into the pockets of the landlords in this city because the Government is located here.

Now, then, here is a proposition to appropriate $20,000 to clear the streets of the city of Washington for the benefit of whom? The benefit of the citizens of Washington. And you propose to take one-half of that money out of the taxpayers of the United States. Now, I think that is entirely unjust. I think that this proposition when it comes before Congress ought to be, and I trust will be, amended so that the entire sum is paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, as it ought to be; and therefore, if no other person offers that amendment, I shall do it if I get the opportunity.

Now, there is another thing in connection with this proposition, as has been suggested by my colleague from Kansas [Mr. BOTKIN], that the street-car companies are the beneficiaries particularly of this money, if appropriated. It seems under the present usage the street-car companies are allowed to throw the snow from their tracks into the street. They ought to be compelled to remove that snow from their own tracks and from the streets and not blockade the streets.

I think the gentleman from Ohio said this was one of the best governed cities in the Union. And yet we have the confession here by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia that the street-car companies throw the snow on the streets, and the people living along the streets throw it off the sidewalks into the street, thereby blocking the street. I do not think it is a well-governed city that allows a procedure of that kind, and therefore I shall oppose any such appropriation as is proposed.

Mr. CANNON. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Kansas whether he can not devise some legislation that will make the street-car companies in the future, if there is a storm like this, have their tracks cleared by the next morning and the next evening, so that we can get home.

Mr. SIMPSON. Oh, well, there are some things you can not do by legislation.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I thought you could do everything!

Mr. SIMPSON. I think we could have legislation to prevent street-car companies from blocking the balance of the streets that they do not use. Does not the gentleman from Illinois think that that would be good legislation?

Mr. CANNON. The street-car companies occupy part of the street under their license, and it is still a public street. I wish very much that they could have had it clear yesterday and this morning, so that we might get back and forth.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the gentleman think it is a good thing to allow the companies to block up the balance of the street by clearing the snow from their tracks?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, I should dislike very much to wait a week for the street-car companies to hire men to shovel snow into wagons and haul it away in order to clear their tracks.

Mr. SIMPSON. Why not have the street-car companies clear a part of the street?

Mr. CANNON. They pay their taxes.

Mr. SIMPSON. If a private individual should block the street the way the street-car companies are allowed to do, he would be hauled up immediately.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this paragraph is exhausted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to say a word upon the proposition that has been made here, that as the United States owns one-half of the property of the District of Columbia, or of the city of Washington, therefore it ought to pay one-half the taxes. When you look into the character of the property owned by the United States, it seems to be marvelous that any person should seriously make that statement.

In what manner do they compute that the United States owns one-half of this land? To make this computation they take every street—property that cities usually buy by taking their own funds and paying the individual owner of the land they want to get. These gentlemen say that the Government of the United States ought to pay taxes upon the streets. Why, sir, the Congress of the United States has appropriated out of the public Treasury thousands of dollars for opening Sixteenth street and other streets. Yet, after we have thus bought streets at the expense of thousands of dollars, these gentlemen contend that the Government in addition should pay taxes on those streets.

Why, Mr. Chairman, take into consideration the character of the property owned here by the United States. Is not every particle of it appropriated to public uses—uses for which any city ought to be willing, and for which every ordinary city is willing, to bear the burdens of taxation, and not only that, but to beautify it at its own expense? But, Mr. Chairman, the District of Columbia does not act fairly toward the United States in this matter. Why? When the United States Government has any lands which need protection, does the police of the District of Columbia give any care to it? Oh, no. We find that when the Capitol grounds are to be policed the District of Columbia is not required to pay one-half of that expense, but it must all be paid out of revenues of the Government. So as to the Mall, extending from the Capitol grounds clear down to the Washington Monument. What do we find as to the policing of that? That large tract of land which gentlemen say the United States ought to be willing to pay taxes for——

Mr. CANNON. At this point the gentleman will allow me to say that I think his complaint upon the point he is now discussing is a very proper one, and I am glad to say to him that in this very bill we have corrected the injustice of which he complains, not only as to the parks of which he speaks, but as to the parks at the intersection of streets and avenues, the maintenance and policing of which have heretofore been provided for by the Government. This bill in all such cases divides the expense half and half between the United States Government and the District of Columbia, as in the case of all other District appropriations.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the gentleman say that there is included also in this bill a requirement that the District police force shall patrol the Mall?

Mr. CANNON. The whole thing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And also the Capitol grounds?

Mr. CANNON. No, not the Capitol grounds; they are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. Nor the White House grounds inside of the iron fence.

Mr. GROSVENOR. May I be allowed a question at this point? Does the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] think it would be wise to permit a police force not controlled by Congress to have charge of this Capitol building?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, I do not see why there would be any danger in such an arrangement. The police force would be paid at least one-half by the Government. In addition to that let me say that in other cities where there are capitol buildings or other public buildings we do not find a police force specially designated for those particular buildings; nor do we find that such buildings in any of those cities are imperfectly protected.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can testify personally as to only one capitol building, and that is policed by officers furnished by the State through the authorized custodian of the capitol building itself.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It may be that there are some janitors in the State capitol buildings——

Mr. GROSVENOR. What I have stated as to one capitol building is, I think, true of all the capitol buildings in the different States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think not. There may be some special watchmen or something of that kind, but as to patrolling the grounds of the capitol buildings I do not believe there is any capitol building in any State that is not policed by the regular police of the city or town in which the building is located.

Now, I recognize that the United States Government wants to do what is fair; yet it does seem to me that the District of Columbia ought not to be trying continually to come in and get a little more out of the Government than its proper proportion. As to certain parks of the city of which citizens enjoy the benefit, the United States Government pays its half for their care and beautifying; but as to certain other parks gentlemen who claim to represent the people of the District say that the District police and other District machinery have no relation to those parks. It seems to me such a thing is unjust.

Allow me to say further that I think one-half is too great a proportion to be paid by the Government of the United States. Some remedy ought to be applied in that respect. But at present that is the proportion authorized by law and we must make our appropriations in accordance with it. It seems to me that if a proper solution of this question were arrived at the proportion of expense to be paid by the Government of the United States would be much smaller than one-half, and even in that event we would be doing more than is required from the States in capital cities under similar circumstances.

Mr. McRAE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McRAE. What has the snow-cleaning resolution got to do with the sundry civil bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Absolutely nothing.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BROMWELL having taken the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 11266) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

H. R. 11455. An act granting to the city of Boulder, in the State of Colorado, certain lands for park purposes for the preservation of the native trees on said lands; and

H. R. 1798. An act to remove the charge of desertion against Carl F. W. Stolle, of Iron Bridge, Wis.

The message also announced that the Senate still further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 4936) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. TELLER, Mr. STEWART, and Mr. PASCO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, an experience of some years in connection with the city government of Chicago brings me to my feet for the purpose of saying a word in justification of the law and the practice of this Government in paying one-half the expenses of the District of Columbia. If I had my way to-day, the Government of the United States would pay not only one-half of these expenses, but two-thirds. There is no city in this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that has the good grounds, the good streets, the good care which the city of Washington has. There is not a city in this country which, under its own local laws, can raise money enough to secure such a city government as we have here in Washington.

No Representative ever shows a friend or a constituent over the city of Washington without feeling proud that the great country to which he belongs has the honor and the greatness to maintain at the seat of its Government a city so well governed, so well paved, so well cleaned, so well lighted, so well policed, and with such good water and sewerage facilities. And the gentlemen who represent cities in the far West which do not have paved streets, and when they have paved streets do not have clean streets, or if they have streets at all do not have them well lighted, ought not to complain of the Government which gives a better city government here and takes care of a better city.

Gentlemen complain about the proposition to expend $20,000 for clearing the snow from the streets——

Mr. BOTKIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MANN. Gentlemen complain about the proposition to expend $20,000 for clearing the snow from the streets, when every gentleman on the floor of this House knows that to-day and yesterday our country has lost, in all probability, as much as $20,000, because the clerks who will be paid out of the Government Treasury were unable to reach their places of business to perform their duties, and it will be a profitable scheme for the Government to expend all the money that is necessary in order to put the streets into such a condition that the Government clerks can get to the Departments.

Mr. BOTKIN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BOTKIN] who is seeking to interrupt me was here in this House yesterday at all, he was compelled to pay a high cab fare to get here, when he ought to have been able to come upon the street cars, and would have been able to come if we had made proper provision for the cleaning of the streets.

Mr. BOTKIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Now I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BOTKIN. I should like to ask if the gentleman stated that we had good water in this city?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated, and he repeats the statement, that we have better water in the city of Washington than this gentleman, who has often been in Kansas, was ever able to obtain in any city in Kansas.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Or anything else.

Mr. BOTKIN. I was going to say that if the gentleman calls the water in Washington good water, it proves that he does not drink any of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Well, I can assure the gentleman from Kansas that the gentleman from Illinois is perfectly familiar with what constitutes a good drink. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. The gentleman forgets that we make a specialty of water in Kansas. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Shiloh National Military Park: For continuing the work of establishing a national military park on the battlefield of Shiloh, Tenn.; for the compensation of three civilian commissioners and the secretary, clerical, and other services, labor, land, iron gun-carriages and historical tablets, maps and surveys, roads, purchase and transportation of supplies and materials, office and other necessary expenses, $55,000.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which will be read by the Clerk.

Insert, at the end of line 5, page 74, after the word "dollars," the following:

"To enable the Secretary of War, through the Commissioners of the Shiloh National Military Park to construct a gravel road from Selmer, on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, to Pittsburg Landing, on Tennessee River, in Tennessee, $20,000."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will have to reserve a point of order upon this amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not make his point of order when he hears the facts.

On the 6th and 7th days of April, 1862, on the western bank of the Tennessee River, in Hardin County, Tenn., was fought the battle of Shiloh, one of the greatest and most decisive battles fought during the war; one of the decisive battles of the world's history. No doubt many members of this House participated in that great battle. Had it not been for the result of that battle perhaps Ulysses S. Grant would never have been Commander in Chief of the armies of the United States or President of the United States.

The Tennessee River runs from the south northward through the State of Tennessee and is the only means of public travel to this battlefield. The Government of the United States has expended a large sum in building a national cemetery there and caring for it, and has lately authorized the expenditure of large sums for the Shiloh National Military Park.

Work is now being done upon that park, and this place, Selmer, the county seat of McNairy County, is the nearest railroad station to that battlefield, cemetary, and national park. The facilities for traveling on the Tennessee River are not such as to afford proper and convenient means for people to visit this battlefield and national park when they come there from other States, consequently thousands of dollars are being spent for the improvement of this place, and the people of the United States who are interested in the park are unable to get there in any convenient way in the time of year when they want to get there, on the anniversary of the battle.

Mr. DOCKERY. How long will this road be?

Mr. SIMS. About 20 miles. I remember at one time a party of more than eighty gentlemen from Iowa came from Paducah, Ky., on the steamboat. Among the party were General Tuttle and General Clarkson, and many other distinguished citizens. I remember hearing the complaint of the poor facilities for reaching this battlefield, because they had to come up on the boat from Paducah and go back the same way.

When this road is constructed, at a cost not exceeding $20,000, from this railroad, which has connections all over the North and all over the South, people can come there and at any time get out to the battlefield for a small sum, and not be delayed by the inconvenience of steamboat travel.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that we ought to make this appropriation, and I want to state that it is not made for the benefit of the immediate locality. Selmer is a small town, not exceeding a thousand population, and this road will not go through the town. I am assured by the citizens along the route that property owners will give the land for this road free, and that the Government will be put to no expense in acquiring the title to it. There is plenty of good gravel all the way along. Only two small bridges will have to be constructed, and I am asking for this appropriation for the benefit of people all over the country who wish to visit this battlefield, and not for the benefit of citizens along the line, though they would incidentally receive some of its benefits.

Now, I suppose it will be held that this is subject to a point of order, but I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not make his point of order, but will let this appropriation go into the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does the amendment provide that the owners of the property shall dedicate the right of way to the United States for road purposes?

Mr. SIMS. The amendment does not provide that, but I have introduced a bill for that purpose, and when it is considered I will ask that it be amended, in case this appropriation is not allowed to remain on the bill. I am perfectly willing that the amendment should go on and that the appropriation should be made on that condition, for I am assured by a delegation of citizens that that will be done without hesitation.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say in reply to the gentleman that this amendment is for the construction of a road from Selmer, Tenn., a distance of about 20 miles, to the Shiloh battle grounds. Is that correct?

Mr. SIMS. This is from Selmer to the landing on the Tennessee River, but it is not much more than 13 miles to the battle grounds, and I understand the park commissioners are already constructing a road from the landing out to the western limit of the park, which would make only about 13 miles to be constructed.

Mr. CANNON. It is a proposition to construct a road over 13 miles of property that the Government of the United States does not own, the construction of a road from the boundaries of the park to a railroad station.

Mr. SIMS. That is correct.

Mr. DOCKERY. Just a moment. Let me ask my colleague, if the gentleman will allow me, what amount has the Government appropriated for beautifying this park?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know the entire amount, Mr. Chairman, but it is a large amount. The sum of $55,000 is carried in this particular bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand there is no railroad communication—no means by which they can reach the park.

Mr. SIMS. None whatever. This road will furnish a direct line to it.

Mr. DOCKERY. This is to make a sufficient appropriation to enable people to get to this park.

Mr. CANNON. I think it is proper to say that I apprehend there is another railroad station, possibly from another direction, where the road is being constructed. But let that be as it may, it seems to me that it is my duty to make the point of order against the appropriation for the construction of a highway 13 miles long at Government expense on land that somebody else owns.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman make the point or order?

Mr. CANNON. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Gettysburg National Park: For continuing the work of establishing the national park at Gettysburg, Pa.; for the acquisition of lands, surveys, and maps; constructing, improving, and maintaining avenues, roads, and bridges thereon; making fences and gates, marking the lines of battle with tablets and guns, each tablet bearing a brief legend giving historic facts, and compiled without censure and without praise; preserving the features of the battlefield and the monuments thereon; providing for a suitable office for the commissioners in Gettysburg; compensation of three civilian commissioners, clerical and other services; expenses and labor; the purchase and preparation of tablets and gun carriages and placing them in position, and all other expenses incidental to the foregoing, $90,922.50.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a statement and an inquiry. If I am not correct, I desire to be corrected by the gentleman from Illinois. As I understand it, the Government has heretofore provided for military parks at Chickamauga, at Shiloh, at Gettysburg, and recently, if I remember right, an act passed the House authorizing a park at Vicksburg. In other words, the United States has recognized by appropriations, including the bill which passed the House a few days since, five national military parks. Is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. I think so.

Mr. DOCKERY. Can the gentleman indicate to the House about how soon the work upon these parks will be concluded? I especially desire to inquire about Gettysburg.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I can not say, I will answer my friend. This is an increase of $12,000, in round numbers, this year to pay for some land that has been condemned for the purpose of marking the Confederate lines. My friend must ask me something easy.

The Clerk read as follows:

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT.

Toward the construction of works on harbors and rivers under contracts or otherwise, and within the limits authorized by law, namely.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, after the words "Engineer Department" I desire to offer the amendment of which I gave notice on Friday. The Clerk has the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

After line 21, page 74, insert the following:

"That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to acquire, by purchase from the States of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, for and in the behalf of the United States, such portion of territory now belonging to Costa Rica and Nicaragua as may be desirable and necessary to excavate, construct, control, and defend a canal of such depth and capacity as will be sufficient for the movements of ships of the greatest tonnage and draft now in use, from a point near Grey Town, on the Caribbean Sea, via Lake Nicaragua, to Brito, on the Pacific Ocean; and such sum as may be necessary to make such purchase is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"SEC. 2. That when the President has secured the territory in section 1 referred to he shall direct the Secretary of War to excavate and construct a canal and waterway from a point on the shore of the Caribbean Sea, near Grey Town, by way of Lake Nicaragua, to a point near Brito, on the Pacific Ocean. Such canal shall be of sufficient capacity and depth as that it may be used by vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest depth now in use, and it shall be supplied with all necessary locks and other appliances to meet the necessities of vessels passing from Grey Town to Brito; and the Secretary of War shall also construct such safe and commodious harbors at the termini of said canal and such fortifications for defense as will be required for the convenience and safety of all vessels desiring the use of said canal.

"SEC. 3. That in making surveys for and in the construction of said canal and harbors, the President may detail such number of engineer officers of the Army and Navy or employ such civil engineers as may be necessary, and may require of them the performance of such professional duties as he may desire. The Secretary of War shall have power to enter into contracts for the performance of all or such portion of the work as may be necessary to most speedily and advantageously complete the construction of said canal and harbors.

"SEC. 4. That in the excavation and construction of said canal the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua, or such parts of each as may be available, shall be used.

"SEC. 5. That in any negotiations with the States of Costa Rica or Nicaragua the President may have, the President is authorized to guarantee to said States the use of said canal and harbors, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, for all vessels owned by said States or by citizens thereof.

"SEC. 6. That the sum of $115,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the completion of the work herein authorized, said money to be drawn from the Treasury from time to time, as the same shall be needed, upon warrants of the President, made and verified by the chief engineer in charge of the work and approved by the Secretary of War."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the point of order against this amendment. First, the amendment is not germane; second, the amendment is obnoxious to Rule XXI in this, that it proposes legislation; third, that it appropriates money not authorized by existing law; fourth, it appropriates money not in pursuance of a public work or object in progress.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I had supposed that a proposition of this kind, independent and distinct—the point that it must be germane in order to have a place on the sundry civil bill—would never be made by the gentleman from Illinois. Why, Mr. Chairman, this bill takes the broadest possible range. It includes within its limits propositions of every character conceivable and for every purpose conceivable. Upon one page I find a proposition to maintain a national cemetery, and upon the same page I find a proposition for the improvement of the harbor at Humboldt. Following that I find another appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Savannah, more than 3,000 miles distant, neither one of them having the least possible relation to the other. I take it that in good faith the objection can not be made that this amendment is not germane.

There are but two questions, Mr. Chairman, that can arise in the discussion of this point of order. One of them is whether or not this work for which the appropriation is asked is now in progress. If it is, then this is the place to make the appropriation. The second is, does the amendment contain new legislation? I shall endeavor to show that in the contemplation of this section, and in contemplation of the interpretation put upon it by this committee, no new legislation is here. I take it, Mr. Chairman, that the first of the objections I have stated can not be held to be valid against the proposition, if it can be shown as a matter of fact that this work is now in progress. Let me read the rule.

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Now, if this work is in progress, then certainly it is not obnoxious to this rule, and it is a question of fact as to whether it is in progress. I maintain that it has had the solicitous care of this House at least in two sessions and has been the object of legislation for at least two sessions. In an appropriation bill—the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported by the gentleman who makes this objection—I find this, and I read from the bill which passed in 1895:

For the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility, permanence, and cost of the construction and completion of Nicaragua Canal by the route contemplated and provided for by an act which passed the Senate January 28, 1895, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua,' approved February 20, 1889," $30,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

And a board of three engineers is hereby constituted to make the survey and examination necessary for such ascertainment; said board to be selected and appointed by the President of the United States, one from the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, one from the Engineers of the Navy, and one from civil life; and the compensation of the members of said board shall be fixed by the President, not to exceed $5,000 each, including such pay as the engineers so selected are receiving, for the time they are so employed, from the Government.

And the said board, under such arrangements and regulations as shall be made by the Secretary of State with the approval of the President of the United States, shall visit and personally inspect the route of the said canal, examine and consider the plans, profiles, sections, prisms, and specifications for its various parts, and report thereon to the President; and should they ascertain that any deviation from the general line of the proposed route is desirable, they shall so state in their findings and conclusions with regard thereto in their report.

And said board shall make their report on or before November 1, 1895; and the appropriation shall be immediately available.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the sundry civil bill of 1895. It was reported by the gentleman from Illinois. He was chairman then, as he is chairman now. Many of the gentlemen, lawyers of high repute, were on the committee then and are on the committee now, and gave their sanction to the construction of this law that I now maintain. Why, look at it, Mr. Chairman; this is the first time that the Nicaragua Canal appears in any appropriation bill. Not authorized by law! Only authorized, as the gentleman says, by a bill that has recently passed the Senate. Mr. Chairman, not only is the appropriation there, but the legislation is there. New legislation—if that in the amendment I have offered is new legislation.

Here is the provision to change the ordinary current through which these appropriations flow, from the Secretary of War, who has charge of works of this kind, to the Secretary of State. Here is other new legislation. It is not to be done by the engineers of the Army under the direction of the Secretary of War, but by a commission appointed by the President; not officers detailed, but civilians. A new office is created. Not only that, but the pay is fixed at $5,000 a year; not only that, but the pay of the Army engineer, the pay of the naval engineer, is increased until it will be equal to $5,000 a year. Here is all of this legislation, new legislation, if what the gentleman now says is true. But it is not new legislation, as I shall discuss later on.

But, not content with giving this work a status that is given it in the act of 1895, I find in the sundry civil bill of 1898 a paragraph that I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nicaragua Canal commission: To continue the surveys and examinations authorized by the act approved March 2, 1895, entitled "An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes," into the proper route, the feasibility and cost of construction of the Nicaragua Canal, with the view of making complete plans for the entire work of construction of such canal as therein provided, $150,000; and to carry out this purpose the President of the United States is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission to consist of one engineer from the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, one officer of the Navy, who may be taken from the active or retired lists, and one engineer from civil life, said commission to have all the powers and duties conferred upon the commission provided for in said act.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me, although I think it makes no difference for the purpose of his argument, the clause that he has read, I think, is a Senate amendment. This matter has come by Senate amendment, and was different from the clause that was finally agreed to between the two bodies. I hold in my hand the act of 1896.

Mr. HEPBURN. I read from the act of 1898.

Mr. CANNON. I am speaking of the act of 1898. For the gentleman's purpose I do not think it makes much difference. I understood him to say he read from the sundry civil bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. The sundry civil bill as enacted, and I understand that volume to be the acts of the first session of the present Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The first session of the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; the first regular session of the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Mr. CANNON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I had my eye on the deficiency bill and this is the sundry civil bill, and I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that the first proposition of importance that the gentleman refers to is disposed of by the determination of a question of fact. Is this work in progress? Has a step been taken toward the final conclusion——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. By the Government.

Mr. HEPBURN. By the Government. If so, then it is in progress. If we have taken any steps from the point of inception to the point of conclusion, then we are progressing, and this is in progress. But gentlemen say that it has been declared that a survey shall not be regarded as committing the Government to a work of this kind. I want to call attention to that statute. I find it in the river and harbor bill of a recent date:

Provided further, That after the regular or informal report on the examination, survey, project, or work under way is proposed or submitted, no supplemental or additional report or estimate for the same fiscal year shall be made unless ordered by a concurrent resolution of Congress. The Government shall not be deemed to have entered upon any project for the improvement of any waterway or harbor improvement in this act until funds for the commencement of the proposed work shall have been actually appropriated for.

Now, there the declaration of the statute applies simply to the works named in that act. There is always a reason for a statute, and the gentlemen who voted for that had a reason for it. The reason for it was that they wanted in these particular acts to declare that the Government was not committed to them without there was something more than a survey. Now, in the absence of that legislation applying to this subject, what is the irresistible inference? That a survey is regarded by those in authority, by this House, as a part of the work; that it is a progressive step; that it must be so considered except where the law in explicit terms declares that it shall not be so regarded.

But, Mr. Chairman, in the absence of a statute, can anyone claim for a moment that a survey, a final survey, a survey complete with estimates complete, making everything ready for the work for him who digs, is not a step in the progress of a work of this kind? If it was a railway, the first thing to be done would be to make the preliminary survey; the second thing to be done would be to make the final survey; the third step would be to plant the stakes; the fourth, to secure the right of way; the fifth, the building of the superstructure; sixth, the bridging; seventh, laying the rails; eighth, the ballasting—each one a progressive step, each one constituting the progress of the work.

Can any gentleman say that any act that can be performed by any one of those who will engage in this great enterprise is more important than that of the engineer who makes the survey, who takes the soundings, who makes the borings, who studies the climate, who watches the water courses, who studies the water fall and the course of streams and the level of the lake and the character of the river, the trade winds, the possibility of completing the harbor? All these steps are essential and they all constitute that which shows the work is in progress.

I insist that, as a question of fact, there can be no doubt that this work is in progress—in progress in contemplation of this rule. I insist that in contemplation of the action of Congress, in view of the river and harbor bill of 1896 and the provision which I have read, it was the opinion of Congress that legislation was necessary in order that surveys should not be regarded as constituting progress in a work of this kind.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that this later legislation contains what the gentleman now insists is new legislation—that which was last read from the Clerk's desk. It provides for the appointment by the President of a commission. Had he the right without such legislation to appoint that commission? Surely not. He might perhaps, as Commander in Chief of the Army, have detailed Army or Navy officers. But here a new office is created; a civilian is appointed and his pay regulated; the pay of Army and Navy officers is changed—raised a few dollars or perhaps more in the case of each. Then these officers are instructed as to the course they shall pursue. They are instructed that they shall in person go upon the ground—it is not enough that they examine surveys which may be furnished them by their subordinates, but they are to go upon the ground and investigate. These are the requirements of law that they must comply with. They must make a complete and final report as to the character of the work, its feasibility and cost.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not contend that that is new legislation in the sense in which that phrase is used in the rules. But the paragraph concludes:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto, etc.

The provisions of this bill are simply limitations upon the manner in which the appropriation is to be expended. The appropriation is the major proposition. In fact, there are two—one in the first section—the appropriation of an indefinite sum; the other in the last section, contemplating an expenditure of $115,000,000. Now, every other proposition to be found in this bill is directory as to the manner in which those appropriations shall be expended. Every provision is a limitation upon the major propositions in the first and second sections—nothing else.

It is perhaps true that while the first section prescribes that the President shall purchase, and so forth—while there is that provision, yet it might not have been there. It is simply declaratory of a power that he now has. Has not the President of the United States the power to purchase that little strip of land across that Isthmus—at most 10 miles wide—which would be sufficient for the purposes of this canal? Who can say "No" in view of the fact that Thomas Jefferson purchased hundreds and thousands of square miles——

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. I will.

Mr. SULZER. I am in favor of the Nicaragua Canal, and want the Government of the United States to construct it and own it. Is it not a fact that under the constitution of Nicaragua that country can not sell any land or cede sovereignty to any other country in the world? I ask simply for information.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know whether that is true or not.

Mr. SULZER. Well, it is true.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, the gentleman says it is true. I assume he knows, or he would not say so. I assume it out of politeness, not because I think it is so. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Has the gentleman read the constitution of Nicaragua?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have read what is said to be an English translation of it.

Mr. SULZER. Did you not read in it a provision that Nicaragua can not sell any of her territory or cede any of her sovereignty to any other country?

Mr. HEPBURN. It is not in there as I read it. I have read what gentlemen with the same modicum of information as the gentlemen from New York have repeatedly asserted, but I have never been able to find that provision. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not care whether that is true or not. There is a vast difference between the constitution of such a country as Nicaragua and such constitutions as we are familiar with. Our constitutions are permanent. We have definite methods of changing them. It requires time. Not so there. I am told—I do not know how truthfully—that the legislative power of that State has the right to change, and does change from time to time, the fundamental law. But whether that is true or not, I do know that revolutions change the constitution, and that with every revolution comes a new constitution, and that those revolutions are quite as frequent as we would care for, even if we required a change in their constitution and it could not be effected in any other way.

Mr. SULZER. Then I presume the gentleman is trying by his bill to cause a revolution in Nicaragua? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, no; they have one there now, as every man in the House knows, except the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SIMPSON. I should like to suggest to the gentleman from Iowa, "what is a little thing like the constitutions between friends, anyhow?" [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, that was a New York question, and I suppose the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] can answer it. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, this amendment that I have offered, as I said before, contains nothing except the two provisions for appropriations and the direction by which they shall be expended. I said that in the first section there was this authority to the President. I said that I did not think, perhaps, that was necessary, that it only declared the law as it exists to-day, that the power to do that is now lodged in his hands. If that is true, then there is no new legislation in the first section. What I said with regard to that may be said with regard to every other of the following propositions.

There is one that he shall direct the Secretary of War, another that he shall detail officers from the Navy and the Army and from civil life to do this work, another that a particular route by way of the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua shall be utilized as far as possible, another that as a part compensation for this land that he is authorized to purchase he may give under proper terms to the citizens of Nicaragua and Costa Rica the right to use this waterway, and the sixth and last one simply declares how that money shall be drawn from the Treasury upon the warrant of the President, based upon verified estimates of the engineer approved by the Secretary of War.

Now, those are the provisions, every one of them a limitation upon the appropriation, every one of them a direction as to how the appropriation shall be used.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me? I have no difficulty about the right of the House to direct the manner of using the appropriation. The only question in my mind is whether his amendment is not obnoxious to the first provision of the rule which provides that no appropriation shall be in order except in prosecution of a work already begun. Now, I am not so clear that the work of constructing the Nicaragua Canal has already begun within the meaning of that provision. I did not happen to be in the Hall of the House when the gentleman was reciting the act under which he claims this work was begun, and what I desire to ask him now is if the law that authorized the President to appoint the commission went further than merely to authorize that commission to report?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; the act does not go any further than that, authorizing them to report; but it authorizes them to report everything that will be essential to enable the contractor to begin work. Everything, the contour of the harbors, the quantities of excavation, the necessity for piers, the value of those piers, the direction that the work is to take, and the portion of the river to be utilized, estimates of cost, borings down to find the bed rock, everything that precedes the actual thrust of the spade into the earth.

Mr. BAILEY. Then they could only have done that after a survey of it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, of course a survey is the beginning of a work.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is what I contend. It is the beginning of the work, and being the beginning of the work, when it is completed the work is in progress, for the survey is the beginning.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. In progress when they begin until they end; in progress from their beginning to the ending of their work.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield, of course.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman whether, in view of all that he has enumerated as having been done in the course of the survey and the work that has already gone forward, and the recognition of treaty rights formally given to the United States and ratified in the Dickinson-Ayon treaty of 1867, whether that would not strengthen the proposition of my friend from Iowa.

Every right that we need to build that canal appears in the Dickinson-Ayon treaty, formulated and entered into in 1867, and subsequent acts of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, under which, Mr. Chairman, we have the right to put our citizens upon the Isthmus and the Army of the United States and such portion of the Navy as we desire upon either the Atlantic or the Pacific at that point to enforce the rights of the American people thereunder, our rights being guaranteed and vouchsafed in a treaty formally entered into by the President and the Senate of the United States in behalf of this Government.

If my friend will permit me, I contend that the force of the Dickinson-Ayon treaty and the preceding and subsequent acts of this Government warrant an appropriation to give force and effect to the object sought just as much as the treaty of peace recently ratified in the Senate and entered into at Paris between the commissioners of the United States and the commissioners of Spain. We have formal, definite, distinct rights under the Dickinson treaty and obligations growing out of more recent legislation by Congress which warrant an appropriation to carry forward this great work.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, in view of what my friend has said I certainly contend that here is the second step taken, and if what he says is correct, which I do not doubt, then all that is found in the first section of the bill, in addition to what I have said as to the power of the President, is now warranted by this treaty that he has alluded to.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] adopts the argument of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH], will he kindly have that portion of the treaty he refers to read, so that the Chair may have the benefit of it?

Mr. HEPBURN. I would be glad to have the gentleman from Michigan send it up. I believe I have said all, Mr. Chairman, that I desire to say primarily upon this subject. I think we are strictly within the rule.

But I might say something here about the rule itself. I have observed, Mr. Chairman, that this rule is obsolete as to a part of the membership of this House. It is only invoked and its provisions enforced when the Committee on Appropriations desired to stand somebody off whom they think is about to make a raid upon the Treasury. [Applause.] If the rule is to be construed as the gentleman from Illinois now construes it, I say that there are thirteen distinct violations of that rule to be found on the first nineteen pages of this bill. I have only examined it up to the nineteenth page, for the purpose of discovering how little force it has on the Committee on Appropriations; but it is always enforced when they desire to invoke it, and anything like opposition to it is regarded as revolutionary, and gentlemen tell us we who would seek to get from under its pernicious power are revolutionists.

Mr. Chairman, I have but little affection for this rule. In my judgment, it stands on a par with all the other rules of this House, and their inauguration, their inception, their enactment here were of that character that gives me but little respect for them. I make the statement here that their adoption was made possible by the pledge that was made that at a later day, not longer than thirty days, this House would have the opportunity to vote upon a code of rules and to determine whether or not it would have this one as a part of this code. That pledge induced the enactment of these laws. Otherwise, I take it, they would not now be the rules of the House.

There may have been reasons justifying the gentleman upon whom the hand of responsibility was placed by that pledge for not keeping it. About that I have nothing to say; but I do say, and I say it without fear of successful contradiction, that it was that pledge that made it possible then to enact the rules in the form in which they were enacted, and that but for that there would have been a limitation placed upon their duration. So that the rule does not affect me with that idea of sanctity with which I usually desire to regard law. [Applause.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. At the request of the gentleman from Iowa and others about me, I desire to read into the RECORD three articles of what is known as the Dickinson-Ayon treaty, entered into between the United States of America and the Republic of Nicaragua on the 21st day of June, 1867. I desire to read Articles XIV, XV, and XVI:

ARTICLE XIV.

The Republic of Nicaragua hereby grants to the United States, and to their citizens and property, the right of transit between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans through the territory of that Republic, on any route of communication, natural or artificial, whether by land or by water, which may now or hereafter exist or be constructed under the authority of Nicaragua, to be used and enjoyed in the same manner and upon equal terms by both Republics and their respective citizens, the Republic of Nicaragua, however, reserving its rights of sovereignty over the same.

ARTICLE XV.

The United States hereby agree to extend their protection to all such routes of communication as aforesaid, and to guarantee the neutrality and innocent use of the same. They also agree to employ their influence with other nations to induce them to guarantee such neutrality and protection.

And the Republic of Nicaragua, on its part, undertakes to establish one free port at each extremity of one of the aforesaid routes of communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. At these ports no tonnage or other duties shall be imposed or levied by the Government of Nicaragua on the vessels of the United States, or on any effects or merchandise belonging to citizens or subjects of the United States, or upon the vessels or effects of any other country intended, bona fide, for transit across said routes of communication and not for consumption within the Republic of Nicaragua.

The United States shall also be at liberty, on giving notice to the Government or authorities of Nicaragua, to carry troops and munitions of war in their own vessels, or otherwise, to either of said free ports, and shall be entitled to their conveyance between them without obstruction by said Government or authorities, and without any charges or tolls whatever for their transportation on either of said routes: Provided, Said troops and munitions of war are not intended to be employed against Central American nations friendly to Nicaragua. And no higher or other charges or tolls shall be imposed on the conveyance or transit of persons and property of citizens or subjects of the United States, or of any other country, across the said routes of communication, than are or may be imposed on the persons and property of citizens of Nicaragua.

And the Republic of Nicaragua concedes the right of the Postmaster-General of the United States to enter into contracts with any individuals or companies to transport the mails of the United States along said routes of communication, or along any other routes across the Isthmus, in its discretion, in closed bags, the contents of which may not be intended for distribution within the said Republic, free from the imposition of all taxes or duties by the Government of Nicaragua; but this liberty is not to be construed so as to permit such individuals or companies by virtue of this right to transport the mails to carry also passengers or freight.

ARTICLE XVI.

The Republic of Nicaragua agrees that, should it become necessary at any time to employ military forces for the security and protection of persons and property passing over any of the routes aforesaid, it will employ the requisite force for that purpose; but upon failure to do this from any cause whatever, the Government of the United States may, with the consent, or at the request, of the Government of Nicaragua, or of the minister thereof at Washington, or of the competent legally appointed local authorities, civil or military, employ such force for this and for no other purpose; and when, in the opinion of the Government of Nicaragua, the necessity ceases, such force shall be immediately withdrawn.

In the exceptional case, however, of unforeseen or imminent danger to the lives or property of citizens of the United States, the forces of said Republic are authorized to act for their protection without such consent having been previously obtained.

But no duty or power imposed upon or conceded to the United States by the provisions of this article shall be performed or exercised except by authority and in pursuance of laws of Congress hereafter enacted, it being understood that such laws shall not affect the protection and guaranty of the neutrality of the routes of transit, nor the obligation to withdraw troops which may be disembarked in Nicaragua directly that, in the judgment of the Government of this Republic, they should no longer be necessary, nor in any manner bring about new obligations on Nicaragua, nor alter her rights in virtue of the present treaty.

A treaty of like import, Mr. Chairman, was made with the Republic of Colombia, under which the United States have interfered three times to preserve order upon the Panama route. This, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, introduces into the legislation of the United States in a very forcible, vigorous manner the subject of a canal across the Isthmus, and in my humble judgment furnishes some authority for making an appropriation to carry forward the objects guaranteed to the United States under this treaty.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. Is not this treaty, then, existing law, and would that not change the existing law, namely, that treaty, by enacting the proposed law?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. In my judgment, this treaty shows existing conditions, and the appropriation is in furtherance of the object sought, viz, the construction of the canal.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] puts an effective answer to the impassioned speech of the gentleman from Michigan into a single sentence. Yet the gentleman from Michigan, coming to the rescue of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], brings here the treaty of 1867, as much as saying there is no law to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] that authorizes this appropriation that you have stated, but I have discovered the treaty of 1867, with Nicaragua, that just fits the case, and he has read a portion of it, and then he gravely proceeds to say about the same time we made an exactly similar treaty with Colombia, touching the right to cross the Isthmus of Panama, and we have interfered several times under that treaty. Well, now, if that be so, it would be just as easy to put an amendment in to construct a canal across the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It would not be as wise.

Mr. CANNON. It would not be as wise, and yet it is the same as with Nicaragua. When you are talking about the wisdom, about the law, you are trying to seek with a microscope, and even with the most powerful microscope ever constructed you would not be able to find it, because the law does not exist.

Now, I will ask the committee to bear with me a very few moments while I state the facts as I understand them to be touching the Nicaragua Canal. Away back many and many years ago there was a survey made, under the authority of the United States, at various places across the Isthmus, one at Tehuantepec. One of the earliest documents that I recollect was a magnificently illustrated report of a splendid survey, covering hundreds of pages, with a detailed statement of that survey by United States officers crossing the Isthmus by the so-called Tehuantepec route. What for? That the Government of the United States might be informed as to whether there was a feasible route there, and all about it.

Well, now, it is just as much in order, on account of that survey, to move to purchase a zone or territory on a general appropriation bill to construct a canal along the Tehuantepec route as along the Nicaragua route. There was a survey of the Panama route, and all the while this Government has been trying to get information. Now, if a mere survey for information, without any other legislation, is such a law as to commit this Government to the construction of the canal, then we have got to build one at Panama and one on the Tehuantepec route, and that, too, notwithstanding this Government has incorporated the Maritime Canal Company. The Maritime Canal Company has been performing down there on a Nicaraguan canal and have absolutely thrown up some dikes and done some work.

Now, I beg gentlemen, in discussing this question, not to let their desire touching the propriety of constructing a canal across Nicaragua or at any other point along the Isthmus determine this question of order. I said the other day that under proper guards and conditions I was for the construction of a canal across the Isthmus, and so far as I have knowledge I am inclined to believe the Nicaragua route is the best. I am for a great many other things, but the construction of this canal or of any other public work on our territory or off of it ought to be after due consideration, and then the enactment of a law.

"Well, but," says the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], "we propose to enact a law here and now." Yes; that is just what you propose to do, notwithstanding the treaty that my friend from Michigan has discovered. Here is the amendment that the gentleman from Iowa introduces. What is the first line? "That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to acquire by purchase from the States of Costa Rica"—by the way, I believe the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] did not play the Costa Rican card, did he? [Laughter.] He played the Nicaragua treaty.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. This is a treaty with Nicaragua.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but you say it authorizes you under that treaty to perform in Costa Rica. [Laughter.]

is hereby authorized to acquire by purchase from the States of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, for and in behalf of the United States, such portion of territory now belonging to Costa Rica and Nicaragua as may be desirable and necessary to construct, control, and defend a canal of such depth as will be sufficient, etc.

SEC. 2. When the President has secured the territory referred to he shall direct the Secretary of War to excavate and construct a canal and waterway, etc.

He says what the capacity shall be. Also that he shall construct safe harbors at Quito and Grey Town. Then it adopts a route; it says what that shall be—Quito to Grey Town, following the San Juan River, and utilize Lake Nicaragua. That he proposes to write into the law that it shall be done. If that is the law now, why in the world is the gentleman from Iowa undertaking to write it in again? There it is.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CANNON. With great pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. The question of order is not entirely clear, but I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that it ought not to be mixed up with the merits of the proposition. The survey has been made, and there is room for a difference of opinion as to whether that was the beginning of the work or not. I suggest that there is an easy solution, and that is that we agree to make the bill a special order after the conclusion of this appropriation bill, and that will save any further question.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend from Texas, touching that matter, that it is not in his power and mine to agree to that. But I will say to my friend further that if this is a work in progress within the meaning of Rule XXI, then this amendment is in order. Let us test it for a moment. Suppose you strike out all of this amendment and put in "there is hereby appropriated $115,000,000 for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, according to the work now in progress." Does my friend from Texas think there would ever be one dollar expended under that appropriation if there was never anything else done?

Why, my friend will see at once there could not be. Yet there must be a public work or object in progress, if it is not authorized by a prior law, in esse, in being, to which you could apply the money appropriated. There is no such thing in progress, and such an appropriation would not be worth the paper it is written on; and therefore the gentleman from Iowa takes good care to provide—

That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to acquire by purchase the territory, etc.

Now, suppose this was being considered——

Mr. BAILEY. I realize the strength of the argument which the gentleman is making along that line, just as I realize the strength of the argument in the other direction; and in order to avoid a decision between the two I rose to ask that we arrange by unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill, and thus separate it from the appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. In the first place, you can not do it in Committee of the Whole——

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Illinois knows very well that if all parties were to say they would obviate the decision of this difficult question at this time by going into the House and asking unanimous consent, we would get it.

Mr. CANNON. Now, let me say to the gentleman how this matter can be reached without unanimous consent, because you generally find some one person in the House who will object to almost anything. Let me tell the gentleman how it can be done. To-morrow if this appropriation bill is not completed, I shall move to go into Committee of the Whole. If a majority of this House does not want to further consider this bill in Committee of the Whole at that time, it can vote my motion down. Then the next step in order is to arrive at a morning hour. "Ah! but," says my friend, "can we get there?" A majority of the House can arrive at a morning hour; and as soon as that morning hour is over my friend knows the House can resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills upon the Calendar, and can designate this particular bill and consider it and pass it. A majority can do that. Why has not the gentleman from Iowa been seeking that remedy? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I think it appropriate that I should answer that question. One reason I have not "sought that remedy" was because the gentleman three or four days ago served warning upon the House that every moment of its time would be required in order that the needed appropriation bills could be passed; that no time could be given for the consideration of this measure or of the Payne bill.

Mr. CANNON. Now, a word in reply to that. "The gentleman from Illinois" is one man. A majority of this House can refuse to consider anything which it does not want to consider, and can proceed to consider what it desires to consider.

Mr. BAILEY. That statement may satisfy the gentleman from Illinois, but it will not satisfy the House.

Mr. CANNON. Let me finish with the gentleman from Iowa. [Laughter.]

Now, let us consider a minute. This session of Congress met on the first Monday of last December—the last session of the Congress. The Committee on Interstate Commerce, so ably presided over by the gentleman from Iowa, was then in existence. There was the same necessity then as now for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal. All December passed by—plenty of time. Then came January. All January passed by—a good deal of time. Meanwhile we were preparing the general appropriation bills, some of which have not yet been reported—notably the naval bill—possibly the Army bill. All this time no report came from the gentleman from Iowa or his committee. Now he does come with his report; but when? On February 13 for the first time he comes with his report upon the Nicaragua Canal—two months and a half after this session of Congress began; and then when I seek——

Mr. HEPBURN rose.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment. And then when I seek as one member of the House to place it in the power of a majority of the House—I being charged by my committee with the annual money bills—that they should have an opportunity to pass them if they wanted to, and if they did not want to, to refuse to consider them—with three weeks of the session only in front of us, and if they are not considered, with a special session of Congress in front of us, because the annual appropriation bill must pass before the 1st day of next July, or the machinery of the Government stops—in comes the Iowa joker turning a double somersault and champing on the bit [laughter], and seeks to move this bill upon the great sundry civil bill and tries to juggle with the House and persuade it that it is the only chance which the House has to pass the bill.

Gentlemen, that proposed method of consideration and legislation is bad consideration and bad legislation. It leads to mistakes or it leads to fraud—sometimes one and sometimes the other. And whenever I find a patriot who is so anxious to get in his measure on a supply bill which must pass or the machinery of the Government stop, and he knows that he wants to get on there as a "rider"—because then, whether a good rider or not, as the appropriation bill goes through he rides through and arrives at the goal—whenever I see that thing done or attempted, unless it be upon some matter of such importance that all the members assent to it, I say that somebody is getting ready to enact legislation which in some of its provisions may perchance not be provident, to say the least of it.

Now, I stand here performing a duty to this House. What is it? As one member of the House—just as large as any other member, and no larger; just as good as any other, so far as the rules of the House are concerned, and no better—I stand in my place under the organization of the House, charged by my committee with this bill carrying $62,000,000 and running all along the lines of the public service, and when the gentleman from Iowa comes here and offers his bill as an amendment to this general appropriation bill I rise in my place and invoke Rule XXI.

What is Rule XXI? That no appropriation shall be in order upon any general appropriation bill, by amendment or otherwise, unless previously authorized by law, or unless in pursuance of a public work or object already in progress. Now, I invoke that rule. What for? Because it is my duty to do it; because I want this bill to be enacted; because the rider ought not to go on; because there is no sufficient time to consider it; because this rule, substantially as it is now, was adopted before the gentleman from Iowa was born and before I was born, away back in 1836 or 1837, and was found to be absolutely necessary, because the riders went onto general appropriation bills and they failed, one after another. So the rule has been continued from that time to this.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa believes that a majority of this House agree with him and agree with me that under apt and proper provision the Nicaragua Canal should be constructed. Therefore he seeks to force it on here whether or no, and in doing it violates the rules which have been growing up for the good government of the House of Representatives made under the Constitution and which are the growth of a hundred and ten years. They have never been violated, where a protest has been made against such violation, with profit to anybody; never. Therefore I am not willing that this amendment should go on here upon this bill.

Let us look a minute and see where it would legitimately lead us. If this amendment be in order, it is in order to amend it, to provide that if Nicaragua and Costa Rica will not sell, the President of the United States shall be directed to seize. There are two ways of acquiring territory, one by purchase and treaty and another by conquest. If you can provide that the President of the United State shall seize, you can provide in that event for the raising of an army.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. CANNON. In a minute. If you can provide for the raising of an army, you can provide, and have it germane and just as much in order as this is, for borrowing money or levying taxation to pay it. Therefore these rules, the growth of a hundred years, have declared that no amendment shall be in order unless it is germane. This amendment is not germane to anything in this bill and therefore is not in order.

Again, Rule XXI expressly prohibits any appropriation without prior authority by legislation. You can not find that authority. It does not exist.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman from Illinois has just stated that he would be willing, in furtherance of the object sought to be obtained, to acquire lands and other property necessary to carry on this great work. I desire to draw the attention of the gentleman from Illinois and of the committee to a treaty entered into by Mr. Frelinghuysen in 1884, containing a provision——

Mr. CANNON. Which was never ratified.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not say that it was ever ratified.

Mr. CANNON. Then I can not yield further.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But this is in furtherance of the objects which the framers of that treaty had in mind.

Mr. CANNON. It is a last year's bird's nest that never held an egg.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the last year's bird wants to get into the nest, I am perfectly willing. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Oh, this is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair trusts the committee will be in order.

Mr. CANNON. Now, one word further as to the policy of legislating in this way. It is sometimes easy to write laws upon the statute books under the influence of zeal or passion and without full consideration. Sometimes when they are written upon the statute books with full consideration they return to plague those who enacted them. If I recollect aright, the Pacific railroad legislation was enacted as a separate bill and we all huzzahed, "Grand! Splendid! A great war measure!" It was. If I had been there, I am satisfied I would have voted for it. It was the pioneer road across the continent, the original explorer. It was constructed.

After my election to Congress I came down just about at this time in the last session of the Forty-second Congress to look on, and I saw march down that aisle from the Republican side that great man of business, since gone to his long home; and I saw that great parliamentarian and publicist and journalist from New York, who had builded up a reputation from a long lifetime, from the other side of the House, march down in front and receive the reprimand of the Speaker for matters connected with the construction of those great railways.

You say, am I sorry those railways were constructed? No. Grand in achievement, splendid in conception, they brought out great things, but I would to God that the men who authorized them had taken a little more time, had put better guards about the enacting clause. The project could have waited six months or could have waited a year. It could have awaited timely and seemly consideration. I would to God they had done it, and that honored heads and great men in the country should not have had their hairs brought down in sorrow to the grave from loose and hurried legislation.

And now, as my duty is with this amendment pending here, an amendment in aid of a thing that is near to the heart of the American people and that will be worked out, considering the public sentiment North and South and East and West, as it comes here, you know, and grips hold of this great supply bill, and which is to be passed in a twinkling of an eye, recollecting the past and knowing the dangers of hurried legislation and improper provisions and improper lodgment of power, I stand, not with the cross, but with the rules, containing Rule XXI, the concrete wisdom of the Congress for the guidance in the enactment of law for one hundred and ten years, I stand and hold it up and interpose it, as it is my duty, as one member of this House, and say it can not in this way be dishonored by being put upon this bill. If you put it there, it goes with the stamp of suspicion and distrust and illegitimacy that will follow it from its birth to the time of its manhood.

A MEMBER on the Democratic side. It is no worse than your rules.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, good God, how that sounds like a parrot. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. Now, I do not know that there is anything further for me to say. There are certain things in the world that the experience of the world shows can not be done with impunity. Why, take the social relations. You understand that the laws and the customs that are placed upon the race are absolutely necessary for the preservation of the race, and he or she or they who set them to one side, being the concrete wisdom that has been gathered in all our civilization, do so at their peril.

So, I say again, the parliamentary practices and usages of this greatest parliamentary body on earth have evolved and grown in Great Britain and in this country, not only in representative halls, but in courts, upon the battlefield, upon land and sea, and are a part of our civilization. There they stand. Applied to the present bill carrying $62,000,000 for the public service, the rule of the House says, first, that an amendment must be germane, and second, that it must comply with existing law or be in continuation of a public work or object in progress.

And yet gentlemen say, thrust it aside. Why, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], good lawyer as he is, able advocate as he is, after he had argued this case, turned around, and I say it with respect, if it had been in the State of Illinois, or Indiana, or Iowa, and he had turned around and had done what he did here, it seems to me he was guilty of what out in that country they would call pettifogging. [Laughter.]

He began to talk about the Committee on Appropriations and the rules of this House and the adoption of those rules, to humble them, to disgrace them, to discredit them. He spat upon them. Why, the rules of the House are the servants of the House. The committee I belong to is the servant of the House, and so is the committee that you belong to, I will say to my honored friend, and I will say that that attempt to prejudice shed no light upon the question and was not worthy of the gentleman who made it, in my judgment.

Mr. HEPBURN addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman from Iowa desires to make reply to the gentleman from Illinois now, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HEPBURN. Only a moment. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, every member of this committee was impressed not only with the language, but the manner and the spirit of the gentleman from Illinois when he pronounced his eulogy upon the rules, their sacred character, as he held them aloft, speaking of the cross, and assimilated their sacredness to that sacred emblem. It was a very dramatic episode in the gentleman's speech, and would seem to indicate that the rules of this House had some coercive force upon his action, and that the rules of this House, he thought, ought to be obeyed. Yet the gentleman charged me with an offense against the House, in juggling with it.

Mr. Chairman, look at this bill. In the first 19 pages of it the gentleman himself thirteen times violated that rule. [Applause.] Thirteen times! And I undertake to say that I can find 75 distinct and substantive violations of the rules.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HEPBURN. And yet he holds them up for the purpose of his argument. So I say.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I call the gentleman's attention to page 76 of this bill:

Improving harbor at San Pedro, Cal.: For continuing construction of breakwater at San Pedro, Cal., in accordance with the plans and specifications of the board appointed by the President, as provided in the act of June 3, 1896, $300,000.

Simply an appropriation upon the report of a commission to certify and report.

Mr. CANNON. Not at all. In the very language of the river and harbor act, "continuation of contract."

Mr. HEPBURN. Let me call your attention to page 7, line 8.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is not a contract.

Mr. HEPBURN:

Tender for the engineer, Third light-house district: For new steam tender, for construction and repairs in the Third light-house district, New York, $85,000.

And yet can the gentleman find any authority for that in the statute? Bills are now pending in this House to authorize the construction of that vessel. No authority in law has been given. It is a wanton violation of the rule, for there is no authority for that construction; and now this amount is to be given. [Applause.] There are two others of precisely the same character as that; and I could go on and point out proviso after proviso whereby the gentleman breaks and limits the appropriations that he makes. He turns them out of their natural channel and limits them as to the amount that shall be paid in a given time. Over and over he violates this rule which he wants to invoke in order to control the action of others.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me at this point?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. In all general appropriation bills there are matters like unto that reported by the Committee on Appropriations. They sometimes pass and sometimes do not; but they always go out if the gentleman from Iowa or any other member invokes the rule. I here invoke the rule.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then undoubtedly the gentleman can be——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then the committee violates the rule, and waits for somebody else to be advised of it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Undoubtedly the gentleman can be kept within the rule if the gentleman from Iowa could always be after him [laughter]; but I can not anticipate what the committee will do.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I am after you in this. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. If I can bring it about, I intend you shall continue to be after me, and a long way behind. [Renewed laughter.]

The first sentence of the second section of that rule is this:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, etc.

[Laughter.]

Bringing in a bill making an appropriation and hoping it may escape observation, that others may not be diligent, and in that way the rule may be violated. I say if you are going to give the liberal construction to this rule that the gentleman now insists on, he is guilty of a crime against the dignity of the House, and has violated the rules over and over again; he has spat on the rules over and over again. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has had something to say about the dereliction of the committee over which I have the honor to preside. He knows, or ought to know, that that committee, month after month, has been considering this question; he knows, or ought to know, that committee at the last Congress reported a bill. He knows, or ought to know, that there was a petition signed by 300 members, I am told, of this House, asking for its consideration; and notwithstanding the fact that the rules are so easy, that consideration is so possible that anybody can have it when they want it for any measure that they please; notwithstanding that fact, with all of these months of consideration, there was not one poor moment that could be given to the consideration of that great measure.

The gentleman says that our report ought to have been in long ago. Does he not know that two of the surveying parties connected with this commission are still in Nicaragua; that the commission have not their material; that they have not yet made their final report; that their preliminary report was only made fifteen or twenty days ago, and every moment of time of every session of that committee, since and before that, has been given to the consideration of this great question? But I undertake to say that the gentleman needs no further information. If there is any one question known to the American people; one that they have determined upon; one that they have pronounced good, it is this. The gentleman ought to remember that for twenty years it has been a subject for discussion, and for the last six years it has secured more or less of the attention of the committees of this House.

The gentleman tells us how easy it is to secure the passage of this bill. Ah, but he omitted an important matter; he would move to take up this bill to-morrow. A majority could refuse. Then a call of committees; but he forgot to tell you that under a call of committees we can go to the House Calendar, and this bill is upon the Union Calendar. Ah, says the gentlemen—or he would say it if he knew that much of the rules [laughter]—he would say that after one hour has been passed under that order, then, at the suggestion of a committee, a motion may be made to go to the Union Calendar and to take up a particular bill. That perhaps is the language of the rule; but preliminary to that motion, certainly preliminary to its being effective, the Speaker must recognize you. [Laughter.] Who juggles with the House? [Laughter.] That is all, Mr. Chairman. I have to say upon this question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I suggest whether, it now being 5 o'clock, it would not be wise for the committee to rise——

Mr. HEPBURN. Let us get through with this first.

Mr. BAILEY rose and was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard now or to-morrow?

Mr. BAILEY. It will be impossible to conclude this to-night, and I think the committee might as well rise.

Mr. CANNON. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the report from the Committee on Military Affairs on the appropriation bill for the Army for the next fiscal year, and I will ask the House to take it up as soon as the fortification bill is finished.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, reports the bill (H. R. 12106) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, which will be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and all points of order are reserved thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 26. An act for the establishment of a light and fog-signal station on or near Hog Island Shoal, Narragansett Bay, Rhode Island.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 2616. An act granting a pension to Harriette F. Hoey;

S. 4231. An act granting an increase of pension to Millie A. Berry;

S. 5186. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, A. D. 1880, by extending the privileges of the first section thereof to the subport of Miami, Fla.;

S. 1827. An act granting an increase of pension to Stephen M. Davis; and

S. 831. An act to increase the pension of Thomas J. Haughey.

REMOVAL OF SNOW AND ICE IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take the joint resolution (S. R. 245) to provide for the removal of snow and ice in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, from the Speaker's table and pass it.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the following sums are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, for the following object, namely:

For cleaning snow and ice from the streets and avenues of the District of Columbia, $20,000, one-half of said sum to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the other half out of the Treasury of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. TODD. I object to that, Mr. Speaker, because I think the amount is too great.

Mr. CANNON. It will not be expended unless it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. TODD. Let the gentleman bring in a bill with a proper amount.

Mr. CANNON. My friend is mistaken; I think there ought to be as much as $20,000 available for the balance of the season.

Mr. TODD. I would suggest that if there is any member of the District of Columbia Committee here that he state how many men are now employed in cleaning the streets.

Mr. CANNON. I doubt if any member of the committee knows.

Mr. TODD. Then how do they know how large an appropriation should be made?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that they are out of money now. The Senate passed this bill yesterday, and I think they are anticipating, in the work of cleaning the streets, the passage of this bill.

Mr. TODD. I have endeavored to get information from the Committee on the District of Columbia as to the needs for this purpose, and I can get no information that any such sum is necessary. I do not approve of making appropriations without some evidence of the sum necessary. The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia can not tell how many men they have employed.

Mr. MUDD. No one can tell that.

Mr. TODD. I shall object to it.

Mr. CANNON. Well, my friend can take the responsibility and let these poor people who are shoveling the snow go hungry, if he wants to. I will say to him that the District Commissioners will not waste a dollar.

Mr. TODD. Does the gentleman think that Congress would refuse to pass a deficiency bill?

Mr. CANNON. No; but it is an offense to spend the money unless it is available.

Mr. TODD. Does not the gentleman bring in a deficiency bill and have Congress pass it at every session?

Mr. CANNON. The deficiency bill is not a deficiency in the sense that the gentleman from Michigan understands it. A deficiency bill, in common parlance, is for the balance of a year, in the future; that is, the appropriations not being sufficient for the balance of the year to carry it to the 30th of June.

Mr. TODD. Mr. Speaker, I wish the streets to be clean, but I am not willing to provide any exorbitant amount.

Mr. CANNON. Well, my friend will have to take the responsibility.

Mr. TODD. I will withdraw my objection, Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman agrees that only an adequate amount of the appropriation will be expended.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on ordering the joint resolution to a third reading.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Is it in order to move an amendment?

Mr. CANNON. I hope my friend will not do that. There is no quorum here.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. If it is in order, I move to amend by striking out, after the words "twenty thousand dollars," the words "one half of said sum," and after the words "District of Columbia" striking out "and the other half out of the Treasury of the United States;" so as to read: "Twenty thousand dollars, to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Mr. CANNON. While the House might concur in that amendment, and I should have no objection to it personally, yet I will say to my friend that there has been a long contest about this matter; and if the gentleman insists on this amendment, it means no appropriation at all for this purpose. I think my friend will find an opportunity later to insist upon this principle in such a way that it will not work any hardship. I hope he will not move the amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. I hope the gentleman will insist on the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the amendment will not be moved. I move the previous question.

Mr. BOTKIN. I am informed that the Senate has adjourned; and it occurs to me that it is impossible to put an amendment on this proposition without injury to those to whom this resolution may give employment.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I would not be put in the attitude of causing suffering humanity to suffer more than is necessary; but I thoroughly believe that these people who are at work clearing the streets of Washington will be paid, whether the money comes out of funds belonging to the District of Columbia or out of the Treasury of the United States. I thoroughly believe that this expense should be paid out of the funds of the District of Columbia. Therefore I insist on the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I move the previous question, Mr. Speaker. The amendment has not been read at the desk.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana would be admissible.

Mr. CANNON. It has not been read at the desk. It seems to me it would not be admissible.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had the floor to offer it.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. If the Chair thinks the gentleman had the floor to offer the amendment, I will move the previous question upon it.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the gentleman from Illinois mistakes the purpose of the gentleman from Indiana. If the amendment is offered and adopted, very well. If it be rejected, there is no disposition on the part of the gentleman from Indiana to delay or defeat the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; let us have a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the words "twenty thousand dollars" strike out "one half of said sum;" and after the words "District of Columbia" strike out "and the other half out of the Treasury of the United States;" so as to read, "$20,000, to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Mr. CANNON. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MIERS of Indiana, it was rejected.

The joint resolution was then ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. FARIS, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies the papers in the case of James F. Dickey, Fifty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with accompanying papers, a report on the character and value of certain improvements on lands which have become a part of the Wind River or Shoshone Reservation in Wyoming, was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

I desire to give notice that to-morrow, at the expiration of the morning business, I shall call up the bill for consideration. HELEN MILLER GOULD.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 5225) recognizing the patriotic devotion and benevolence of Helen Miller Gould. This is a measure of merit, and as we are at the fag end of the session I ask that the bill be placed upon its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, at the end of line 5, to strike out the words "the cordial appreciation of Congress is hereby tendered to her, and;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in recognition of the patriotic devotion and bounteous benevolence of Miss Helen Miller Gould to the soldiers of the Army of the United States during the war with Spain, Congress hereby authorizes and directs that a gold medal, with appropriate designs, be prepared by the Director of the Mint, and that said medal be presented to her by the President of the United States at such time and in such manner as he may determine.

Mr. HOAR. Where did that bill come from?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has just been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have it go over. I should like to look at it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is no vote of thanks in the bill. That feature has been eliminated. It simply authorizes the President to present her with a gold medal for her munificent donation and for her personal work for the soldiers. I trust the Senator from Massachusetts will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt of the patriotism and of the excellence of this lady, but there are a great many women who certainly deserve everything that the bill contains. I remember seeing in the hospital at Montauk, ministering to the Massachusetts soldiers, a beautiful and refined lady, the daughter of an eminent Confederate general, a member of the other House from Alabama, and the eyes of the sick and dying soldiers were watching her as if she had been one of their own kindred. I know the gratitude which is felt by my constituents to those excellent and devoted ladies who gave a personal service which no gift of money can approach in value. I think there should be some general policy or understanding on the part of Congress. If we select one citizen of either sex for such an honor, every citizen that deserves the same honor and does not receive it is in some degree disparaged. So, without having knowledge of the bill or studying its provisions, I desire that it shall go over one day for examination.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill lies over.

Mr. HOAR subsequently said: The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL] reported just now from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill in relation to Miss Helen Miller Gould. I desired to have the bill stand over until to-morrow under the rule that I might examine it; but I have now examined it, and if no other Senator has any objection I will waive mine and consent that it be put on its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OSBORNE W. DIEGNAN.

Mr. CHANDLER. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. R. 227) authorizing the President to appoint Osborne W. Diegnan a cadet to the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

Mr. GEAR. I ask that the joint resolution be taken up for immediate action.

Mr. CHILTON. Let the joint resolution be read for information.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in view of the conspicuously gallant services of Osborne Warren Diegnan, a sailor in the service of the United States, in the sinking of the Merrimac in the harbor of Santiago de Cuba, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint the said Osborne Warren Diegnan a cadet in the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was the joint resolution reported regularly from the Committee on Naval Affairs?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was reported this morning.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

THE BROWNELL & CO., DAYTON, OHIO.

Mr. TELLER. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 599) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sum of $400 to The Brownell & Co., Dayton, Ohio, on account of penalty erroneously imposed by the Light-House Board, to report it without amendment, and as it is a small matter and has the approval of the Department, I ask that the bill may be put on its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER (for Mr. CANNON) introduced a bill (S. 5510) granting an increase of pension to Eli Balderston; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McBRIDE introduced a bill (S. 5511) to increase the pension of Catherine A. Young; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5512) to increase the pension of Samuel S. White; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for the construction of a brick storehouse on the grounds of the Propagating Gardens, in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $165,000 for the construction of two revenue cutters of the first class for service on the Great Lakes, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $15,000 for constructing, maintaining, repairing, and operating telegraph or telephone lines between Glenhaven, Mich., and South Manitou Island, Lake Michigan, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MASON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 to be expended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in opening, extending, and grading Fourteenth street through the estate of John T. Lenman and land of Lipscomb and Saunders, trustees, by condemnation or purchase, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MARTIN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $8,500 to enable Gen. Thomas L. Casey, Chief of Engineers of the Army, to continue the examination relative to making or securing designs for a memorial bridge across the Potomac River, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $158,400 to be expended by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary to complete the project for the improvement of the Potomac River below the city of Washington, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11414) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. CULLOM, Mr. SEWELL, and Mr. TELLER were appointed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 14th instant approved and signed the following acts:

S. 3684. An act for the relief of Joseph Toussaint, alias Touzin; and

S. 5088. An act to amend section 27 of the Revised Statutes, relative to the apportionment and election of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Presinent had on this day approved and signed the following joint resolutions:

S. R. 218. A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the Naval Acadamy, at Annapolis, Ricardo Yglesias, of Costa Rica; and

S. R. 219. A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the Naval Academy, at Annapolis, Alberto Valenzuela Montoya, of Colombia.

STEAM WHISTLE AT MICHIGAN CITY, IND.

Mr. PERKINS. At the request of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS], who is absent, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 10231) authorizing the Light-House Board to provide a steam whistle at Michigan City, Ind. It is a short bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Light-House Board to provide a steam or hot-air fog whistle at the entrance of the harbor at Michigan City, in the State of Indiana, at a cost not to exceed $5,500.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPUTY COLLECTOR AT SCRANTON, MISS.

Mr. MONEY. I ask consent to call up and put on its passage the bill (H. R. 11440) to locate the office of the deputy collector of the port of East Pascagoula, Mississippi, at Scranton, Miss. It is simply to remove the office 8 miles.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make a privileged motion. I move that the Senate proceed to consideration of executive business. Now I will withdraw the motion, in order that the Senator's request may be entertained, but I wished to have the motion entered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts will be recognized to make the motion. In the meantime the Senator from Mississippi asks the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to locate at Scranton, Miss., the office of the deputy collector of the port of East Pascagoula, in the Pearl River district of the State of Mississippi.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MCENERY. Mr. President, I rise to a question of privilege. I apologize to the Senate for making a statement out of time. It ought to have been made yesterday when certain statements were made to which I will allude. I would not even do it now except for the inference from those statements that after the joint resolution was introduced by me on the morning of the 6th instant it was in some way tampered with and that as finally voted on it was an entirely different resolution from that first proposed.

Yesterday the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] called attention to some remarks made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] on the 6th instant pending a debate on the joint resolution introduced by me. In reply to that statement the Senator from Kentucky said:

> I am informed that the resolution as offered by the Senator from Louisiana, then, turns out to be not the resolution I supposed it was. The original resolution as he offered it did seem to meet the very point I made when I was making those statements. My attention has been drawn to the fact that this is not the original resolution, but one altogether different from it. The investigation I have made has convinced me, even if I had been discussing this resolution at that time, that the pending resolution does not do any of those things.
> Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky what has become of the original resolution?
> Mr. LINDSAY. I can not answer the question.
> Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I was endeavoring to discuss——
> Mr. TILLMAN. I will state, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me, that the evening we ratified the treaty the McEnery resolutions, which had been presented that morning, were amended out of all shape as he presented them, and then printed the next morning as though he had introduced the resolution which we now have, whereas if we will get the original typewritten copy we will see an entirely different measure.

The joint resolution introduced by me had been in my possession for some time, and I had intended to offer it as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN]. I deferred offering it at the request of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], but on the morning of the 6th instant I concluded to introduce the joint resolution, and I then changed it to make it suit the conditions which then existed. That resolution was sent up to the desk and was read by the Secretary.

> Mr. MCENERY. I offer a resolution and ask that it be read, and that an hour be fixed before 3 o'clock when the vote shall be taken on it.
> The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.
> The Secretary read as follows.

Then follows the joint resolution as introduced by me. Objection was made to its consideration by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. Then nothing was done until after executive session, when a debate ensued upon the motion to fix a day for a vote. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], in the course of his remarks, stated:

> The resolution as it now stands is as follows. Allow me to read it again.

Then he read the joint resolution as amended. Immediately on the conclusion of his remarks the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] made the remark quoted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON], which called forth the explanation from the Senator from Kentucky. So far as the Senator's relations to the joint resolution are concerned, I am willing to admit that possibly he saw the resolution before it went up with the alterations that I had made, but even those alterations did not materially change the text of the resolution.

After the executive session the joint resolution was amended only in two ways. One was by inserting the words "the Philippine Islands" instead of "said islands," and the other was by striking out the word "pending," so as to make it accommodate itself to the conditions after the ratification of the treaty. Those were the only amendments, and hence I can see no ground whatever for the declaration of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that the resolution had been amended out of all shape and then printed next morning as though it was the original joint resolution which I had introduced.

Now, Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] took occasion yesterday, in his denunciation of the joint resolution and in his graphic description of the tyranny which he imagined would be inflicted upon the people of the Philippine Islands, to state that the sum and substance of the joint resolution was that it meant the protection of the sugar interests of Louisiana and to ward off competition.

If the sugar planters thought that the annexation of the islands or the ratification of the treaty would injure them, it was their right, if not their duty, to protect themselves in any way whatever they saw fit, just as much so as the people of Massachusetts should protect themselves from the imposition of a duty upon hides in order to foster and encourage the leather industry of that State.

But the Senator spoke under a misapprehension. If he likes to represent a proud, intelligent, and respectful constituency, if he likes to represent men of the character of the sugar planters of Louisiana, who agree with him in his views, I say the sugar planters of Louisiana concurred with him in every sentiment that he uttered in reference to the treatment of the Philippine Islands. They have been, as a body, opposed to the ratification of the treaty, and they expected that I would vote against the ratification of the treaty. I never consulted them. I voted without any consultation with them whatever.

I do not represent that class of people exclusively in the Senate. I come from the northern portion of Louisiana, a section of country that is devoted exclusively and entirely to the cultivation of cotton, and those people to a man were in favor of the ratification of the treaty of peace. I think the Senator did the sugar planters a great injustice in putting the construction that he does upon my motive in introducing the joint resolution. I am proud, Mr. President, if on any occasion it is within my power, to aid and assist any of the people of the State of Louisiana. If the construction which the Senator places upon the joint resolution is correct, that it was intended to protect those people, and does protect them, I am very glad of the action which I have taken.

But that was not my motive exclusively in introducing the joint resolution. I had some objection to the results which would follow the ratification of the treaty. I thought they could be cured by the introduction of a resolution defining the policy of the Government—a policy which, in my opinion, would keep them from becoming a part of the territory of the United States and numerous ignorant diverse races from being incorporated into the citizenship of this country.

Those were my principal motives for introducing the joint resolution, and if incidentally it helped the people of Louisiana I am very glad of it.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me one sentence, I wish to say that I said nothing of anybody's motive or purpose. I said all the resolution would accomplish is what the Senator from Louisiana says he would be very glad to have it accomplish.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, I would not insist on taking the floor at this time except that the explanation of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY] rests somewhat upon a statement made by me the other day in debate.

I want to say that there is no difference in recollection between the Senator from Louisiana and myself. I did not mean to intimate, nor did I intimate, nor do I believe, that any improper change in the resolution was made after I saw it. The original resolution was shown me in a clean typewritten copy. It was then intended to be offered as a substitute for the resolution offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN]. Afterwards substantially, I will admit, the same resolution was offered as a joint resolution. I had no knowledge that any changes had been made in it, and I supposed it was the resolution as shown me before it had been introduced at all.

The right of the Senator to change the resolution no man can question, and the propriety of the changes made by him is not open to dispute.

I wish to say that if anyone understood me to intimate, or if anything I said will bear the interpretation that I intimated that anything improper had been done about the resolution, I disclaim here and now any such intention. The truth of the matter is, it was neglect on my part not to read the resolution when it came up for debate, so as to see that it conformed to the original which I had in my hand. It may be that the changes were not substantial. I think they were; but we will not debate that question.

I said in the course of my answer to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON]:

> The investigation I have made has convinced me, even if I had been discussing this resolution at that time, that the pending resolution does not do any of those things.

Which he quoted me as saying that in my opinion the adoption of the resolution will bring about. It was neglect on my part. That is what I meant to say and meant to explain, rather than to impute anything in the slightest degree improper to the conduct of my friend from Louisiana.

I believe that is all I feel called upon to state on this subject.

PETER E. SHIPLER.

Mr. HOAR. Before I rose to make my motion, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] rose to make a request, and I will, therefore, if there be no objection, yield to him, and after that insist on my motion against all other business.

Mr. HALE. After that, I shall call for the regular order.

Mr. QUAY. I rise to ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the consideration and passage of a pension bill on the Calendar. It is a bill which has passed the House of Representatives, granting an increase of pension to Peter E. Shipler, late captain of Company G, Tenth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Corps, a regiment with which I had the honor to be connected. I trust the Senate will indulge me by passing the bill without objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5796) granting an increase of pension to Peter E. Shipler. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Peter E. Shipler, late captain Company G, Tenth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Corps, and to pay him a pension of $20 per month in lieu of that he now receives.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 303) granting a life-saving medal to Michael F. Barry, of New York City.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HOAR. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is the regular order, and the question is on that motion.

Mr. BATE. I thought I had the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] had the floor and made a motion for an executive session, which he withheld for three Senators.

Mr. BATE. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive session. After three hours and fifty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ICE IN THE POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12094) making an appropriation for clearing the Potomac River of ice, which is on the table.

The bill was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to meet expenses that may be necessary for the purpose of clearing the Potomac River of ice, within the District of Columbia, there is hereby appropriated, payable from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and from the revenues of the District of Columbia in equal parts, and to be immediately available, the sum of $5,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate the joint resolution (S. R. 244) making an appropriation of $5,000 for clearing the Potomac River of ice.

The motion was agreed to.

CODE FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, for the purpose of asking unanimous consent, I call the attention of Senators to the bill of the House which has been placed on each Senator's desk, No. 8571, entitled "An act to define and punish crimes in the district of Alaska, and to provide a code of criminal procedure for said district."

This bill passed the House of Representatives some time ago, and it has been the subject of very careful consideration in the Committee on Territories for about a month. The committee has added sundry amendments, not extensive or important, in the text of the bill as it passed the House. But an addition was made in the form of a code of civil procedure. The criminal code and the code of civil procedure were both primarily prepared by the code commissioners authorized to codify the criminal and penal laws of the United States, who were directed by a special resolution of Congress to prepare or codify the laws applicable to the Territory or district of Alaska.

It is very desirable that some system of laws applicable to that district should be passed at the present session of Congress. Moderate estimates place the number of our citizens who will be located in Alaska engaged in various occupations during the coming year at a hundred thousand. It is probable that the present permanent population of the district will reach about 30,000. There are very large and important mining and fishery and other operations in progress in that region, none of them paying any taxes and none of them having any very distinct legal protection.

I realize that it is utterly impracticable to take up the time of the Senate in the busy hours of the day reading this bill from beginning to end, and for the purpose of having it read formally I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill commence at this hour, that no other business shall be transacted during such formal reading, and that the formal reading may continue until concluded, unless the Senate shall sooner adjourn during the evening.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, when the Revised Statutes of the United States were enacted, that statute had the careful attention of a committee of the House and was prepared as this proposed statute has been, which affects 30,000 permanent people and a hundred thousand possibly in near prospect partly permanent and partly transitory. That statute was laid on the table of the Senate one day after 12 o'clock. It was read by its title only; it had three readings by the title only; it was enacted without debate and without amendment on the same day, and on the next morning at 12 o'clock a printed and bound copy of that large volume, all printed at the Printing Office in the interval, was laid on the desk of the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate, a marvel of legislative dispatch and a marvel, also, of mechanical execution.

Although there have been some omissions, some errors discovered in that code of laws, they have been fewer in number all told than have been discovered in some special acts occupying only five or six or eight pages. One of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, which had the examination before it was enacted of the late Senator George, of Mississippi, a very distinguished lawyer, and Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, late chairman of the Judiciary Committee, had, I have no doubt, more important errors in it than the whole of the Revised Statutes.

Now, I respectfully suggest, without interfering with the plans of my honorable friend, that that precedent will well warrant the reading by its title only of this bill, which comes from three very learned commissioners, which has been examined in the House of Representatives by a committee there with a good deal of care, and has been examined by this committee with a good deal of care, reading it by its title only and accepting by unanimous consent whatever amendments our committee propose as a matter of form, and then letting it go into conference or go back to the House.

Mr. CARTER. I will, with the permission of the Senate, very readily and gladly accept the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and modify my request for unanimous consent accordingly, asking that the bill be read by title, and that the amendments made in committee be agreed to as amendments made in the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. And a conference asked.

Mr. CARTER. And a conference asked with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts astounds me, being simply a layman. I am surprised that so distinguished and experienced a Senator should make a suggestion that we should legislate in that way. I admit it is a short cut, but I will suggest further that it would be equally a short cut for us to pass all sorts of bills in that way, something that we are not in the habit of doing in the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, it is true that the House of Representatives has considered part of this bill. Two hundred and twenty-five pages out of 665 pages the House has considered. The rest has been added by the committee of the Senate. I have not read it; I do not know whether it is wise or unwise; but I do notice one thing. A little time ago we had up the question of repealing the prohibitory laws in the district of Alaska. It was fought over in the Senate, and the advocates of license did not prevail. Perhaps they will the next time. The House did not suggest that that should be done in the bill it sent here.

Mr. CARTER. I will suggest to the Senator that the House did so provide. It provided for a license law in the district.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I stand corrected to that extent. I simply noticed the provision under the form of an amendment, commencing on page 230.

Mr. LODGE. On page 60 the House provision is found.

Mr. CARTER. On page 60 the House proposition appears, as is suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I stand corrected to that extent.

Mr. CARTER. The House proposes a license law based on the theory of the law of the State of Illinois on that subject. The Senate amendment is framed upon the theory of the license law of the District of Columbia, we believing that that law was framed more in harmony with the spirit of the government that would prevail in the district of Alaska.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I said, I stand corrected to that extent. But of course the Senate committee provisions are different from the House provisions, to say the least. Now, that is a matter which I happen to believe is of some consequence and ought to be debated. I do not know that I shall have very much to say about it, but I am not willing that it shall go by default.

I say, Mr. President, I can not afford to let it go by default. I am not willing to have it said, as it has been said on the floor of the Senate, and then to be crystallized into law, that this Government of ours can not enforce its statutes, especially when the statutes are made to govern some 30,000 Indians and a few white men who chance to go into that Territory. The governor of the Territory in his annual report pretty pointedly suggested that no real attempt had ever been made to enforce it. I think the law officers of the Territory have made the suggestion that it is impossible to enforce it. And yet no real effort that anybody has ever been able to find has been made to enforce it.

Mr. CARTER. Permit me to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts might be adopted, excepting only the license question, which might be specially reserved as an amendment not to be considered according to the general arrangement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no desire to unnecessarily interpose objections to this or any other report that is made from a committee. I repeat that it startles me to have a suggestion come from one of our oldest Senators that we are going to dispense with the reading of bills in the Senate, because this will not be the only time such a request will be made if we enter upon that kind of legislation. But I will not myself interpose any objection. I shall not interpose any factious opposition on the point to which I have called attention, but I should certainly like to have it left open, so that it can be read and at the proper time debated.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] in regard to this matter. I am upon the Committee on Territories. I have myself not had time to look through this measure properly, as I should have done, and I am quite persuaded that though the subcommittee who have had it in charge have done their full duty and have made proper amendments and changes in the bill as it came from the House and have put it in a condition as near perfect as they could, yet the course suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts is a precedent that I think ought not to be set by the Senate. They ought not to take bills of vital importance like this and read them in that way and pass them here. It is to be the law to control Alaska; it is to be the local law that is to govern it for many years to come perhaps, we know not how long, and it ought to be enacted with a degree of care according to the necessity and dignity of the law.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I beg to differ with the Senator from Massachusetts in regard to the Revised Statutes. While he knows the history of the manner in which the Revised Statutes were passed better than I do, as he was then a member of the body, I speak not more of the manner than the result. We have heard time and again the manner in which that was done discussed in the Senate, as we have elsewhere upon the stump and through the press. It is a kind of stain, almost, if I may so speak, upon the legislation of this country that those statutes should have been passed in the manner in which it was done. Out of that the trouble, or a part of the trouble, in regard to our currency question grew. It is alleged openly and publicly that there was fraud practiced then and there, and that it was done by an improper reading or a want of reading of the statutes, and a want of giving proper attention at the time of its passage. All that grows up out of this vicious method of legislation.

Therefore I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire, and I think this act touching the government of Alaska ought to be read, every word of it. I do not want to detain the Senate, but this is an important matter, and to legislate it into law without reading would set an example here of vicious legislation and full of dangerous consequences. It can not be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish simply to observe that in Alaska they have needed a code for years now; it has been a scandal that they have not had one; and in my opinion you will not get a code for Alaska unless the precedent set in the case of the Revised Statutes be followed. I do not believe that we shall ever do it practically in any other way. If you have the document read, it will be an occasion when all but five or ten Senators in the body will leave the Chamber and the Senators present will be here on some other errand than attending to that business. I take the liberty to express my opinion that that will be the result.

Mr. HALE. Now, where would the Senator stop in this process of railroading legislation?

Mr. HOAR. Wait until I get through.

Mr. HALE. No; I am asking the Senator before he gets through. I do not want to put my question after the Senator has sat down. I will begin again. I ask the Senator—that is the form of the question—where he would stop in this process of railroading legislation through that it is claimed is important, that it is claimed has had great scrutiny, and that it is claimed can not pass unless we resort to this process? To-morrow some other committee will invoke the action of the Senate in the same way, and does not the Senator himself see any danger resulting from another precedent in this direction? Will it not be claimed by other committees and other commissions afterwards that we shall do the same thing?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should stop where our precedents have stopped, and I should go as far as our precedents have gone. Where a code undertaking to include in a statute of hundreds of pages the entire body of jurisprudence, either for the United States or for this Territory, so far as it is enacted in a statute, is concerned, I should trust it to the committees or the commissioners who have made it. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee and implied in the remarks of the Senator from Maine has not any practical force, because the thing which I propose to do, in a way which will save much time, is going to be done without saving much time. You are not going to get the Senate of the United States, this winter or any other winter, to take under consideration, in the usual way, the 665 pages which include an entire code of civil and criminal law, embracing every subject proper for legislation and for jurisprudence, crimes, civil rights, remedies, contracts, torts, descent of estates. Any page of the 665 pages might give rise to a difference of opinion if we debated it as we do other things. The thing will not be done. You are either going to take the result of the labors of these commissioners and the labors of this committee and send them into conference, where the disagreements will have the careful consideration of three able lawyers representing each body, or you are going to take a long time in the Senate in reading and debating day after day this long bill, and you will have the same thing happen in the end.

Mr. HALE. Now will the Senator allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. This is legislation for a far-distant people, in a sense alien to the United States. I should not want to set the precedent with all the reasons given for it by the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. HOAR. That is not a question.

Mr. HALE. I will put it in a different form.

Mr. HOAR. Then I will answer it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is very apt to ask questions of others.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. And I am very apt to ask questions of him.

Mr. HOAR. I do not in the least object, but my friend got up and seemed to make a speech answering mine, before I got through.

Mr. HALE. I have known the Senator to do that a hundred times and there would be a very good speech put into the body of some one else's by the interruption. I shall not put a very good speech into his, but I will put it in the form of an interrogation. Would the Senator be willing to make this precedent? It is important legislation about a distant people. It has had the management and scrutiny of a commission. But if we do this for Alaska to-day, does not the Senator fear that we may be asked to do it for Hawaii to-morrow, and for Porto Rico the next day, and for the Philippines the next day? Would the Senator want any commission appointed to report a code for Porto Rico or Hawaii or the Philippine Islands and put it through without the Senate doing just what he says we have not time to do, considering everything section by section?

Mr. HOAR. I have seldom had a bill of discovery in which I have had to respond to so many interrogations; but I will try to answer the Senator.

Mr. HALE. The Senator must be subject to interrogations, as every Senator is here. It has got to be our way of debating, and I hope the Senator will be encouraged by my example and ask me questions.

Mr. HOAR. I will ask one now. When will the Senator get through?

Mr. HALE. I can not tell. I will put my question again.

Mr. HOAR. I object to the Senator putting it again.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will answer the question, I will not put it again. I will wait until my friend gets through.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I would stop exactly where our old precedent stopped—the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia and the Revised Statutes of the United States, where you have got a code, including an entire body of jurisprudence, and I would leave it to the commission or the commissioners, and enact the code reported by them. It is impossible to do anything else, and you are not going to do anything else. The alternative is to leave the people in Alaska without any law at all; for we certainly can not, if this bill is to be read in full, enact it at this session. After we pass this code, if there are any complaints or difficulties, we shall have our attention directed to the specific difficulties and can meet them in an understanding fashion.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Then is the Senator's proposition that the more difficult and exhaustive we make a code for a people the less consideration we should give to it?

Mr. HOAR. No; but it is something which grows out of the necessity of the case. You have got to do that thing.

Now, let me say what everybody knows will happen when the reading of that bill begins—unless what I say at this moment prevents it—the Senator from Maine will disappear from this Chamber.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no.

Mr. HOAR. And he will not be in this Chamber for a week.

Mr. HALE. The Senator need not be too certain about that. My association with the Senator from Massachusetts is so pleasant that if he will agree to stay here I will stay with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will disappear from this Chamber. Everybody who knows him knows he will, if he does what other Senators do in like cases, and that he will not appear for a week unless he puts his nose—I beg his pardon; his countenance, I mean—into the door and inquires what is going on; and if informed that the clerks are reading this ponderous document, he will go back to his other employments and not come into the Chamber again until he gets some assurance that the reading has been concluded.

Mr. HALE. Is not that likely to be the case about any important matter? But the reading of a bill does give a Senator who is inclined to scrutinize and to watch a measure and who stays here more than either the Senator from Massachusetts or I do an opportunity to make objections, whilst this process does not allow such an opportunity even to a Senator who stays here or the half dozen Senators who stay here and who are interested in the matter. We do not look after everything here; that is, most of us do not. We look after the things in which we are interested from our committees.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think it is quite the thing to do to ask me a question in the middle of a sentence and for the Senator then to make an argument.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator is restive, I will not go on.

Mr. HOAR. I am not restive, but I wanted to complete what I was saying. However, I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has alluded to the fact that only a few Senators listen to the reading of bills; but the Senators who want to listen will be here and have an opportunity to do so. I do not see the emergency, I do not see why this bill should be brought up in the last fourteen or fifteen days of a session, and why we should be asked to agree to the entire codification of a system of laws without anybody knowing what is contained in it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say now, if the two Senators will allow me to do so, that we are not practically going to do this thing in any other way than in the way I have suggested. If you attempt theoretically and formally to do it in any other way, you will find you can not do it at this session of Congress, and that you will have to leave those people in Alaska entirely without law for ten or twelve months, certainly for six or eight months. The line of distinction is clear as to the character and nature of this transaction. It is a code covering all jurisprudence in Alaska, and it is impossible to have a code covering all jurisprudence, the intelligent result of an understanding and debate in the Senate, unless you are going to take several years to it. One session of Congress would be required in discussing that one bill, and there would be danger of it preventing the consideration of other important matters.

Now, I wish to refer to the suggestion about the Revised Statutes of 1873 often being denominated as a fraud. I supposed then and suppose now that to be one of the silliest and most thoroughly exploded and absolutely contradicted political charges that ever was made in the heat of a campaign; and I say again, with some experience as a lawyer and as a Senator, that there are few statutes of ten pages in length which we pass on legal subjects which afford fewer grounds of criticism on the whole than the Revised Statutes of the United States. There may be some mistakes, and of course mistakes are always important, but in general those Revised Statutes constitute a masterpiece of good legislation.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I have no doubt in view of the objection of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] that the first request I preferred should be preferred anew. I desire, however, to make one observation before preferring the request.

This bill is not a new system of laws, but a codification largely based upon the statutes of the State of Oregon, changed only in so far as necessary to adjust the law to the system of government in the district of Alaska.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator as to whether this work has been done in committee, or whether the committee has had outside assistance?

Mr. CARTER. This work was primarily done by the code commission, consisting of Judge Culberson, of Texas, a very eminent lawyer, well known in this body, and the other, as well, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives for a great many years; of Judge Botkin, a lawyer of eminent standing in the State of Wisconsin, many years ago a lawyer of large practice, and Judge Watson, of Ohio.

Mr. STEWART. Was the code commission appointed for the purpose of preparing this code?

Mr. CARTER. The code commission prepared this work.

Mr. STEWART. Under an act of Congress?

Mr. CARTER. Under a resolution of Congress, passed in regular order, for the purpose of having the work done. Thereafter the criminal code passed through the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the House of Representatives and passed the House of Representatives. We have added to that criminal code a code of civil procedure, and that code constitutes the chief amendment, save and except to the extent that we add a license system.

Mr. STEWART. What is the civil code modeled upon?

Mr. CARTER. It is modeled upon the civil code of the State of Oregon—the simplest form of procedure.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator if there are any provisions in this bill about mining and mining claims?

Mr. CARTER. I will say to the Senator that we have provided in what is known as the Alaska government bill briefly for the recording of locations.

Mr. TELLER. Is that in this bill?

Mr. CARTER. There are two bills, one now pending in the House of Representatives, which I am advised will be passed next week, which provides for the division of the district of Alaska into three subdivisions, each to be presided over by a judge, and a recording system is provided for in the hands of the court.

Mr. TELLER. I want to inquire whether there is in this bill any attempt to interfere with the mining regulations established by the miners themselves?

Mr. CARTER. Not save and except to the extent that in the absence of local regulation we provide that notice of location shall be filed for record within ninety days after the location shall have been made, but we leave the local rules and regulations of the miners to govern wherever such local rules and regulations obtain which are not in conflict with the general laws of the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There is nothing relating to mining claims in this bill.

Mr. CARTER. There is nothing in this bill relating to mining laws.

Now, I renew my request that at the present time we proceed with the formal reading of the bill, and that the reading continue until it is completed, or until adjournment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to ask the Senator if any member of the Committee on Territories has read this bill through and carefully examined it?

Mr. CARTER. A subcommittee consisting of three members of the committee read every section and line of the bill, and have gone over it with very great care.

Mr. PETTIGREW. How long has the committee had the bill?

Mr. CARTER. In the neighborhood of a month or six weeks.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator will carry out the suggestion I made. If this bill be laid before the Senate, I hope the Senator will ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of considering the bill he has in charge.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the regular order, the unfinished business, be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. HALE. I have no belief that this bill can be passed at the present session of Congress.

Mr. CULLOM. Why not? It can be passed as soon as it shall have been read.

Mr. HALE. If it is taken up now and the reading commenced, it will take certainly one or two or three days of the time of the Senate.

Mr. CARTER. I have no idea that it will occupy two hours.

Mr. HALE. I know the Senator has not.

Mr. CARTER. I certainly hope not.

Mr. HALE. But when it is read through, it will be subject to debate and discussion, and I can not consent, for one, that the Senate embark upon the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CARTER. I feel quite confident that if the Senator will reflect a moment he will realize the very great importance of passing this bill, at almost any sacrifice, at this session of Congress.

Mr. HALE. I do not see why it is now especially of more importance than it was a year ago. This matter has been allowed to run into the last fourteen or fifteen days of the session, and we are asked to take up a bill of nearly 700 pages on a subject nobody knows anything about——

Mr. CARTER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HALE. And to commit the Senate to its consideration. If the Senate deliberately decides to take this bill up and consider it, and other Senators do not object, then I will have to submit; but I will not consent that it be taken up by unanimous consent. If the Senator wants to move to take the bill up, let him take the sense of the Senate on that question.

Mr. CARTER. I merely ask that the formal reading of the bill may be proceeded with.

Mr. HALE. That commits the Senate to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. Not necessarily.

Mr. HALE. And the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] suggested that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. That puts the bill of the Senator from Montana before the Senate, and the moment the Senate gets any leisure which is not occupied by the unfinished business the Secretary keeps on reading this bill, and it will then be before us, and we can not help it. If the Senator wants to move to take up the bill, let him make the motion and get a majority of the Senate to do so; but he can not get my consent to take it up.

Mr. CULLOM. My understanding was that it was the purpose of the Senator from Montana to ask for an evening session for the purpose of proceeding with the reading of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. The formal reading of the bill.

Mr. HALE. That commits us to the consideration of the bill when to-morrow morning comes.

Mr. CARTER. No such construction will be placed upon the arrangement by me.

Mr. HALE. The bill must be before the Senate, or else it can not be read at all.

Another thing I will say. It has come to be the fashion to hold a man personally accountable if, in the interest of the public business, he objects to some measure. I have not as much interest in the passing of some of the great measures which are before this body as others have; I have not as much interest in the passage of the great appropriation bills as the Senator from Iowa has. If the Senator from Iowa believes now that the Senate can afford to take up this bill of 665 pages and start it before the body, and that we can get through with the appropriation bills also, then I will take his suggestion about it.

Mr. TELLER. It will not interfere with the appropriation bills.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to hear what is the proposition for unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. That the bill in charge of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] be taken up and the reading proceeded with. That puts the bill before the Senate.

Mr. CARTER. The first formal reading of the bill.

Mr. HALE. And when to-morrow morning comes and the routine business is completed, then this bill comes up.

Mr. CARTER. I am sure, if the Senator will permit me to make a statement of facts, he will allow the reading to proceed.

Mr. President, it is not a pleasant thing to state, and yet it is a fact known to lawyers in Alaska that a legal jury has never been impaneled in that district, nor can one be impaneled there to-day, notwithstanding numerous men have been executed.

Mr. HALE. Why did the Senator put this important matter off until the last fourteen or fifteen days of the session?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Montana has been endeavoring day and night in committee to get this proposed legislation perfected.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator been obliged to call up this bill and spring it upon us at this stage of the session?

Mr. CARTER. There is no springing about it. There has been an earnest and determined effort to make as perfect as possible every line and section of this proposed code of law.

Mr. HALE. It was a surprise to the Senate, and certainly it was a surprise to me, when the bill was brought in here and this effort made to take it up.

Mr. CARTER. It may be a surprise to the Senator, because it was only received from the commission something like sixty days ago; and if Senators are surprised it is because they have lacked the diligence to apprise themselves of what was before the body.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator wants to take up the bill he must take the sense of the Senate upon the question; but I certainly can not consent to it.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, certainly nothing can be more important than that there should be some legislation touching the conditions existing in Alaska. The testimony taken by the committee shows that fact. I will say to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that it is almost absolutely indispensable that something of this kind should be done. My idea was that any Senator who objected to anything contained in the bill should have at least an opportunity to criticise it, if he desired to do so, whether in regard to the code itself as an entirety or its component parts, the impaneling of juries, the holding of courts, the division of the districts of Alaska, the raising the money by which all expenses are to be met, or laws touching the mining interests—for all those matters and many more are contained in the bill.

It seems that there is really no law in Alaska to govern that district, and something ought to be done. One of the most delicate and sensitive subjects to be handled in connection with this bill is that in regard to the prohibition question, which was referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. That is contained in the bill also.

I believe every Senator ought at least to have an opportunity to be heard, if he so desires, upon any proposition contained in the bill. Besides, I think it would be vicious legislation to pass a bill of this character nem. con. We have here almost every day bills two or three hundred pages long. Such is frequently the case with the great appropriation bills, and we manage to get through with them in a short time.

What if some Senators do leave the Chamber, as was said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]? There can be no criticism upon that, for all who are interested in the items in the particular bill under consideration will stay here and attend to it; hence we will feel safe and secure in the end that the bill has been properly criticised and properly acted upon.

I think the same opportunity ought to be afforded for the consideration and the discussion of this bill as is afforded in the case of other great bills. This bill is only about twice as large as some of the appropriation bills which we have to pass upon now. This bill contains something over 600 pages, and appropriation bills and some others now on hand contain two or three hundred pages.

I think, Mr. President, the Senate ought to allow the reading of this bill to proceed on the motion of the Senator from Montana. The people in Alaska need laws, and it is all important that a wise system should be devised for their government. It is necessary that there should be a division of the courts in that large Territory, where three appointments of judges and minor officers to conduct the courts have to be made. The clerks, marshals, etc., under the judges, and the commissioners are indispensable there. Things are now running riot in that respect, so that something ought to be done.

I think it is due to those people that we should pass a bill providing a code of laws for their government, and we ought to give some time to its consideration. It makes no difference where it presses or what it may temporarily set aside, this is one of the things that is important and that ought to be done.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I prefer the request that the formal reading of the bill be proceeded with. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not know what is contained in this bill. I have glanced over it here at my desk to see what it is, and I find it is a civil and criminal code of procedure for the district of Alaska. I find also that the House of Representatives only dealt with the criminal code. I should be glad to know from the Senator whether or not both of those codes have been reported by the commission?

Mr. CARTER. Both of those codes were reported by the commission, and likewise a code of civil law, which we do not include in our amendments from a desire to limit the work in the greatest possible degree.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that the passing of the Revised Statutes in the form in which they were passed constitutes a precedent for this legislation. The Revised Statutes were passed, it is true, without reading in this body, except by title, but it was then stated that the Judiciary Committee of this body had carefully examined those statutes; that they contained nothing but a restatement of the laws then in force which had passed both Houses of Congress; that there was no new matter in those statutes; and we had the assurance of the Judiciary Committee of this body—I remember it very well—that the statutes had been carefully compared by the code commissioners who had prepared them and that there was no new legislation of any kind in them.

Now, here is a code which is absolutely new legislation, except that the Senator from Montana states that it is based upon the laws of Oregon. The laws of Oregon, as I understand, have been in vogue in the Territory of Alaska since its acquisition, or practically so. Therefore, although there has not been a separate and a distinct code of procedure for Alaska, there has been for years, as I understand, a spreading of the statutes of Oregon in existence at the time over the Territory of Alaska by the specific designation of our statutes.

I do not wish to impede the progress of this bill, although I can not see, when this code commission has only reported within sixty days, and the House of Representatives saw proper to only act upon one of the codes, that there is any special or great importance to be attached to the disposition of the bill at this session, although I am willing that whatever time can be spared to the consideration of this measure may be occupied in its consideration. But, whatever may be done to-night, I shall object to this bill being before the Senate on to-morrow, either to lay aside the consideration of the regular order or to interfere with appropriation bills. In any agreement made respecting this bill I ask that it shall be understood that at any time an appropriation bill is ready it shall be considered, and that this bill shall not stand in its pathway. Otherwise I am sure it will be impossible for us to deal with this question and pass the current appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE. Not only appropriation bills, but any other bills.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if it is not the privilege of the appropriation bills to have the right of way?

Mr. ALLISON. That would be the case ordinarily, but I understand the Senator from Montana asks that this bill shall be taken up now, and that the reading shall be proceeded with until completed. Suppose that this bill is taken up in ten minutes from now and some Senator moves to adjourn——

Mr. HALE. Or calls for a quorum.

Mr. ALLISON. Or calls for a quorum. Then there is an interruption and to-morrow morning we are confronted with the unanimous-consent agreement that this bill shall be read until it is completed.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the proposition is that the reading shall be proceeded with until we adjourn this evening.

Mr. CARTER. My request was that we proceed with the formal reading of the bill to-night.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. Until its completion, unless we sooner adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly; which means that we shall proceed with its consideration to-morrow unless we have it understood that the bill shall not then be considered.

Mr. CARTER. That is no part of the request. I have no idea of extending the reading beyond to-night.

Mr. HOAR. I am very confident of the propriety, not to say the wisdom, of the suggestion I made. We should commit all such jurisdiction ordinarily to a Territorial legislature. If Alaska were a Territory having 100,000 or 200,000 people, as the Dakotas had before they were admitted as States, if the people there had a Territorial legislature which contained those three commissioners—Judge Culberson, an eminent jurist and statesman, long at the head of the law committee in the other branch, Judge Botkins, and their associate, Judge Watson—and had, in addition to that, the revision in another branch from a body whose collective wisdom was equal to that of the committees of the two Houses, which had gone over the whole subject, and then the thing was to be gone over again in conference, you would consider that they had as good a legislature as that of any Territory or State in this Union, old or new.

Although, theoretically, this is to be an act of Congress, we have practically intrusted its compilation, as we intrusted the Revised Statutes, to a committee. Whether it was a statement that they were codifying existing law or no, it was making a revised statutes of the law of the land, and all the thousands and hundreds of thousands of doubtful questions of interpretation that may have existed in former laws, so far as the Revised Statutes settled them, were settled without the action of the Senate.

I wish to repeat here the affirmation of my conviction that in taking that course you take the only practicable course, because it is clear that otherwise these poor people have to be left without any law. They have not even a law providing for the administration of justice with the aid of a jury. We have got to leave them without law for another winter or you have to take this course, and the course is one which, practically, will be taken whenever we pass this code.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely wish to make one suggestion. I have just glanced at the code here in my seat, and I find no provision as to when it shall take effect. Therefore it means that it shall take effect from and after its passage. Now, manifestly that would be an injustice to the people of Alaska, 5,000 miles away. It may be that there is a provision on that subject which I have not seen.

Mr. CARTER. There is a provision that the law shall go into effect the 1st day of June, 1899.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit that that is too early a day, considering the distance to that far-off Territory.

Mr. CARTER. It might go into effect on the 1st day of July.

Mr. TELLER. That is a matter of amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I only call attention to it to show that there may be amendments to the bill in other directions. I do not object to the bill being taken up and considered if it shall be understood that it shall not stand in the pathway of appropriation bills. Other Senators may have other bills of importance, and they may not wish it to stand in their pathway. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. TELLER. I can not see why the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations insists upon reserving to that committee what I understand the rules of the Senate give it.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not now, the Senator from Montana having modified his request for unanimous consent.

Mr. TELLER. The Appropriations Committee have the right to call up an appropriation bill at any time and proceed with it.

Mr. BATE. It is privileged legislation.

Mr. ALLISON. That is, if no unanimous-consent agreement interferes with it.

Mr. TELLER. It has never been understood that a unanimous-consent agreement interfered unless we agreed to vote or do something of that kind. There is no proposition to vote on this bill.

Mr. HALE. There are many other matters besides appropriation bills which I believe are of more importance than this bill.

Mr. CARTER. My request goes only to this evening.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Montana simply asks that the Senate shall proceed to the first formal reading of the bill, the order only to continue for this evening, I shall have no objection.

Mr. CARTER. I will put the request in that form, and further supplement it with the statement that no business shall be transacted during the evening save and except the formal reading.

Mr. HALE. That is right.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator having this bill especially in charge. The House bill, as I understand it, provides only a criminal code.

Mr. CARTER. It is confined exclusively to the criminal code.

Mr. LINDSAY. The House bill covers about 245 pages. The Senate amendment, providing a code of civil procedure to take the place of the Oregon code, which I understand to be now in effect in the district of Alaska, increases the volume of this bill by over 400 pages. I suggest why not act upon the House bill at this session? What assurance have we, if we amend this bill by adding a code of civil procedure, which is not absolutely essential, that the House will be able to take up and consider the amendment we shall send over to it? If it be indispensable that a code of criminal laws shall be enacted, why not let us act upon the bill sent over by the House without increasing it threefold in size and importance.

Is there any pressing reason why the code of civil procedure now in force in the district of Alaska should be superseded at this particular time? I can understand why there should be haste in establishing a code of criminal laws to apply in that district, but we have the court, we have the district attorney, we have a code of civil procedure—whether it be the best or not I am not able to say. But certainly at this late day in the session it seems to me judicious to act upon the House bill and not send practically a new bill back to the House.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has asked unanimous consent that the reading of this bill be proceeded with to-night, the order to last only until the adjournment, not displacing the unfinished business or interfering with appropriation bills.

Mr. TILLMAN. What is the regular order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no regular order.

Mr. TILLMAN. What will be the business before the Senate unless that consent is given?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is the regular order before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to make a statement as to the reason for my action. Senators will remember that as soon as the Nicaragua Canal bill was completed, in spite of the protest of the minority of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, what is known as the anti-scalping bill was taken up. It has been lying here day after day ever since as the unfinished business of the Senate. There are some Senators who propose to discuss that bill exhaustively before it becomes a law, if it passes at this session, and if we are going to discuss it at all we want to begin. I shall object to displacing that bill after to-morrow unless we have an agreement that we will have time enough, without being pressed by our amiable friend who is at the head of the Appropriations Committee to push this, that, and the other out of the way so that he can pass the appropriation bills. I therefore object to taking up anything until the anti-scalping bill is disposed of, unless we can dispose of it by unanimous consent and refer it, along with the House bill, to the committee to which it belongs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will withdraw his objection. I intend with him to take part in a very full discussion of the ticket-brokerage bill if it is considered at this session; but I am not so anxious to begin that debate as to be unwilling to have the other business of the session go forward. I think the proposition made by the committee which has reported the Alaska bill is one which ought to commend itself to the Senate; that is, that the reading should go on now until the bill is finished, and that no other business should be done except the reading of the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is time to go to dinner.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from South Carolina goes without his dinner when the public good requires it just as often as any other Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will excuse me, as the people of Alaska have been without a code so long, I do not see why, in the expiring hours of this Congress, we should get into a sweat here in this cold weather and press forward without rhyme or reason the passage of this measure.

Mr. CHANDLER. We ought not to unless we want to facilitate the public business and transact as much of it as can be well transacted before the 4th of March. If we do want to facilitate public business, then we ought to make this agreement.

With reference to the ticket-brokerage bill, I will state that the discussion upon that measure will cover a great deal of ground. I could enumerate now the various heads of the discussion leading up to a full consideration of the subject of trusts and monopolies such as are now growing up in this country. The ticket-brokerage bill is one in the interest of monopoly and against competition, and is only one of a long series of legislative acts that will be proposed here from time to time in the interest of monopoly and against public competition. I do think, as the debate upon that bill will certainly take a week, even if it is not prolonged and not made exhaustive, as the Senator from South Carolina says he intends to make it——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me?

Mr. CHANDLER. In one moment. The legitimate discussion upon that bill will take a week, and I hope that the Senator from Illinois will allow the unfinished business to be displaced, so that it may not be a continual bugbear to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. And to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. And other Senators.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I do not care to take up the time of the Senate in discussing the anti-scalping bill or the other measure. I thought this afternoon, when the Senator from Montana desired to get up the proposed revision of the laws of Alaska, in order to proceed with the reading of it this afternoon and evening, that it was a reasonable request to make, and I encouraged it. I do not think myself, however, that the Senate ought to pass a bill with the declaration that none of it is to be read. I think that would be a mistake.

Mr. STEWART. Would it not solve the question if the Senator from Montana would move now to take up the bill? You will have no trouble in getting up your bill any time you want to.

Mr. CULLOM. Let me say something.

Mr. STEWART. Talk well and I will let you go on.

Mr. CULLOM. I do, generally.

The request of the Senator from Montana seems to have been denied, so far as I know, and the Senator from South Carolina desires to know what has become of the anti-scalping bill, and he objects to the consideration of anything else while that measure remains as the unfinished business.

I desire to say simply this: The bill, it is true, has been upon the Calendar as the unfinished business, having been taken up by a vote of the Senate, but the Senator from South Carolina knows, and every other Senator knows, that up to this afternoon there have been matters pressing before the Senate, such as appropriation bills and treaties and resolutions, that seemed necessarily to take precedence of the anti-scalping bill or any other business of ordinary character. I will state frankly that I very much doubt whether we will be able at the present session to pass the bill which seems to be such a nightmare to the Senator from South Carolina—referring to the anti-scalping bill. Still I have had hopes that there would come a time during the present session when we might take up the anti-scalping bill and pass it, if possible, without very long delay.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me?

Mr. CULLOM. I very readily see that if the Senator from South Carolina and his colleague as against the anti-scalping bill—I refer to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]—determine to take up as much time as they can, under the rules of the Senate, in talking about it, the probability is the bill will not come to a vote. If it does not, it will not be my fault.

All I desire to say now is that I should like to take up the bill and press it to a final vote, because it has been in my way as long as it has been in the Senator's, and I should like to get it out of the way by passing it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to suggest to him that if that had been his view, he ought not to have taken up the bill in the way he did, after the committee, by a majority vote, had instructed him not to do so until the other bill——

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Excuse me, please. Of course you have the floor——

Mr. CULLOM. I have yielded to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Until the other bill, dealing with the general powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, had been brought in. That was our agreement in committee; and the Senator knows we had a hearing, in which the Interstate Commerce Commission appeared there, by Mr. Knapp and others, and presented their views in an extended way, the Senator agreeing with them and championing their bill, and asking the committee to vote on it and send it in here. Now, apparently, the Senator suddenly changes front. Of course I am speaking without any intention of being offensive to the Senator, but he seemed to lose all interest in his own baby, and he took up this other baby that somebody else had introduced or fathered previous to that.

We who are opposed to any legislation on the subject of interstate commerce until we can have the whole matter taken up and pass one general law covering the entire field, killing and extirpating, if you please, these "perjurers and thieves," as they are called by the railroad people, who buy and sell tickets——

Mr. CULLOM. I did not yield for a general discussion of the railroad question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course, if the Senator wants to stop me, I will come in after he gets through.

Mr. CULLOM. Oh, no; I merely do not wish to take up the time. If the Senator from Montana wants to get up his bill and everybody is willing to let him——

Mr. TILLMAN. I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Montana should get up his bill, if the Senate will take it up, but I do object to displacing this very important measure which the Senator from Illinois is championing and which has been displaced from day to day.

Mr. CULLOM. Only temporarily.

Mr. TILLMAN. We are tired of the word "temporarily." We want the bill to go to its little grave or else we want it——

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator is very incorrect in his statement, if he will allow me to say so. In the first place, I did not have the bill taken up by motion or otherwise except to vote for it. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] called the bill up, and it is before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I only remember that the Senator from Colorado expressly stated that he did it at the request of the chairman of the committee—yourself.

Mr. CULLOM. The chairman of the committee simply requested the Senator from Colorado to take charge of the bill——

Mr. TILLMAN. And get it up.

Mr. CULLOM. Because I was ill at the time and could not be in the Senate.

The Senator from South Carolina is mistaken in another respect. He says I dropped one bill and took up another. I did not do that. Neither did the Senate. The Senate took up for consideration the bill which I reported from the committee that the Senator refers to, although he is mistaken in one respect. It was taken up at the time it was, after, I think, a majority perhaps of the full committee had stated that they were willing to have it done, without referring the bill to the Committee on Interstate Commerce at all. I do not want to discuss that bill to-night, although I am prepared to discuss it when we take it up for consideration. I merely wished the Senator to know that in the first place it was not taken up on my motion, and in the second place he knows as well as I do that there has not been a time until this evening when we could consistently ask that it be taken up for consideration, especially as the Senator himself has been proclaiming on every occasion almost that when we did take it up he intended to take as much time as he wanted, and that it would take a great deal of time in order to dispose of it. So far as I am concerned, I should like to see the bill passed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me right here?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have never uttered any such thing to any man on this floor or outside of this Chamber. I may have thought it. The Senator may be a mind reader. If that is the way in which he has arrived at my purpose, I tell him now it is my purpose, and that the bill can not pass the Senate at the present session if I can prevent it.

Mr. CULLOM. I have heard the Senator say so before, whatever may be the Senator's statement.

Now, he knows as well as I do that we have had no proper opportunity to consider that bill up to this time. I am ready to take it up to-morrow morning, but I am not willing to take it up and interfere thereby with the appropriation bills that are now pending and which have to be passed. I want to be reasonable about the matter, and I hope the Senator does; and when he charges me with violating my pledges and all that sort of thing, he is mistaken.

Mr. TILLMAN. I certainly had no purpose of charging the Senator from Illinois with violating pledges. My language I do not think will bear any such construction. If so, I withdraw it. I simply wish to say that the Committee on Interstate Commerce by agreement entered into by a vote, and I think the Senator himself voted that way——

Mr. CULLOM. No; I did not.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not sure; I do not recall. I merely know that by a vote of 6 to 4 the order was made that the bill be reported to the Senate, and then by a vote of 6 to 4 the order was made, much to my surprise, that it should not be taken up in the Senate until the committee had considered and reported the bill which the Senator from Illinois had introduced, dealing with the general powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and materially enlarging them.

Mr. CULLOM. In response to the Senator's statement, I will say that the RECORD shows all about it, and when the time comes it will be considered. I do not care to take the time to answer the Senator on that point. However, I wish to say, while the subject is up, that I desire to have the bill passed, but I announce now that I do not intend to insist upon it as against appropriation bills and other measures which have to be passed at the present session of Congress, if they are to become laws, in order to carry on the affairs of the country.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The House bill is now upon the Calendar. Has the Senator any objection to taking it up and having it referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce?

Mr. CULLOM. I have, until we see whether we will consider the other——

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Illinois state why he objects?

Mr. CULLOM. It may be that if we enter into the consideration of the one, we may want to take up the other possibly in preference to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Allow me to call the attention of the Senator from Illinois and of the Senate also to the way this legislation is being attempted. There is a House bill. It came over four or five weeks ago. The opponents of the bill have been anxious from the beginning that it should be referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee and that it should be considered by that committee, and yet there it lies upon the Calendar. Now I ask unanimous consent that the House bill may be taken up and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that will not be done until the Senate determines the question I have referred to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have my request submitted to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate has heard the request of the Senator from New Hampshire. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOM. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Consent is not given.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 16, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 15, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHARLES W. RUSSEY.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the special order set for this morning, the bill (H. R. 245) for the relief of Charles W. Russey.

I have now all of the papers in connection with the case which were used by the committee who have considered the bill, and which I ask to have read at the desk.

The first one is a letter from the Department written to Mr. Hutcheson, formerly a member of this House, in which is incorporated one to Senator JONES of Arkansas, neither of which I ever saw until this morning.

The letter was read, as follows:

SIR: Referring to House bill No. 5732, for the relief of Charles W. Russey, who was formerly a subcontractor on Mail Route No. 29359 (Mineral Springs to Ultima Thule, Ark.), and to your letter of the 9th instant for information in connection with the claim, I have the honor to inform you that there was deducted from the pay on this route the sum of $433.58 for failure to perform service, both ways, over 12 miles of the route, between Paraclifts and Norwoodville, from January 18, 1884, to December 12, 1885.

The following copy of a letter addressed to Hon. J. K. JONES, United States Senator, by this office, under date of September 23, 1885, sets forth the position of the Department in the matter:

"The deduction of $334.28 made from the pay of Mr. Charles W. Russey was made because he and the subcontractor for Routes Nos. 29065 (Lockesburg to Paraclifta) and 29239 (Lockesburg to Rocky Comfort) partially consolidated their routes, so that no service was performed over 12 miles of the route for which Mr. Russey is subcontractor. The consolidation was without authority of the Department. If the Department had ordered the change, there would have been deducted from the compensation a sum equal to the value of the service dispensed with. The amount withheld now is only what would have been paid to Mr. Russey had the Department been sooner informed of the fact. It would not seem that he is entitled to pay which he would not have received had he, in the exercise of good faith, advised the Department, in the first place, of the change he had made."

This letter was written in reply to the application, made by Mr. Russey, for the remission of the amount deducted from his pay on said route for the quarter ended June 30, 1885, which application was forwarded to this office by Senator JONES on September 14, 1885.

In the opinion of the Department this claim should not be allowed. When the Department advertises for separate and distinct service over two or more different routes, it has a right to demand that service, and it holds that a contractor or subcontractor has no right to combine the service over the whole or any portion of those routes. If the Department had desired this to be done, or intended to permit it to be done, it would have so stated in its advertisement for the service.

Very respectfully,

W. T. BISSELL,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOS. C. HUTCHESON,
Committee on Claims, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

In contradiction of that paragraph in the letter which says that he consolidated his route with another, I submit the affidavits of the three postmasters, indeed all of them on the route, except one, J. B. Smith, who lived at the beginning of the route, and who was the enemy of the carrier.

The affidavits were read, as follows:

SEVIER COUNTY, State of Arkansas.

I, David L. Cowden, hereby certify that I was postmaster at Norwoodville when Charles W. Russey was mail carrier from Paraclifta to Ultima Thule via Norwoodville; that the mail was regularly carried and arrived promptly at this office; that those who received mail at this office were not in the least inconvenienced by Mr. Russey not crossing the river at Paraclifta, but his traveling the road by Lockesburg was for the benefit of the people; they received their mail by this change where, on account of high water, they would not have received their mail had Mr. Russey traveled the road direct from Paraclifta to Norwoodville. I may have once signed a petition to change the above-mentioned route to have it go via Lockesburg, where the river could be crossed at all seasons.

D. L. COWDEN, P. M.,
Norwoodville, Ark.

SEVIER COUNTY, State of Arkansas.

I, Mrs. Anne Hopson, do hereby certify that I was postmistress at Paraclifta, Sevier County, Ark., when Mr. Charles W. Russey was mail carrier from Paraclifta to Ultima Thule; that he carried the mail on said route promptly and regularly; that in crossing the Cossatot River near Lockesburg, instead of Paraclifta, the people were not inconvenienced in the least, but got their mail as soon as they would have by crossing at Paraclifta, and often received their mail when they would have not on account of there being no bridge on the river at Paraclifta. I also remember signing a petition to change the route from Paraclifta to Ultima Thule in order that the mail go by Lockesburg, where it could cross the river regularly.

MRS. A. E. HOPSON, P. M.

Sworn and subscribed to before me this the 21st day of March, 1894.

H. L. NORWOOD, Notary Public.

SEVIER COUNTY, State of Arkansas.

I, W. K. Dellarhide, do hereby certify that I was postmaster at Ultima Thule when Charles W. Russey was mail carrier or contractor on route from Mineral Springs to Ultima Thule. Paraclifta and Norwoodville post-office were on said route. I signed a petition to change said route by Lockesburg, for the reason that the river could not be got around at all seasons at Paraclifta and could be crossed at Lockesburg on the bridge. I further state that the only change Mr. Russey made was to travel the road crossing the Cossatot River near Lockesburg on the bridge. The mails arrived at Ultima Thule regularly and came when it would not have if he had traveled the road that crossed the river at Paraclifta, the river frequently being too full to be crossed there.

W. K. DELLARHIDE,
County and Circuit Clerk.

Subscribed and sworn to before me on this 22d day of March, 1894.

H. L. NORWOOD, Notary Public.

Mr. McRAE. Now, Mr. Speaker, here is another affidavit of the mail carrier, whose good character is testified to by 27 honorable citizens of Sevier County.

The Clerk read as follows:

I, Charles W. Russey, do solemnly swear that during the term I was subcontractor on Route No. 29359, from Mineral Springs to Ultima Thule, in the State of Arkansas, during the fall, winter, and spring seasons it was impossible to cross the Cossatot River, between Paraclifta and Norwoodville, on said route, on account of overflows in said river, there being neither bridge nor ferry on said road. That by going about 8 miles up the river I was enabled to cross said Cossatot River on a bridge. For that reason I would during such rainy seasons vacate the regular route and go up the river to the bridge on the public road, between the town of Lockesburg and Norwoodville. That the service performed by me in lieu of that on the route vacated was much heavier, the distance being 6 miles greater between Paraclifta and Norwoodville, so that on each round trip 12 miles additional service was added to the distance.

That the trips were run regularly and connections made on schedule time and no post-office was vacated. During the time I had the route I got up a petition in due form for a change on said route, and all the postmasters on the route signed it except one, J. B. Smith, the postmaster at Mineral Springs, and for the reason that he did not sign the petition I did not send it in. That all parties along the route were well pleased with the change and none were delayed in receiving their mail or otherwise put to inconvenience.

CHARLES D. RUSSEY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me on this —— day of March, 1894.

[SEAL.] W. H. COLLINS, Notary Public.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, County of Sevier.

We, the undersigned citizens of Sevier County, say that we are acquainted with the affiant, Charles W. Russey, whose name appears to the foregoing affidavit, as well as with the facts stated in said affidavit, and believe the same to be true and correct.

W. T. Boyer, N. V.; J. M. Hunsucker; H. L. Norwood, representative; W. C. Park; J. A. Woodford; A. B. Bishop, M. D.; W. R. Woodruff; Geo. Pork; J. B. Martin, county examiner; Jim Floyd; John C. Bell; H. C. Williamson; J. H. Turrentine, treasurer; J. A. Little; N. M. Cannon; G. S. Turrentine; Robt. E. Steele; Rupert Steele; W. P. Oliver; A. L. Tribble; Steel & Steel, attorneys; W. H. Collins; F. C. Floyd; W. K. Perkins, county judge; W. K. Dollenline, county judge; R. M. Grady, sheriff; Alex. Luther, ex-court clerk; L. H. Norwood; F. F. Coffey.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Charles W. Russey, who was the subcontractor on Route No. 29359, partially traveled the Route No. 29358, so that no service was performed over 12 miles of Route No. 29359, for which deduction was made. From the evidence read the facts appear to be that during the period for which Mr. Russey was subcontractor on Route No. 29359, 12 miles, from Paraclifta to Norwoodville, is through river bottom, low land, and impassable during greater part of the year. The Cossatot River between is quite a large stream, there was no bridge nor ferry on route, and being a mountain stream and easily swollen by heavy rains, there are many creeks and sloughs which, when the water is high, are dangerous to cross; that the 12 miles of route was vacated for those reasons, and in lieu thereof greater service over a longer route was made—there being a bridge on the route substituted; that by so doing the trips were regularly run and connections promptly made; that the community was greatly benefited by the change.

The Department claims that it had the right to demand the service on the particular route scheduled. That is not denied. But the evidence shows that the service could not have been rendered. The honest attempt he made to deliver the mails should entitle the carrier to full compensation. The evidence shows that trips could not have been made without danger to life and injury to mails. Had the trip been undertaken and traveled one way, the carrier was liable to be detained indefinitely by high water before his return, thus rendering it impossible to make schedule time and causing a great inconvenience to the community. The objection is only technical and without equity.

If no service was performed on the one route, greater or double service was still performed over another; and, from a parity of reasoning, double pay should have been allowed on route over which service was rendered.

The Government has suffered no imposition and has nothing to complain of. It is the party benefited by the change. It is enforcing a penalty unjustly, and the loss falls heavily on a deserving citizen, who is a poor man.

The mere fact that the Department was not advised of the change was not because of bad faith on the part of the claimant, as has been charged. The reason was that at the beginning one postmaster on the route, J. B. Smith, refused to indorse the change, and on account of a personal grudge against the claimant reported the irregularity to the Department.

No one denies that the mails were promptly delivered at all the offices on Route No. 29359. No one denies that for a greater portion of the year it was impossible to deliver the mail by said route by reason of high water. No one denies that under such circumstances the contractor would have been entitled to his pay for the whole time for his failure to perform service which was not due to any fault of his. No one would deny that it was better to carry the mail over another road and thereby supply the wants of a country and meet the ends and objects of the law than to leave the mails at some post-office to await the fall of a swollen and impassable river. And I assert that if the service was rendered impossible by high water, and the contractor would have been paid irrespective of the trips thus lost, there is no equity in stopping his pay because he carried the mails over another than the scheduled route, because he traveled 6 miles over another route.

I submit, therefore, that the Government received all the fruits of the services contracted for; that the aims and objects of the law have been absolutely met, and that to stop the pay or any portion thereof to the contractor on the technical grounds assumed by the Post-Office Department is adverse to the principles of equity. Outside of the evidence it is known that the claimant, Mr. Russey, sustained great loss in having the mails carried over the substituted route.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a plat which will show to anyone who desires to see it exactly why this change was necessary. From the affidavits of these postmasters and of Mr. Russey himself it is perfectly clear to my mind and has been satisfactorily established to every committee that has ever investigated it that this man performed the service and ought to have his pay.

Mr. BRUCKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McRAE. Yes.

Mr. BRUCKER. This petition which was circulated to change the route—was that petition presented to the Department?

Mr. McRAE. That fact does not appear from the papers I have.

At any rate, the Department say they did not authorize the change. Now, when this gentleman went up the Cossatot River and crossed the bridge which he mentions in his affidavit, he there struck another mail route in order to go to Norwoodville, and because he traveled over a route that another mail carrier traveled over the Department insist that he shall have no pay for it. But the route of Mr. Russey, you must remember, did not stop at Norwoodville, but extended to Ultima Thule. That is all there is in it. But he performed the service, and if the carrier had stopped at Paraclifta or Norwoodville, then there would have been no mail facilities to Ultima Thule.

Mr. BRUCKER. The question that I asked was this: Is there anything in the record which the gentleman has submitted to show that this mail carrier ever informed the Department that they desired to have this route changed?

Mr. McRAE. All the postmasters on the route except one say that a petition was signed by them, but the Department says that they did not authorize any change. This was in 1884, and the present officers there remember nothing about it. They told me so this morning, that they only found the letters which I have read and one other to the same effect.

Mr. BRUCKER. Does the Post-Office Department dispute the fact that this petition changing this route was filed?

Mr. McRAE. The people in the office now do not know anything about it, and no search for such papers had been made this morning at the time I called on the chief clerk.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, there is a matter of considerable importance involved in this bill, although it involves but $436. But first, in case I might forget it in going into another portion of this question, I will answer the question of the gentleman from Michigan that he propounded to the gentleman from Arkansas. It is immaterial whether the Department ever received any request to change this route. The Department, in a letter here presented, stated that if the route had been changed they would have made this reduction.

Mr. BRUCKER. Then it is only a question of good faith.

Mr. LOUD. The Department says that if a change had been made this reduction would have been made.

Mr. BRUCKER. This man would not have been held to perform the service, and the other man would.

Mr. LOUD. On yesterday "the gentleman from California" [Mr. LOUD] said:

What does the Department say about this bill?

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] said:

The Department officials told me several years ago that the man ought to have his money, but that in order to enforce proper discipline and good service they felt constrained to make deduction every time he went on this circuitous route and not the route prescribed by the Department.

I then said:

Is there any letter from the Department in relation to this subject?

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE]:

There is none incorporated in the report. I do not know of any letter from the Department, but I have talked with the officers about this case, and so have other members of the Committee on Claims. No one who has examined it has objected to it.

Then, later, the gentleman from Arkansas says:

I do not know whether the committee has such a letter or not, but I know that the gentleman who reported this bill—the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF]—refused for a long time to make the report, until he could consult with officers of the Department.

Upon that statement, Mr. Speaker, I waived objection to this bill on yesterday.

Now, the facts in the case are clearly demonstrated by a letter from the Department. This is the fourth report from the Department which has been made against this bill, and yet the gentleman stated here on his honor as a Representative——

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will not be permitted to say that I knew of any letter or that any had ever been written to me.

Mr. LOUD. I only read from the RECORD.

Mr. McRAE. I repeat again, the officials of that Department several years ago said exactly what I said on yesterday.

Mr. LOUD. I only read from the RECORD, so that the gentleman can not say I misquote him.

Mr. McRAE. You can not misrepresent me if you read from the RECORD.

Mr. LOUD. I will read it again:

Mr. McRAE. I do not know whether the committee has such a letter or not, but I know that the gentleman who reported this bill—the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF]—refused for a long time to make the report until he could consult with officers of the Department.

Mr. McRAE. That is true. The gentleman from Illinois did tell me substantially that.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from Illinois is not here.

Mr. McRAE. And if he were here he would tell you that he refused to report the bill until he examined the facts.

Mr. LOUD. I think the fact is the Department every time they have been requested to pass upon this bill have reported against it.

Mr. McRAE. And, as I have shown by the testimony of these postmasters, they have done it every time upon a misapprehension of the facts.

Mr. LOUD. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, in good faith, that if I had known these letters were in existence, this bill would never have received consent in the House, and the gentleman can see the situation from the same point——

Mr. McRAE. If the gentleman insinuates or thinks or believes that he was deceived about it by anything I said on yesterday I will, if the Speaker will permit, ask to have the bill presented again for unanimous consent. I would not deceive him or anybody else about this or any other bill. If the Speaker will submit the bill again, I will give the gentleman from California another chance to object to its consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUD. Just a word, and I am willing to submit to that, Mr. Speaker, I want to correct one statement that the gentleman has made, and then he can withdraw the bill and offer it again. The Department in this letter—the one that has been read here—has made this case perfectly clear. Mr. John Smith had a contract to carry the mail from Office A to Office B, and Mr. Jones had a contract to carry the mail from Office A to Offices C, D, and E, and perhaps some other offices.

Now, the first contractor combines with the second one because they reach nearly the same point, and this is the testimony before the Department.

Mr. McRAE. Will the gentleman yield to me to make a statement?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. McRAE. I asked the chief clerk of the Department this morning to give me the information upon which that statement was based, and he said that he did not know it and would have to make further search to find it.

Mr. LOUD. The case is fourteen years old and he could not put his hand on it at once.

Mr. McRAE. With the testimony that I have furnished I submit that it would not be true. J. B. Smith, an enemy of Mr. Russey, reported and misrepresented the facts, and for fourteen years this claimant has been without his pay.

Mr. LOUD. I am perfectly willing to trust the Department after the careful investigation it has made of the case. The facts that appeared in the investigation made by the Department show that this was the case, that he found somebody over here carrying the mail, which substantially reached the same place; so he got the man to carry for him, and perhaps he carried some for the other man.

Mr. McRAE. That is denied in the affidavit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the matter should be submitted in accordance with the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas. The gentleman from Arkansas withdraws the bill, and he now asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. LOUD. I object.

WASHINGTON PUBLIC LIBRARY.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11712) to provide a site for a building for the Washington Public Library.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority is hereby conferred upon a commission, to consist of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, and the president of the board of trustees of the Washington Public Library, to cause to be erected upon Mount Vernon Square, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, a building for the use of the Washington Public Library, with funds to be contributed by Andrew Carnegie: Provided, That such building shall be commenced within twelve months and completed within two years from the passage of this act: And provided further, That no liability shall be incurred by the United States or the District of Columbia for the cost of the erection of said building.

SEC. 2. That said commission shall invite ten architects or firms of architects, of conspicuous ability and experience, to submit competitive designs for the said building, upon a carefully drawn programme, said competition to be adjudged by said commission acting with two other persons to be selected by the competing architects. The architect, or firm of architects, whose design shall thus be adjudged most acceptable shall be employed as architect of the building, to act under the direction of the office of construction hereinafter provided for, and to furnish all designs and drawings required for the construction of the building and personal services requisite for their artistic execution. Said architect shall receive as full compensation for the said designs, drawings, and personal services the sum of 3 per cent of the total cost of said building, to be paid from time to time as the work progresses; and all designs and drawings furnished by him for the said building shall become the property of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That the construction of said building shall be placed in charge of an officer of the Government especially qualified for the duty, to be appointed by the aforesaid commission, who shall receive for his additional services an increase of 40 per cent in his present salary, to be paid out of the appropriations made for the said building, and he shall disburse the funds under rules to be prescribed by the said commission, make all contracts, and employ all necessary personal services not herein otherwise provided for.

With the following amendments:

In line 12, page 1, strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

In line 21, page 2, strike out the word "in" and insert in lieu thereof the word "of."

In line 22, page 2, strike out the words "the appropriations made for the said building" and substitute therefor the words "any available funds."

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BARHAM. I reserve all points of order.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Nebraska. This is on the Calendar?

Mr. MERCER. On the Calendar as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. It is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, under the rules of the House we have to reach it upon the Calendar before it can be considered. This is an effort, as I understand it, because it is claimed to be a matter of great importance, to get the unanimous consent of everybody in the House to pass this bill against the rules of the House, to dispense with the rules of the House. Is that what the gentleman is trying to get at, because, as he says, this is a matter which he claims to have merit?

Mr. MERCER. That is not my intention; I am only thinking about this bill.

Mr. CANNON. That is what the gentleman asks—the consent of every member of the House to pass it?

Mr. MERCER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Then unanimous consent can dispense with all rules and pass it. I want to ask the gentleman another question: What is to become of the other unfinished business on the Calendar?

Mr. MERCER. I am willing to ask unanimous consent on each one of them. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if this is one of the bills considered in Committee of the Whole in the House last week?

Mr. MERCER. As I remember, it was.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think these bills should all stand on the same footing. I have no objection to this particular bill, but I do not think that some of these bills should be picked out and others not taken up.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman, before he objects, allow me a suggestion that this is somewhat different?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the sundry civil bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. One moment, Mr. Speaker. I wish the gentleman from Illinois would withhold that for a moment; I want to offer a resolution, if the Chair will recognize me for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to offer a resolution and ask unanimous consent on a matter relating to the canal subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Illinois, and the motion before the House is that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the nays had it; and the House refused to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PAYNE. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MUDD. Let us hear the resolution first.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let it be read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was ready to withdraw the demand for the regular order for that purpose.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will give me an opportunity to read the resolution.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to his reading the Ten Commandments if he does not take up too much time. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not want to read but one. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday next be set apart for the consideration of Senate bill No. 4792 as amended and reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the consideration to extend from day to day until completed.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that resolution.

Mr. CANNON. And to that I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the House that the demand for the regular order is an objection.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to the reference of that resolution under the rules to a proper committee.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not desire to bury it.

Mr. CANNON. I know; it is a cheap performance you desire. I renew my motion.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CANNON, it was agreed to—ayes 173, noes 1.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question pending when the committee rose was the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] upon an amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] had been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall detain the committee but a moment, because I only desire to reply to that part of the speech delivered yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois in which he recalled with some pathos and effect the unfortunate scandals which grew out of the construction of the Pacific railroads. He did not say it in so many words, but it was perfectly plain to all who heard him that he desired to influence the House by raising in the minds of its members a fear that the construction of the Nicaragua Canal will be followed by scandals like those which disgraced the promoters of the Pacific railroads.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I had not that matter in my mind. I was seeking to show to the House the importance, as I thought, of considering all business in an orderly manner and of having due consideration, especially, of important legislation; and I referred to the Pacific railroad matter, in which there was loose legislation, under which great scandal arose later on; and it seemed to me that in justice to ourselves and the country—in the light of the past and the present, and looking to the future—that whatever legislation may be had should be fully and fairly considered, without let or hindrance, up to the point of a sufficient consideration. That is all I intended.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman only emphasizes the importance of what I was going to say, and that was this: That the scandal to which he referred did not grow out of loose or hasty legislation. The trouble in that case was deeper. It grew out of the unfortunate partnership into which the Government entered with individuals and corporations. The gentleman does not believe more than I do in careful legislation. I am one of those who believe that all important matters ought to be fully debated and then fairly decided.

The gentleman from Illinois is usually one of the most adroit debaters in this House, but he was not fortunate yesterday in calling attention to this point, because the bill which the gentleman from Iowa has sought to offer as an amendment to this general appropriation bill avoids the very vice out of which those Pacific railroad scandals grew; that is to say, it avoids a partnership of this Government with private individuals and corporations. I desire to vote on this proposition, because I realize that sooner or later—and my judgment is that it will be very soon—the House will be compelled to choose between the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Iowa and the other proposition that has been pending here since I have been a member of Congress.

One proposition is that this canal shall be built with the money of the Government and that it shall be owned by the Government; the other is to build it on the credit of the nation and allow it to be owned and operated by a private corporation. If this canal is to be built at all (and that it will be is, I think, beyond the shadow of a doubt), it must be built for the purpose of military and naval defense, for a large majority of gentlemen on this side, I am sure, and I believe a majority of gentlemen on the other side, are not yet ready to assert the power of the Federal Government to go into a foreign country and construct highways purely and only for the benefit of foreign commerce.

If you have reached that point, then tell me how, after having constructed waterways in a foreign country for the benefit of foreign commerce, you can refuse to come back home and construct railways in our own country for the benefit of interstate commerce? The power of the Government in each case is precisely the same—granted to Congress in almost the same words and in exactly the same provision of the Constitution. Therefore I assume that a large majority of this House are not ready to commit the Government to the construction of this work merely and only for the purpose of promoting foreign commerce.

If it is built as a great work of naval and military defense, will any gentleman assert the wisdom of allowing private individuals or private corporations to own an interest in it? You might as well assert that it is wise to allow private corporations or private individuals to own our forts and arsenals as to assert the wisdom of allowing them to own an interest in a canal which is to be the greatest work of naval and military defense constructed in the century. It was a wise decision of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce when they decided that this great work of national commerce should be executed by the Government at its own cost, and when completed should be owned by the Government.

I think that the House is justified at any point short of a violation of the rule in giving its indorsement to this proposition, as against the other and indefensible one, which puts the Government of the United States into a sort of a partnership with a private corporation.

It does even more than that, Mr. Chairman, it reduces the Government to a position of a mere incorporator, an artificial creation of the law, when it becomes a stockholder in a company for the construction of this great Nicaraguan Canal. In order to avoid reducing the Government of the United States to the condition of a stockholder in a commercial enterprise—in order to avoid such scandals as grew out of the construction of the Pacific railroads, on the very terms and conditions that it is supposed to construct this great canal—I am exceedingly anxious to see the House afforded an opportunity to vote on the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. Chairman, I am as averse to the violation of the rules of the House as any other member on this floor. I do not believe, and never have believed, in sticking for the letter and violating the spirit of the rule. I have contended more than once that those rules should be lived up to while other gentlemen trampled them as if they were made only to be obeyed "on occasions." But, sir, the rule whose sanctity the gentleman from Illinois asserted with so much vehemence has been violated a hundred times on the floor of the House. It is violated in every appropriation bill that is reported to our body, and it has been frequently done by his own committee.

I see the gentleman from Illinois rises as if he wishes to interrupt me.

Mr. CANNON. I want the gentleman from Texas to be entirely fair to myself while he is also fair to himself.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope to do that.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says that the rules have been violated frequently, namely, intimating that general appropriation bills had carried appropriations which are not authorized by the law. Now, that is true. But it has never been done except by unanimous consent. Why, this morning only the rules of the House were sought to be violated by unanimous consent for the purpose of passing a public-building bill, just as the same effort was made a dozen times on yesterday when the "rules were violated" by unanimous consent and various bills passed this body.

Now, it is not true—and I speak advisedly, I will say to my friend from Texas—it is not true that any rule of the House, so far as I have knowledge, has been violated except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. The occurrence to which the gentleman refers is no "violation" of the rules. It merely suspended them.

Mr. CANNON. Well, a suspension of the rules, then, if you choose to call it that way, by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. But that is no violation of the rules——

Mr. CANNON. Then there has been no violation.

Mr. BAILEY (continuing). But the gentleman from Illinois and his committee do not first obtain unanimous consent to report a bill with an item not justified by existing law. They report their bills without such unanimous consent, and it is safe to say that nearly every bill reported contains some item in violation of the rule.

Mr. CANNON. Let me say—of course the gentleman from Texas desires to be fair to both.

Mr. BAILEY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CANNON. The matters reported that are not authorized by law sometimes are authorized when they are supposed not to be. As in this bill certain items in that respect are pointed out in the report. Then the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole, and it is presumed to have unanimous consent in the absence of the point of order.

But even if the contention of the gentleman be true, do two wrongs make a right? Has anything ever gone on the bill, so far as the House is concerned, in this connection, where any member objected by raising the point of order?

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Illinois will remember that there is more in the rule than that clause which forbids the consideration of an amendment where the point of order is made. The rule expressly declares that "no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, that is not authorized by existing law." Therefore when the gentleman and his committee report any such item in the bill, they do not suspend the rules by unanimous consent, but they violate the rule, and that was my original statement.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I will state to the gentleman right there——

Mr. BAILEY. I am not complaining of the gentleman or his committee. I am inclined to think it frequently happens that there is an item that everybody would desire to have included, and these rules are not made to prevent the House from doing business, but to facilitate the transaction of its business.

Mr. CANNON. Now, there is another rule to which I want in fairness to call attention—that any bill making a charge upon the Treasury shall receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. Take the library bill, for which the gentleman from Nebraska this morning asked unanimous consent. It makes a charge upon the Treasury and is on the Calendar, yet there is that rule that it shall receive, and so forth. And so with hundreds of other bills.

Mr. BAILEY. But the bill——

Mr. CANNON. Now, the "shall" and the "must" are always subject to waiver by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. Precisely so; and if the House waives it, it is not a violation of the rule.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. BAILEY. The difference between the two cases is this: One gentleman rises and says, "I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill." That unanimous consent is granted. That suspends the rules; it does not violate them. But when the gentleman from Illinois and his committee report to this House a bill containing an appropriation not authorized by law they violate the rule.

Mr. CANNON. Well, suppose——

Mr. BAILEY. Because they do not first obtain unanimous consent.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think, under the practice, not; but, for the sake of the argument, grant it is so. Does that authorize the gentleman from Texas to violate the rule when a member of the House, in the exercise of his right, arises and makes the point of order?

Mr. BAILEY. I have not contended that it does.

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. BAILEY. I was simply replying to the statement as to the alleged sanctity of the rule. Now I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MOODY. Of course we all want to get things exactly as they are. The gentleman from Texas has properly laid emphasis upon the wording of the first branch of the rule which prohibits the reporting upon any general appropriation bill of an appropriation for an expenditure not authorized by law. Now, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in this bill, according to the very best information that I could get, and according to my own memory of its construction and detail, there is not a single dollar reported in violation of that branch of the rules—not a single dollar. And I want to say again to the gentleman that that is not peculiar to this bill, but is in pursuance of the policy of the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, that I may complete my information, because I know gentlemen all want to get the fact, it is, however, true that in the bill there are very many instances of provisions which are obnoxious to the latter part of the rule, which is in these words:

> Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or any amendment thereto.

Now, the prohibition against reporting an appropriation for an expenditure not authorized by law has been observed by the Committee on Appropriations, and I challenge anybody to point out a single instance in this bill where it has been violated.

But it is true that under the less stringent language of the latter half of the rule, and in accordance with a practice that is a good deal older than the experience of any gentleman in this House, legislation has been placed upon this and always is placed upon appropriation bills; and I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in this report, as in all other reports coming from that committee and from every other committee which makes appropriations, according to my knowledge, the specific instances of amendments to the bill or provisions in the bill which are obnoxious to the latter half of that provision, as being changes of existing law, are enumerated, italicized, and in every possible way brought to the attention of every single member of the House, so that he may know his rights.

Now, perhaps, it would be as wise to observe the same caution about the latter half as the former half of that rule, but the language is different. The gentleman will appreciate it. Those are the exact facts about the case, and I am sure we all want to know them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts makes a good defense of his committee.

Mr. MOODY. Not a defense. It was rather a disclosure of the exact practice of this committee, which the House of Representatives is entitled to have.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I used one word to express what the gentleman has well expressed in two or three sentences. At any rate they need no defense; there is no committee in the House for which I entertain a higher respect. In saying what I did, so far from attacking the committee, I was rather invoking the practice of the committee to justify what might be a departure from the rule, because I was showing that one of the great committees of the House almost every time it reported a bill violated the very rule it is now claiming to be so sacred.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, however, does not satisfy me as to the distinction which he tries to draw between the first and the latter part of the rule. If either is to be observed or to be violated, I would rather violate the first and observe the last; because it being an appropriation bill there is less objection to putting a new appropriation in it than there is to putting in a change of existing law. The purpose of the rule was to prevent legislation on appropriation bills. A wise one, according to the view of some; but I am not sure that it is wise.

Some of the greatest triumphs achieved by the advocates of civil liberty in Great Britain were won by forcing great reforms on the money bills of Parliament; and I am by no means certain that it is the essence of wisdom to deny the lawmaking branch of the Government the right to employ this power to bring the executive branch to an agreement with it. But whether that be wise or not is not now open for discussion. For many years—longer than I have lived, and, perhaps, longer than the gentleman from Illinois has lived—that rule has constituted a part of our methods of procedure, and I am not inclined to disturb it now, but I commend to the Committee on Appropriations the fact that its adoption proceeded from a desire to prevent legislation on appropriation bills; and when you violate the last provision in it, you violate the most important one which it contains.

I would rather you would incorporate new items of appropriation than that you would pass new laws upon your bill. If you merely spend the people's money, you may do them no further harm than that you take what their energies have produced and waste it; but if you hide into your appropriation bills new laws, you may seriously impair their higher and more sacred rights; and the statement that you keep the first and disobey the last injunction of the rule might subject you to the greatest censure.

But, Mr. Chairman, I did not rise for the purpose of discussing the rule. I rose purely and only to call the attention of the House to the fact that the bill which is proposed as an amendment carefully and wisely avoids the very condition out of which grew the unfortunate scandals that followed the construction of those great highways across the continent. [Applause.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, the issue now before the House is not the alleged delinquency of the Committee on Appropriations, but the plain, distinct proposition as to whether or not the requirements of clause 2 of Rule XXI shall be maintained in its integrity—the point of order having been raised by the gentleman from Illinois against the proposed amendment. Clause 2 of Rule XXI provides that certain appropriations shall not be reported in a general appropriation bill. That does not, however, relate especially to the pending amendment. It is the concluding paragraph of clause 2 of Rule XXI that I desire to call to the attention of the House. It reads:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

So the only question for the determination of the House is whether the provision offered by the gentleman from Iowa does or does not change existing law. If it does change existing law, then it is not in order on this general appropriation bill; and I would be glad for any gentleman on this floor, having regard for his reputation as a parliamentarian, to rise and assert in this intelligent presence that the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa does not change existing law. I assume that every intelligent Representative concedes that it does change existing law. That fact is admitted; and yet it is an open secret that the majority of the House are expected to overrule the decision of the Chair—because the Chair must hold this provision to be obnoxious to the rule—they are to overrule the decision of the Chair, appeal to the House, and hold the canal proposition to be in order.

Something was said by the gentleman from Iowa yesterday in derision of the rules——

Mr. BERRY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. How do you change any existing law if the United States has not given authority for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal?

Mr. DOCKERY. Simply because in express constructions, and I do not want——

Mr. BERRY. Is there any existing law?

Mr. DOCKERY. The amendment carries legislation that does not now exist, and such legislation is a change of existing law.

Mr. BERRY. But you said that it does change existing law.

Mr. DOCKERY. It has been held over and over again that where there is no existing law on a given subject and it is proposed to make law on that subject, the making of law is in that respect a change of existing law. Why, certainly it must be true, because it is not existing law.

Now, then, I ask the attention of the House for a few moments. I know that a majority seem to be eager to get at the public Treasury in this case. I have not been here for sixteen years to be unable now to understand the temper of this body; but I propose, Mr. Chairman, under the rules, as I have the privilege, to interpose one objection to a precedent now sought to be established which for all time would override the rights of the minority. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] yesterday referred with some derision, I repeat, to the rules. I confess I have no especial regard for this particular body of rules. In my judgment the code of rules adopted by the other side of the House has degraded the House of Representatives before the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This system of rules has minimized the House of Representatives and exalted the tremendous power of the Speaker, and I have no sympathy with it as such. My judgment is against this code; and if I have an opportunity under the rules, I will vote to change it. But nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, it will not do for any gentleman on this side of the Chamber to arraign this particular rule—clause 2 of Rule XXI. That rule has come down to us from a Democratic President, indorsed by James K. Polk when he was Speaker of this body in 1837. It is a Democratic rule, and in its present form it only differs from its exact terms in former years in this, that the Republican majority has eliminated what is known as the Holman provision. That is a provision allowing the repeal of legislation upon appropriation bills where such repeal reduces expenditures.

The odium that attaches generally to the Reed code of rules does not attach to this particular rule, because, as I stated, it was first adopted in 1837, when James K. Polk, of Tennessee, was Speaker. It continued to be the rule of this body until 1876, when it was strengthened, Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana, a Democratic Speaker, being in the chair. In 1880 it was still further strengthened, with a view to prevent legislation upon appropriation bills, on the suggestion of William R. Morrison, of Illinois. It prevailed again under the administration of Speaker John G. Carlisle. So, from 1837 until now, this rule has been maintained by the Democratic party when it had control of this House, under all administrations, with the elimination of the Holman provision now and then. Accordingly, gentlemen on this side of the House can not launch their criticisms at clause 2 of Rule XXI as being peculiarly a provision of what is known as the Reed code of rules.

Why was this rule adopted? It was adopted in 1837, Mr. Chairman, as I stated yesterday, because a practice had grown up both in the Senate and the House of Representatives to incorporate legislation on appropriation bills. The practice had been so abused prior to 1837 that appropriation bills frequently failed because of the legislation incorporated in them. Hence it was that this rule was born of the contention between the Senate and the House, because, though not agreeing as to the legislation, all agreed that the supply bills of the Government must pass, that the Government must live, however great might be the difference of opinion as to the legislation.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman says if we ignore this rule it will minimize the power of the minority.

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, no; I said the Reed code of rules.

Mr. Chairman, I remember well, and so do some gentlemen who are seated around me, the stormy scenes of the Fifty-first Congress, when the minority was absolutely helpless here. But even the reckless management of the Republican party in that Congress never thought of incorporating the force bill on an appropriation bill. It remains for the influence back of this measure to override the provision of the rule and challenge the attention of the country in behalf of a proposition in itself meritorious, in my judgment—at least I am in favor of it—but introduced here under circumstances wholly unwarranted by our rules.

But, Mr. Chairman, if this rule, which has been maintained since 1837 under Democratic Administrations, is to be overridden in Committee of the Whole and the canal proposition comes before the House for consideration, I intend to offer at the proper time an amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]—an amendment which I now ask be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

And to provide for the payments authorized in this paragraph and the five preceding paragraphs the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue United States legal-tender notes to the full amount so authorized, which legal-tender notes shall be additional to such legal-tender notes as have been heretofore authorized to be issued.

Mr. MAHANY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if he is not aware that the rules under which we are now legislating are purely temporary ones and never have been formally adopted by the House, and therefore this particular rule, in common with the others, has no sacred or eternal obligation?

Mr. DOCKERY. The rules were adopted at the beginning of this Congress in language which provided that they should continue to be the rules of the House of Representatives for the Fifty-fifth Congress until otherwise ordered. As to the question of the sacredness of the rule, let me say to my friend from New York that a rule is no more sacred than a law enacted under the Constitution of our country, and I have yet some reverence for the Constitution, notwithstanding it seems to be held in derision in some quarters. The House of Representatives has power to adopt rules for its guidance, and such rules, when adopted, have all the force and effect of law—of law enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives with the approval of the President.

Mr. MAHANY. The gentleman from Missouri is too candid not to admit that had the House of Representatives been given an opportunity to enact rules for its guidance at the beginning of the Fifty-fifth Congress many changes would have been made in the old rules. The trick by which those of the Fifty-fourth Congress were "temporarily" adopted has thus far been effective to prevent all revision.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not know whether that is true or not; but I know this, that the distinguished Speaker thus far, in respect to the code of rules, has been able to command substantially the unanimous vote of that side of the Chamber. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SWANSON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. If I recollect aright, when the Cuban matter was up before this House the Democratic side—all of them, possibly with the exception of the gentleman from Georgia—voted to put the proposition for Cuban independence upon an appropriation bill; and if I mistake not the gentleman from Missouri voted with us. [Laughter and applause.] I would like to have him tell us whether at that time he thought he was acting in accordance with the rules of the House, or did he think it was a defiance of the rules?

Mr. DOCKERY. I confess very frankly that it was in open defiance of the rules. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I stand here to-day to admit that, to that extent, I was then a party to a violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. You violated them because you had no other opportunity to express yourself.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true. The gentleman from Texas well suggests the condition in which we found ourselves—that under the House rules the House of Representatives was repressed. But shall we change the rules by revolution? Shall we organize chaos here in the House of Representatives?

Several MEMBERS. Yes!

Mr. CUMMINGS. The present condition with respect to our rules was brought on by fraud.

Mr. DOCKERY. I say not, Mr. Chairman; I say not, especially——

Mr. HEPBURN. I should like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does the gentleman know of any prescribed manner that is obligatory upon this House, under the Constitution, for adopting its rules? Is not the subject remanded entirely to the House? Are there any limitations as to the time or place or manner in which the House shall make changes in the rules?

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa is too good a lawyer to suggest that you can change a law by violating a law. [Applause.] The rules of the House provide how they shall be changed. And I want to say, Mr. Chairman, right here and now, in the presence of this overwhelming pressure to get at the Treasury of the United States——

Mr. BERRY. Will the gentleman tell us something about the evidences of that pressure?

Mr. DOCKERY. There is evidence of it right across the aisle. Mr. Chairman, the condition of the Treasury is this: On the 30th day of June next there will exist a deficiency of not less than $159,000,000. On the 30th day of June 1900 without any additional legislation imposing additional obligations upon the Treasury, there will exist a probable deficiency of not less than $100,000,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to raise a point of order that the gentleman from Missouri is violating the rules of this House by discussing a subject which is not before us.

Mr. DOCKERY. I know the gentleman does not want me to refer to the probable deficiency.

Mr. HEPBURN. I insist that the gentleman shall be confined to the subject under discussion—that he shall not violate the rules of this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I admit that it is a matter of exceeding difficulty under these rules to talk at all without violating the rules. [Laughter.] But I thought, as I had before me the illustrious example and precedent of the gentleman from Iowa, established yesterday, I might proceed to tell the House and the country something of the situation of the Treasury without having a point of order interposed by him. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I withdraw my point.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am obliged to the gentleman.

Now, then, in all earnestness, gentlemen, let me say that I am in favor of the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, because——

Several MEMBERS. When?

Mr. DOCKERY (continuing). I am in favor of the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, because, in my judgment, it will promote the national defense. If we construct the canal, it will not be necessary to build so large a navy. If we construct the canal, it will assist us in a policy of commercial expansion, which I prefer to a policy of remote territorial expansion—the policy of this Administration. [Applause.] But, Mr. Chairman, involving, as this project does, a draft on the Treasury of perhaps $200,000,000, and with a Treasury deficiency inevitable during the coming fiscal year, I submit to gentlemen on this side of the House, if not on the other side, that if we are to dig this canal at this time Congress should not only give the necessary authority to the Secretary of War, but should also provide the means by which the canal shall be constructed. When it was proposed, in the Fifty-third Congress, to coin the seigniorage in the Treasury, our friends on the other side declared it to be a proposition "to coin a vacuum." The criticism was, of course, without foundation, but I suggest to the House that it will be very difficult to construct the Nicaragua Canal by an issue of warrants to be paid out of a "deficiency vacuum."

Do you want to issue bonds? And I address myself particularly to gentlemen on this side of the House. [Cries of "No!" "No!" on the Democratic side.] Is there a Democrat here who wants to issue bonds for any such purpose? [Applause on the Democratic side.] And yet, sir, here is a proposition imposing a liability of perhaps $200,000,000 on the Government and on the taxpayers of this country without a single, solitary suggestion as to how the money is to be procured to meet that liability.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman allow me a question just there?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will.

Mr. QUIGG. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that whatever rights we may have in connection with this Nicaragua matter expire within eighteen months, and to ask whether it is worthy, in his judgment, of consideration that we will probably have to take it now or not at all?

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman from New York interrupted me for that question. I coincide with the views so well expressed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. I believe in the sentiment expressed in the platform of the Democracy of Missouri, that the Government of the United States should construct the Nicaragua Canal.

But let me ask the gentleman, is it not possible that somewhere along the line of the proposed legislation, if it is to be enacted, "a little joker" may not appear?

A bill has already passed the Senate carrying $5,000,000 for the benefit of a private corporation, in order that this Government may be subrogated to their rights. And it is an open secret that the bill, in the form submitted by the gentleman from Iowa as an amendment to this bill, can not become a law at this session of Congress.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. The Senate has a bill containing certain objectionable features, as the gentleman has just suggested. The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, on full consideration, struck out all of the language of the Senate bill and inserted this measure which is now before us.

Now, if we are remanded to the ordinary procedure, this bill will go back to the Senate as amended, and the Senate bill to which the gentleman objects so much would go into conference and there "the little joker," about which my friend from Missouri professes so much apprehension, might become troublesome. But it is not probable, if the measure is placed on this bill, that this clause should become a subject of conference at all between the two Houses, and "the little joker," therefore, absolutely disappears and the fears of the gentleman will have no foundation.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, I would ask the gentleman from Iowa how can the "joker" disappear when it shall have been incorporated and intrenched in the Senate bill with a bonus of $5,000,000 to these parties?

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman did not understand my suggestion.

Mr. DOCKERY. Probably not.

Mr. HEPBURN. I say if we take this proposition up at a future day, and adopt this measure, it will be as an amendment to the Senate bill, and in all human probability would take its place, and therefore at once become the subject of a conference between the two Houses. But, on the other hand, if we tack the same legislation on this bill, no man can authoritatively say that it will ever be the subject of a conference; and therefore, by the adoption of the resolution to insert the amendment, we avoid the difficulty which seems to haunt the dreams of my friend from Missouri.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, knowing the conferees of the House as I do, especially the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I feel assured that if the canal amendment were incorporated into the sundry civil bill the Senate proposition to distribute $5,000,000 to certain distinguished citizens of the State of New York and elsewhere who happen to be the stockholders would not receive the approval of that gentleman.

Mr. HEPBURN. Why not let it go on the bill then, and be put under the watchful care of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes; it would be in very safe hands, let me say to the gentleman. But I think I am not mistaken as to some of the influences outside of this Hall. I know something of the influences back of the Hanna-Payne steamship subsidy, and I know also that some of the same influences are behind the Senate bill which contributes $5,000,000 to the Maritime Canal Company. So I say, Mr. Chairman, that we can not, in the closing days of this session, at the peril of an extra session, afford to put upon an appropriation bill a provision authorizing the construction of the Nicaragua Canal without close and careful examination, so that all proper safeguards may be provided, and without at the same time authorizing the issue of bonds, or the issue of United States legal-tender notes, or the free coinage of silver, or without providing in some other way for the payment of the probable $200,000,000 of liability carried by the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I propose to discuss the question of order alone. I realize how difficult it is to attract the attention and arouse the interest of the House unless something of personal conflict creeps into the speech of gentlemen, but yet I am going to risk the inattention of some members for the sake of those who would like a statement of the question before the committee, by confining myself to the exact question and treating it with the utmost economy of words which I can impose upon myself.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is challenged under Rule XXI. I will not read that rule. It has been read to the House. Any amendment upon an appropriation bill such as this must go out upon a point of order if either, first, it makes an appropriation not authorized by existing law, except in continuance of a public work already in progress; or second, if the language with which the appropriation is clothed changes existing law. If the amendment does either of those things it must go out under the point of order. It must run the gantlet of both paragraphs of the rule. I say to the House that it violates both paragraphs of the rule. To use the language of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], it is an open and palpable violation of both these paragraphs of Rule XXI, and I ask the attention of the House for a few minutes while I undertake to prove my assertion.

It is not contended by anyone that the construction of the Nicaragua Canal is authorized by any existing law, but it is asserted that it is "a public work and object already in progress," and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] well said to the House that the question whether or not it is a public work or object already in progress is a question of fact. If it is such a work, then so far as that branch of the rule is concerned this appropriation is not open to the point of order.

But is it? It is said to be so because certain surveys have been authorized and are now in process of execution. Why, Mr. Chairman, there are surveys and surveys. If I, having determined to build a house upon a particular piece of land, undertake the engineering work connected with it, it may be said to be the beginning of the work of construction of my house. If being uncertain whether I will construct a house or not, or if I am to construct it, uncertain where it shall be constructed, I begin the work of inquiry as to the practicability or feasibility or the comparative expense of one or the other location, then I have not begun the construction of the building. I have begun the inquiry as to the feasibility of constructing it, in order to decide whether I will or will not begin the work.

Now, all that has been done which it is claimed makes the construction of the Nicaragua Canal a public work already in progress has been under the sundry civil bill of 1895, the act approved March 2, 1895.

A MEMBER. And 1898.

Mr. MOODY. I will come to that in a moment. Now, I crave the attention of members while I call attention to what work is in progress under the provisions of that act, and whether the construction of this canal is in progress or whether the inquiry as to whether it is wise to begin the construction of the canal is in progress. These are the words:

For the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility, permanence, and cost of the construction and completion of the Nicaragua Canal—

By a certain route named—$20,000 are appropriated and—a board of three engineers is hereby constituted to make the survey and examination necessary—

Necessary for what, Mr. Chairman? Necessary for the construction of the canal? No.

The survey and examination necessary for such ascertainment.

The ascertainment of the feasibility.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman——

Mr. MOODY. In a moment. Necessary for the ascertainment of the feasibility, permanence, and cost of the construction. That is the public work that is in progress, the preliminary inquiry, and when the inquiry is completed and the report is made to this Congress, then the whole public work authorized by any law upon the statute book has been done.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman has confined his reading to the act authorizing the preliminary surveys?

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, if he will have the goodness to read the provision of the act of last year he will find how much progress has been made.

Mr. MOODY. I have it not at hand. I have examined it, and if I am wrong I invite correction by the gentleman from Iowa. Now, I say there have been two appropriations made since. For what purpose? They have been made in the sundry civil bill of last year and in the deficiency bill of last year. For the purpose of beginning the construction of the canal? No; but for the purpose of completing the surveys which are authorized by the act of 1895, which I have quoted.

Mr. BARHAM. To report plans for construction.

Mr. MOODY. And report on plans, undoubtedly. And why? That Congress may see what it will cost, and whether it is feasible, and whether it is desirable. I notice that the gentleman from Iowa has not made any correction of what I have said.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to send the act to the gentleman and let him give it the publicity that he has the other. I will send it to you.

Mr. MOODY. I do not care to read it. I think I have stated it substantially. If I have not—I am sure I do not want to make any misstatement on this question, and if I am wrong I have the courage to correct it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will read it:

Nicaragua Canal Commission: To continue the surveys and examinations authorized by the act approved March 2, 1895, entitled "An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes," into the proper route, the feasibility and cost of construction of the Nicaragua Canal, with the view of making complete plans for the entire work of construction of such canal as therein provided, $150,000; and to carry out this purpose the President of the United States is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent, etc.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, that is exactly as I stated to the committee. It is an appropriation for continuing surveys authorized by the act of March 2, 1895.

Mr. QUIGG. I call attention to the gentleman's reading of the first act. After he had read the wording of the first act he said, "For what purpose?" "For the purpose of construction?" said he. "Oh, no; for the purpose of ascertainment." That was the gentleman's language.

Mr. MOODY. Yes; it is my language now. I stand by its accuracy. Anybody reading these two provisions together and desiring to know the truth about it will know I have told it.

Mr. QUIGG. But in the subsequent act, which the gentleman from Iowa has just read, the word "construction" is used.

Mr. MOODY. Oh, undoubtedly; with a view of preparing plans for the construction of the work and the expense that it would be. The gentleman from New York has made no discovery. The word "construction" was used in the act of 1895, and the cost of construction is to be ascertained simply for the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility and desirability of the construction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been claimed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] that if there is not any provision in any law on the statute books there is a treaty under which this appropriation can be made, the Dickinson-Ayon treaty, made with the Republic of Nicaragua, which becomes, as he well said, the supreme law of the land. Now, I do not agree with him. A statement made by so careful and able a gentleman as the gentleman from Michigan can not be passed over without answer, and that is my reason for attempting to answer it.

Mr. Chairman, the salient articles of that treaty he printed in the RECORD yesterday; and what are they? They simply grant to the United States, their citizens and property, the right of transit between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans through the territory of the Republic on any route of communication, natural or artificial, either by land or by water, which now are there in existence or to be constructed under the authority of Nicaragua. The contemplation of that treaty was a canal, to be constructed either by Nicaragua or by some one under its authority; and it has no relation whatever to the scheme of construction of that canal by this Government, which was apparently born and became a possibility years after this treaty was entered into.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Then how can the United States undertake the construction of a canal upon the territory of Nicaragua or Costa Rica without first obtaining the consent of those countries?

Mr. MOODY. Certainly they can not do it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Now, then, in furtherance of the object foreshadowed in that treaty, a distinct treaty was formulated between Mr. Frelinghuysen and Mr. Zavala along the same lines. When that treaty was submitted to the Senate and rejected by a vote of 32 to 23, every Republican in that body voted for it. The canal company held the matter in statu quo by securing valuable concessions; and I pretend to say that the concessions afterwards made by Nicaragua to the Maritime Canal Company under a charter of this Government gave the right to construct that canal under the direction of the United States.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman from Michigan, although interesting, is in no wise relevant to the question under consideration.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MOODY. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. It is perfectly patent, it seems to me, to every member of this House that that treaty to which the gentleman from Michigan refers is absolutely antagonistic to the bill which the gentleman from Iowa proposes to offer as an amendment to this appropriation bill.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am not the author of it, but the end I seek may be accomplished in this way, and it may not. I will take my chances. It is the only avenue now open.

Mr. MOODY. I want to adopt the position of the gentleman from New York, who states that better than I can.

Mr. RAY of New York. The one can not be the continuation of the other, because the treaty contemplates the construction of the canal under that Government and its auspices, and this bill proposes the construction of a canal by the United States of America, and it proposes that we first purchase the territory.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The way has been pointed out, and by it the Government may be aroused to some action which will result in the construction of the canal.

Mr. MOODY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentlemen will settle their differences later. Mr. Chairman, this rule is, as has already been said, in its exact terms, every word and letter of it, the rule of the Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-fourth, and Fifty-fifth Congresses. It was the rule that was originally adopted in this language by the Democratic majority, adopted for three Congresses by a Republican majority, and consequently there have been many rulings upon the construction of that rule. I will not undertake to weary the House with a recital of them all, but if the House will pardon me I will call its attention to three of the most important of those precedents.

The first was in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, when an amendment was proposed for the construction of a dry dock at Algiers. Mr. Butterworth, of Ohio, an eminent parliamentarian, was in the chair, and he ruled that, although surveys had been made and although commissioners had been appointed and recommended the site, the appropriation was not for a public work already in progress, and sustained the point of order.

Now, that ruling, which is in point here, was followed by the present occupant of the chair with respect to League Island in an amendment offered in the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress. It was again followed by a ruling by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] in reference to a dry dock in Boston. In the Forty-fifth Congress, Mr. Carlisle, although a site had been purchased for a public building under an appropriation given by Congress at Topeka, Kans., sustained the point of order against an appropriation beginning the construction of that work, because, according to his view, the purchase of a site was not a sufficient beginning of the work so that it became a public work in progress.

I desire now, Mr. Chairman, to state the strongest authority that can be found in support of the contention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. It is the ruling of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] last year upon the dry dock at Algiers. That gentleman, then being in the chair, ruled that as there had been purchased by the action of Congress a site intended for the construction of a dry dock at Algiers, an amendment offered for the purpose of beginning the actual building of the dock was in order. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the strongest precedent that can be found in all the countless precedents of the House, and it falls infinitely short of the necessities of the gentleman who offered this amendment, because there the work had actually begun, in the sense that a site had been designated and actually purchased for the purpose of construction.

I have taken the rulings not of inconspicuous members of this or former Houses; I have taken only the rulings of great parliamentarians, whose eminence in that branch of the law no man can dispute. Again, I want to say that if any further authority were needed on this subject the present occupant of the chair [Mr. HOPKINS] furnished it yesterday when he ruled an appropriation for the Pacific cable out of order, although surveys authorized by Congress were already in progress.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MOODY. Certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. If I understand the gentleman's argument, it is that this matter is purely a question of fact?

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

Mr. CORLISS. Then we are in the attitude of jurors, not jurists?

Mr. MOODY. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I know what the gentleman is coming at. We are to judge as conscientious jurors, and not as jurors who disregard the law.

Mr. CORLISS. Now, I want to ask one other question. You stated a few moments ago that if you had surveyed a piece of property, made plans for the construction of a building, but had not determined in your own mind whether you would build it or not, that would not be a step toward progress necessary to determine the construction of a building under this rule.

Mr. MOODY. Under this rule, yes.

Mr. CORLISS. I want to ask the gentleman whether, when Congress passed several appropriations for the survey, plans, and estimates for this Nicaragua Canal, when the respective parties of our country declared in their platforms that the country should build it, does the gentleman think there was any doubt of the intention of the people of this country to build that canal?

Mr. MOODY. Not the slightest.

Mr. CORLISS. That the people demanded the construction, and the action of Congress was a step in that direction.

Mr. MOODY. Well, Mr. Chairman, a bad cause always brings forth bad reasons in its support. Now, the gentleman says the public demand for the construction of this work indicates that it is a public work already begun.

Mr. CORLISS. I know the gentleman does not intend to misrepresent or misconstrue what I said.

Mr. MOODY. Certainly not.

Mr. CORLISS. I said that your position was that when you had in consideration a public matter, whether or not it was in the progress of construction would depend upon your intention to construct. Now, if when we made this survey, made these appropriations, whether we, representing the people, intended to build it, and if so, it would determine the question of fact whether it was in progress.

Mr. MOODY. I think we should want to wait until after we got the facts of the report. But, Mr. Chairman, I must hurry on. I said this is not a public work in progress, and I have proved it. I further said the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa was a violation of the latter half of the paragraph because it changed existing law.

Now, what does it propose to do? The whole question is in the first section. It authorizes the President of the United States, for and in behalf of the United States, to buy such portion of territory now belonging to Costa Rica and Nicaragua as may be desirable for the construction of a canal. The gentleman from Iowa—I could not believe my ears when I heard it—I could not believe my eyes when I read it in the RECORD—the gentleman from Iowa says that that does not change existing law! The conferring of the power upon the President to go out and purchase part of the territory of a sovereign nation does not change existing law! And why? I read his language:

> It is simply declaratory of a power that he now has. Has not the President of the United States the power to purchase that little strip of land?

Why, Mr. Chairman, these are days when we get novel constructions of the Constitution of the United States; but the gentleman from Iowa is entitled to proclaim himself the first discoverer of an authority under our system of Government which permits the President of the United States to acquire part of the territory of a foreign country.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts permit an interruption for a moment?

Mr. MOODY. I will.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. The gentleman from Massachusetts was a member of the Fifty-fourth Congress——

Mr. MOODY. I was.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Is it not true that in the Fifty-fourth Congress the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], when an item was reached in a general appropriation bill concerning an appropriation for the foreign service, offered an amendment terminating the relations between Turkey and this country, and requested that the minister of that country at this capital be dismissed? Is it not true that a point of order was made that the amendment was not germane, because it interfered with our foreign relations, because it created a new relation with a foreign country? And did not the gentleman from Massachusetts now occupying the floor vote to sustain the gentleman from Iowa upon the ground that the amendment was germane?

Mr. MOODY. Not by any means. The gentleman can not find that anywhere in my brief history in this House I have consciously voted to violate one of its rules.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I am not speaking of your consciousness, but of your act.

Mr. MOODY. I certainly did not do it. I did not approve the amendment; I did not vote for it; I did not vote to treat it as in order. I was against it. I have been against every such thing during my whole public career, because I believe that matters of that kind ought to be intrusted to the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Does the gentleman state to the House that he voted against that proposition of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. MOODY. I certainly say so.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I trust I shall be recognized later.

Mr. MOODY. If there is any record to the contrary, it is a record which escaped my observation, and which misrecorded my vote.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I must be fair with the gentleman and say that I have no yea-and-nay record. I have only the number voting on each side. If the gentleman says that he did not vote as I have indicated——

Mr. MOODY. I remember the incident very well. I was opposed to the proposition.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I accept the gentleman's word, of course, until I have examined the RECORD. I have only the Journal before me.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I have said that to authorize the President to purchase part of the territory of a foreign power is a change of existing law. How could there be any greater change? Why, Mr. Chairman, we have been accustomed to be told that there are only two ways in which the United States can acquire territory—by treaty or by conquest. The gentleman has discovered a new method of acquiring territory. According to him, all that we have to do is to have the President go out and in the fullness of his powers purchase territory, without the authority of any of the representatives of the people. Certainly the President now in the White House has no such conception of his powers.

The gentleman from Iowa, without his usual accuracy, cited in support of his proposition the case of Thomas Jefferson, who, he said, bought many square miles of land. I had supposed up to yesterday that Thomas Jefferson did not buy the territory of Louisiana. I had supposed that that territory was acquired by treaty, ratified by two-thirds of the Senate of the United States; and even with the gentleman from Iowa against me, until I have something else in support of his position, I shall still continue to believe that the great territory of Louisiana, out of which has been formed 10 imperial States, came in under the treaty-making power of the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, it is claimed by the gentleman from Iowa that this is simply an appropriation of so many hundred thousand dollars or million dollars, and that the words in which this appropriation is clothed are simply limitations upon that appropriation. Is that true? If a limitation upon an appropriation becomes permissible, when it will do such work as this will do—authorize the President of the United States to acquire foreign territory—then a limitation upon appropriations ought to be struck from the possibilities of an appropriation bill. But it is not so. There are many decisions upon the question of what is a limitation. I am going to ask the attention of the committee to one, and one only, because it is the decision of a man who was eminent in this House and whose recent death we mourn to-day.

When Mr. Dingley was occupying the chair, during the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, an appropriation bill was under consideration, and a provision was contained in the bill which it is not necessary to read, but upon which the point of order was made. The provision was in substance that a widow, under the act of 1890, might be paid her pension although she had an income up to $500 per annum. The point of order was raised against this provision. It was claimed that it was merely a limitation on the appropriation for that particular year, and in terms it was simply that.

Mr. Dingley rendered a long and careful decision. The matter was under consideration for ten days or two weeks in the House, and at the end of that time he sustained the point of order against the proposition, and I will ask the Clerk to read, and ask the committee to attend to, the language in which he did it, because if that language is correct, if the proposition enunciated there is accurate, then this provision goes out, because it is a change of existing law.

The Clerk read as follows:

The act of 1890 provided that if a soldier should die "leaving a widow without other means of support than her daily labor." But observe that the provision now under consideration is not a limitation or restriction. It is an extension. It provides not that the money herein appropriated shall not be used for a purpose authorized by law, but that it shall be used for a purpose not already authorized by law. It is an extension, not a limitation. If it should be held that propositions of this character should be held and entertained as in order, on the ground that they are limitations, there is no possible legislation that might not be presented on an appropriation bill and held to be in order, thus obstructing the passage of appropriation bills.

Mr. MOODY. So this provision now before us is not a limitation on an expenditure already authorized by law, but under the guise of a limitation it is an authorization to spend money for a purpose for which it could not have been used prior to the passage of an act containing such a provision. Can that be doubted? Is that not plain? Can anyone dispute the proposition that if the ruling of Mr. Dingley, which I have just caused to be read, is the law of the House that this provision must go out on the point of order because it changes existing law?

Now, there is not a real, a sincere, attempt to persuade the House that the point of order is not well taken. Revolutionary principles are appealed to here to upset the practice of the House. Why, days and days ago, before even the occupant of the chair was selected to preside in the Committee of the Whole, the question which went around the House was not whether the point of order was good, but "Will you vote to overrule the Chair?" Could there have been, unconsciously, a greater testimonial to the validity of the point of order than that? And every man in the House within the hearing of my voice knows that I speak the truth.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word about the reason of the rule and I am done. Why is the rule not a good one? Let us see what could be done if such a proposition as this were held to be in order by the House under the rule. If it should be held in order, and I believe it would not be so held by the ruling of any gentleman in the House who took the responsibility of the Chair upon him—if it should be held to be in order, what would be its attitude in the committee?

Here is a proposition involving an enormous expenditure. What opportunity would there be for consideration? Ten minutes in Committee of the Whole, except by unanimous consent! When an amendment is proposed, as gentlemen know, in Committee of the Whole to a bill there pending, five minutes are allowed for and five minutes against the proposition, and nothing beyond that except by unanimous consent. I do not mean to say, of course, that this rule would be invoked or held down in practice to that severe extent on such an important matter.

But I use the illustration simply to show what might be the result if this amendment was held to be in order on an appropriation bill of this kind in Committee of the Whole. It shows that we should not fulfill our responsibility to our constituents, to our country, and to ourselves by placing ourselves in such a position as that. Why, sir, this project has been debated by the linear mile at the other end of the Capitol, and yet we propose to dispose of it by putting in the power of the House, on the objection of any one member, to close the debate in ten minutes!

Reflection upon the House of Representatives! Where could there be a greater reflection than this proposition?

But it is said that the desire of the country is so great—and I agree that it is great, and I share in that desire myself—that the canal should be constructed that we should construct it even in violation of the rules of the House. Is there any such urgency as that?

The President has not the power at present, it is true, that the amendment seeks to confer upon him. But the President and Senate have the power to acquire this territory by a treaty, and nobody now disputes it or has done so for scores of years. Gentlemen have spoken as to the possibility of acquiring the property of Nicaragua. It can not be done in a week; it can not be done in a day; it can not be done in a month. It can be done as rapidly, however, by the President of the United States, with the Senate of the United States, through the instrumentality of a treaty, as we could do it under this bill.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Can that be done at all?

Mr. MOODY. Of course it can be done.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. How?

Mr. MOODY. Just as I have said; by a treaty. Just as we have almost always acquired territory of the United States outside of the original possessions, by treaty stipulations.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The Republic of Nicaragua has no existence to-day.

Mr. MOODY. It has just as much existence to make a treaty as it has to make a conveyance.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It has no existence at all to-day. Its existence has been merged into a new republic with Honduras and Salvador.

Mr. MOODY. Then there is no use in considering this bill. If there is nobody to deal with, then we can not deal with him either under this bill or under the treaty.

Why, Mr. Chairman, they say this question is old. So it is, in one sense. The people have determined that we should build that canal. We are going to do it. There is just as much desire for it on one side of the House as there is on the other. But the people have not determined how we shall build it, when we shall build it, where we shall build it, and under what circumstances we shall build it, and they expect the Congress of the United States, their agents, to determine it for them.

I say that part of the question is not old. It is young. I do not complain of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] for not bringing in his report earlier. I complain that he brought it in too early. The report from the commission which we authorized in 1895 has not yet come to us. I am willing, in an orderly manner and at the proper time, to consider the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, and I shall vote for it if I can vote for a bill that constructs it exclusively under governmental control and with no private partnership.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOODY. But I will not be forced into a corner under a violation of the rules when we shall have legislation in the hurried closing days of the session the consequences of which no man can tell and for which no man can safely undertake the responsibility.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I want to correct the gentleman. Just let me make the statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOODY. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not wish to be misunderstood in the statement I made that Nicaragua, as an independent State, is not now in a position to grant us concessions or rights that might be necessary to construct this canal. But what I contend for and wish to be understood as saying is this, that the United States already have rights, and, in my judgment, obligations, growing out of treaties made—obligations to citizens especially chartered by the Congress of the United States, which we should preserve in statu quo; relations that may be valuable, but are fast disappearing by neglect upon our part to vigorously assert the rights of the United States Government.

Mr. MOODY. Now, Mr. Chairman, those are words, and they sound very well. I do not understand what they mean. What rights have we in Nicaragua?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. You have these rights: A treaty concession was made by the Republic of Nicaragua to an association of American citizens in 1887——

Mr. MOODY. Yes; I have heard of that.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Wait a moment. That association of American citizens was merged into an American corporation especially authorized and chartered by the Congress of the United States. What I maintain is that citizens of this Government have rights under that concession which the Government may avail itself of if it does not wait until the rights lapse under the operation of law. And I would have the Government obtain all the rights that can be obtained from our own citizens who have acquired the same, and I would not have them go to any expense for it unless it is absolutely necessary and entirely fair and just in the estimation of the President of the United States. The statement has been made here that $5,000,000 was pledged to some corporation I know nothing about.

I desire to say, however, in this presence, that the president of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua told me only a short time ago that he would rather lose every dollar that he had put into this enterprise than see the Nicaragua Canal defeated by this Congress. That company have made a report to the Secretary of the Interior, under oath, which shows an expenditure of over $1,150,000 on that project. And I say, in all justice to that gentleman and his associates, who are men of the highest character, that we ought to give them credit for fairness when he says that he would rather have the Nicaragua Canal built by this Government and would rather have our Government succeed to all the rights of the company than to get back a single dollar that they have put into the enterprise.

Mr. MOODY. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MOODY. No; I have the floor and I will yield to the gentleman presently.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. MOODY. I will yield seasonably. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Michigan again what rights have we in Nicaragua? I have no light upon the question, although the gentleman has made a speech.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I will answer that.

Mr. MOODY. I would like to have you answer me.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Under a resolution deliberately conceived and passed by a coordinate branch of the Government it holds that this Government can succeed to the interests of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua if it wishes.

Mr. MOODY. What is the coordinate branch of the Government?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The Senate of the United States.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, we are getting light every minute. We are getting instruction——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Let me say to the gentleman——

Mr. MOODY. Let me dispose of one piece of light first. These come in such large blocks that I can not digest them; one at a time. Yesterday I found out that the President had the right to acquire territory. Now I discover that the Senate of the United States can legislate for the union of States.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman is quibbling. He is pettifogging—not his usual custom, but in this instance especially noticeable.

Mr. MOODY. I do not mean to.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I did not say that. I do not think it is becoming in the gentleman to put words into my mouth.

Mr. MOODY. I so understood it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. No, I say this: That the coordinate branch of this Government has deliberately affirmed that we may succeed to certain rights and valuable interests of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua if we preserve the status quo.

Mr. MOODY. You mean the Senate has told us that we can do it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. No; but their action indicates their belief that we can succeed to the rights of the canal company if we desire. It may not have any weight with the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MOODY. Oh, yes.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But, however, it carries some force and effect when that great body affirms the right by solemn enactment.

Mr. MOODY. Oh, yes.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And if we do not see fit to ratify the action of the Senate, if we do not see fit to complete what they have undertaken to do, we might still maintain the status quo, if nothing else, by our action to-day, and give the Executive the right to acquire such interests as will protect our rights there.

Mr. MOODY. Words are always exceedingly useful to conceal thought. It is not because the gentleman has an absence of thought, because there is no man who understands more about the public service and public interests than he; but he has said nothing. I asked what rights we have in Nicaragua. He told me some concessions. I then told him that did not give me information. He answers me by saying the Senate has told us that they are important.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I refer the gentleman also to the United States statute.

Mr. MOODY. The statutes of my country are always important. But they have not contained the resolutions of one body.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Here is the statute to which I refer. I will read the preamble:

Whereas to facilitate commercial intercourse by water between the Atlantic and the Pacific States, as well as with foreign nations, it is deemed desirable for the public interests of the United States that a ship canal be constructed between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans on what is known as the Nicaragua route: Therefore, etc.

Mr. MOODY. What is that?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It is an act of Congress passed February 28, 1889.

Mr. MOODY. What of it?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Under that authority certain concessions have been given to certain people composing that corporation, and we can succeed to those valuable rights if the Government of the United States will authorize it to be done. That is the only contention I make.

Mr. STEELE. And pay for them.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. You need not pay for them. No demand can be made unless we shall freely assent to the proposition after due inquiry and investigation.

Mr. STEELE. If this company have rights, we would have to pay for them if this bill should pass.

Mr. MOODY. I just want to say a word in conclusion. No precedent has been produced by any gentleman claiming that this amendment is in order under Rule XXI. None is produced, because none could be produced. An appeal is made to override the rules of the House. Gentlemen may do that; no one can call them to account.

Mr. TONGUE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOODY. Other gentlemen may do as they please; but as for me, I propose to stand by this rule, because I believe not only it is the rule, but that it is a wise and salutary rule, that we ought always observe.

Mr. TONGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I am requested by gentlemen about me—I do not quite see the bearing of it, but gentlemen tell me it has a bearing—to read this language contained in the concession to this Nicaragua Canal Company.

The present concession is transferable only to such company of execution as shall be organized by the Nicaragua Canal Association, and in no case to governments or to foreign public powers.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will you listen to this for a moment. The Republics of Costa Rica and of Nicaragua are both parties to that concession. Both have gone into this enterprise and both have directors upon the board.

Mr. MOODY. I do not want to go into any canal company which is composed not only of private parties, but the Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. You will have to if you cross their territory at all.

Mr. MOODY. This isthmus might stand there until it was washed away by the two oceans before I would see this Government a party to any such proposition as that. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand why this terrific excitement. I do not understand why this broadcast insinuation against the good faith and proper conduct of the members of this House crowds this debate. I can not understand what there is to drive a lawyer to fury in the argument of a plain, simple question of law.

I can not understand what there is to make the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations shout like a leader in a camp meeting for an hour [laughter] simply because the representatives of the people of this country are making an honest effort, feeble it may be, to do that which all the political parties of this country have been promising they would do at the first opportunity for the past five years, and to carry into execution a project that of the 75,000,000 human beings in this country at least 65,000,000 are looking at this House at this moment to see whether or not the will of the American people has any power over legislation or not. [Applause.]

They want to know, and they will take several ways to find out, whether a technical construction of the rule for which it has been necessary to bring to bear the sophistry and legal power of these gentlemen for almost half a day shall stand and hold them by the throat, when nearly every public man in this body has pledged himself that this enactment shall be had by the American people. The American people are slow to anger and they are plenteous in mercy, but sometimes they hunt down the men who think they can run this Government without the aid of the representatives of the people.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] said that "covert influence" was being used on this floor. Covert influence—what is that? Conspiracy? I have not heard of any. It is said that somebody has been approaching members of this House to ask them, before this amendment was introduced in the House, how they would vote on this question. I never heard of this amendment until it was formally offered in this House, and if there is anybody going around here trying to influence members, I do not know it.

Let me see now. The gentleman has assumed that we are compelled to be driven to an appeal from the decision of the Chairman, because the gentleman says it is too plain for controversy. And then we are told in the next breath that everybody who differs in opinion with these gentlemen are some way actuated by some bad principles and sinister motives against the country and against the laws of the country.

Well, gentlemen, if to try to execute the orders of the people of the United States that have been repeated so often that there is no division upon it—if that is an outrage, there are gentlemen here guilty, I have no doubt. If to seek to thwart the opinion and action of the people of this country, if to turn aside their registered will is an outrage, it does not lie at the door of gentlemen on this side of the House, and these broad aspersions had better stay out of the domain of argument.

Mr. BROWN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. Does the gentleman understand that he and I, as Representatives of two Congressional districts of Ohio, in obeying that will, are required to put this great work on its feet by an amendment not well considered, by an amendment to a supply bill, which is a violation of the rules of the House—does he understand that the will of our people requires us to do that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman unfortunately has made a set of premises that I do not subscribe to, and therefore I can not answer his question yes or no; but I will try to answer it as I go along. When the gentleman has been here as long as I have—and I hope he will be here a great deal longer—he will learn that all the arguments that have been made on this side of the question which I occupy have been made over and over again by the same gentlemen who are to-day preaching the inflexibility of the rules of the House; he will learn that the rules of the House are convenient masks behind which to retreat when they serve the purpose of certain gentlemen, but they are always brushed aside when they fail of that purpose. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, I will try to come to the point that the gentleman is speaking about, and I am not unaware that there is just ground for two opinions upon the construction of this rule. It is no such easy sailing as gentlemen here have claimed. And the gentleman from Illinois, who occupied the time of the House an hour and a half yesterday, was very wise in not citing one single authority except his own upon that question. Nor would he read the rule, nor would he analyze it, nor would he do anything except appeal here to members to save the dignity of these House rules.

I had hoped that we might be clear of this question. I had hoped that there might be such a concession to public sentiment in this body as would relieve the Chairman from a ruling on this question, and relieve the members of the House from any subsequent action. I never doubted that such would be the case until the culmination of a series of events which I will describe.

The first was that, before a word of suggestion had come from the gentleman from Iowa that this amendment would be offered, the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, introducing this appropriation bill and explaining its leading characteristics, gave notice to the House that there were two things which he would uncompromisingly oppose in this House. He did not say "on this bill," for there had been no proposition to put this amendment on this bill; and in my judgment it never would have been offered as an amendment to the bill but for that declaration of the chairman of the committee.

Standing here he declared that the shipping bill should not have a trial in this Congress, and determinedly and almost excitedly he declared that the Nicaragua Canal should not be heard in this Congress. Not "on this bill;" I have his language; he did not refer to this bill; he referred to the condition of the public Treasury and then pointed out measures that it would not be safe to proceed upon by reason of the condition of the Treasury.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, if my friend will allow me——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's statement of my position does not agree with the statement I made. I never have dealt in "shalls" and "shall nots" with this House; and I took pains to say that in my judgment the measures to which I referred would not be considered because every moment of time would be required for the performance of work that was absolutely necessary to be performed if a special session was to be avoided. That is in substance what I said, taking care to say that I was but one member, voicing my own opinions only.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not understand the gentleman to voice any single opinion. I understood him to defiantly say in this House that the Nicaragua Canal bill should not be considered at this session of Congress; and that was the understanding throughout the country.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman who heard me had no such understanding; and it does not appear in the RECORD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well. The gentleman has a right to his own language, whatever it was. Let me say to him, I could not have believed it—I could not have put that construction upon his language—but for an event about which there will not be any dispute. We were in the midst of a heated and unpleasant debate here; the excitement of yesterday was already to dawn again and project itself into the debate of to-day.

The cool, deliberate judgment on this side was that it would be wise to avoid this debate and avoid this decision of the Chair and avoid any subsequent action of the committee. And so in a respectful manner, in obedience to the rules of the House, in a manner that put every man who favors the position which I occupy in the position of a suppliant at the hands of the Committee on Rules and this House for that purpose, a respectful resolution was offered asking that the House might in that way express its opinion—not to pass the rule, but to pass a resolution asking the Committee on Rules to give us a day for that purpose—and the gentleman from Illinois refused to permit that resolution to be read. That was war to the knife, gentlemen; that is what it was.

Mr. CANNON. Just a moment at this point, because we can settle this matter now better than by my replying to the gentleman later.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I only want to do what is fair.

Mr. CANNON. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Iowa for unanimous consent was that on Tuesday next this canal bill that he reported should be in order and from day to day thereafter until completed; and the proposition was by unanimous consent to take it up and pass it. I objected; and I but performed my duty when I did so. Such an appropriation of the time of this House at this stage of the session would mean the noncompletion of the supply bills and a special session. I objected then, and I would object again.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman object to a resolution setting apart one day for the consideration of this bill?

Mr. CANNON. What was the gentleman's question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman object to a resolution, which I hold in my hand, asking the Committee on Rules to give us one day——

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that if he desires to refer that resolution to the Committee on Rules, he has absolute power and right to do it. If my friend asks me whether I would object to the consideration of that bill for a day at this stage of the session, I say frankly that out of respect to him I would not object; but I will be equally candid with the House and say that if the gentleman were to ask me whether I would consent to an order that would pass the bill in a day under the whip and spur of the previous question to be ordered by a special order, I should say "No," because I do not believe that any bill of the kind can be properly considered and matured in a day.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So we see that a measure that has been discussed more widely, and about which there is more unanimity of public opinion in the United States than on any question that ever came before this House, at least during the last twenty years, is to be deprived of a hearing—first, because one proposition for its consideration asks too much time, and, secondly, because another proposition does not ask time enough! "You'll be damned if you do, and you'll be damned if you don't." [Laughter.]

Everybody knows that we are seeking to-day the only possible remedy to get rid of this deadlock upon this mighty question. So much now in answer to my friend. The time comes when a member of Congress must, if he is a competent public servant, look to the various ways and methods by which the public demands can be complied with. When he has done all that he can——

Mr. GROW. We have spent two days on this point of order, when we might have been considering the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, yes; we had plenty of time to consider the bill while this point of order has been harrowing up the souls of our friends here on this floor, and I expect the discussion will go on for a couple of days more, because the discussion of this point of order is a very interesting topic.

So we have done our best, and what are the exigencies? When we had no war, when we had no Hawaiian possessions, when we had no questions out in the Orient, the whole people of the country, if it is fair to say they spoke through their representative capacity, were all in favor of this measure. There never was a dissenting voice anywhere on the continent, that ever I read or heard, against the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, and now we are face to face here in the closing days of this Congress with the question whether the people can be heard or whether they can be gagged, and that is all there is of it. And when it comes to a question of whether I shall take some other man's construction of a rule which I do not believe, because it is vociferously asserted, and shall abandon the duty that I owe to the public, I will do my duty and take the wrath of the powers that be. [Applause.]

Now, let us see how clear sailing this section is. The gentleman from Indiana says in effect that it is so plain that nobody can differ. Therefore, as a great many men do differ on this floor, that is a discount proposition upon the intelligence of those gentlemen.

This section contains certain affirmative restrictions upon the power of Congress, and it contains a certain exception to that limitation. And we are brought face to face, in my judgment, with that limitation upon the restrictive character of the rule. I have studied this rule long and faithfully, and I have heard it decided from the chair of this House all sorts of ways, and I have come to the conclusion that it is not the easiest matter in the world to say that the man who differs with me about this rule has not got any sense or any judgment or does not know anything.

This rule presents to the House of Representatives under all circumstances more authority for members to decide the question for themselves than any other rule of the House, for the reason that the operation of it as a restriction and as a permission are both based upon questions of fact, which are to arise here and be determined in this House. Now, let me read this rule as I interpret it:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law—

Now, I stop right there and say that is a prohibitory restriction, a limitation upon the power of the House, and I am not here to discuss the propriety or nonpropriety of this rule. I am going to see my way through without any difficulty as to the position which I do occupy in absolute conformity and acquiescence in this rule, in the spirit in which the rule was made—unless in continuation—

Now, let me read this to you who happen to have the rule before you. Let me read that section of the rule which destroys the limitation of the early part of it. I supply the words up to a certain point:

It shall be lawful to make appropriations not previously authorized by law—

Get that, now, fully into your minds as fairly as necessarily deducible from a just construction of the language of the rule:

It shall be lawful to make appropriations for the construction of works not theretofore authorized by law, if such public works and objects are already in progress.

Now, that is a fair and just reading and construction of that rule.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman tell us how they can be in progress if there is no law for them?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That, my friend, is exactly the meat of this whole subject, and you will get on the outside of the breastworks if you do not look out.

Mr. RICHARDSON. All right; I will try to take care of myself outside of the breastworks. I thought I asked the gentleman a fair question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Read it this way:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for public works and objects already in progress.

Gentlemen sit and laugh here at my construction. Does not that mean that if the public works are in progress, then the appropriation may be made, even though not in conformity to prior law? Else what is the language there for? Why not have said, as has been argued here:

No appropriations shall be reported in any general appropriation bill for any expenditure not previously authorized by law—

And stop right there. But they did not do it, and they said, no matter what the condition of it is as to the preexisting law, if there is a public work in progress the appropriation is lawful. If you do not put that construction upon this section of the statute, then there is simply a lot of dead language there that is to have no effect whatever.

Now, gentlemen have sat here and laughed at that construction. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], who has studied the question, says that is the proper construction.

Mr. MOODY. As long as the gentleman has quoted me, I will say that I agree with the gentleman that if a public work and object is already in progress——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. MOODY. No matter whether it is authorized by any law or not, an appropriation can be made for it, notwithstanding this rule.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is it.

Mr. MOODY. But my contention is that, according to all precedents, the construction of that language, "a public work and object in progress," would exclude the Nicaragua Canal.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand that. Now I argue the other way.

Mr. COX. That is a matter of fact.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not want the gentleman to think I am interrupting him for the mere purpose of interrupting him. I want to get at a fact, and I will not interrupt the gentleman without his consent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Go ahead. I make no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, right along the line suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], has the gentleman from Ohio any authority to show, or can he show in any way, that this work, the Nicaragua Canal, is now in progress?

Mr. GROSVENOR. My friend simply has not heard this debate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, I have.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This whole debate has been upon that question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have been in my seat all day.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I say the gentleman does not want to put that question into my mouth.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; I ask the question in earnest.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] yesterday afternoon spent fifteen minutes in a most unanswerable argument upon that proposition, and that has been the position we have taken all the way through.

Mr. MOODY. And I spent fifteen minutes in opposition to that view in an equally unanswerable argument. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly; they were both unanswerable. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does the gentleman state that this Nicaragua Canal is now in progress?

Mr. MOODY. No; I deny it. I say that the only things in progress are these surveys to ascertain whether we will undertake it.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman yield to one question, please? Does not the clause to which you refer—mean that if the Committee on Appropriations should fail in their bill to incorporate an appropriation for a public work that is in progress, then under this provision any member who is interested in that work can offer an amendment, and it will be in order?

Unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress—

Mr. GROSVENOR. We have got the other side to splitting hairs on this law. This states that there shall not be reported in any appropriation bill all that which is prohibited, but it shall be lawful to report that which is not prohibited. That means the action of the committee.

Mr. MOODY. Let me answer the gentleman's question in a word. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] that the failure of the committee to appropriate for a work in any given year has been held repeatedly not to render it a work not in progress. If the committee fails to appropriate for a given work which is in progress for a given year, it still is a work in progress, although work actually ceases during that year.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, we should like to hear the gentleman from Ohio, and we can not hear anything that is being said.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So we have come back precisely, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] and myself, to the consideration of a single question. And now let us see whether there is here in this question presented to the members of this House a condition that will justify in the eyes of the world your action in the solution of this problem as in your judgment the truth is.

Before I proceed to that branch of my argument, I regret very much that the gentlemen who opposed this view of the case should not have launched their case after some consultation with each other. It would have been far easier for this side of the House to have answered their argument if we could have only got them to do that; if we could have only got them so that they would not have attacked each other by the logic and force of their argument here.

Now to illustrate. The position of the gentleman from Massachusetts is, and I am going to do him absolute justice—for no man ever made a stronger effort to get rid of trouble that had been cast upon him by the gentleman from Missouri than did the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that there is no law authorizing the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, and the gentleman is lawyer enough to know that he is without any footing, without any standing in court, unless he can make that appear; for if there is a law that authorizes the construction of that canal, then this appropriation is legal and constitutional.

Mr. MAHON. But not in this bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In this bill, absolutely, if there is a law authorizing the building of a public work.

Mr. MOODY. Provided it is not in conflict with the existing law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, now, there is my point. Now the gentleman has taken the only position that is tenable, and I will try to show that it will not hold water. The gentleman from Missouri, who always comes here with a repetition of the same old threat or warning that we have heard often upon even a small appropriation of a few hundred dollars. He comes here and says that it changes existing law. That is what he says. It changes existing law! One gentleman says there is no law, and another says it repeals the law. What is a change of law? You can not change a law unless there is one. You can not repeal an existing law unless there is an existing law. If there is an existing law, what is it, and what is the change of it?

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think I ought to finish my answer on this point. I am trying to get to it.

Mr. MOODY. Certainly; excuse me.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is there a law in existence now that is changed by this statute? If so, then your whole contention falls; for if there is an existing statute under which that public work is being done, then the second clause of the rule applies to it, and it does not make any difference whether we are changing the existing law or making an appropriation for a going public work.

Now, there are the two positions of the gentlemen who are fighting this proposition, the widely divergent, inconsistent, irreconcilable arguments to which I have referred: "Is there any law authorizing the building of this public work?" Therefore, we are coming here with the sanction of the second subdivision of this paragraph. Then comes the other proposition. "Nay, verily, there is a law, because you are trying to repeal it. You are changing an existing statute of your country by an appropriation of money to build the Nicaragua Canal."

Now, there are the two horns of the dilemma, and I do not care which one you take. Either one is fallacious; but the one occupied by the gentleman from Massachusetts is the only logical proposition, in my humble judgment—"that there is no law." Now, we propose to meet that proposition. Though there may be no law in existence authorizing the building of that work, yet there may be conditions when this appropriation would be lawful under this rule of the House.

Now, let us see. You take now a public work, by way of illustration. Take the breakwater at the city of Cleveland. There is not any law for the building, expressly, of that public work; simply the steps which the gentleman from Indiana described yesterday have been taken one by one. The first step was the project itself, and the report upon it; and then an order by the Congress in the enactment of the river and harbor bill that the engineer department shall make a survey and estimate and report whether it is a valuable public work or not. There is the first step taken.

Then the next river and harbor bill contains an item of $100,000. Nothing is said about any statute—a mere appropriation for the progress of the work in Cleveland Harbor, $100,000. Then, suppose that for ten years thereafter not another thing is done. Is it competent, gentlemen, for Congress to make another appropriation for that harbor improvement? I have known it myself to be made under this rule on account of public works that have lain without an appropriation for twenty years. I can name one of them on the shore of Lake Erie.

Mr. MOODY. The gentleman from Ohio does not want to secrete any circumstance, I know. Permit me to state to him, and he understands it as well as I do, that this rule does not apply to the river and harbor bills.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am quite frank to admit that the rule does not apply to the appropriations.

Mr. QUIGG. Does not the very fact that the statute was necessary to be passed in order to construe the rule as against a survey as a part of the work prove that the rule means that the survey is a part of the work in everything except the rivers and harbors, where a statute was passed to prevent its application?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I undertake to say, having reached the exact point of my argument—I say as matter of fact, of which you are the only judges, as a matter of fact, the Nicaragua Canal is a public work within the scope and meaning of this section, already in progress.

Mr. HEMENWAY. What was the first step taken upon which the gentleman bases his statement here? Was it not the passage of an act through the Senate of the United States entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company?"

Mr. GROSVENOR. It had nothing to do with it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Was not the second step, the appropriation of $20,000 to ascertain whether or not a route set out by this company was a feasible route?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman can not show upon the statutes any other foundation except the one I have called attention to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not want to spend my time in reading this; it has been read until we are all acquainted with it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. What is the foundation for the first appropriation?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not got my foundation built and the gentleman is inclined to knock it down. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Ohio has not built a foundation that will stand. But I ask the gentleman if the foundation upon which the first $20,000 was appropriated was not an act passed by the Senate of the United States—never passed by the House—incorporating the Maritime Nicaraguan Canal?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It had nothing to do with it any more than the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman show upon what the appropriation of $20,000 was founded?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Undoubtedly that was an effort to deflect matters in the direction of the Maritime Canal Company. Does the gentleman claim it is an act of Congress?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It was an act for the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility and permanence and cost of the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal by the route contemplated and provided for in an act which passed the Senate January 28, 1895, entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company," and there is your foundation upon which the first appropriation was made, and every succeeding appropriation refers back to it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, what has that got to do with it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. You propose not to construct the canal as provided for by the appropriation, but to construct one by a different plan.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, the argument of the gentleman is this; I will give you an illustration: We made an appropriation for the improvement of Colbert Shoals in Tennessee River; we made it on the survey and estimate, and every step of the way the law was complied with. Now, in the wisdom of Congress, by the omission of an appropriation it has been determined to have a different project; and I can tell the gentleman that that happens in more than two-thirds of the great appropriations of this country for river and harbor improvement.

One improvement is launched—proposed, perhaps, upon a basis of 10 feet of water—and step by step appropriations are made for the improvement of the harbor upon different lines, deflecting the channels in different directions, cutting them deeper, and cutting them wider, or locating them, as in the case of the Maumee River, in different places.

Mr. HEMENWAY. All the time under the direction of the Government and under the control of the United States—different from this——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Because here you start out, not under the control of the United States, but under the control of a private corporation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is not a word in the statutes that gives control of the canal to the Maritime Canal Company.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have the act here.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have the act before me.

Mr. HEMENWAY. No, the gentleman has the appropriation bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, this is the whole of that. Just see how simple an answer will pull down the foundation upon which this superstructure of strangulation is based. There are two or three different lines of communication across the Isthmus—one is traveled by the Panama Company, another is partially located by the Maritime Canal Company. As a matter of identification, and for no other purpose, these appropriations have been made for the purpose of starting the work, as I say, for constructing the canal along the Maritime Canal Company's route, which is the old Government survey.

Now, let me answer the gentleman more fully, and he will never press the argument again. Suppose here is the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal and the Government wants to build a railroad along from here to Cumberland, and it directs that there shall be a survey made along the line of the Ohio and Baltimore Canal Company. Does that put it in the control of the canal company? That is the argument of the gentleman, that because Congress selected the line of study and development that was already being to some degree pushed by the Maritime Canal Company we thereby put the control and management of this money into the hands of that canal company.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Senate of the United States had passed an act putting the control there, and an appropriation was made in pursuance of that act and with reference to it, I would put that construction upon it; but if no such act had been passed by either House, and no reference made to any act to put the United States in partnership with that company, then certainly I would not be justified in making the statement.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, it is enough to say that for all purposes every connection with the Maritime Canal Company is eliminated from this bill. And I sometimes think it is just possible that that is a mistake that the committee made if it wanted to get a bill through this House. I sometimes wonder that the ghost of that old Maritime Caual Company should stalk here constantly as an argument against the building of this canal.

Mr. HEMENWAY. So far as I am individually concerned, I will never at any time vote for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal under any other than the exclusive control of the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Nor will I.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then the gentleman and I are together on that proposition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And I will tell the gentleman another thing. If this appropriation fails on this appropriation bill, and in this Congress, your grandchild will not live long enough to see a Nicaragua Canal built by the United States. And I will say more than that. In the eyes of the nations of this world the American people can not any longer trifle with this question in this way. Other nations are standing ready to seek for the concessions that are offered to us——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Right there may I ask the gentleman a question for information?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Do not break into my sentence.

And if you defeat this bill and postpone operations for a year and a half—if this bill is defeated here—you will have opened to the world, as you ought to, you will have opened to everybody else, as you ought to, the right to go there without any infringement upon our action or our interest and build that canal. And the intelligence of the world will say, "You stood and trifled and fooled with the question and defeated the will of your own people in doing so; and you shall not bar the way of the world across that Isthmus any longer." [Applause.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, let me ask the gentleman, what are the concessions that are offered by Nicaragua to the United States? We have heard a great deal about them. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] tried to secure a statement of what those concessions were. I do not know, and no doubt the gentleman does, what concessions have been offered by Nicaragua to the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand the State Department has information that both these Governments—I learned it from the chairman of the committee—are willing to make any reasonable concession that the United States may ask if we will build that canal.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then absolutely we have no concession from the Nicaraguan Government at this time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And if there is nothing done, this appropriation would fall to the ground.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The only concession controlled by anyone is controlled by this Maritime Canal Company, and we would have to buy that, I suppose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman, who constantly wants to put his speech inside of mine, for the improvement, doubtless, of my speech——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I beg pardon if I interrupted the gentleman without his consent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not suppose it was a continuing consent. Public works are never built, as the gentleman knows, except step by step. The gentleman's speech appears to have come in by virtue of his original interruption by consent.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope the gentleman will be candid and fair. I have injected no speech into his. I have simply injected questions, as I supposed, with his permission; if not, I beg his pardon.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But the gentleman has undertaken to get into my speech the statement that there is no concession for this canal.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I asked you to state whether there was any concession, and if so, what?

Mr. GROSVENOR. And I ask you to say whether there is any or not.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not know.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Neither do I. We are equally wise on this question. You are trying to put your wisdom into a speech that has no wisdom in it on this point.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will permit me, he said there were certain concessions, and that if we threw them away we could no longer say that other countries should not come in and take them. I asked him what those concessions were. He has now said he does not know; and I say I do not know.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I said I was informed of that fact, and I understand——

Mr. HEMENWAY. You said they would expire in 1900.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I had just learned it from the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG], and until the gentleman from Indiana says that he knows something about it I will take the word of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have been asking the gentleman on the floor who said that these concessions would expire in 1900 what the concessions were, and now he frankly admits that he does not know of any concessions.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, will the gentleman let me answer him? I have stated on this floor what I repeat, that the State Department of this Government has informed the country that both these Governments——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Informed the country where?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, now, will the gentleman kindly wait with his question until I can complete a sentence?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I thought you yielded to me.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I stated that the State Department had informed the country through the press—and it is as much a matter of common knowledge as that two and two make four—that both these Governments have over and over again offered to this Government any reasonable concession for the making of that canal. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] came and told me that certain concessions would end in eighteen months, and I repeated the statement as a matter of information.

Mr. QUIGG. Nicaragua claims that they will end in six months; the company claims, if I may say it, that on October 9, 1900, these concessions expire. Nicaragua claims that they expire October 9, 1899——

A MEMBER. Are those concessions to our Government or to the company?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Ohio has said that he does not know what these concessions are. Now, if the gentleman from New York——

Mr. QUIGG. Why does not the gentleman get the treaty and read the concessions?

Mr. HEMENWAY. What treaty does the gentleman speak of?

Mr. QUIGG. The contract between the Maritime Canal Company and the Government of Nicaragua, which you can find in a Senate document which has been printed in connection with this bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman has not finished what he has to say, he can go ahead.

Mr. QUIGG. I am through. I will make my speech when I get ready.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then the gentleman means concessions to the Maritime Canal Company and not to the United States?

Mr. QUIGG. You are trying to make it appear that concessions which were granted to the citizens of the United States are not concessions which the United States ought to protect, I suppose.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Not a bit.

Mr. QUIGG. I think you are.

Mr. HEMENWAY. This is a corporation organized in the United States to which these concessions have been granted. Am I not correct about that?

Mr. QUIGG. Certainly.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then they are not concessions to the United States.

Mr. QUIGG. They are not concessions to the United States Government; no.

Mr. HEMENWAY. But to citizens of the United States.

Mr. QUIGG. They are not concessions to the United States Government, no; but they have had this effect: They have given the citizens of the United States the control of this situation. They have enabled the Government of the United States, through its Secretary of State, to control the situation in the interest of its citizens' corporation, and that situation exists to-day and has been protected all these years and can be availed of by either the citizens under their present charter or by the Government if it chooses, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will this Maritime Canal Company convey to the United States, if it has the power, these concessions?

Mr. QUIGG. I am not the attorney of the Maritime Canal Company.

Mr. MAHON. No; they can not give those concessions to the United States.

Mr. QUIGG. But I am a Representative of the United States.

Mr. HEMENWAY. You are not one of the corporation?

Mr. QUIGG. No, sir.

Mr. HEMENWAY. You do not belong to that particular class that have these concessions?

Mr. QUIGG. What does the gentleman mean by the words "belong to that particular class?" They are some of the best citizens of New York.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have no doubt of that. A great many good citizens are members of corporations.

Mr. QUIGG. And the gentleman recalls the language of the gentleman from Missouri, that there is a scheme here and that there is a joker in this bill and that somebody is going to be paid for it. I very much hope that somebody will be paid for the money that they have spent.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from New York, then, has schemes in his mind, because I have said nothing about schemes nor jokers.

Mr. QUIGG. But it makes no difference to this Maritime Canal Association whether they are to be paid or not. If they can have their way, they will have this bill passed here to-day; and if it passes absolutely ignoring them, they are satisfied and content.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman allow me right there? If that is true, will they permit it to go through the Senate without amendment?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is the point.

Mr. QUIGG. I presume they will try to protect their rights if they can. They would be foolish if they did not. But the Senate has the same right to pass this bill that we have.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, gentlemen, let us get back to the point. The gentleman from Indiana, sitting here now clothed with the intelligence and learning of the Committee on Appropriations, has interposed an argument of this character. Now, let us see how long he will stand by it. He says, in effect, that there is nothing competent in this legislation, because I can not define the concessions that have been made to the United States.

Now, let me ask the gentleman, did the United States ever get the right to build a public building in a foreign country or the right to establish a coaling station in a foreign country or to build a light-house or a signal station in a foreign country without first, by negotiation to be put in motion upon the part of the United States Government, soliciting and obtaining that concession?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Before or after appropriation?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We have that power, as I understand it; yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So the argument of the gentleman is, "You can never acquire the right to build the Nicaragua Canal until some Government has made the concession voluntarily and without the suggestion of the United States."

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman will have to search the RECORD very carefully, and when he has done so he will not find any statement of that kind from me.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the logic of it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is the statement you are trying to put into my mouth that I have never made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then the gentleman has not said a word on the subject.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The House knows whether the gentleman has said a word or not. I have certainly exposed the gentleman from Ohio and shown that he had no knowledge of that concession that was going to expire in eighteen months.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I never claimed to have. I stated that it came to me by report. It is common report and everybody understands it, and I commend to the gentleman the reading of Senate Report No. 1418 of the first session of this Congress.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes; the Maritime Canal project.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And I will tell you now what the Secretary of State said upon the very question we have under consideration. This is a letter addressed to the chairman of the Nicaragua Canal Committee in the Senate, dated the 13th of June last:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 13, 1898.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter of the 11th instant, I have the honor to state that no negotiations are now in progress with the Government of Nicaragua respecting any project for the construction of an interoceanic canal.

Existing conditions obviously make any negotiations of the indicated character inexpedient at this juncture, while an additional ground for inaction is found in the fact that the Nicaraguan Maritime Canal Company, holding a concession from the Government of Nicaragua, has been incorporated under a special charter granted by the Congress of the United States; that its incorporators are American citizens, and that the Government of the United States has at various times expended large sums of money to assist that company by way of official surveys.

It would seem only just that no negotiations should be undertaken until the Nicaraguan Maritime Canal Company should be afforded all proper opportunity to complete its work under its actual concession, and I see no present reason for adopting a contrary policy.

Respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM R. DAY.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
Chairman Committee on Nicaragua Canal, United States Senate.

That was the condition last May. Now comes the new condition that confronts us. Time is going on. At that time the war had not ended. At that time the enormous necessity for this work had not been shown to the people of the United States. But in the exigency of this hour, that to-day is pressing upon us, the utmost that is sought here in this bill that is finally conclusive upon this Congress is to authorize the President of the United States to negotiate for the very concessions which the gentleman says we are without.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. MAHON. All these bills which have been framed in this Congress, excepting this amendment, have been framed with one thing in view. That was to escape the limitations of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, entered into between Great Britain and this country, that neither country should purchase one foot of land for a waterway across that country without the consent of the other, and that treaty is in force.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is no news in that.

Mr. MAHON. I know that; but I call for information. Suppose you pass this amendment, how do you intend to purchase a foot of that land without the consent of the other party to that treaty?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, the gentleman drives me to another statement. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] will get exactly what I say about that. It is a matter of common knowledge in the United States to-day—I do not vouch for the truth of it, but it has been published in newspapers and never denied—that the British minister himself has, either directly or through some correspondence with his Government, informed the Government of the United States that it will not be considered an infringement of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty if we do acquire the rights in that canal.

Mr. BARHAM. Or if so, that they will modify it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Or if so, that they will modify it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will say to the gentleman that I am as anxious to have the canal built as he is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is one thing to speak the word; it is another thing to do the act. I want to get forward, for I have occupied too much time. If you pass this bill in this House, not one dollar of money except the expenses for the negotiation for right of way and territorial limits will be made until the coming of the next Congress of the United States.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does not the gentleman know that the bill as framed here can not pass the Senate; that it will be amended when it gets to the Senate?

Mr. BARHAM. I deny that.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And that there are only between two and three weeks more of this session?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman has no right to assume that. The enemies of the Nicaragua Canal are bristling with reasons why nothing should be done. Every man in the United States knows that this obstruction means the ultimate defeat and repudiation and abandonment of the Nicaragua Canal. It can be nothing less than that. It must in the very nature of things be so, and if this measure shall receive no action nor sanction at the hands of this Congress I will cheerfully vote for a joint resolution to notify the nations of the world that the American nation has abandoned the project, and appealing to other civilized countries to build the canal upon the same terms that England built the Suez Canal.

Mr. CANNON. Now, will my friend allow me at this point? For one, so far as I am concerned, according to my best judgment and opinion, I utterly and totally deny the statement of the gentleman that the failure to break down this rule means the abandonment of the construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well!

Mr. CANNON. There is not, in my opinion, one word of truth in it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I have given my opinion, and the gentleman has given his.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the gentleman says there is no truth in my opinion. A man's opinion may be erroneous, and yet it may be truthful. I have doubted the gentleman's judgment very seldom in the sixteen years I have known him, but I have known him to be mistaken, and I hardly ever knew him to admit that he was. [Laughter.] My proposition is that time is crowding the nations of the world for this canal.

Mr. MAHON. Who wants it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Everybody wants it who can get the right, and your people want it more than mine want it. Now, the action on this bill does not intend and does not propose to commit Congress to the absolute construction of this canal until future action by Congress; and if no action is taken in the Fifty-fifth Congress, it simply postpones this measure, at the best that can be accomplished, for eighteen months before the incipient preliminary stages are entered upon by Congress.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. Why has this bill not been reported before this?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The chairman of the committee stated yesterday that it was not reported because the Walker committee had not made its report; that they did report it as rapidly as they could, and had considered it long enough to report it long ago, but it was necessary to have that report in order that intelligence should enter into the construction of the measure.

Now, then, gentlemen, I have said all I desire to say. My proposition is that this work is going forward; that it is in progress. Oh, some gentlemen will say, "Define what is a progressing work and what is a nonprogressing work." Is it work upon which some one is at work on the construction of a building every hour of the day, every day of the week, and every week of the year, in order that it shall be in progress; or is it possible that a man may make his project, ascertain the cost, make his plans, and stand ready to let his contract, and then wait another year or two years? It is only one year since the last appropriation was made; and yet has the work to be "in progress?" What is the limitation of the word "progress" in this connection? Will somebody state that it is that a public work must be in progress so that it does not require the initial action of the Government to start the work over?

Mr. GAINES. How far, as a matter of fact, has this work progressed?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It has gone far enough so that the Government could let the contracts if the Government had concessions from the Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua. [Laughter.] The surveys are absolutely complete, as the chairman of the committee stated.

Mr. GAINES. Now the gentleman from Indiana says, "How far is that?"

Mr. GROSVENOR. Six hundred thousand dollars is given as the item of expenditure, and that has been expended already by this Government. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee. It was stated yesterday by the chairman of the committee that under the appropriation of Congress the entire ascertainment was completed, the measurements had been made of the depth of the soil and the size of the rocks, and everything, and that a small railroad had been constructed.

Mr. BARHAM. Eleven miles.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Eleven miles along the track of the forthcoming canal, and yet gentlemen stand here and say that the work is not in progress. I stand here, therefore, in answer, and say that as a matter of fact the construction of the Nicaragua Canal is in progress, and therefore this amendment is in order.

Mr. GAINES. Has that report been filed, and is it official?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand that dredges are on the work, and the lower half of the canal has been dredged by them for the purpose of this observation, and that this was authorized by law.

Mr. FOOTE. Where do we get that information? I would like to find it.

Mr. GAINES. Is it an official report?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is an official report, made by the Walker Commission, recognizing the work that has been done along the line of that canal that they propose to assume, and to take the work that has been constructed by the Maritime Canal Company, including the dredging and railroad construction.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman tell me where that is?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman knows as well as I do.

Mr. GAINES. I do not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You will find it in the folding room. I will go there and get it for you.

Mr. GAINES. I will not put the gentleman to that trouble.

Mr. FOOTE. Is that all hearsay, that we had some dredges there?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is in the official report, as I am told.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The committee will observe that the point raised by the gentleman in charge of the bill does not affect the merits of the bill relating to the construction of the Nicaragua Canal. The point raised is one purely of a parliamentary character, and simply relates to the construction of the rule that was invoked by the gentleman who has the appropriation bill in charge. The bill, as the committee will remember, is a general appropriation bill, and when we reached the point on page 74 indicated by the Clerk the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] arose and presented an amendment, which has been read from the Clerk's desk, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] raised the following points against it. He said:

Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the point of order against this amendment. First, the amendment is not germane; second, the amendment is obnoxious to Rule XXI in this, that it proposes legislation; third, that it appropriates money not authorized by existing law; fourth, it appropriates money not in pursuance of a public work or object in progress.

The rule referred to by the gentleman reads as follows:

2. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

The gentleman from Iowa who offered the amendment, in answer, insisted that the amendment is permissible because it is in continuation of public works already in progress; and in support of that he cited to the Chair a law that was adopted by Congress in 1895 providing for surveys and a supplementary law of 1898 making additional appropriation. In regard to determining whether this law can be construed as having established the public works, namely, the construction of this canal, it is important to examine the language itself. The committee will note that it says "for the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility and cost of the construction and completion of the Nicaraguan Canal, etc., $20,000 are appropriated." The language clearly indicates that it is for the purpose of ascertaining facts that will guide the action of Congress in the future, without committing it to any policy whatever.

Now, the amendment of 1898 does not enlarge the scope or purpose for which the original appropriation was made. It simply increases the amount, but limits it to these purposes, namely, to ascertaining a state of facts that can be used for the public hereafter. The wisdom of that will be noted on reflection, because of the wide divergence of opinion as to the manner in which this Nicaraguan Canal should be constructed, whether by private enterprise or by the Government guaranteeing the bonds that should be issued, or whether the Government should take a copartnership with private individuals; or, as proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, take the construction upon itself and obtain the control and sovereignty over the territory through which the canal is to be constructed.

So that, to the Chair, it is entirely clear that the law cited by the gentleman from Iowa is not susceptible of the construction suggested by him, but is to ascertain the facts, leaving the Government of the United States entirely clear hereafter to determine whether it will embark in such an enterprise or not. Indeed, the Chair is fortified in this by the amendment sent to the Clerk's desk by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], which provides that the President shall be authorized in the first instance to purchase territory, and, in the second, to direct his Secretary of War to go on and take all the preliminary steps necessary for the construction of the canal itself. So that, as the Chair construes it, the very amendment offered by the gentleman is a refutation of the statement that the preliminary legislation appropriating in 1895 $20,000 and in 1898 $150,000 commits the Government to the construction of this canal.

Now, on this part of the rule, the Chair is fortified by previous decisions on other questions. As has been stated by several gentlemen, this rule, invoked by the gentleman from Illinois, has been the rule in this House for more than a generation, and there have been repeated rulings on the identical point raised that the Chair is now considering. As late as the Forty-fifth Congress, Mr. Carlisle, of Kentucky, one of the ablest parliamentarians who has ever presided over this body, was called upon to pass upon this question. While the committee were considering an appropriation bill, Mr. Ryan, of Kansas, offered the following amendment to be incorporated into the bill:

Fifty thousand for a building at Topeka, Kans., of the kind and for the uses provided in the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the purchase of a site for a public building at Topeka, Kans.," approved March 3, 1875, and such building shall not exceed in cost the sum of $200,000.

Mr. Atkins, of Tennessee, raised the point of order that under this rule, invoked by the gentleman from Illinois, it was not a proper amendment, and Mr. Carlisle, after discussion, ruled that it was not. Mr. Ryan in his argument showed that Congress had already authorized the purchase of a site, and that $10,000 had been appropriated for that purpose, and that the jurisdiction of the site had been given by the State of Kansas to the United States Government.

But Mr. Carlisle held that the purchase of a site did not authorize the construction of a building upon it, although the purpose for which the site was bought was the construction of a public building; and he held that the amendment was not in order. There was no appeal from that decision.

In the Fifty-first Congress Mr. Wilkinson, of Louisiana, offered an amendment to a general appropriation bill appropriating $75,000 for the construction of a dry dock at Algiers, La. Prior to the offering of that proposition a naval board, acting with full authority under the law, had indicated the location for the site for a dry dock at Algiers. That amendment was offered when the naval appropriation bill was under consideration.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], the chairman of the Naval Committee at that time, made a point of order against the amendment that it was obnoxious to the rule now under consideration. Mr. Butterworth, of Ohio, a very able parliamentarian, as the older members of the House will remember, was in the chair, and after listening to a full discussion held that the locating of the site by that naval board did not authorize the appropriation of $75,000 for the construction of the dry dock. He sustained the point of order. The committee acquiesced in his ruling.

There are numerous other decisions along this line, all of them in harmony with the two decisions which the Chair has read to the committee in support of his position that the point made by the gentleman from Iowa that the law cited by him is a commencement of the construction of the canal is not well taken.

Now as to the point made by the gentleman from Michigan that this amendment is proper under existing law because there is a treaty between the United States and the Republic of Nicaragua looking to the construction of a canal. An examination of that treaty will show that it is entirely foreign to the proposition contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. The canal that is contemplated in that treaty is a canal that is to be under the supervision and absolute control of the Government of Nicaragua; so that the United States would be eliminated from the matter at the pleasure of the Republic of Nicaragua. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa proposes to buy a strip of territory where the Government of the United States shall become absolutely supreme. So that the two are inconsistent; and the Chair holds that that does not authorize the amendment offered by the gentleman.

There are a few other considerations on this point that the Chair desires to present to the committee. The bill under consideration, under the rule which has been invoked, makes appropriations only to meet existing law. No appropriation is provided for unless it is to meet some obligation which has accrued by virtue of existing law.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] goes entirely beyond that; it recognizes the fact that there are no obligations whatever on this question between the United States and the Republics of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, and provides in the first section that the President of the United States shall be authorized to purchase from the States of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, for and in behalf of the United States, such portion of territory now belonging to those States as may be desirable and necessary for the construction of this canal, and authorizes the necessary expenditure for that to be made by the President of the United States.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] claims as one of his objections that this amendment is not germane to the bill, and the Chair is inclined to hold that that objection is well taken, for this reason, that this amendment proposes to enter into negotiations with two separate, independent States by the President of the United States looking to the acquiring of foreign territory. Gentlemen are familiar with the Constitution of the United States and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which hold that we can acquire foreign territory only under the war and treaty making power. One of the leading cases, I think, is that of Fleming vs. Page. Another is the recent Mormon case, decided in 136 United States Reports, by Mr. Justice Bradley, wherein he elaborates the point that foreign territory can be acquired only under this clause of the Constitution.

Now, suppose, instead of seeking to acquire foreign territory from these two small States, the amendment had been to acquire the island of Ireland from the British Government. Does anybody contend for a moment that that would be held germane to this appropriation bill, and that we could go on and legislate for the purchase of that island from Great Britain if she were willing to sell? It seems to the Chair that this extreme illustration shows that in the first section of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] it departs widely, not only from the requirements of an appropriation bill itself, but from the rules that govern and control us.

If we can not purchase Ireland by an amendment to this appropriation bill, the same objection holds true that we have no right to purchase foreign territory from any country whatever.

Another test as to whether this legislation is germane and should be considered is this: All gentlemen of the committee are familiar with the rule which provides for the dividing of the work of the House among the various committees of the House. Among those committees we have the Committee on Appropriations, whose work is not to consider legislation, but to report appropriations. That committee can create no laws. It is limited simply to make appropriations to carry out laws that already exist. Another committee is the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That committee has the right to originate bills that may become laws, and this amendment that has been offered here is offered by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Coming from that committee as a separate bill, its hearing before the House would be entirely proper.

But suppose that bill had been introduced and sent to the Speaker's desk and the question had arisen as to which committee it should go to, what committee should have jurisdiction of it. Suppose the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations had insisted that it should go to the Committee on Appropriations and the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had insisted that it should go to his committee and that his committee should take jurisdiction. The Chair apprehends there would have been no doubt in the Speaker's mind in determining that the committee presided over by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, should have jurisdiction of this subject rather than the committee presided over by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the Committee on Appropriations.

For the reasons indicated the Chair is inclined to sustain the point of order made by the gentleman and to hold that the amendment proposed is not in order.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, with the very greatest respect for the Chair, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DALZELL. And I move to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. BAILEY. There is no table in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that in Committee of the Whole the gentleman's motion is not in order.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania recognizes that fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HEPBURN. I was about to propose that we submit the matter to a vote without further discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FLEMING] has asked for recognition, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit some views on this question. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] No call by men on this side of the House or on that side for a vote will prevent me from exercising my parliamentary privileges on this floor and saying what I intend to say.

I will also state that I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] was somewhat mistaken in implying that the question before the House on overruling the decision of the Chair is the same question that has been debated up to this time.

Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of building the Nicaragua Canal, and from all the investigations that I have been able to make I am of the opinion that the bill known as the Hepburn bill is the best plan and the best scheme that has yet been presented to Congress for carrying out that purpose. Unless additional facts to the contrary were brought out in the discussion, I should take great pleasure in casting my vote for the passage of that bill, if it can ever be legally and properly brought before this House. Furthermore, I will join hands with any other members in this House for the purpose of bringing that bill to early consideration and an early vote, if such a thing be possible.

But, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the great vigor and incisiveness with which the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of this committee, has presented his case to this House—and no man, in my judgment, could have made a better presentation of such a case—notwithstanding all the ability that he has brought to bear upon this question, my mind stands now where it stood from the first, and I believe that the attempt to put this bill as an amendment or a rider upon this general appropriation bill is an open violation of the rule which this House has established for its government. The general purpose of this rule and paragraph, under which it is sought to bring in this amendment——

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that we may have order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The Chair desires to state to the friends in the galleries that they are here by the courtesy of the House, and they must engage in no conversation and make no noise that will disturb the members on the floor.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Chairman, I can readily understand that when the House has its mind pretty well made up on a question of this kind, the members do not take much pleasure in listening to anyone else, especially if he presents views somewhat different to their own. And by way of excuse to the members, I want to say that I am making the argument that I now make more as a justification before the country for my own vote in sustaining the Chair than in any hope of convincing gentlemen who have their minds made up to the contrary. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] There will be no vote until I have said what I want to say. [Laughter and applause.] You gentlemen who are calling for a vote are simply wasting the time of yourselves and of the House.

Mr. Chairman, the general purpose of this rule is a wise one. There is not in our whole volume of rules a wiser or a better one than the rule which gentlemen now intend, apparently, to upturn and trample under foot. General legislation ought not to be incorporated on appropriation bills. It is wrong in principle; it begets all manner of logrolling and corruption, and prevents the passage of bills to carry on the machinery of the Government by hanging on to them other legislation that ought not to be put there, and sometimes preventing the passage of bills which would receive practically a unanimous vote before the House.

In addition to that, it violates a principle in our Constitution. And right here I want to apologize for mentioning the Constitution. In these latter days there has been so much of sneering and derision against men who seem to have a reverence and respect for it that I feel I ought to make some kind of an excuse for even mentioning that instrument, which once held the respect of public men. But according to that Constitution there are three departments of our Government whose indorsement of a law is necessary before it can be put on the statute book. One is the House of Representatives, another is the Senate, and the third is the Executive. There is no better means of coercing an Executive and forcing him to sign a bill that ought not to be signed than to put it as a rider on an appropriation bill and force him to accept an unjust, improper, or corrupt law or to veto the whole bill, and in that way prevent the convening of an extra session of Congress for the purpose of supplying the needs of the Government. [Applause.]

So I say that this rule is founded not only in wisdom, it has not only the sanction of the vote of the members of this House in adopting these rules, but it has its root way down in the provisions of the Constitution itself. [Applause.]

I understand that applause. Gentlemen are still wasting time.

So important, Mr. Chairman, was this principle of public legislation considered that in my own State of Georgia it was incorporated into the constitution, and not allowed to rest in the rules or even in the statute law. It was put into the constitution itself, and in the State of Georgia no rider can be placed on an appropriation bill.

More than that. When those able and brilliant statesmen—and this country never furnished better—met at Montgomery to establish a constitution for the Confederate States of America, these men, these statesmen who framed the constitution of the Confederate States of America, and who had long experience in public life, understood and provided against the evil which this rule of this House in some measure seeks to avoid. They put into the constitution of the Confederacy the provision that the chief executive might disapprove any item in an appropriation bill and still let the balance of the bill stand in its integrity.

Now, Mr. Chairman, such is the general wisdom of this rule that it has been indorsed and supported and defended by the best Democratic leaders that have been in this House for the last fifty years [applause]; and when men inveigh against the tyranny of the Reed rules—and I join in that protest—they fail to draw the distinction that this is not one of the rules created at that time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will my friend permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. FLEMING. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to say, if my colleague will permit me, that I fully agree with him in the position he has taken; but I just want to ask him this question: If he believes that there is a man upon the floor of this House who, if he had to draw the line in a week or a month from now, or at any time hereafter, when considering a proposition involving the rules of this House, would have voted to put this one out?

Mr. FLEMING. If there be such a man, he would have voted in absolute ignorance of what his duty was under the circumstances.

Mr. BARTLETT. One other question. Suppose that we were to vote to overrule the Chair; it is not because the Chair has violated the rule, or because this rule is a bad one, but simply because we desire to pass a measure with or without the rule.

Mr. FLEMING. It will simply mean that the members who vote for it are ready to go into a revolution so far as parliamentary law is concerned, and go into a state of anarchy for the purpose of accomplishing some immediate object; and in the long run you lose ten times as much as you will gain.

Mr. Chairman, as I was about to say, this rule is not one of the oppressive rules that have weighed so heavily upon the minority party of this House. This rule, along with a few others, has been our shield and protection; and when members of the minority, in a spirit of reckless lawlessness, override and repudiate it, you cast down out of your hand the only weapon that is left for your own protection. You place yourselves at the absolute mercy of the majority party on that side of the Chamber.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question right there. Is there a single instance in the history of this House that he can point out where the minority have been protected in their rights?

Mr. FLEMING. Time and again the minority have been protected in their rights under this very rule. They were protected, so far as a consensus of opinion on this side the House was gathered, in the matter of the Pacific cable bill, which the gentleman from Michigan sought to ingraft as an amendment upon the pending measure. So far as the action of the committee is concerned, by the passage of that amendment the Government might now be authorized to build that Pacific cable, had the chairman of the committee not ruled that amendment out of order.

That is where you get your protection. That was not any more than a day ago. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this: If this committee overturns the ruling of the Chairman in this matter of building the Nicaragua Canal, and the committee proceeds to put this as an amendment on this bill, then I submit to the Chairman that inasmuch as his judgment has been overruled in this it will be incumbent upon him, as a matter of justice and moral right to the gentleman from Michigan, who proposed the amendment for the Pacific cable, to make his apologies to that gentleman, take back his ruling, and to reinstate the Pacific cable as an amendment on this bill.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask this question?

Mr. FLEMING. Certainly.

Mr. RIDGELY. Has it not been the action of this House on more than one occasion during this Congress that where a question as to the rules affecting any contemplated action of the House was invoked that the question is as to what the rule was affecting, the proposed legislation having been referred to a vote of the House—and the House reversed the Chair in some instances—that the Speaker of this House afterwards said that by that act, having referred the question to the House itself, that the House having taken this specific action itself which has taken place, that that changed the rule as affecting the proposed action, and if we vote that the ruling shall be overruled that then we make a rule by that vote?

Mr. FLEMING. It would not make a rule by that vote. In the same way Herr Most, having violated the law, might stand up in New York and say, "I have made a new law for the country." That is anarchy. The rules provide how they can be suspended and amended, and the Constitution provides how the rules are to be created, and for any man to stand up under these circumstances and say you have a right in accordance with the law to override the rules, when you know the decision of the Chair is right, is simply to state a proposition that is utterly absurd.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman from Georgia, my colleague, allow me an interruption?

Mr. FLEMING. Always, to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The question having passed out of the hands of the Chair, an appeal is now before the committee. Has not each individual member of this committee on the floor now a right to construe the rule for himself?

Mr. FLEMING. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And can he be called an anarchist for so doing?

Mr. FLEMING. I freely give to every man the same rights that I claim for myself.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Would you call a man an anarchist that would differ with the Chair?

Mr. FLEMING. The question was not whether the committee could properly overrule the Chair, but if it should do it outside of the law.

Mr. RIDGELY. The gentleman from Georgia does not wish to misrepresent me, and I think he misunderstands my position. My position is this, that if we overrule the Chair by the act of determining what is the rule, that determines the construction of the rule, and the Speaker of the House has so held.

Mr. FLEMING. If a majority of the members of the committee believe conscientiously that the Chairman of the committee has made an error, if you believe he is really wrong, of course the committee has the right to say so. What I am talking about, Mr. Chairman, is how a reasonable, sensible, and conservative man can come to any such conclusion. That is what I am talking about, and that is the point I am now discussing.

Mr. SIMPSON. If we are conscientious, it is not anarchy. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLEMING. Oh, well, Mr. Chairman, I suppose that Herr Most himself might have been conscientious in some of his schemes. It is not a question of conscience as much as a question of good sense.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, if my memory serves me right, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FLEMING] addressed the committee upon this subject yesterday. I ask the Chair if he is not now violating the rule of the House, section 6, Rule XIV, which provides that a member shall not address the House but once upon a subject?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to suggest that the question before the House now is whether the decision of the Chair shall stand as the decision of the committee, and that is a new question, and the gentleman is addressing himself to that question.

Mr. HENDERSON. And upon that each member can be heard once.

Mr. CORLISS. I was not aware that the gentleman from Georgia was addressing himself to that subject.

Mr. FLEMING. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] when he heard me discuss this subject before the committee?

Mr. CORLISS. I thought I heard the gentleman on the floor yesterday addressing the House, and I thought it was on this question.

Mr. FLEMING. The gentleman is absolutely mistaken. I have not before this arisen on the floor nor addressed the Chair in any way in relation to this bill nor in reference to this question. I have not risen on the floor and said one word to the House or the Chair on this subject.

Mr. Chairman, it simply shows to what terrible extremes gentlemen will go in a matter of this kind, to carry out a purpose that certainly can not commend itself to their sober judgment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], with his usual discriminating ability, placed his case on the only plausible ground that it could possibly be placed upon. He said nothing about some treaties fifty years old, he said very little about whether it was germane or not, and he said very little about existing law, but he rested it upon the ground that it was an appropriation for a public work which he claimed was "in progress." Now, Mr. Chairman, if that is the best argument that can be made, it is a thoroughly weak and unfounded one, when you come to analyze it.

Mr. BRUCKER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. FLEMING. Willingly.

Mr. BRUCKER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of building, ultimately, the Nicaragua Canal?

Mr. FLEMING. I am.

Mr. BRUCKER. Does not the gentleman think he has undergone punishment enough to justify himself before his constituents without going further? [Laughter.]

Mr. FLEMING. Perhaps I have said enough to justify myself before my constituents. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I say with some degree of pleasure, and I hope with some little modesty, that I really think my constituents have enough confidence in my character to know that I was honest without any proof at all; but my chief concern now is to put this thing so plain and patent that the constituents of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRUCKER] may know what little reason and little cause he had for attempting to overturn the rules of this House. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BRUCKER. I shall answer to my constituents, and I am in favor of the canal.

Mr. FLEMING. Now, Mr. Chairman, they say that this work is "in progress." Why, Mr. Chairman, if the work is in progress, the country certainly does not know it. Our galleries are crowded to-day, and the press gallery is filled with a full complement of men with their pencils pointed ready to write to the country and tell it whether we are going to build this canal at all or not. Yet gentlemen say the work is in progress. A work in progress before it is begun! The question is, Are you going to build a canal at all? That is the purpose of the amendment—to say we shall build it. Yet the gentleman who offers the amendment seeks to justify it by saying that we have already started the work, that it is "in progress." In other words, you have a work in progress that you have never even begun. I do not understand the English language, Mr. Chairman, if a work can be in progress that we have not yet decided to begin. Talk about your surveys——

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FLEMING. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Is not the only question before the individual member of this Committee of the Whole this question, Is the ruling of the Chair right under the rules of the House?

Mr. FLEMING. That ought to be the only question.

Several MEMBERS. It is.

Mr. FLEMING. Upon the proper plane of the consideration of this matter that is the only question. But the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] who has asked that question knows, as I know, that we have heard it talked around this Hall for more than a day that the decision of the Chair, right or wrong, was to be overruled if it should be against the introduction of this amendment. And it is against that I am talking.

Mr. PERKINS. That is right.

Mr. FLEMING. I say that the decision of the Chair ought to stand. Gentlemen of the House, do you not know that the Chair did his duty? Do you not know that he decided this question according to all the precedents? Do you not know that he followed the ruling of John G. Carlisle, one of the finest parliamentarians that ever sat in that chair? Now, I say, after putting in the chair the gentleman who now occupies it and giving him the rules for his guidance, you have no right to attempt to override him and mortify him before the public by saying that he has decided something wrong, when you ought to know that he has decided it right. [Applause.]

Mr. MAHANY. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. FLEMING. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAHANY. I have, as the House knows, never been in favor of continuing the present rules in their entirety; but I desire to point out, along the lines of the gentleman's remarks, that in the whole body of House rules the one under discussion has seldom, if ever, been the subject of adverse criticism.

Mr. FLEMING. I think it is one of the few that has never been criticised.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen say that this rule has been frequently violated by the Committee on Appropriations putting into appropriation bills outside matters, and, nobody making objection, those things have gone into the law. It is true that the committee has frequently brought in such side provisions; but it is not true that this House, after objection has once been made to such a provision and after the Chairman has sustained the objection—it is not true from the beginning of this Congress to the present hour that this House has ever voted to overrule such a decision. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The Chairman rapped for order.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Chairman, I know that some members, particularly here to my left, must have lost a great deal of their usual courtesy and conservative spirit, and I might use stronger language. I excuse them by reason of the great excitement that they may be laboring under in their anxiety to pass this measure over the rules of the House, for when a man has once made up his mind to do something wrong he does not hesitate very much as to how he shall carry it out. And the constant talking and the insistence for a "vote" over here on my left, by some gentlemen whom I do not know, simply emphasizes that fact. They are in extremes; they do not want to hear this question argued. They have been so much torn up by this argument and other arguments which they think perhaps will make their position ridiculous before the country that they want to cry down anyone who opposes them, but I will not be cried down until I get ready to stop.

Mr. BALL. I have not interrupted the gentleman——

Mr. FLEMING. I have no objection to yielding to the gentleman.

Mr. BALL. The gentleman has criticised other gentlemen so severely, I would like to ask him this question: Did he expect to address himself to the favor of any of the members of the House when he started out by characterizing a portion of them as anarchists and the balance of them as not having sense enough to understand a proposition?

Mr. FLEMING. I have done neither.

Mr. BALL. "Anarchists and fools" was the gentleman's language; the RECORD will show it.

Mr. FLEMING. I have done neither. The reporter of the House has taken down my words, I hope, as they fell from my lips. I said that when men came in here and upturned and violated the rules of the House it was nothing better than anarchy—that it was revolution, anarchism. I have not characterized any man as an anarchist. On the contrary, I clearly stated that any man who conscientiously believed that the Chair had decided wrong had the right to cast his vote in accordance with his belief just as I have the right to cast mine.

Mr. BALL. Did you not also say that you did not see how any man with good sense could come to that conclusion?

Mr. FLEMING. I did say that, and I repeat it. [Laughter.] But I did not say that because a man comes to another conclusion from mine he has not good sense. I simply say I can not see the question that way. He may have more sense than I have; and it may be my want of sense that prevents me from seeing the question his way. But I am simply stating the fact that the rules on this subject are so plain that I can not understand how a man of good sense can say honestly and conscientiously that the Chair has decided wrong. Yet I admit that gentlemen may hold such sentiments and opinions; and if they do, I cheerfully grant them freedom to do it.

Several MEMBERS (derisively). Thank you!

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Chairman, this House, since I have been a member of Congress, has never yet overridden a decision of the Chair upon this rule in reference to striking out a "rider" on an appropriation bill. Never since I have been here has it been done. There have been some attempts to put on these "riders," and the Chair has ruled them out. There have been appeals from the decisions of different occupants of the chair, but every time the majority of the House has sustained the opinion of the Chair. And if this House this afternoon overrides the decision of the Chair, it will be the first time in the history of this Congress when such revolutionary action has been taken.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I say here and again that if the House overrules your decision upon the Nicaragua Canal amendment it will be your duty to take back your ruling about the Pacific Cable Company amendment, and allow the gentleman who offered that to offer it as an amendment and put it on this bill.

Mr. MAHON. I do not want to appear discourteous to the gentleman from Georgia, but I wish to make this parliamentary inquiry: Is an appeal from the decision of the Chair debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is, but it is within the province of the committee to close that debate at any time.

Mr. FLEMING. I am through, Mr. Chairman. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HEPBURN. I move that all debate——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will recognize the fact that the gentleman from Georgia still has the floor.

Mr. HEPBURN. I thought the gentleman from Georgia had concluded his remarks.

Mr. FLEMING. I had substantially finished what I had intended to say, and I would have gotten through a good deal sooner if gentlemen on my left particularly had not interrupted me. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it is the better policy for us to stand upon principles, to stand by the rules of the House, to stand by the laws of the country, to stand by the provisions of the Constitution, even though they may at times bear hard upon us, than it is to sacrifice the protection which the law gives us in order to accomplish some temporary advantage.

I am in favor of this bill if it can be brought in legally before this House, but I will not vote to upturn and overrule the decision of the Chair, when I for one believe that he has decided in accordance with the law, and that he has done his duty, and that he deserves praise rather than censure. [Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this question of appeal be now declared closed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that all debate on the pending question be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending question is closed. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair be the judgment of the committee?

The question being taken, the Chair announced that he was in doubt.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 152, noes 118.

Mr. HEPBURN. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. HEPBURN and Mr. CANNON.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 127, noes 109.

Accordingly the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee decides to sustain the Chair and the amendment is ruled out. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Oakland, Cal.: For continuing improvement, $133,000.

Mr. CANNON. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 76, in line 5, after the word "improvement," insert the words "under existing project."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Falls of Ohio River at Louisville, Ky.: For completing improvement, including Indiana Chute Falls, $15,000.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make an inquiry, and I move to strike out the last word. I see that the appropriation is for $15,000. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether that is all that was estimated for the next year?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that the appropriation for the current year finishes the project. Now, we recommend this $15,000 because Congress diverted $15,000 from this appropriation at the last session for the lower river, and this is to make the appropriation full.

Mr. EVANS. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CAPRON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate joint resolution (S. Res. 244) making an appropriation of $5,000 for clearing the Potomac River of ice.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11414) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CULLOM, Mr. SEWELL, and Mr. TELLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 11815) to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, asked a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. CARTER, Mr. HALE, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 5706. An act granting an increase of pension to Peter E. Shipler;

H. R. 10281. An act authorizing the Light-House Board to provide a steam whistle at Michigan City, Ind.;

H. R. 11440. An act to locate the office of the deputy collector of the port of East Pascagoula, Mississippi, at Scranton, Miss.;

H. R. 599. Authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sum of $400 to The Brownell & Co., Dayton, Ohio, on account of penalty erroneously imposed by the Light-House Board; and

H. R. 12094. An act making an appropriation for clearing the Potomac River of ice.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. R. 240. Joint resolution declaring the purpose of the United States toward the Philippine Islands.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Missouri River from mouth to Sioux City, Iowa: For continuing improvement of Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City, Iowa, including salaries, clerical, office, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Missouri River Commission, surveys, permanent bench marks, and gauges, $300,000: Provided, That of this amount the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, shall be expended in works of improvement at the following places, namely, St. Joseph, Mo., $30,000; Omaha, Nebr., and Council Bluffs, Iowa, $50,000; opposite Leavenworth, Kans., $5,000; Jefferson City, Mo., $20,000; Nigger Bend, Mo., $10,000; Randolph Bend, Mo., $15,000; Lexington, Mo., $10,000.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 79, line 13, after the word "dollars" insert the following:
"To improve the harbor at Jefferson City by compelling the current and channel of the river to the south side thereof."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, just a word. I know nothing about the propriety of this amendment, and I am not familiar with the river there. I will say to my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that we put this item in the bill, segregating this amount at Jefferson City, in the exact language that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors gave us, in a written recommendation, after consideration of the subject. Now, I will ask my friend if he has such knowledge of the matter that he can say that it ought to be further modified?

Mr. BLAND. There is no doubt about that, Mr. Chairman. The whole object of the appropriation was to compel the channel to the south side of the river.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask my friend whether it would not be likely to be done anyhow, without his amendment?

Mr. BLAND. That might be, and there might be some trouble about it. I should greatly prefer to have this amendment agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. This subject was very carefully considered by the River and Harbor Committee. An appropriation of $300,000 per annum is made for this portion of the Missouri River. One hundred thousand dollars of that has already been appropriated, or deducted, so as to leave $200,000, making the amount very limited for all purposes on the river. This bill provides for the expenditure of $140,000 for specific localities on the river, leaving but $60,000 for the general expenses of the Missouri River Commission. That is the very least amount sufficient to enable them to maintain their existence.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] does not want to increase the amount to be devoted to Jefferson City.

Mr. BLAND. This does not increase the amount.

Mr. BURTON. I did not catch the change in the phraseology. What is the purpose of the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. BLAND. The whole purpose is to compel the channel to the south side of the river. That is the whole object of it.

Mr. BURTON. I misunderstood the purpose of it, and I see no objection to that amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; it is a matter I know nothing about, and I defer, of course, to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. BURTON]. I am quite content, if it meets with their approval.

Mr. PERKINS. It is for the protection of the bank.

Mr. BURTON. That is what it is.

Mr. BLAND. There is no trouble about it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

California Débris Commission: For defraying the expenses of the commission in carrying on the work authorized by the act of Congress approved March 1, 1893, $15,000: Provided, That officers of the commission traveling on duty in connection with the commission's work may be paid their actual traveling expenses in lieu of mileage allowed by law.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Insert in line 21, page 32, after the word "law," the following: "And shall hereafter receive no mileage."

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph to which I have offered this amendment appropriates $15,000 for the expenses of the members of the California Débris Commission. What may be the powers and duties of that commission I do not know. It has not a very attractive name. I judge that it is a sort of roving commission, possibly not of much benefit to the Government. The proviso at the end of the paragraph provides that the members in traveling may receive their actual expenses in lieu of the mileage now provided by law.

In other words, as it now stands they will be permitted to take their choice. For a short journey their actual expenses may exceed the lawful mileage. In that event they will, of course, charge the actual expenses. But for a long journey, where the mileage allowed by law exceeds their actual expenses, they may charge mileage. It permits them to select on the occasion of each trip the method of payment which will be most to their interest and least to the advantage of the public Treasury.

My amendment simply confines them to their actual expenses and prevents them from receiving any mileage whatever. In a bill which carries millions of dollars, as this does, a $15,000 item may seem comparatively unimportant, but just as economies in small things are essential in private life to the success of business enterprises, so economies in small things, as well as in larger ones, are important to the successful management of the finances of the Government.

I trust that the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee will see the entire propriety of my amendment. There are larger matters to which we must give attention as we reach them. As he himself has well said, the condition of our revenues is such as to require the most careful management. We have very heavy expenditures incident to the war with Spain, and this same bill carries an appropriation to meet the obligation of the Government involved in the ratification of the treaty with Spain.

I was surprised to hear the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] declare that he would vote against this bill because it carries with it that appropriation. The Constitution of the United States, in the second section of its second article, expressly confers upon the President the power to make treaties by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate. When a treaty has thus been made, if it involves an obligation to pay money, that obligation is just as binding upon the people of the United States as is the obligation to pay a Government bond.

In this case the treaty has been made by the President and has been ratified by a two-thirds vote in the Senate. Whether we do or do not approve of that treaty, whether we do or do not want the Philippines, whether we propose to sell them or to give them away, or to govern them or to assist the people of those islands to govern themselves—all those things are outside of the pending question.

The Government of the United States, by the action of its President and Senate, clearly sanctioned by the Constitution, has incurred a binding obligation to pay a certain sum of money to the Government of Spain. This bill, among other things, makes an appropriation for that payment. The gentleman says he will not vote for it because he does not approve of the terms of the treaty. He might just as well refuse payment of the United States bonds issued during the Administration of President Cleveland because he does not approve of the terms upon which those bonds were sold. It is too late to raise such questions now.

The obligation of the Government has been constitutionally created, and the good faith and honor of the American people require that it shall be promptly met. If I am correctly informed, Spain herself is the only Government on the face of the earth that has ever sought to evade the payment of a treaty obligation. When we follow Spanish precedent, our honor will have fallen as low as hers.

I do not believe that there is any member of this House upon whose constituency the sense of pecuniary or national honor rests so lightly as to sustain that member in voting to violate the money obligation into which this nation has solemnly entered with all the forms and ceremonies provided by the Constitution. I do not believe that the gentleman's constituency will sustain him in that matter, and I am pleased to see that he is not sustained by other gentlemen upon that side of the House.

Having these increased expenses to provide for, it is the more essential that we shall scrutinize these appropriation bills and guard against every wrongful, wasteful, or unnecessary expenditure of money, and thus avoid the necessity of either issuing additional bonds or imposing upon the people additional taxes which they ought not to be called upon to bear. I insist upon the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I think my friend is quite right; but I call his attention, as a query, to this: Does not the paragraph as reported meet the object, "their actual traveling expenses?"

Mr. OLMSTED. It says they "may" be paid, leaving it optional with them or with others, that they may be paid either their mileage or actual traveling expenses.

Mr. CANNON. The very object of it was to enable them to pay their traveling expenses. They can not go into the mountains and only have their mileage as compensation.

Mr. OLMSTED. My amendment makes clear just what they shall receive.

Mr. CANNON. Let the amendment be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "law," in line 21, page 32, insert "and shall hereafter receive no mileage."

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will say to my friend, if he insists on his amendment going on, I will not object; but when you say that this is in lieu of mileage, it seems to me to accomplish the same thing.

Mr. OLMSTED. You do not say "shall;" you say they "may." It may work both ways.

Mr. CANNON. The law gives them mileage, which is less than they should receive. They can not receive both, and I have no doubt they would take the most; but it is to pay them their actual expenses when they have to go into the mountains.

Mr. OLMSTED. If they take a long trip the mileage would exceed the actual expenses.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend insists on it, I shall not offer any objection to his amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Deep Waterways Commission: For completing surveys, examinations, and investigations (including estimate of cost) of deep waterways, and the routes thereof, between the Great Lakes and the Atlantic tide waters, as recommended by the report of the Deep Waterways Commission transmitted by the President to Congress January 18, 1897; such surveys, examinations, and investigations to be made by the board of three engineers designated and appointed by the President for this purpose July 28, 1897, in compliance with the provisions of the act of June 4, 1897, to be immediately available, $60,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 23, page 83, the word "sixty" and insert the word "ninety;" so that it will read, "$90,000."

Mr. CANNON. That is a subsequent estimate, and I am satisfied that it is a necessary appropriation to finish this survey.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For farm, namely: Pay of farmer, chief gardener, harness makers, farm hands, gardeners, horseshoers, stablemen, teamsters, dairymen, herders, and laborers, and for all tools, appliances, and materials required for farm, garden, and dairy work; for grain, hay, straw, dressing, seed, carriages, wagons, carts, and other conveyances; for all animals purchased for stock or for work (including animals in the park); for all materials, tools, and labor for flower garden, lawn, and park; for rent of leased lands, and for repairs not done by the Home, $15,000;

In all, $575,350.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The action of a majority of this House in defeating the Nicaragua Canal is to be regretted. There are only seventeen days more remaining in the life of the Fifty-fifth Congress. We adjourn sine die at 12 o'clock on the 4th of next March. Judging by the action of the House this afternoon it seems almost certain that there will be no legislation in this Congress to begin the building of the Nicaragua Canal.

I am in favor of building the Nicaragua Canal and of the absolute control of it by the Government of the United States. I trust and hope this Congress will not adjourn until some affirmative legislation is placed on the statute books in favor of that proposition.

We have spent practically all day yesterday and all day to-day discussing a flimsy point of order—a mere quibble, so to speak—as to whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] to build the Nicaragua Canal was germane to the bill now under consideration, and known as the sundry civil bill, or whether it was not germane under the rules of the House. The rules of the House seem to be for the purpose of giving the majority here the right to do, or not to do, just what it wants. One day they are construed one way, and another day the opposite way—doubtless on the theory that it is a poor rule that will not work both ways—especially for a partisan advantage.

The Republican party is in a majority in this House, and is charged with the responsibility of legislation. You can not escape the imperative duty which confronts you, nor evade the burden of responsibility. We know, if we know anything, that the people of this country are in favor of the construction and the ownership of the Nicaragua Canal. It is imperative, in my opinion, that we do something in regard to this proposition to build the isthmian canal before this Congress adjourns. If we do not, the Republican members of the House must take the responsibility, and if I mistake not they will hear from the people in no uncertain tones ere the Fifty-sixth Congress begins. The people are in no mood to be deceived or trifled with. They want action, rules or no rules. They want this work commenced.

The building and the ownership of the Nicaragua Canal by the Government of the United States is essential, from a naval and a military standpoint, to the integrity of our Atlantic and Pacific seaboard. Everyone knows this who is familiar with recent history. Everyone knows also that nothing could help our commerce and our merchant marine so much as a canal across the Isthmus controlled by the Government of the United States. No one will or can deny the benefits and the advantages that will accrue to us by the construction and perfection of the canal. In time of war the canal will be an imperative instrumentality for our coast defense, and for our own safety and protection. In time of peace the canal will be one of the great factors in the trade and the commerce of the world. Its benefits to us will be simply incalculable. No one can overestimate the advantages to us of owning and controlling the canal across Nicaragua.

Let me say to the gentlemen on the other side of this House that there are many who are skeptical regarding their sincerity in this canal matter. Some of you, no doubt, favor its immediate construction, and some of you, I believe, desire to delay it as long as possible. The facts will all come out ere long. If you are throwing dust in the eyes of the people, it will soon be known.

We have witnessed a spectacle here to-day which should bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every sincere patriot in the land. We have wasted two whole days splitting hairs over an alleged point of order raised by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON]. How ludicrous it all seems to a man who wants to accomplish the thing.

You all know that if you had devoted that time to a fair and an honest discussion of the merits of the Nicaragua Canal bill, either the one framed by the gentleman from Iowa or Senator MORGAN'S canal bill, which has already passed the Senate, we would have been able in that time to have thoroughly discussed the measures, and in some shape one of them would have passed the House to-day by an overwhelming vote. Your willful delays and your studied procrastination lend irresistible belief to the statement which has been going around that you do not want to pass any Nicaragua Canal bill during this session of Congress. Why, I ask? Is it on account of the condition of your Treasury? Or is it, forsooth, on account of the railroads?

In my judgment a large majority of the members of this House have been in favor, and are in favor now, of passing some kind of a bill to begin immediate work on the construction of the canal, but on account of the rules of this House and their technical enforcement in this matter you can not get a hearing on the bills, and we can not get a day in the House for their consideration. For one I do not believe the rules are sacred. I know they are not infallible. I would not permit them to restrain me from doing right. Their primary object is to prevent the majority from riding roughshod over the rights of the minority. We are here, however, for a purpose, and the essential thing is to accomplish something, to do something. We should begin at once to build the canal.

There is no time like the present. Every postponement means additional complication. Every day's delay is fraught with positive danger. The canal should have been built by the United States long ago. No other people would have delayed and dallied as we have. Everybody knows this. Everything that happened during the Spanish-American war demonstrates it. The trip of the Oregon around Cape Horn was an object lesson for every man, woman, and child in the country. It proved conclusively the imperative importance to us of a canal across Central America. The recent trip of the Iowa and her companion ships is another object lesson that has arrested the attention of the thoughtful people of our land, and makes the immediate building of this canal an absolute necessity.

The people expect this Congress to pass the Nicaragua Canal bill. They will be disappointed if it does not. They want this Government to construct the Nicaragua Canal, pay for it with its own money, and then to own and control the canal for all time to come. There must be no partnership with England or any other country in the matter.

I favor the bill of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and if I can not get that bill I will favor any other that will start work on the canal. I want to begin. I am opposed to any further delay. If there should be defects in the law, the defects can be remedied by subsequent legislation. Let us do something at once. The people expect and the country demands immediate action. Woe to the men who stand in the way of this great national enterprise!

My mind is so firmly determined in regard to the importance of this great canal project that when the Chair this afternoon ruled the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa out of order, as we all expected him to do, I voted on the appeal from his decision to reverse the Chair. I am glad I did that. It is too bad that the Republicans of this House sustained the Chair in that ruling.

If we had succeeded in getting the Nicaragua Canal amendment on this appropriation bill, it would be sent to the Senate and finally to conference, and from the conference committee no doubt there would have been evolved some bill, some kind of legislation, to begin the immediate construction of the Nicaragua Canal by the Government of the United States. The thing to do is to start it, to inaugurate the great undertaking. Let us begin.

Many of you, no doubt, underestimate how intensely the people feel regarding this great question. We have dallied with it for years and years, and during that time we have appropriated millions and millions of dollars for worthless improvements on brooks and creeks and streams that many of us could jump across. What folly! How unwise and how shortsighted!

The gentlemen here know that, according to the best estimates that have been made by very competent engineers, the Nicaragua Canal can be constructed in less than ten years for less than $100,000,000. To go on with the work at once would only necessitate an expenditure of from five to ten millions of dollars a year. Why, sir, a mere bagatelle to this great country, when we consider the importance of the project and the invaluable benefits to be derived therefrom. No doubt the canal would pay for itself and bring in a splendid revenue to the Government in less than twenty-five years.

The vote here to-day proves, if it proves anything, that the Republican leaders in this House are not in favor of building the Nicaragua Canal—at least not now. If they had been sincere and in earnest, rule or no rule, they would have attached to the sundry civil bill the Nicaragua Canal amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. The people of the country will understand, and they will hold the Republican party responsible for the defeat of the Nicaragua Canal. The Republican party must and will have to assume that tremendous responsibility in the next campaign. It will be a pretty heavy load to carry.

Now, sir, if we do not take action on this matter before this Congress adjourns nothing can be done until the Fifty-sixth Congress assembles next December, and it may be, and probably will be, too late then to do anything. I have no doubt, nevertheless, that many here desire that very thing. I say to the friends of the canal that we must take action now or we will lose the valuable rights which we have at the present time. We must take action now or we may jeopardize the possibility of the Government of the United States ever constructing or ever owning the Nicaragua Canal.

We must take action now or some other country wiser and more farseeing than we, realizing the immense possibilities and the innumerable benefits of a canal across the Isthmus, may step in while we delay and build and own the canal, to our great detriment and disadvantage.

Let me, sir, say in conclusion that every patriot in this House who believes in our Army and our Navy, who believes in our greatness and our destiny, who believes in promoting the safety of our seacoast towns and the integrity of our seaboards, who believes in our commercial supremacy, who believes in our maritime growth, and who believes in our future progress and advancement should stand firm for the building of the Nicaragua Canal, and bend every energy and every effort to secure its immediate accomplishment, even though it should necessitate an extra session of Congress.

We will be derelict in our duty if we adjourn before we take action on this vital question, and no apology will justify our inaction and our dereliction. Let us sink partisanship and stand together as patriots.

Now is the time to do something. Now is the time to act. Build the Nicaragua Canal, I say, and let us begin at once. Build it with the money of the Republic, build it with the brains and the brawn of the Republic, so that the Republic will not only own it and control it, but it will be our achievement and our monument.

I hope we will all be able to reach some conclusion regarding immediate legislation in favor of this great project for an isthmian canal before another week comes and goes. I favor now, as I always have favored, the Nicaragua Canal. If I can not have the bill I want, I will take any bill to start the work. I promise now I will do all in my power for the balance of the session to bring about its realization and its consummation, for the greatness, for the grandeur, for the glory, and for the integrity of the Republic. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the sundry civil bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RETURN OF BILLS TO THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to submit the following requests from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the joint resolution (S. R. 244) making an appropriation of $5,000 for clearing the Potomac River of ice.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1527) for the establishment of a light-house and fog signal at or near Point Arguello, California.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the requests of the Senate will be complied with.

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following change of reference:

Senate bill 5282, granting to the Dakota Southern Railway Company a right of way through Yankton Indian land in the State of South Dakota, from the Committee on the Public Lands to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the transfer will be made.

There was no objection.

RICHARD R. STEEDMAN.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11294) to correct the relative rank of Richard R. Steedman, captain, Eleventh Infantry, United States Army, and pending the reading, I will state that if consent is given I shall move to substitute the Senate bill, which is in exactly the same terms.

Mr. SULZER. What is the bill for?

Mr. MOODY. The bill is reported from the gentleman's committee unanimously. It is not my bill; it is a bill of my colleague, Mr. MCCALL, who is confined to his house by illness. I call it up at his request, and will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] to explain it.

Mr. SULZER. I reserve the right to object.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to correct the relative rank of Richard R. Steedman, captain, Eleventh Infantry, his name shall be placed next below that of Wallis O. Clark, captain, Twelfth Infantry, United States Army.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, this is not a bill to restore anyone to the Army. This captain was ordered before a board for promotion, and before he was examined the last time was ordered to Cuba, and was in the battles around Santiago, and while absent a certain number of men were promoted over him, and this is to restore him to the position he would have been in if he had remained here.

Mr. SULZER. I understand the bill, and it is all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOODY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to substitute the Senate bill 5027, which is identical with the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MOODY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

WORK AT NAVY-YARDS AND NAVAL STATIONS.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 307) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to pay certain laborers, workmen, and mechanics at United States navy-yards and naval stations 50 per cent additional for work performed in excess of eight hours per diem was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BURROWS. A joint resolution in the exact words of the House joint resolution has been reported favorably by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate and is now on the Calendar. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have the House joint resolution considered and the Senate joint resolution indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At this time?

Mr. BURROWS. At this time.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have not read the joint resolution. I should like to know something about the details of it. It applies only to the Navy?

Mr. BURROWS. Just to the navy-yards and naval stations.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to ask one other question about it. It gives 50 per cent additional for overwork?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does that apply to existing contracts? Has the Senator thought that existing contracts ought to be excepted, because there are large establishments in which the men are freely working ten hours, and it would be bankruptcy practically to some concerns?

Mr. HALE. Let it be read, so as to see what the text is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for information, unless there is objection.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay 50 per cent additional for all work in excess of eight hours per diem performed by laborers, workmen, and mechanics whose compensation is fixed upon a basis of eight hours per diem, and who, between March 18, 1898, and October 31, 1898, were employed at any United States navy-yard or naval station, and who worked in excess of eight hours per day and have not already received said additional compensation; the amount due each laborer, workman, and mechanic affected by the above to be based upon the time records of the several bureaus at the navy-yard or naval station where the work was performed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURROWS. The Senator from Connecticut will see that it does not apply to contracts outstanding.

Mr. LODGE. It applies to no contracts, but only to work done in navy-yards.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BURROWS. I move that the joint resolution (S. R. 195) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to pay certain laborers, workmen, and mechanics at United States navy-yards and naval stations 50 per cent additional for work performed in excess of eight hours per diem be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement concerning the naval eight-hour bill. I am informed that it applies only to the naval establishments, and there are no contracts there, of course. It does cover back pay, so to speak, giving the extra 50 per cent for overwork for the past and for the future. Is that the substance of it?

Mr. LODGE. That is the substance of it, as I understand it.

It goes back to the beginning of the war. The men worked for ten, twelve, and sixteen hours a day when the war was on.

Mr. BURROWS. The Secretary of the Navy made an order or a rule covering the future. This covers the gap.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts, as a matter of information, if this measure was sent to the Navy Department, and if it has been recommended favorably by the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. LODGE. I have not the measure in charge. As I understand it, the Secretary of the Navy has made an order regulating this extra time in future.

Mr. SEWELL. On the basis proposed?

Mr. LODGE. On this basis, and this is to fill the gap between March 18, 1898, and the present time.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to pay $250 to Robert G. Proctor for compiling and indexing "Tariff acts passed by the Congress of the United States from 1789 to 1897," as authorized by concurrent resolution, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for the erection of barracks, quarters, gun sheds, and stables for one battery of light artillery at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MONEY submitted an amendment making available the appropriation made by the act of March 3, 1879, to be paid to Robert Otis, administrator de bonis non of the estate of Roger A. Hiern, and the suspension imposed by the joint resolution of July 1, 1879, upon the disbursement of said appropriation, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $175,000 for constructing an addition to the public building at Hartford, Conn., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay from the funds in the Treasury belonging to the Choctaw Nation of Indians outstanding warrants not exceeding in amount the sum of $75,000, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ELKINS (by request) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $34,323 to enable the Public Printer to pay an additional sum of $1.50 per square foot to the owners of lots A, B, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, comprising 22,882 square feet, in square No. 624, for an addition to the Government Printing Office, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and orderd to be printed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $6,000 for salaries and commissions of register and receiver of an additional land district, known as the Peavy land district, in the district of Alaska, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PROMOTION OF OFFICERS.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to furnish to the Senate a statement, giving the name, rank, and pay of each officer promoted in pursuance of the provision in the act of Congress entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the Quartermaster's Department of the Army," approved July 7, 1898, and the rank and pay such officer received prior to his promotion, and also where stationed since January 1, 1899.

The Secretary of War is further directed to furnish like information in regard to each officer promoted in pursuance of the provision in the act of Congress entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the Subsistence Department of the Army," approved July 7, 1898.

JOHN M. PALMER.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 5342) granting a pension to John M. Palmer, and the message requesting a conference on said bill and amendments.

ICE IN POTOMAC RIVER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives; which was read:

Resolved, That the Clerk return to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the joint resolution (S. R. 244) making an appropriation of $5,000 for clearing the Potomac River of ice.

Mr. GALLINGER. As a similar joint resolution has passed both branches of Congress, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT POINT ARGUELLO, CALIFORNIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives; which was read:

Resolved, That the Clerk return to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 1527) for the establishment of a light-house and fog signal at or near Point Arguello, California.

Mr. GALLINGER. As a bill accomplishing the same purpose has passed both Houses at this session, I move that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. HALE. If morning business is concluded——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business appears to be closed.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10403) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks for the present consideration of——

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SEWELL. Will not the Senator from Maine allow me to call up a little appropriation bill, the Military Academy bill, and get it through?

Mr. HALE. Let me get the personnel bill before the Senate, and then of course I will yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL. Now the Senator from Maine yields to me?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask that the pending bill be laid aside informally in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11717) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask that the amendments of the committee be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and that course will be pursued.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Permanent establishment," on page 2, line 1, to reduce the appropriation for pay of cadets from $197,000 to $170,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 3, to reduce the total appropriation for permanent establishment from $224,000 to $197,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 23, after the word

"tactics," to insert "ordnance and gunnery, and practical military engineering;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay of five senior instructors of cavalry, artillery, and infantry tactics, ordnance and gunnery, and practical military engineering (captains), in addition to pay as first lieutenants, not mounted, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 23, after the word "privates," to insert "(infantry);" so as to make the clause read:

One hundred and eleven privates (infantry), $17,316.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 14, after the word "privates," to insert "(cavalry);" so as to make the clause read:

Sixty-one privates (cavalry), $9,516.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 11, to reduce the total appropriation for pay of Military Academy Band, field musicians, general Army service, cavalry detachment, enlisted men on detached service, and extra pay of enlisted men on special duty at the Military Academy, from $64,932.72 to $64,884.90.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 17, to strike out:

Total pay of Military Academy, $343,005.21.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 19, to strike out "For current and ordinary expenses, as follows" and to insert as a subhead "Current and ordinary expenses."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 7, to insert:

For furniture for Young Men's Christian Association room, $405.28.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 9, to insert:

For purchase of two sets of Larned's History, for use of cadets in section rooms, $50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 24, to increase the total appropriation for current and ordinary expenses of the Military Academy from $67,048.80 to $67,503.58.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, after line 16, to insert:

For purchase of five desks for use in office of the adjutant, United States Military Academy, to be immediately available, $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 17, to increase the appropriation for tearing out the old, worn-out, and obsolete style "cold storage" in the cadet mess building and putting in new and modern style cold-storage rooms, plant, etc., from $7,500 to $7,850.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 24, to increase the total appropriation for miscellaneous items and incidental expenses of the Military Academy from $25,985 to $26,535.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 22, to strike out:

Total Military Academy, $426,328.51.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 3, to insert the following subhead: "Buildings and Grounds;" and in line 5, before the word "Repairing," to strike out "Buildings and Grounds, Military Academy;" so as to read:

BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Repairing roads and paths, including roads and bridges on reservation, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 16, to strike out:

Total, including buildings and grounds, $901,817.01.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, there is an increase of over $100,000 in the pending appropriation bill over the act of last year. Of this, $70,000 is for renewing the present library, which is an absolute necessity, and some addition is made to the appropriation for water supply and quarters. The committee have gone into the matter thoroughly, and are satisfied that the amounts allowed by the House are fair. Twenty-five thousand dollars is given for an increase in lighting and furnishing the memorial hall which was donated to the Government by General McCullom, and it being a free gift and having accepted it, the Government should of course put it in good condition.

The are some little increases and reductions which are set forth in the report of the committee accompanying the bill.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. HALE. Now I ask the Senate to proceed with the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10403) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

Mr. HALE. Let the amendments of the committee be acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. I object to the amendments being acted upon until the bill is read through.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. HALE. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs is on page 3, in section 4.

Mr. GORMAN. Does the Senator intend to have the committee amendments gone through with this morning? I supposed we were to have the bill formally read through, and then, at a subsequent time, take up the bill and have the amendments acted on.

Mr. HALE. All that I propose now is that the first amendment to the bill, on page 3, be taken up. I do not propose to have it considered now, because the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] has the Post-Office appropriation bill in charge, which he desires to have considered now; and it is the rule of the Senate to give appropriation bills precedence. I simply desire to have the first amendment read.

Mr. GORMAN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, in section 4, line 12, after the word "Navy," the Committee on Naval Affairs propose to strike out "except watch duty in the engine room;" so as to read:

That engineer officers transferred to the line who are below the rank of commander, and extending down to, but not including, the first engineer who entered the Naval Academy as cadet midshipman, shall perform sea or shore duty, and such duty shall be such as is performed by engineers in the Navy.

Mr. HALE. I can not at present push the passage of the bill further, so I will simply notify the Senate that at the earliest possible time I shall ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the bill. This is a very important measure, and I think a large majority of the Senate desire its passage. After the appropriation bill is out of the way, I shall ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the bill which has just been read.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. QUAY. I now ask, in accordance with the notice I gave yesterday, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 11683, being the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11683) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900? The Chair hears none; and the Chair lays the bill before the Senate.

RENEWAL OF PENSIONS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield to me that I may ask that a message from the House of Representatives be laid before the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the message from the House of Representatives returning to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 5465) authorizing the renewal of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines who served during the war with Spain.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now move that the votes whereby the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is now before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now move to amend the bill by striking from it the proviso, which I ask to have read.

The SECRETARY. In line 7, after the word "discharge," it is proposed to strike out:

Provided, That the application therefor be filed within one year after such date.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to strike out the proviso which has been read.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. PALMER.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] yields to me to make a further motion. During my enforced absence from the Senate by illness the bill pensioning Gen. John M. Palmer came from the House of Representatives amended, and a conference committee was ordered upon the bill and amendment. I desire to move to reconsider the vote whereby the conference was ordered, and, if the vote be reconsidered, I shall ask that the bill be placed before the Senate with a view of accepting the House amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill has probably gone to the House of Representatives.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I will move, Mr. President, that the bill be recalled.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that I think the bill should go to conference. There is such a wide difference of opinion between the House of Representatives and the Senate on this question that I think the bill should be considered by a committee of conference.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well; let the matter go. I do not agree, however, with the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CULLOM. I want to say to the Senator from North Dakota that I am myself very much interested in that bill, as are many of the friends of General Palmer in my own city. After consultation with them, they agree that the bill had better be allowed to go as passed by the House of Representatives, and we want to get it back here for that purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill remain as it is, and the conference committee can dispose of it in another way.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the conference committee can have a meeting during the day and dispose of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is withdrawn.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the Committee on Military Affairs unfortunately finds itself so situated that it is evenly divided, and two reports will be made upon the bill for the reorganization of the Army. In behalf of one division of the committee I report the bill (H. R. 11022) for the reorganization of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, and submit a report thereon.

A few explanatory words. The situation of the country and the extraordinary responsibilities and duties imposed upon the nation are too well understood to need extended exposition or comment, but I beg leave to submit a few remarks, so that the Senate may understand just what is before it.

The treaty with Spain was agreed to by the plenipotentiaries at Paris, December 10, 1898, and it was ratified by the United States Senate, as everyone knows, February 6, 1899. The last article of that treaty provides that—

> The ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington within six months from the date hereof, or earlier, if possible.

That is the language of the treaty. Now, I am informed by the State Department that the Spanish Cortes will be assembled on the 20th of this month. It is not expected that there will be debate or a prolongation of consideration, but a prompt ratification by the Cortes is confidently expected. We may expect, therefore, in about fourteen or fifteen days to have the manuscript of the certification of the ratification in Washington. Nothing can be done on such a subject, of course, by telegraphic dispatch, and the notice may be expected to reach the President, say, March 8 or 9. There will be no reason that I am aware of that would permit him to allow a long or unnecessary consideration. In fact, it is possible that the proclamation of ratification may be made by, say, March 15.

What then would be the situation? There are two acts of Congress pointed out relating to this subject, and the concluding part of one of them, with which you are all very familiar, is the act providing for a temporary increase of the Regular Army, in the concluding section of which it has been provided:

> That at the end of any war in which the United States may become involved the Army shall be reduced to a peace basis by the transfer in the same arm of the service or absorption by promotion or honorable discharge, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may establish, of supernumerary commissioned officers and the honorable discharge or transfer of supernumerary enlisted men; and nothing contained in this act shall be construed as authorizing a permanent increase of the commissioned or enlisted force of the Regular Army beyond that now provided by the law in force prior to the passage of this act, except as to the increase of 25 majors provided for in section 1 hereof.

Therefore it will then be the imperative duty of the President to reduce the Army to 27,000 men.

Public act No. 67, concerning the Volunteer Army, section 4, is in these words:

> SEC. 4. That the Volunteer Army shall be maintained only during the existence of war, or while war is imminent, and shall be raised and organized, as in this act provided, only after Congress has or shall have authorized the President to raise such a force or to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States: Provided, That all enlistments for the Volunteer Army shall be for a term of two years, unless sooner terminated, and that all officers and men composing said army shall be discharged from the service of the United States when the purposes for which they were called into service shall have been accomplished, or on the conclusion of hostilities.

Therefore, allowing a reasonable time for Spain's ratification, the transmission of the certification of the ratification, and some consideration by the President, it may be expected that the proclamation of peace will be made about March 15, though the President need not absolutely make it until six months from December 10; but after both countries have ratified the treaty, I do not see how the President can delay issuing his proclamation for any purpose, patriotic or other. So on March 15 orders must issue for the dismissal of the entire volunteer force of 75,845 men and for the reduction of the regulars from 58,607 to about 27,000, which will then be the total of our Army.

I need not dwell upon the situation nor upon what will be required. The report of the committee when printed will give the statistics in full.

I myself think this the greatest crisis that has come upon the country in a great many years. I do not advocate any particular bill, because my colleagues on the committee will offer one, but in my opinion action is what is imperatively demanded.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, the distinguished and able Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has stated properly the situation of the bill. Five Senators favor and five oppose it. Those of us who oppose the bill have not prepared any full report in the case, so far as furnishing data or anything of that kind, but have agreed simply to make a brief statement of our objections.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTIONS.

The reorganization of the Army of the United States is a most important question and far-reaching in its effects.

When made, it should be done thoroughly and most carefully and deliberately, so as to make it superior in all its arms and parts to any existing military organizations in the world.

This much is due to our institutions and to our soldiers, volunteers and regulars. In all the essential elements of the true soldier they are without superiors or equals, and should have the best possible systems of organization, both for the Regular Army and the Volunteer Army or National Guard in the respective States.

The title of this act is a misnomer, for while it purports to be "An act for the reorganization of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," the only change in the present organization is in section 3, which discontinues the regimental organization of the artillery arm of the United States Army and designates it "the corps of artillery," to comprise two branches, the coast artillery and the field artillery, both of which are practically in existence to-day. And yet it continues the colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, and lieutenants. We hold that there is not sufficient time in the few remaining days of this Fifty-fifth Congress to complete a proper reorganization of the Army as it should be done.

This bill does not even attempt it. Analyzed, it simply increases the number of officers and enlisted men in the present organization and increases the cost of the Army to the taxpayers and toilers.

We are opposed to the unnecessarily large increase of the Regular Army, the standing or permanent military establishment authorized by this bill, which provides for an army of 98,363—officers, professors, and enlisted men—and then says the President in his discretion may enlist a smaller number or reduce the number of enlisted men in a troop of cavalry and a company of infantry, so that the number of officers and enlisted men in the whole Army would be 59,975.

This is a virtual confession that the latter number, 59,975, may be amply sufficient for all purposes. The Constitution provides that "the Congress shall have power" "to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years." This clearly contemplates that the Congress, not the President, shall determine the size or number of officers and men who shall compose the Army, and no one Congress can create an army and determine its number or strength and appropriate money for its maintenance beyond its own constitutional term of two years, and thus bind a subsequent Congress. In this bill Congress abdicates its power and leaves the strength of the Army to the sole discretion of the President. There is no existing necessity and no probable necessity for any such increase in the Regular Army as provided in this bill. It will entail an enormous burden upon the Treasury and the taxpayers, without any possible corresponding benefits to the country.

At this particular time it is practically impossible to determine with certainty the number of officers and men who should compose our Regular Army. The only thing absolutely certain is that the number authorized in this bill is wholly unnecessary.

We have no desire, no disposition, no intention whatever, to withhold from the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, any amount of money or any number of soldiers necessary for all possible contingencies in the future. When the war with Spain was threatening, without a word we gave to the President $50,000,000 to be expended in his discretion in preparation for the emergency—an unprecedented act in our history.

On April 25, 1898, the following law passed by Congress was approved by the President:

[Public—No. 69.]

An act declaring that war exists between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Spain.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That war be, and the same is hereby, declared to exist, and that war has existed since the 21st day of April, A. D. 1898, including said day, between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Spain.

Second. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry this act into effect.

Approved April 25, 1898.

On April 22, 1898, "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," passed by Congress, was approved by the President. On April 26, 1898, the day after the approval of the declaration of war, "An act for the better organization of the line of the Army of the United States," passed by Congress, was approved by the President. This law authorized an increase of the permanent military establishment in time of war to about 62,000 officers and men, and provided:

That at the end of any war in which the United States may become involved the Army shall be reduced to a peace basis by the transfer in the same arm of the service or absorption by promotion or honorable discharge, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may establish, of supernumerary commissioned officers and the honorable discharge or transfer of supernumerary enlisted men; and nothing contained in this act shall be construed as authorizing a permanent increase of the commissioned or enlisted force of the Regular Army beyond that now provided by the law in force prior to the passage of this act, except as to the increase of 25 majors provided for in section 1 hereof.

Approved, April 26, 1898.

This was a plain and unequivocal declaration by Congress, that even in time of war 62,000 men were amply sufficient for the Regular Army, and that when peace was restored, the Regular Army should be reduced gradually to a peace basis. Peace will doubtless be restored very soon by ratification by Spain of the treaty with Spain. It is contended that new complications have arisen and an increased force is absolutely necessary. To fully meet this contention and all possible contingencies and emergencies seen and unseen, we propose the enactment, as an independent measure, of the following provisions for a specified time.

I will read it and have it printed as a separate bill:

A bill to provide for the discharge of volunteers for the war with Spain, and for the continuance of the permanent military establishment on a war footing, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That within —— days—

I leave the number of days blank, because I am not certain as to the exact number that will be required to enable the mustering-out process to be completed. Whatever number it is can be inserted in the blank—from the exchange of the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain, all the officers and enlisted men of the Volunteer Army shall be mustered out of the military service of the United States and discharged: Provided, That enlisted men of the volunteers who desire to remain in the military service, may, if found qualified therefor, be transferred to and enlisted in such batteries, troops, or companies of the permanent military establishment as may be below the maximum strength allowed by law, and when so transferred and enlisted shall be credited on their new enlistment with the periods of service rendered by them respectively as volunteers.

So that all the volunteers who enlisted in the regular service would be considered as a part of the regular service from date of volunteer enlistment and receive the increased pay.

SEC. 2. That the act of Congress entitled "An act for the better organization of the line of the Army of the United States," approved April 26, 1898, be, and the same is hereby, continued in full force and effect until July 1, 1901: Provided, That men who enlisted in the permanent military establishment between the 10th day of May and the 26th day of October, 1898, shall be discharged upon their own application respectively, but nothing herein shall be held or construed to require the discharge of any enlisted man in such permanent military establishment awaiting trial by or under sentence of a court-martial.

Between the 10th day of May and the 26th day of October the volunteers who were taken into the Regular Army were taken in for the war with Spain. They are entitled to their discharge. On the 26th day of October that order was revoked, and those who have been taken in since have all been sworn in for service for three years unless sooner discharged; and if this provision is enacted, then all the soldiers who go in hereafter will simply go in for three years, unless sooner discharged, as they have been all the time. As a matter of course, any law repealing that would discharge them, because it would operate as a discharge; but they were all to be taken in just as they have been, for three years, unless sooner discharged. Now, I come to section 3:

SEC. 3. That the President be, and is hereby, authorized in his discretion to enlist and organize a military force in Cuba and in Porto Rico, and, whenever such conditions exist as in his judgment will justify him, in the islands of the Pacific, to be known and called the army of Cuba, the army of Porto Rico, and the army of the islands of the Pacific, and to be composed of the inhabitants of such islands, respectively, for the purposes of establishing and maintaining peace and order, enforcing laws and regulations, and protecting life and property in such islands, respectively, and not elsewhere, under such rules, regulations, and limitations as he may prescribe in such islands, respectively, as to age, term of service, qualifications, and number of officers and men in each organization.

Such forces in said islands, respectively, shall be organized in companies, battalions, or regiments, and officered as the President may direct, and shall be entitled to such pay and allowances as the President may prescribe in such islands, respectively, not exceeding the rates now allowed by law, to be made and paid from the revenues of such islands, respectively, or from the Treasury of the United States, to be subsequently reimbursed to the United States from such revenues. During the occupancy by the United States of such islands, respectively, the forces of such islands enlisted and organized therein shall be under the control and subject to the orders of the President and the officers assigned to duty by him in such islands, respectively: Provided, That the number of such military forces in all said islands shall not exceed 35,000 enlisted men at any one time and shall not be considered a part of the permanent military establishment of the United States herein authorized: Provided further, That where such military forces shall be enlisted and organized in such islands and have shown such efficiency as in the opinion of the President to be sufficient for all military purposes in such islands, and there is no longer any necessity for the presence of the United States military forces therein, they shall be withdrawn, and the permanent military establishment shall be reduced to a peace footing.

SEC. 4. That the Chief of the Record and Pension Office of the War Department shall hereafter have the rank, pay, and allowances of a brigadier-general, and the President is authorized to appoint an assistant chief of the Record and Pension Office, by selection, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a lieutenant-colonel.

Mr. President, just one word more. This law that we propose to continue in full force and effect continues the military establishment at 62,000, more than the minimum number prescribed in the bill which came from the House. We then give in addition 35,000 from the islands, to be organized by the President in his discretion, to be officered by him, to be under his control absolutely, to be used in those islands for the restoration of peace and for the maintenance of order and for the protection of life and property, and they are to be kept there until such time as in the judgment of the President the United States troops can be safely withdrawn.

Mr. President, we offer here everything on earth that is necessary to meet any contingency that may arise within any reasonable time during the existence of the present Administration and for four months after its term closes. So far as concerns provisions for the maintenance of an army sufficiently large for all purposes, for the organization of forces in the islands for the preservation of peace, the maintenance of order, and the establishment of stable government and protection of life and liberty, it is all in this proposed measure—every bit of it, and we give it cheerfully. We believe we have gone even further than is absolutely necessary, but we want to remove any doubt in respect to provision having been made for the President sufficient to meet any emergency and contingency that may arise until three or four months after his term of service expires.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I thought it was understood between the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] and myself that we would not enter upon any general argument of this question this morning, but that we should confine ourselves to statements sufficient to set forth the situation. Of course, there are many things which the Senator said to which I think I can satisfactorily reply. When I said at the close of my remarks that I was not advocating any particular bill, I really meant that I was not entering into the particulars of the defense of the bill I reported. What I wish to say will come up more appropriately when we shall have the bill before the Senate for discussion, a situation which I shall try to bring about at as early a day as possible.

Mr. BATE. I beg to suggest to the Senators who have this matter in charge, respectively the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Connecticut, that the Senate should order all these bills printed, that we may have the benefit of them at once.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill which I have submitted be printed. I desire to have it to go in as a part of my report, and I ask that what I have stated may be printed not only in the RECORD, but as a separate document, as a statement of five members of the committee. I did not have time to write it all out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

The bill (S. 5516) to provide for the discharge of volunteers for the war with Spain, and for the continuance of the permanent military establishment on a war footing, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEWPORT NEWS, VA.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1964) for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Newport News, Va., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the House amendments numbered 1 and 2, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 3.

FRANCIS E. WARREN,
CHARLES W. FAIRBANKS,
H. D. MONEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
DAVID H. MERCER,
J. H. BANKHEAD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

ANDREW S. EVANS.

Mr. GEAR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3307) to increase the pension of Andrew S. Evans. It will take but a moment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 3, after the word "Interior," to insert "he, and he;" and in line 4, after the word "place," to strike out "upon" and insert "on;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Andrew S. Evans, late of Company C, Twenty-eighth Iowa Infantry Volunteers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

Thirty dollars per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. GEAR. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. This man is in a pitiable condition. He has lost both of his eyes, and it requires two persons to take care of him. He suffers from a cancer. Undoubtedly he will lose his life within six months.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Andrew S. Evans."

STELLA FRIENDS ACADEMY AND CHURCH ASSOCIATION.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6670) setting apart a certain tract of land in Oklahoma Territory to the Stella Friends Academy and Church Association.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not undersand from what committee the bill is reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE].

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Where is the land located which is proposed to be conveyed?

Mr. SULLIVAN. In the Indian Territory.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the lawfully constituted authorities of the United States be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent to the Stella Friends Academy and Church Association, of Woods County, Territory of Oklahoma, to the SE. ¼ of the SE. ¼ of the SE. ¼ of sec. 24, in T. 27 N., of R. 11 W. of the Indian meridian, containing 10 acres, more or less, being a tract of land conveyed by Ernest Howard to said Stella Friends Academy and Church Association by warranty deed dated January 25, 1897.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is not an Indian reservation, then?

Mr. SULLIVAN. It is a mere matter of the gift of 10 acres to a church and school.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The point with me is that the United States Government can not give to a church land belonging to the Indians.

Mr. SULLIVAN. It has been paid for already.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Is the title in the United States?

Mr. SULLIVAN. The patent has not been issued, but the purchaser has complied with the law, except——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The land does not belong to an Indian tribe?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Not at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CODE FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER. For the information of Senators who may be interested in the matter, I desire to give notice that as near the hour of 4.30 o'clock this afternoon as may comport with the convenience of the Senate I shall ask unanimous consent to proceed with the formal reading of the Alaska bill.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that we may now proceed with the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11683) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the committee amendments be disposed of as they are reached in their order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General," on page 3, line 3, to increase the number of mailing clerks, letter distributers, dispatchers, registry clerks, money-order clerks, directory clerks, etc., at $600 each, from 2,537 to 2,539; and in line 12, to increase the total appropriation for mailing clerks, letter distributers, dispatchers, etc., at $600 each, from $1,522,200 to $1,523,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General," on page 4, line 21, to increase the number of chief clerks, stamp clerks, superintendents of registry, etc., at $1,000 each, from 1,407 to 1,410; and on page 5, line 6, to increase the total appropriation for chief clerks, stamp clerks, superintendents of registry, etc., at $1,000 each, from $1,407,000 to $1,410,000.

For temporary clerk hire at summer and winter resort offices, and for holiday and election service, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 8, to increase the total appropriation for "clerk hire in post-offices" from $12,261,900 to $12,398,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Free-delivery service," on page 12, line 5, before the word "rural," to insert "experimental;" so as to make the clause read:

For experimental rural free delivery, including pay of carriers, horse-hire allowance, supplies, and mechanical appliances, $300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 14, before the word "stamps," to strike out "rating, and other" and insert "and rating;" so as to make the clause read:

For postmarking and rating stamps, and repairs to same, and ink and pads for stamping and canceling purposes, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General," on page 13, line 11, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no bid for carrying the mail on a star route for the fiscal year 1900 shall be considered unless the bidder resides on or contiguous to the route on which the service is to be performed, or shall file with his bid an agreement that in the event of the service being awarded to him he will reside on or contiguous to said route and give his personal supervision to the performance of the service: Provided further, That the Postmaster-General may refuse to accept bids which he deems excessive, and readvertise the routes until he can procure the service for a reasonable compensation: Provided further, That no payment for carrying the mail on a star route, under a contract hereafter executed, shall be made unless there shall be on file in the Post-Office Department evidence satisfactory to the Postmaster-General that the contractor resides on or contiguous to the route and personally superintends the performance of the service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 12, after the word "Postmaster-General," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That all railway postal clerks whose duties require them to work six days or more per week fifty-two weeks per year shall be allowed an annual vacation of fifteen days with pay.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 20, to insert:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from New York and Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, $171,238.75: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

For continuing necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton, Kans., $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the amendment?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes, sir; I object to the adoption of the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment, which begins at line 21, page 15, and ends with line 3, on page 16.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, this appropriation in one form or in another has been before Congress repeatedly, and this year for the first time in another legislative department of the Government it was striken out, only to be reinstated, the same old appropriation, in the appropriation bill by the Senate committee.

For years there has not been a Postmaster-General who has not told us in his official report that this appropriation was absolutely useless and worthless, and that identically the same service could be obtained without the appropriation of a single dollar. As was said in another branch of the legislative department, it is the last of our inland subsidies and about the most useless.

But we are asked why the Postmaster-General spends the money if it is permissive only in the bill. The reason of it he gave when he said that he would be a bold Postmaster-General who, when both branches of Congress authorized him to spend money in a specific way upon special railroad mail, did not spend the money that way.

But, Mr. President, there is no sort of a valid claim on the part of anybody that the mails would be facilitated two hours to a single point in the United States by the adoption of this amendment.

There has been a good deal of testimony taken lately on this very subject, and the testimony of the Assistant Postmaster-General is that it is just so much money thrown away. The two amendments may be taken together. The one is for the Southern Railroad. Without a dollar appropriated here he could get the mail carried. The other is a small sum for running an early train from St. Jo west to Newton to oblige a morning paper at St. Jo, I believe, which desires to get out an early edition and have it distributed along through eastern and central Kansas.

But, Mr. President, if this special facility is to be put on those roads by an appropriation, there is no reason in the world why every railroad in the world should not have an identical appropriation for special facilities put on whenever it has got influence enough either in the committees of Congress or upon the floor of either House.

Mr. President, it seems to me that when we are investigating this whole question of railway mail pay and seeking, as all of us are, to try and reduce the service to some logical fair basis that shall be paid for proportionately to the service and without favoritism, it is a poor time for the Senate of the United States to commence by putting back into this bill two appropriations aggregating some $200,000 that benefit nobody. Always when it has come up heretofore Senators from Southern States have spoken of the benefit they get from it, and usually a Senator or two from New England, attracted by the name of New England in the appropriation bill, has told us how much it is needed to further carry the messages of good will between New England and the South. As a matter of fact it does not save the transmission of fifteen minutes to any city between New England and the South, and it is simply an exhibition of the influence which certain railroads have in the Congress of the United States that they are enabled to get this useless appropriation put on year after year in the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that New England is no longer included.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am delighted.

Mr. LODGE. I can not find, however, that our mail service is any worse than it was before.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am obliged to the Senator. There used to be from New England always somebody to speak in favor of it.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. President, I have only one thought that I desire to express. The Senator from Colorado said, as I understood him, that just as good service could be obtained without this appropriation as with it and that this was useless. I heard that from a member of the House some days ago. When I had heard from a number of people throughout the South and Southwest that this special fast mail service was about to be discontinued I was told that the service could be as well had with as without the subsidy. I wondered how that could be true when the competion was so little in that section of the country, and when I had been informed that the road could not perform the service without this extra pay I applied to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and I have here my telegraphic communication to him and his answer.

Mr. MONEY. Give the date.

Mr. SULLIVAN. The date of the communication was day before yesterday. Here is the first one. Instead of having it read from the desk, I will read it:

To SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL, City:

Mr. FLEMING of Georgia tells me you say the same fast railway-mail service South and Southwest can be had without the subsidy as with it. Can this be done? If so, I shall not move to amend appropriation bill and restore subsidy.

W. V. SULLIVAN.

His reply is as follows:

The statement attributed to this office is not quite exact. The Department thinks it can secure substantially as good mail service to the South and Southwest and more satisfactory service throughout the country without the fast mail subsidy as with it. It does not say it can secure precisely the same schedule as now exists, but it believes that better service in general can be secured from all roads if the subsidy is given to no one.

I again came back asking along the same line simply to see whether or not the appropriation could be dispensed with in any section of the country where the competition is small and where we have very few mails and where every city along the whole line is interested; where all the people are very anxious about the matter.

If you are sure—

I telegraphed him again—

If you are sure you can get as speedy and certain mail service South, where little competition prevails, without as with the subsidy, all right. If it is only conjecture, then I wish to offer amendment. Other sections have largely more competition and this particular section is the one now I wish to aid. If the service will be secured as prompt and frequent without as with subsidy, I shall not move amendment, and your answer will determine that question.

W. V. SULLIVAN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator will withhold a single moment while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1575) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce."

Mr. CULLOM. I am willing that the unfinished business shall be temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside, and the Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. SULLIVAN. The reply to that, on the direct point as to whether just as good service could be had without as with this aid, is as follows:

I regret to say that I can not give a specific answer as to what we will be able to do. It is an open question.

Signed, Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Thus it appears that without this appropriation we can not have the fast railway mail service that every other section of the country does enjoy except ours, and which every other one will enjoy except ours without this subsidy.

The statement that has been made here is therefore made without full knowledge on this subject. I have taken pains to investigate and to find out and to know that without this subsidy we can not get this service; and every other section of the country has the same service that we now ask.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, spoke rather hastily a while since when he mentioned the fact that the railroads seemed to have such control over Congress that they could get into each appropriation bill for the post-office service this particular item.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I did not mean to make any suggestion of impropriety. I meant by its ability to convince the members of the importance of it. The Senator understood me, of course.

Mr. MONEY. I understood the Senator. I did not suppose that he reflected upon anybody. But, nevertheless, I am taking his language as he used it, that these railroad companies seemed to have influence in both Houses of Congress. I do not think his statement is absolutely just. As a matter of fact, I am one of those who favor this amendment, not because I am a friend of the railroads, but because I have numberless letters from cities and from business firms, from chambers of commerce, and everything else from here to New Orleans, asking me to stand by the appropriation.

Now, I want to say that I am a little more familiar, perhaps, with this particular subject-matter than a great many others who are here before me. When I was chairman of the Post-Office Committee of the House, about twenty years ago, in conjunction with the Post-Office Department, I began to see what could be done to institute fast mails over the whole of the United States or to improve the facilities on the trunk lines, as they are called. I myself, and the Department also, engaged in a large correspondence, and I recollect very distinctly that the great transcontinental lines of road pointedly refused to take the proposed extra pay, the extra allowance, because they said they could not afford to do it, and the only line on which it was put into operation was one that did originally run from Boston to Tampa.

A very curious thing happened there. We wanted to get the mail to Havana and there was no authority on the part of the Postmaster-General to make a contract, except for sea postage, with any steamer. I put in the bill a provision that placed Havana, as far as transportation was concerned, within the domestic commerce, so that the Postmaster-General was enabled to make a contract with the Plant system of railroads, which built the steamers which are yet plying, the Mascot and the Olivette, to carry that service.

This same subsidy, as you term it—the bill does not call it that; it calls it extra facilities for fast mail on trunk lines—this same service was enjoyed for a great many years by the Seaboard Air Line. I believe that is the name of it, or is it the Seacoast Air Line.

Mr. BACON. The Seaboard.

Mr. MONEY. The Seaboard Air Line to Tampa. In the meanwhile, however, I had a table prepared by a very competent statistician to show that the mail should be carried on the line to New Orleans just as on the line to Tampa, and the showing seemed to me to be quite sufficient to divert the extra pay to what is now the Southern line. It was not so called then. But, however, the Seaboard Air Line itself declined to take this same extra allowance, because they said they could not afford to make the schedule required by the Department. That is why they lost it. It is because they declined any further to carry it, and they gave the reason for it. Then an application was made to put it upon what is now called the Southern line, and it was transferred to that line.

The Post-Office Department do not say, in the telegram which my colleague has read, that they will give us the same mail facilities that they do with this extra allowance, and I for one do not believe that they can get it. I am perfectly satisfied that the lines will not give it. They have now two fast mails from here to Atlanta, and that is continued on another line from there to New Orleans. The expedition of this service extends very much beyond the terminus. It extends all through the State of Texas and to the whole West, because being facilitated one-half the way from New York, the great commercial center, to distant capitals of the country, it carries it to New Orleans and from there to the whole West, and it is expedited that much.

The Senator from Colorado, being a business man, ought to know what value time is in business letters, especially in time drafts. I recollect very distinctly that in the correspondence a while ago alluded to a banker in Denver wrote a letter to me in which he stated that the saving on time drafts from New York to Denver was very much more than would pay for the extra allowance for fast mail. However, the transcontinental roads decline what I considered the liberal offer that we were willing to make them, and therefore they never got it.

It may be that the Post-Office Department feel satisfied that they can give a certain facility of mails to the Southern country, but we do not think that is enough. We want what we have today; and while we shall not insist upon anything like an undue proportion of expenditure for the South, yet it is a fact that we do not have the frequent mails in that section, as you all know, not because of any sectional matter, but simply because our country is more sparsely settled and has not cities of such size and so closely contiguous as in the North.

Nevertheless, I hope that this amendment fixed by the committee will remain in the bill for the reason I have stated; and I feel quite sure that if it is stricken out, when the next bill is passed there will be a pressure brought to bear here from citizens of the South that will compel at least the Southern members to vote for such a provision. It is the people who are asking for this appropriation. I have no doubt there are railroads that would like to have it, but I am not speaking of them. I presume they would like to have it, as they have accepted it, but it was rejected by the Seaboard Air Line. You will observe that the Postmaster-General takes the liberty of fixing these schedules and the time allowed, and if the railroads were not compelled by the regulations of the Department they would not give the time that is required for the fast mail.

I hope that the amendment will remain in the bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, what has been said by the Senators from Mississippi will make it unnecessary for me to repeat some things which I otherwise myself would have said. I desire, however, to present to the Senate the consideration that this is a most important matter to the business of a very wide extent of our country. All the business communities of the territory south of this city are vitally interested in the retention of this item in the bill.

It is a fact that it was stricken out in the House of Representatives, but I have looked a little into the circumstances under which it was done, and if Senators will refer to the RECORD they will find that it was done on an exceedingly scant vote in the House. It was done when it was well understood that it was not a final action, and it was done when in view of the smallness of the vote it did not reflect, I am quite sure, the sentiment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not understand the Senator. How does he mean that the vote of the House did not represent its final action?

Mr. BACON. I mean simply that it was well understood in the House that there would be further action in the Senate.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is the Senator of opinion that votes were cast in the House with the understanding that the bill would be changed when it got here?

Mr. BACON. I am not.

Mr. WOLCOTT. What is the Senator's understanding?

Mr. BACON. Simply that it was a very small vote, as is shown by the RECORD, and that the effort which otherwise would have been made was not made to correct it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In other words, that the friends of this measure reserved their efforts for the Senate. Is that the Senator's opinion?

Mr. BACON. No; I do not mean that they reserved their efforts. I mean that there were a great many absent, and that there was not the same effort made in the way of reconsideration or otherwise which would have been made if that had been known to be the final stage of the proceedings. I mean only that and nothing more.

Now, Mr. President, the fast mail taken up at this city, as was stated by the Senator from Mississippi, reaches the South all along the territory bordering on the seacoast, reaching away down into Florida, and it is taken up after it reaches Florida and carried to Cuba. It reaches also through a line running more into the interior, the central parts of Virginia, North Carolina, and the western part of South Carolina, through Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas. While these are the main lines, from these lines are radiating other lines which reach every town, village, and hamlet in all of those States.

Mr. President, Senators who live in the North and West do not appreciate the difficulties in a business relation which are encountered in sparsely settled communities, because all of those States are comparatively sparsely settled. What is the consequence of that fact? The consequence is that it is impossible for the railroads in their ordinary business to run the number of trains or the character of trains which can be afforded by railroads running through thickly settled communities and thickly settled States.

I understand the suggestion comes from the Post-Office Department that as good service can be gotten without this extra compensation. Upon what is that statement based? Is it based upon the experience of the Department before they had this extra compensation? If so, the conclusion is not justified, because before we had this extra compensation we did not have the fast mails, and it is only since we have had the extra compensation that we have had the fast mails.

In almost all the important business communities in my section there have been meetings by the business men earnestly urging that these mail facilities should be continued. I will give to the Senate a little illustration of what would be the difference in the way of business if the fast mails are not continued. Take the immediate section in which I live, the State of Georgia. The mail leaves New York City this morning early, and the New York mail, with the New York papers, will reach Atlanta at 5 o'clock to-morrow morning. In the absence of this extra compensation, if we had to return to the condition of affairs which existed prior to this compensation, that mail would not reach the city of Atlanta until the afternoon. The consequence would be not simply the loss of twelve hours, but practically the loss of twenty-four hours to the entire business community not alone of Atlanta but of all the various cities and towns which are reached by roads radiating not only from that particular town but from the various towns upon the main line upon which this fast mail is carried.

So I say, Mr. President, the suggestion of the Postmaster-General contains nothing, unless he has given the committee some information which we have not heretofore had, upon which to base the contention that the same mail facilities can be had without it. There is nothing in the experience of the past to justify such a statement, and if there is any truth in the statements of these railroad companies, we certainly will not have this fast mail unless the extra compensation is continued.

Mr. President, Senators may say that this is an invidious distinction in favor of a particular section, but if that argument were allowed to prevail in all the appropriations of money, there would be a great many which would be here attacked; there would be a great many of them overthrown if that contention were a good one. It is not simply in the matter of fast mails in which the Government extends its advantages to the different sections and States, but it is in the various sums which it appropriates for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the erection of public buildings, and everything of that kind.

It seems to me the only question properly to be determined is whether or not this is a great public consideration which demands and justifies an expenditure on the part of the Government in order that the interests which are involved may be properly maintained.

I desire to say, in all plainness and emphasis, that the unanimous testimony from the communities of four or five or six, I believe seven, different States is to the effect that to take out this extra compensation would be to strike a most serious and damaging and embarrassing blow at the business interests of all these various communities in this wide extent of territory.

I do hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will not strike this provision from the bill. This amendment comes from the committee. It is not an amendment offered by any Senator on this floor, but it is an amendment put in the bill voluntarily by the committee, in recognition of the fact that it is a proper amendment and should constitute an integral part of this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I have always voted for these Southern fast-mail subsidies, as they are called. I have also been in favor of the special expenditures which have been made to secure fast mail service for the West and across the continent. I shall vote at this time for this appropriation, believing that under the circumstances it ought to be continued for the current year. I am not, however, entirely certain that this system of expediting the mails by special payments ought to be much longer continued.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] asks, What is the theory of the Post-Office Department which leads that Department to conclude that these special appropriations are no longer necessary? Their theory, as stated by the Assistant Postmaster-General before the Postal Commission, is that they can hereafter, by competition among the various railroads, secure a sufficiently rapid transportation of the mails to make this extra stimulus unnecessary. They admit that it has operated well in the past and that under the influence of this authority to make special contracts the mail service has been vastly expedited in its rapidity. They make no criticism, as I understand, upon the vast expenditures which have been made in accordance with the judgment of Congress, but they say that hereafter by competition they can secure sufficiently fast service.

Mr. President, I believe they do that now as between Chicago and Omaha for the mail that goes through Colorado, the mountain States, and on to the Pacific coast. They secure an exceedingly rapid service from Chicago to Omaha. How do they do it? They do it by placing nearly all the mail upon one route—the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy. There are I do not know how many good railroad lines running between Chicago and Omaha, but probably four or five—five, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] says. Instead of dividing the mail between all these routes, they concentrate it all upon the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy. They require that road to furnish the best cars, the most fleet locomotives, the most ample accommodations, and to carry the mail with lightning-like rapidity from Chicago to Omaha. I do not suppose there is a better service in the whole world than over that route.

Mr. President, there is in this bill no special appropriation for expediting this Western service, but the same result is reached by concentrating nearly all the mail and nearly all the mail pay upon this one route, so that they can get fast service. I am very glad that the Post-Office Department is able to get this extremely rapid service eastward and westward by this concentration of the mail and the concentration of the expenditure, and whenever the same condition of things is reached with reference to the mail which is now expedited, not from New England, Mr. President, as the Senator from Colorado suggests, but from New York, through Washington, on down through Virginia and North Carolina to Atlanta, and then on to New Orleans, when the Department can by a similar plan which they have adopted with reference to the fast Western mail service secure a service as speedy as that which now exists going to the South, or a speedier service than now exists, then I shall be in favor of discontinuing these special appropriations, and not until then.

Mr. BACON. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the difficulty there would be in carrying out the suggestion he has made in this particular case, without depriving a very large extent of territory of the advantages of their mail. For instance, take New Orleans as the objective point—from New York to New Orleans. Of course, there are more railroad lines than one by which the mail could be carried from New York to New Orleans. It could be carried around through the West from Memphis down South, and from there through Mississippi and Louisiana to New Orleans.

By concentrating the mail or the fast service, as the Senator suggests, upon that line we would get the mail to New Orleans probably quite as rapidly as by the present system, but it would leave out altogether the advantages of this fast mail service to the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, to say nothing of Florida and the Cuban mails. So the concentration upon one particular line would not effect the purpose. On the other hand, if the mail should be concentrated on the line which runs through Atlanta, it would serve only a particular section of the country and would leave out all the line of territory upon the seaboard reaching down to Florida.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not understand that it is the object of the Department to get an exceedingly rapid mail through Atlanta on down through the rest of Georgia and on to Florida. The theory of this rapid mail service is that it shall go from New York—incidentally accommodating New England—on down to New Orleans, then down to Texas, and I suppose through to Mexico, if the mails go by that route.

Mr. BACON. I think I might safely say that if New Orleans is the objective point, if that is the only city to be considered, if they ignore the business of the intervening territory, it would ignore four-fifths of the business which is transacted by the fast mail.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am speaking on the Senator's side——

Mr. BACON. I understand that.

Mr. CHANDLER. And I do not like to have him criticise me so much. [Laughter.] I call the attention of the Senator, however, to the fact that he must comprehend, even if he does live at Macon, that the object of these large special appropriations is to carry the mail rapidly over, so to speak, transcontinental lines, and while those trains do accommodate the communities along the lines, they do not reach out to the north and the south and the east and the west to all the other points that would be benefited if the fast mail was expedited clear to their homes. That is the purpose of it.

So, as we send the mail from New York with rapidity to Chicago without extra compensation, send it with great rapidity from Chicago to Omaha by concentration, and get a through mail across this continent by this means, the effort in connection with this other line is to start a mail from New York, adjacent to New England, and carry the mail by the routes I have spoken of on to New Orleans, on to Galveston, and on to Mexico. Incidentally the country to the right and the left gets the benefit of this mail service, even the Senator's own home. But it is not the object of the Department nor of Congress to expedite by these special payments the mail everywhere. It is only the through routes. Now, will the Senator not concede that I am right in the statement of the object of the Department?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, that being so, I am in favor of continuing this special Southern service until it can be demonstrated that by the concentration of mails between New York and New Orleans upon some special route the same fast service can be obtained that is now obtained between Chicago and Omaha. When that is done, I then shall be in favor, with the chairman of the Post-Offices and Post-Roads Committee, of putting an end to this kind of expenditure.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] knows that this subject is under investigation by the Postal Commission, of which he is a learned, honored, and energetic member, and the testimony before that commission is contradictory. It is not all one way. It may have convinced the Senator from Colorado that the time has come to discontinue this fast mail service, but it has not so convinced me.

It has not, I will say—and there is something in that—convinced the people of the Southern States who are benefited by this service. They are not convinced that the Department, by the concentration of mails and by competition between these various roads, can furnish as expeditious a transportation of the mails without a special appropriation as that which they obtain by the aid of this special appropriation.

Mr. President, I am not convinced of it. Possibly, after the Postal Commission, which has this whole subject under consideration, is able to make its report, all these special subsidies will be wiped out, but we have not yet been able to make so much progress that we can reduce the $30,000,000 appropriation that is paid to the railroads for carrying the mails or the $4,000,000 which is paid to the railroads for the use of the postal cars. I do not understand that the Committee on Appropriations has proposed any reduction whatever in the $30,000,000 or in the $4,000,000.

With all due deference to the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, who is also the chairman of the Postal Commission, I am in favor of making all these reforms that we are going to make, accomplishing all these economies that we are sure to accomplish when that commission makes its report—and as a member of the commission, I hope to take a humble part in bringing about economy as the result of that investigation. I am in favor of making them all at once, but not now, as at present advised. Having always voted in favor of these special mail facilities hitherto, I am not in favor to-day here and now of selecting this particular appropriation and wiping it out simply because in the judgment of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General he can secure sufficiently fast mail service without the aid of this special appropriation. I think there is great doubt whether he can do it; and so long as that doubt remains in my mind I shall vote for the special appropriation.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have been voting for these appropriations for a number of years, in fact ever since the plan was first inaugurated, and I never have had occasion to regret any vote I have given in favor of this special mail service appropriation, because my conduct in that respect has been approved by a great many people in the South—particularly, of course, by those of my own State, but in the South generally—not by the railroads, but by people interested in all kinds of business. They are deeply concerned about it; they feel that they are to be cut off from these privileges if this appropriation is stopped, of which they have enjoyed the advantage and which have really become a necessity to them in the transaction of their commercial affairs.

But a new factor has come into this subject, according to my conception, which I think the chairman of the Postal Commission will have to deal with, and I hope he will deal with it in a very spirited way when the subject is investigated and comes fairly before the commission, and that is our new relations with the island of Cuba. It seems to me if there is any one matter that is more needed now than another in the United States it is to have speedy communication between Washington City, to say the least of it, and Havana by railroad trains.

We can not expect the railroad companies to move up their trains at a large loss and a large expense to them, or speed at a very rapid rate unless they get some compensation for it. There is not enough business in the way of passenger traffic in the country to justify the railroads in running very speedy trains, because the population of the country is not so very thick, and more particularly for the reason stated here to-day, that there is no actual competition between most of these points. The line which has been hitherto subsidized in this way is a short line, and would naturally take the mail and the travel along with it; but these lines are not under our control, and competition is not strong enough in the South to enable us to force one railroad into competition with another, so as to secure a speedier movement of the trains.

So we must resort to this expedient, at least for a while, for the purpose of getting this service; but I think we shall hereafter, at least for a year or two or three years, be compelled to facilitate mail communication with Havana very greatly. Perhaps we are not doing enough in this bill in that direction. Certainly we can not afford now to have a slow mail between Havana and either Washington City or New York; and if you strike down this appropriation, the Government will be at the mercy of these railroads, and so will everybody else. They can lower their rates of travel to such an extent as to make communication very slow between these points. I think we had better take that into consideration while we are looking at this subject.

It strikes me now that that is the best reason I have ever heard. It certainly is the best one ever addressed to my mind for voting for this rather peculiar subsidy; but there are other places and other railroads also that are virtually subsidized. Whether it is done in the body of the act and by some distinctive appropriation or not makes no difference. The people of Alabama, for instance, and of the South generally, pay their equal portion of taxes upon their commerce and in the way of internal revenue and otherwise for the purpose of paying the debt made in transmitting the mail across this continent. I suppose if you take the actual cost of transmitting a letter from New York to San Francisco it will amount to a quarter of a dollar, but we must make up this contribution from the general taxation of the country, so that those people can get their mail at the same rate of postage we do and with the same degree of speed also. It is a matter of enormous concern to all the business interests of the United States that that should be the case.

When we come in and submit to taxation and pay our quota of the deficit that is caused by these irregularities of the ground over which we carry the mail, the distances through desolate countries, I think no complaint ought to be made about it if we insist upon this small sum for the purpose of enabling us to get from the railroads something like rapid transit for our mails.

So there is no injustice in it. It is not taking up the railroad companies and giving them extra money for doing what they otherwise would do, for otherwise they will not do it, and that is all about it. The service would drop back so that we would not get the benefit of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, as a general proposition, I am opposed to subsidies of any and all kinds. But there are to my mind special reasons why this one may be an exception, and therefore two years ago, and I believe last year, when we had the appropriation bill for the Post-Office Department before the Senate, I voted for the subsidy for the Southern mail, and I do not know but that I had a few remarks to make upon the subject.

The matter has been very fully presented to the Senate; but there is one phase of it which has not been presented. The fast mail over the Southern Railway, running from Washington to New Orleans, goes through Charlotte, then through the northern part of South Carolina on to Atlanta. At Charlotte there is a prong of the Southern road which runs to Columbia and Augusta. On that branch road they run two fast mail trains in connection with this through train from here to New Orleans; and by reason of this fast mail from Washington, or from New York on through, I, at my home 550 miles from here, can get the New York papers the morning after they are published.

As one reason which influences me to vote for this subsidy, I will state that to my personal knowledge I have seen that fast mail train during the summer months, when travel slackens, pass Trenton, my home, with a mail coach, a first and second class passenger coach, and a sleeper, with no more than three passengers on the whole train. Undoubtedly but for the mail that train could not run. You might say, the stem reaching clear from here to New Orleans, like the main nerve down the backbone of a man, branching off at every town where there is a branch railroad, picking up the mail and sending it out, it benefits the people of probably ten, certainly eight States.

There are things in this Post-Office appropriation bill which I know are iniquitous and outrageous. We are paying, as I understand it, the same rates for carrying the mails by the railroads that we paid twenty years ago, when everything else was two or three times as costly as it is now, and yet we hold to the rate per pound that then existed.

The Postal Commission, which has this matter in charge and is investigating this whole subject, will no doubt give us the reasons why that has existed or why it should be abolished; but pending that report, which will come in some time, I shall vote for this subsidy on the principle that it is a very small thing, and it is the only thing in the bill that goes south.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. MONEY. Permit me one word, Mr. President. I am reminded that the honorable Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] thought perhaps it would be difficult for an executive officer to refuse to spend money appropriated by Congress. That, however, has not been my experience. I recollect very well that there were two river and harbor bills under which there was never a cent paid out, and I recollect how, in the Forty-eighth Congress, the sum of $450,000 was appropriated for the purpose of enabling the Postmaster-General to make contracts with steamship lines to carry the mail to foreign ports, and I recollect the Postmaster-General never did spend a cent of that money. I find that the Departments are quite willing to withhold an expenditure when they do not think it is proper, and are willing to take all the responsibility which can accrue from such action. I do not think there will be any trouble on that score.

But I want to say now, for the purpose of disabusing the mind of the Senate upon one point, that the people of the South who are asking for this appropriation—at the same time the railroads want it, as a matter of course—want it because it happens to help them. One railroad line rejected it after enjoying it for several years, because it did not pay that line to continue the service; but we have no assurance, nor has the Post-Office Department any assurance, that this expedited mail will continue a single week or a day after this extra pay shall be withdrawn.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I regret I was not in the Chamber when the Senator in charge of the bill made his remarks. I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], if he will give me his attention, whether the Postmaster-General approves of this appropriation or not? Does he or not say that he can get along without it?

Mr. WOLCOTT. He says he can get along a great deal better without it; that it not only does not facilitate the mail service, but has a distinctly disastrous and unfortunate effect upon every other railroad having lines running between New York and New Orleans.

Mr. BATE. Then, for that reason, if for no other, I should feel disposed to vote against the amendment.

It would be gratifying to me to be able to comply with the request of some of my constituents, especially organized boards of trade, chambers of commerce, cotton exchanges, etc., that have petitioned my colleague and myself to vote for this identical appropriation, but I regard it as a subsidy, and can not consistently do so. I am not in the habit of voting for subsidies, and I can not consistently vote for this proposition. Indeed, Mr. President, I have heretofore voted against this same proposition and propose to do so again, and I do it upon principle. I should like to gratify those constituents who ask my support for it, but I can not do it in this instance at the expense of principle.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BATE. Certainly.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I want to state that the telegrams which I read here in my remarks a while ago distinctly show that one of the strong points against the contention of the Post-Office Department was that this service can not be had, as confessed by the Department itself, without this subsidy, nor anything as good, and that this fast service would be lost to our people without it.

Mr. BATE. I think, Mr. President, that any subsidization given ought to be given to the weaker roads, and not to the strong and powerful ones who need no such aid.

I am informed by the Senator from Colorado that the Postmaster-General says he can get along better without this appropriation than with it, and in that view of it I feel it to be my duty to give due weight to his opinion. He is at the head of the Post-Office Department. He manages all the machinery of his Department, and he understands its minutiæ. He knows when the mails go and come, how much they cost, and how much they ought to cost; and if he does not, who does? We ought to be guided, to some extent at least, by his opinion, and he says he can do without this appropriation.

I am sorry that I did not have the pleasure of hearing what was said by my friend the Senator from Mississippi in this regard.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Will the Senator permit me now?

Mr. BATE. Yes.

Mr. SULLIVAN. When I applied to the Postmaster-General about this particular matter, he referred me to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General as being specially in charge of it, he having charge of that branch of the mail service, and the Postmaster-General himself having no knowledge whatever on the subject. When I went to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, that is the information I got. It is direct. It is explicit. There is not a matter of doubt about what he does say.

Mr. BATE. Furthermore, Mr. President, this appropriation makes an invidious distinction, and I do not believe in that. If we are going to give subsidies at all, let us give them all around; let each road have a chance. It is said this benefits the South. I am a Southern man. It does go through a part of the territory which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. Nevertheless, from my standpoint, it is in violation of a principle by which I am guided in such matters. I look upon it as a subsidy, and I see no difference in voting for a subsidy of this kind and in voting for one to a steamship line, a factory, or anything else.

I was a little amused at the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] and his argument in regard to this contention. It has been but three or four days since I heard the Senator from New Hampshire make a strong and to me an exceedingly interesting argument in this Chamber against monopolies. Yet the whole purport and force of his argument now in this behalf is to give to one road all the bonus, to make a monopoly of this one by uniting, as in the one from Chicago to Omaha, all the contributions for this service. I do not think it is consistent with the course he has taken heretofore. I repeat, I have recently listened to him twice upon this floor with a great deal of interest, and I heard his speech touching monopolies the other day. It seems to me he is now going back on that conviction of his. I am sorry to part company with him in so good a cause.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Tennessee tolerate an interruption?

Mr. BATE. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not regard the question of the concentration of the mails upon one of two or three particular lines, in order to get rapid service, to be exactly the creation of a monopoly. The Senator may call it such if he pleases. What I want to call his attention to is that the term "subsidy" as applied to these payments is not a correct word, if the word is used in any offensive or opprobrious sense.

These railroads all get a certain amount of pay, and this clause in the bill simply authorizes the Postmaster-General to increase that pay over particular routes. A subsidy is something that is given for no service. A subsidy that is subject to criticism, and to which the Senator's anathemas are so often directed, is something that is paid for no particular thing, but just to stimulate the business.

In this case, although these appropriations are sometimes called subsidies, the fact is, it is nothing more than an authority to the Postmaster-General to increase the compensation for fast service over particular lines. I beg to assure my friend the Senator from Tennessee that while I stand just as strongly as ever with him in opposition to wicked and horrid monopoly, this is not a subsidy or a monopoly in any such offensive sense as he and I mutually understand the word.

Mr. BATE. It may not be in that offensive sense, Mr. President, but all the same it is subsidy.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. Right along the same line.

Mr. BATE. I am along the same line myself, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the language of the amendment. It says for "necessary and special facilities." In other words, under the ordinary contract the trains would run just as it best suited the railroads to run them, but under this language they will run according to a schedule fixed by the Post-Office Department. Secondly, it is "on trunk lines" and not a trunk line. Therefore there is no limitation as to the line which the Postmaster-General may select. It says no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph "shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary."

Mr. BATE. The Postmaster-General says emphatically that he does not deem it necessary. Now, the Congress proposes to give this sum additional to what the Postmaster-General says is necessary, and if that is not a subsidy, I do not know what a subsidy is. It is in the strictest sense a subsidy, and it can not be considered anything else.

Here is a contract made by the Postmaster-General, under the authority of law, with these transportation companies, for the transportation of mail over these mail routes. After they are compensated and get all that has been agreed to be paid them by the Government, and they accept it for that particular service, they—these contractors—come along and want an additional amount paid them, not necessary at all; not a part of the original contract in which they agreed to carry it for that amount to the points named. Having agreed to do so, all that the Government gives beyond that is a subsidiary amount.

Yes; I insist that all given beyond that is a subsidy, and it can not be called anything else. If you subsidize one, why not another? Let us have equality and justice about these gratuities. Although this line in question runs through my country, and I should like to see it reap the benefit of this, and I should also like to comply with the requests of some of my constituents who favor it, yet I can not give my vote for that which I regard as a subsidy; and if this is not a subsidy, I do not know what a subsidy is.

I did not seek, Mr. President, to interfere with this matter, except to give my views about it, for I made no motion touching it. I think, according to the statement made by the Postmaster-General, that the mail is not facilitated or will not be by the use of this additional amount of money, $171,000, in this instance. This amendment should be left as it came from the House.

The railroads which transport this mail are anxious to get this fund. It puts something in their pockets, it is true, but there are other inducements outside this which cause them to run their trains rapidly and to deliver the mail promptly. It is the spirit of competition in passenger travel and in the transportation of freight. That is the strong inducement. That is the spur behind which moves them to a rapid stride. This is merely a gratuity given them for the purpose, as they say, to facilitate the mail, while, in fact, the Postmaster-General tells us it does not facilitate it one hour.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish to fortify what the Senator from Tennessee has just said by a statement which he may desire to have inserted in his remarks. Lest somebody might gather the impression that this is to help out the Southern Railroad—which gets most of the money for this service—from a position which is grossly unfair to it, it may interest the Senator to know that the Southern Railroad draws from the Government of the United States for the transportation of the mail more than $1,000,000.

Mr. BATE. This same route?

Mr. WOLCOTT. This same road.

Mr. MONEY. How many thousand miles of road does this company operate?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not know.

Mr. BATE. That is immaterial. They get that much, and it is satisfactory to them, and having estimated what it will cost them and what they will deliver the mail for they have agreed to deliver it for this amount. They are apt to look to their own interests, and having agreed to it I want to hold them to the bargain and not give them unnecessarily an additional amount out of the taxes of the people.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, representing a part of the State of Georgia, I desire merely to corroborate fully what my colleague has said in regard to this appropriation. I am not here for the purpose of speaking in behalf of any railroad, but simply to say a few words in behalf of the business interests of my State. A similar appropriation has existed for about six years, and previous to that time the mail leaving New York in the morning would not reach Atlanta until the next night. Now mail leaving New York in the morning will reach the city of Atlanta at 5 o'clock the next morning. Consequently if this fast mail service is taken off we will lose virtually about twenty or twenty-four hours. A similar appropriation has been in existence for about six years and has given entire satisfaction to the business interests of my section of the country.

Now, I desire to state that a similar appropriation has been considered heretofore by both branches of Congress—by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in the House and by the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate—and has always received favorable consideration. The appropriation now pending here received favorable consideration before the House committee; it has received favorable consideration before the Appropriations Committee in the Senate; and I feel to-day that if this is to be stricken down, serious damage will be done to my section of the country.

I do not regard it as a subsidy. I generally agree with my friend the Senator from the great State of Tennessee [Mr. BATE], but this is simply to enable this railroad to put on its line a fast train which will reach the different sections of our country and deliver the mail promptly. If the appropriation is defeated in this instance, it simply means that this fast train will be taken off and hereafter our mail will be delivered from twenty to twenty-four hours later. I feel to-day that to strike it down would be striking a serious blow at the business interests of my own section. In voting for the amendment, I simply vote to pay a railroad to provide fast mail facilities for the benefit of my section of the country, and in casting my vote in favor of it, I do not feel that I am simply casting a vote in favor of establishing a monopoly. I sincerely hope the amendment will not be stricken down.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be retained. This will be the last Post-Office appropriation bill which will come before the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. In the next Congress the Post-Office appropriation bill will go to the committee of which the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] is the chairman, and they will then have entire jurisdiction and ample time for the investigation of this question in all its bearings. These appropriations have heretofore been made. This is only a continuation of what now exists and has heretofore existed, and I hope it will be retained until the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, who claim that they are thoroughly informed in this matter, may have ample time to consider it. The question of the compensation of the railroads of the country for carrying the mails is a very abstruse one. It is exceedingly difficult to comprehend it in all its relations and bearings. A great deal of evidence has been taken and investigations have been made, but Congress has not yet had the time and the opportunity of sifting those reports and investigations and coming to a satisfactory conclusion.

I know that the word "subsidy" is not attractive, particularly to my good friend the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], but in the pending bill, just above this item, is an appropriation of $5,025,000 for inland mail transportation, for star-route service. Now, a star route is established from one point to another, say 30 miles distant. It is advertised that the mail is to be carried twice a week, and the lowest bidder gets the contract. Then the business interests along the route demand that the mail service shall be increased to three times a week; it is accordingly done, and the contractor under his bond has to carry it. He gets increased pay for it, for expediting—what my good friend the Senator from Tennessee would call a subsidy.

Mr. BATE. Will the Senator from Missouri pardon me for a moment? I would say that is a change of contract, a new contract altogether. That is what it is.

Mr. COCKRELL. We will see about that.

Mr. BATE. That is the way I should put it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then the star route is increased to a daily mail, and the mail contractor has to carry the mail, and his pay is increased. Now, then, let us see. You take the points as to which the fast mail service applies. The mails are carried there, and will be carried there if no extra appropriation is made; but how? They will be how many hours behind in Alabama; how many hours behind in Georgia; how many hours behind in Kansas? In order to expedite the delivery of the mail at a faster rate than the contract specifies, we give increased pay, and we change the contract with the railroad just as much as you change the contract with the star-route contractor. You can not get around it, Mr. President. You are not subsidizing the railroads any more than you are subsidizing the star-route contractor for increased or expedited service.

There is advantage in this increased service. As a matter of course, it does not spread throughout the whole length and breadth of the land, but increased service is made here, is made there, and finally the saving in time comes together, and the delivery of the mail is hastened from one end of the land to the other. I see no objection to this provision. It is not a gratuity. It is increased compensation for increased service. As a matter of course, if you had not expedited the service on this road from a weekly mail, the mail would have been carried weekly. From one point to another the mail would have been carried, but it would have been carried once a week.

Now you have it carried twice and three times a week and you are paying increased compensation. That is a subsidy, according to the Senator from Tennessee. I say it is increased compensation for increased service. It is brought to a daily mail. Now, the same mail that is carried under that daily contract would have been carried under the weekly contract. It would not have cost nearly so much. The same mail that will be delivered on this fast train would be carried. There is no doubt about that, but it would be carried under the existing contract, and there would be delays in its transmission. That is all. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the word "subsidy" is not one which disturbs me at all. I have no objection to giving a subsidy where I think it is going to promote the commerce of the United States or where I think it will help and benefit the business of the people of the United States, but I can see no reason why we should make gifts to special railroads; and this is nothing but a gift to a certain road. It is idle to say that we can not get the fast mail service unless we give this particular road additional money.

At this very moment there are two great railroads in the West competing at great expense and making every effort to save a couple of hours in order that one or the other may retain the mail service at the regular compensation paid. We pay very largely—a great deal too much, many people think—for the regular work of carrying the mails, and for that regular compensation we can secure and compel fast mail in every part of this country. That is admitted by the statement of the officials of the Post-Office Department. They do not want to spend this money. They do not want to have it forced upon them. They can secure every bit of this fast service perfectly well without giving any special railroad this additional amount of money.

This fast mail service formerly extended into New England. It came to a point in my State, Springfield, and there was then the same theory put forward that it was of immense benefit and that it expedited our mails. It has been taken away from New England and I have yet to hear a single complaint that our mails are not transported so rapidly as they were in the days when the subsidy was given.

It seems to me, Mr. President, we ought to stop the whole business of inland subsidies to railroads which do not need them.

The railroads are paid now very, very well, indeed, for every pound of mail they carry, and the Department can compel them to carry on fast time and in ways suitable to the business demands of the country. If we begin and go on with this system; if we are to give the Southern Railroad $150,000, where are you going to stop? In this very bill I find a new addition; that we are to give $25,000 to a bit of railroad running between Kansas City and Newton, Kans. Why should that bit of road be picked out to receive a special subsidy or a special gift or increased compensation?

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator from Massachusetts say that the Kansas item is a new one?

Mr. LODGE. I did not say it is a new thing. I said it is an addition.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me? Does he mean to say that anything like the same service can be had throughout this whole section without the subsidy as with it?

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely. I have not any question of it whatever, and I believe the Department will tell the Senator so, if he will inquire.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I have a statement from the Department on the subject. I desired to know what the fact is. In answer to the direct question made by me, with a full knowledge on their part that this matter was coming up, they said they could not say that we could get the same service.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I do not interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts, I will state that the testimony of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was given very recently, in which he says that he has no doubt that identically as fast time can be secured without any subsidy.

Mr. LODGE. You can get the fastest service by giving the contract to some other railroad, and then the railroad that got the subsidy——

Mr. PETTUS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. Is not the Senator mistaken when he says this is a new thing added to the pending bill?

Mr. LODGE. I know it is not a new thing. We have had this fight year after year.

Mr. PETTUS. I am speaking of the Missouri matter. The Senator said that is a new item.

Mr. LODGE. It certainly has been added to the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. It has been the law for several years.

Mr. PETTUS. It has been in the Post-Office appropriation bill for years and years.

Mr. LODGE. I know; but I meant it is a new thing as being an addition to the pending bill. That is an example of what will come.

Now, Kansas City and Newton, Kans., are no doubt two very important points. I do not question that at all. I know Kansas City is a large and flourishing city. I know less about Newton, Kans., but if they are to have a subsidy for that bit of road, why should we not subsidize the railroads between New York and Chicago and between New York and Boston? Those are larger and more important points. If we are to pick out a bit of railroad here and give it a subsidy, we have got to go on and do it sooner or later to every bit of railroad all over the country, wherever there happens to be somebody particularly interested in having a fast mail. I think the action of the House in striking at the very root of this business of inland subsidies to railroads that do not need them and that can carry the mails and give us the best service on their present compensation is proper. If the subsidy system is continued, it will lead to an enormous extension of the same practice—an extension of what the Senator from Missouri calls increased compensation. Very well.

Does not everybody admit that the railroads are now paid for carrying the mails more than they ought to receive, and are we to begin in this way a system of increased compensation all over the country? Just as certainly as we continue to give it in one place, we shall be called upon to give it in another. If a railroad in the Southern country asks for it, and we insist that that railroad shall have it, there is no reason why the Boston and Maine and the New York, New Haven and Hartford should not get increased compensation; and so on all over the country. If the railroads are paid enough for carrying the mails, as I believe they are, and if we can get the best service for what they are now paid, as I fully believe, then there ought to be no increased compensation given on any excuse whatever. I think, as the House has left this out, we can not do better than to follow that very excellent example.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, just a word in reply to what my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] stated in regard to this being increased compensation. I think it will be found, if we will examine the mode of operation in the Post-Office Department, that every time they change from a weekly to a triweekly or to a daily mail on any of these star routes they make a new contract, and not only so, but require new sureties on the bond and a new bond. Therefore it can not be called increased compensation, as suggested by him, but is a subsidy.

One more word, if you please. Mr. President, the mainspring of the rapid delivery of mail in this country is competition between railroads. You take New Orleans, which is affected by this route. There are three different roads going there, carrying the mails from the same points; and that is the objective point in the South. They go in competition with each other. They run rapidly, and more rapidly in order to secure the passengers and not to deliver the mails. This is merely money thrown in as a subsidy, and nothing else. It helps them that much, and does nothing else, except it takes the money from one man's pocket to put it in the pocket of another.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a very few facts in this connection in regard to the fast mail service from Kansas City to Newton, Kans. We pay $25,000 on this route for the purpose of delaying the Western mail two hours and fifteen minutes. The regular train now leaves Kansas City at 10.30 p. m., and it arrives at Newton the next morning at 6.15. But one train a day runs south from there to Oklahoma and southwestern Kansas. The fast mail leaves Kansas City at 2 o'clock in the morning and arrives in Newton at 8.30 the next morning. Of course every one is well aware that there is no mail collected after 10 o'clock at night. The business houses are closed; the mail is made up; and therefore there can be no possible argument in favor of this appropriation on the ground that it will facilitate the business interests of Kansas City. The trains at Newton, before the fast mail was put on, used to connect with the regular train at 6.15 going to Wichita and Oklahoma.

Now, since the fast train was put on they delay the trains on all branch roads two hours for the fast mail to get in, thus delaying the mails throughout that entire country two hours and fifteen minutes. The only purpose of this appropriation, as near as I can ascertain, is to accommodate two Kansas City morning papers which are published at half past 12 in the morning. They are able to get down into this country and compete with the local papers as to all news received by the newspapers previous to half past 12. But as to what may occur between half past 12 and 3 o'clock the Kansas City papers, of course, do not furnish the news. Therefore, the Government of the United States, in this instance, is paying $25,000 a year for no other purpose under heaven than to enable the Kansas City papers to compete with the Wichita and Oklahoma local newspapers. It serves no purpose under the sun except to promote the interests of these two papers and take money out of the Treasury of the United States.

It seems to me this is the most unjustifiable and ridiculous proposition that ever appeared in an appropriation bill. I think it can be stated without chance of contradiction that the result of this fast mail is to delay about three hours the delivery of mails throughout western Kansas, Oklahoma, western Texas, western Indian Territory. It enables the Kansas City Journal and Times to compete successfully with the Wichita Eagle and Guthrie State Citizen in southwestern Kansas and Oklahoma Territory. Now, if there is any other reason for this fast mail, which delays all the mail except these newspapers from two to three hours, I have been unable to discover it. If the Southern mail is to continue to have a subsidy, is it not a precedent which is liable to be followed as to all the railroads in this country?

In the first place, under this bill we appropriate for railroad transportation and for the use of railway mail cars nearly $38,000,000. It costs the Government of the United States to move a ton of mail 100 miles $40. It costs the people of this country to move a ton of freight 100 miles 83 cents. It costs fifty times as much per pound to carry the mails over the railroads of the country as it does to carry freight. It costs twice as much per pound to carry the mail as it does to carry passengers. If the passengers weigh on an average 150 pounds each, we pay twice as much for carrying mails per pound as it costs the people of this country to travel upon railroad trains. Yet passengers have special facilities, dining cars, baggage cars, sleeping cars. All that is thrown in; and yet the Government of the United States pays the railroads 100 per cent more than the people themselves pay per pound for traveling.

In addition to this, it is proposed to add to these subsidies in order to facilitate the mail until we have carried it to such an absurd degree that we are paying out $38,000,000, a sum of money large enough to run the greatest State government in the Union, a sum of money so astonishing that it is well worth the attention of the Senate and the people of this country.

It seems to me that the Senate can not afford to insist upon giving bonuses to facilitate the mails in the way of subsidies in the face of this enormous gratuity now contributed to the railroads of the United States.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think Congress very appropriately appointed during the last session a commission to inquire into the general situation of the mail-contract system. The cost of carrying the mails, the cost of expediting the mails, the propriety of attempting to conduct the mails in the large cities through tubes, indeed all aspects of the case germane to this general subject, were intrusted to this commission for investigation.

It may be true, as the Senator from South Dakota asserts, that it costs the Government more to carry a hundred pounds of mail than it costs a passenger weighing 100 pounds to travel the same distance. However, there are many qualifying conditions connected with the transportation of the mails. The railroad companies, as a rule, are paid by the pound. I know of cases in the Western country where mail cars are run over lines of road at all seasons of the year carrying a very trifling number of pounds of mail; I know of cases where, according to the pound-rate compensation accorded the roads, cars are carried hundreds of miles for less than the number of cents represented by the miles. It is my opinion that a readjustment is necessary for the purpose of securing fair and adequate compensation to the roads extending through sparsely settled sections of the country.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator from Montana allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In the case of the Southern Railroad to which this bonus is given their compensation is over a thousand dollars per mile per year for carrying the mails, besides the bonus.

Mr. CARTER. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota as a very pertinent piece of information at this time.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Montana pardon me a moment? I do not know that I understand the Senator from South Dakota correctly in his mathematics.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I said that without this subsidy the railroad receives over a thousand dollars per mile per annum for carrying the mails.

Mr. BACON. Oh, I understood the Senator to say that this particular item gives the road that amount.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it occurs to me that the commission appointed to investigate this matter will, as a part of its general report, submit to Congress and the country some equitable basis of adjustment whereby the roads now receiving an inadequate compensation will receive a compensation reasonably adequate, while those roads that are receiving excessive compensation in proportion to mileage and tonnage will be reduced in the amount received.

I am not prepared at this time to say what the report of that commission will be, neither in general nor as to any details; but I submit to the Senate that, prior to receiving the report and its consideration by the Senate, it seems premature and inopportune to depart from the lines that have been deemed wise and prudent and justified by the circumstances in the past.

It is barely possible that the amount allowed for expediting the mail to the South is in excess of the actual requirements of the situation, but for many years past this appropriation has been regularly made. It may be possible that the expediting of the mail to the westward from Kansas City ought to be discontinued in so far as allowance of an extra sum is concerned. I should advise going into the question of justice and expenditure at this time if we were not upon the eve of a report from a very high-class commission appointed by Congress to consider the question. I do not believe it wise and proper to forestall by any action at this session what it may seem wise and proper for that commission to recommend. Since it has been deemed proper for five or six or ten years past to allow to the people of the South and the Southwestern part of the country this bonus for the expediting of the mails from New York to New Orleans, we should continue it at the present session, because we may get information that will allow us to reduce it or to equalize conditions in the near future.

Mr. CULLOM. May I ask the Senator from Montana a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I find in the present law, as well as in the pending bill, the following provision:

Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

I inquire of the Senator if he knows whether the appropriation made last year, or any part of it, has been used by the Postmaster-General in furthering the postal service under that provision which gives him discretion to do what he thinks best?

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I answer the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will answer the Senator from Illinois from the testimony in the language of the Assistant Postmaster-General, having charge of the business. He was asked by Mr. MOODY:

Is not the matter discretionary with the Department, even after Congress makes the appropriation?

Answer. Well, the Department would have the power to withhold it; but having recommended to Congress the advisability of withholding it, the Department is bound to assume that Congress desires the appropriation to be expended, so long as it is made.

That is an unanswerable reply, it seems to me.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to ascertain whether there is any information on that subject.

Mr. QUAY. In reply to the Senator from Illinois, I desire to say that it is my understanding that the subsidy provided for in the appropriation act of last year has been or is being disbursed. In order that the Senate might vote intelligently upon that and several other kindred questions in the bill, I asked the Post-Office Department to furnish me with an itemized statement of the amounts paid during the past year to railroads, but I was unable to receive it to-day. I will probably have it before the consideration of the bill is concluded, so that the Senate will understand exactly what the Department is doing. It has not yet been received.

Mr. CULLOM. In view of the discretion which seems to exist in the provision of the law, I thought it a pertinent inquiry to ascertain whether the appropriation or any part of it had been used. If it had been used, I wished to inquire why the Postmaster-General did not exercise the discretion given him if the appropriation was not necessary.

Mr. QUAY. The discretion naturally has always been exercised, and always in favor of the appropriation.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the answer of the Assistant Postmaster-General may be considered as conclusive from one view of the case, but it does not dispense with the clear lodgment of a discretion in the executive department of the Government to save this money to the Government if the condition of the service can be maintained as good without the expenditure. I should think it would be wise for Congress to await the report which will emanate from the commission which is making a thorough investigation of this matter.

In so far as the subsidy for the southwestern mail is concerned, I assume that the Post-Office Department can, if in its judgment that appropriation need not be used, refuse to use it for the purpose of expediting the mails. I assume that the same rule applies to the mail westward from Kansas City.

Mr. CULLOM. This provision has been in the appropriation acts——

Mr. CARTER. Continuously, I understand.

Mr. CULLOM. The one mainly under consideration has been in for many years. The other one for the last two years, perhaps.

Mr. WOLCOTT. For six years.

Mr. CULLOM. The last one for six years?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No, the first one.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, for six years. If the Senator from Montana will allow me, I will state that I remember when I myself had, as chairman of the subcommittee, charge of this bill some years ago I thought that the provision ought not to remain in the bill and undertook to get rid of it. It is my recollection that I carried the striking out of the provision by a majority of the Senate at first, but afterwards the Senate reconsidered its action and the appropriation went in again, and it has been placed in the Post-Office appropriation act ever since.

Now, the query has been in my mind, if the Postmaster-General, whoever he may be, from year to year has felt that the appropriation ought not to be made, as he is given in each case the discretion to use it or not as in his judgment may seem to him proper, he ought to refuse to use it under the provision of the statute when he does not think it is necessary to be made.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, upon general principles the two items here under consideration constitute but a drop in the bucket compared with the vast expenditure of money for carrying the mails over the railroads of the country. The elimination of these two items from the appropriation bill will be but making dual bites of a cherry. The fact is that before proceeding intelligently to act upon this subject we need the information which we have requested this commission to acquire and furnish to the Senate. The saving of the small amount required west of Kansas City and from New York to New Orleans will cut but little figure in the $34,000,000 being paid out to the railroads for the transportation of the mails. Let the reform, if reform is to be inaugurated, retrenchment, if retrenchment is to be inaugurated, work all along the line, Mr. President. I think the matter may be well left as it is until such time as adequate and full information shall have been received.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, there are a few words more that I think ought to be said on this subject.

First, answering the suggestion which has been made here several times that this appropriation is protected by a provision that the Postmaster-General need not utilize it unless he believes it is for the advantage of the public service, you have only to consider the absurdity of the position we put him in to see how ridiculous it is to expect him to exercise any discretion. At the opening of Congress he invariably comes to us and tells us it is a perfectly useless appropriation and ought not to be continued; that it is bad for the service, and he does not need it. Whereupon Congress, singling out this particular railroad, appropriates the money, and then says to the Postmaster-General, "You need not use it unless you think it is necessary." The Postmaster-General says, "I have already said it is not necessary. I have exercised my discretion. Congress, by making the appropriation, has overruled my judgment and practically directed me to appropriate the money."

Mr. President, there is only one thing that you must do in considering this matter to consider it fairly. You must disabuse your mind of the slightest conception that there is anything sectional about it. The word "South" is in it, but that is all. There is not a member of the Senate or a man in the United States who would sooner vote for an appropriation for anything that would help the Southern interests than I. It is not a Southern question at all. It is not a sectional question at all. When the bill had "New England" in it, New England Senators used to feel that they had to vote for it because New England was in it. Now, a great many Senators from Southern States think because the word "South" is in it they have all got to vote for it. It does not affect the South at all. It does not practically help a blessed one of them in getting a single letter an hour sooner than he would get it if there was no such subsidy, and practically I do not believe they get as good service as they would if there were no subsidy and if this matter were left to the determination of the Postmaster-General alone.

I suppose Senators know that this whole appropriation had its origin in a desire to facilitate the mails to Cuba. The senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who is not here now, called attention to the new relation which we had established with Cuba as a reason why we should have this kind of an appropriation for Southern mail. That is the way it started. But the other railroads that did not go down toward the Cuban connection were a little more powerful than the roads which carried this mail. So they lifted it bodily up and diverted it from being a mail to Cuba and put it over and planted it down as a fast mail to New Orleans.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me right there?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. As a matter of fact, the Seaboard Air Line, that had enjoyed the subsidy, rejected it upon the ground that they did not care to carry the mail.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I reply to the Senator from Mississippi that I am following the sworn testimony of Post-Office officials when I make this statement. This railroad influence was so big that they gobbled up the whole business and took it over to New Orleans.

Now, let us see what they did. In the first place, assume that it was a legitimate thing to do. It is not legitimate, Mr. President, if the way we are doing business with every other railroad in the country is legitimate. The way we get fast mails now to through points is by bunching the mail on some one road and getting them to give special facilities, and they hurry the business through. If the Post-Office Department should take the through mail which has its origin in New York and points north and east of New York, and has its destination at New Orleans and points west and south of New Orleans, and send them over one road, they could do it very much quicker and very much cheaper than they are sending them by this service.

This is simply an extra and supernumerary service on top of millions of dollars that are paid Southern railroads, exactly as every other railroad in the country is paid. Our contention is, first, that the principle is all wrong, and this is the sole relic that is left of the inland subsidies; and the other contention is that it does not help the people for whom it is intended.

The Postmaster-General makes one statement that we all ought to consider. He says it destroys the morale of mail letting. He goes to these other roads and says, "We want you to facilitate this mail; we want you to have a fast mail train to go to a certain point in the country." For instance, he goes to the Chesapeake and Ohio, or to the Pennsylvania, or the Louisville and Nashville, and he says, "You ought to take the mail and improve the service by a mail day to certain Southern and Western points."

They sit back and say, "How is it that you are giving $190,000 to the Southern Railroad and its connections for no better service than you are demanding we shall perform? We can do the service in the same time, or a quicker time, but you are subsidizing a railroad here, and the public gets no benefit from it. Give us the same subsidy." It makes discontent and dissatisfaction with every other railroad in the land that is now carrying mail.

Let us see what it does for us. This mail on its Southern trip is known as train 35. It leaves New York at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes in the morning. Everybody knows that very few of us hear the chimes at midnight. We all get our letters written and mailed before 12 o'clock at night. Nobody sits up and mails a letter between 12 o'clock and 4 o'clock in the morning. The business of the world is transacted by daylight and early in the evening.

This train leaves New York at 4.20 a. m. Here it is. The value of special-facilities train 35—that is, this train that gets $190,000, leaving New York at 4.20 in the morning—has been lessened somewhat by the establishment of the early newspaper train out of New York, No. 77, which leaves at 2.10 a. m., two hours before, but long after all the letters of the day before have been written and mailed, and takes the bulk of the New York papers. It arrives in Washington at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes in the morning, in time to connect with train No. 9—not a subsidized train—on the Southern Railroad, leaving at 8.12 a. m., which carries a postal car to Danville, Va., and pouches ahead to points between Danville and Charlotte, N. C., by closed mails.

This train arrives at Charlotte at 9.35 p. m., twenty-five minutes ahead of special-mail-facilities train 35. That is, from the city of New York as far south as the city of Charlotte, N. C., this fast mail for which we pay $190,000 does not carry a single letter unless that letter happens to be mailed between 1 o'clock and 3 o'clock in the morning; otherwise it all goes by the unsubsidized mail and gets to Charlotte twenty-five minutes ahead of this special subsidized train. This train arrives at Charlotte at 9.35 p. m., twenty-five minutes ahead of the special-facilities train 35. Train 23, leaving New York at 9 p. m., takes the bulk of the business mail.

Most letters, as we all know, are written and mailed before 6 o'clock p. m. When you walk through lower Broadway the wholesale houses and banks have their shutters closed and lights out at 6 o'clock; the business of the day is done. The letters are mailed. Those letters come here on the 9 o'clock train from New York, reaching Washington at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes a. m. This train, however, has no direct connection over the Southern road to the South. Another train leaves New York with express mail at 12.15 a. m., reaching Washington at 7.40 a. m. You will see, therefore, that these three trains leave but little New York mail for the special-facilities train 35, leaving New York at 4.20 a. m. There is not a single letter, unless in some sporadic and unusual instance, that ever is brought by that mail from New York destined to Charlotte or points north of it. It does get, however, the entire New England mail, leaving Boston, Mass., at 7 p. m.; but the earlier New England mail reaches New York in time for the earlier trains.

Now, Mr. President, as for train 37, leaving New York at 4.30 p. m., we have a train leaving New York at 3.30 p. m., arriving in Washington at 8.35, as against 10.20 p. m., the arrival of train 37 (train 63 from New York). This 3.30 train could, of course, take the bulk of the New York mail forwarded on train 37, and its running time is forty-five minutes less. South of Washington there is but one through train at night, and that is train 37.

Now, Mr. President, I want to go on and show you what happens when the train gets to New Orleans. No mail is opened up to Charlotte, not a letter is delivered after this train gets to New Orleans at 8.10 at night, and I am told it is usually late. It reaches the city at 8.10, and the mail is not distributed until long after it arrives, later than any carrier distribution permits it to be distributed, and there is no delivery of the letters in the city of New Orleans, where for this fast mail we pay $190,000, but the unsubsidized train, the train for the service of which we pay a million dollars, which arrives at New Orleans at 7.40 the next morning, before these New Orleans business men and bankers arrive at their offices the mail from that unsubsidized train which has left New York has been distributed and is upon their tables.

There is no gain from this so-called fast service. It may be that there is, as was stated by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], a certain gain as to delivery in certain intermediate portions between Charlotte and New Orleans on the mail arriving there by day, but the testimony under oath of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General again and again is that, judging by his experience with every other railroad in the country, he can make arrangements without a subsidy that will get the Senator from Georgia, at Atlanta and every other town in the South, just exactly as prompt delivery of the mail as he gets it by this subsidized service.

Mr. President, there is no personal feeling about this in the mind of anybody. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] suggested that we ought to wait, because the Postal Commission are considering the whole matter; but he forgets that the House of Representatives have already, in their wisdom, left this appropriation out of the bill. This is not the continuance of a thing which comes to us from the other House of Congress; it is new matter—new matter brought in by the Committee on Appropriations—and we are asked to put it on our legislation, not to continue it. There has been a stop in this extravagance. The House of Representatives has ended it, and the Committee on Appropriations is asking us to continue it, and has put it again on the appropriation bill. Of course personally it is a matter of utter indifference to anybody what is done with it; but it is bad public service; it is all wrong.

Whatever result may be reached by the investigation we are making of the question of railway mail pay, why should you pick out a little railroad running from St. Joe to Newton, Kans., violate every principle the Department acts under in carrying the mails, and pay out of the public Treasury a subsidy for that service, when the great Post-Office Department, charged with the duty of economically, properly, speedily, and satisfactorily fulfilling the behests of the people in delivering its mail matter, tells you they do not need it and do not want it; that it is a useless extravagance; that they can deliver mail in every town in the United States just as quickly, just as speedily, and just as satisfactorily if they do not have it?

Mr. BACON. I do not desire to detain the Senate or to follow the Senator through his elaborate presentation of this question. I simply desire to call the attention of the Senate to two points in the Senator's statement. One is, that all the argument which the Senator uses based upon the schedules to show that there will be as good service without this extra compensation—for I decline to call it a subsidy—as with it, is limited to the points on one hand between Washington and Charlotte, and then skips the territory from Charlotte to New Orleans, nearly 1,000 miles, and limits the question as to the particular effect at that terminal point.

Charlotte, N. C., is in the southern part of that State. As has been explained here by several Senators, it is not simply the delivery of the mail upon the immediate line of this road, but it is the delivery of the mail upon the various ramifications connecting with the road and between the points I have indicated which the Senator has called the attention of the Senate to, as based upon schedules. There is the entire territory of the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, not one square foot of which will be touched or served by reason of the schedules which the Senator has here presented to the Senate.

I repeat, Mr. President, there is no foundation for the statement of the Postmaster-General that he can secure as good service without this appropriation as with it. It is a bald statement without any argument to support it. It did not exist before the extra compensation was granted, and there is no reason to believe that it will exist if the extra compensation be withdrawn.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the Senator will permit me, I will read a sentence from Assistant Postmaster-General Shallenberger's testimony. This question was asked him:

I want to know if any Southern roads going from anywhere to New Orleans—

That is, the through mail—

Q. I want to know if any Southern roads going from anywhere to New Orleans make as good time as these two fast trains?
A. I will refer to Mr. Grant's statement—

That is the one I read—

I think he gives the time from Cincinnati to New Orleans. I am not prepared to say that any other road makes the same or equal schedule time, but I still say that I have no reason to doubt the continuance of the service with such connections as we might be able to make.

That is the through service. Now, as to the local service. I read from a question asked by Mr. MOODY:

Mr. MOODY. I understand your opinion is that you could get just as good service without the subsidies?

This is the local, not the through service.

A. I say that we could get substantially just as good service on all sections of these routes. We could in general get what I regard as better service throughout the country on other roads.

Mr. BACON. That is exactly what I have said.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then this question was asked him:

Q. How much time would it lessen the service between Washington and New Orleans?
A. I am of the opinion that it need not lessen it appreciably.

That is all.

Mr. BACON. Exactly as I have said. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General simply gives an opinion, without a single word of evidence or reason upon which to base such an opinion. It is simply a bald assertion. Against that I present the fact that before we had this extra compensation we did not have this fast service, and I present the fact—which, of course, is not in the shape of testimony—that all the assurances which have been given us by the Department which is in charge of this business were that without it they could not do it, and the statement made by the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] as to the passage through this long expanse of territory of almost empty trains in some periods of the year sustain the assertion of the railroad authorities that without this extra compensation they can not afford to run the trains which would give this fast mail service.

I want to say that over this entire territory, not simply upon the immediate line of the road, but in all the business communities in these four or five or six States, they have held public meetings, and there is almost consternation in business circles at the idea that they are to be remitted to the slow schedules of ten years ago, with the consequent loss to the business enterprises which will necessarily be involved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to say a word.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania has some remarks to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the call for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that the call for the yeas and nays may be withdrawn for one moment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is entitled to address the Senate after the demand for the yeas and nays has been seconded.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I desire to say, in response to a question put a few moments ago by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], that I have since received the letter referred to in my reply then to him, and that it indicates there has not been any reduction during the present fiscal year in disbursement of the appropriation made for special facilities furnished by the Southern Railroad, but that the company has already been paid $80,000 on that account. So that the discretion of the Postmaster-General has been exercised during the present year to that extent and with that result favorably to the principle of this amendment.

As to the history of this bill, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] in his remarks indicated it came like a sunburst from the firmament of the Committee on Appropriations into the Senate. I desire to say that the pending proposition was reported favorably from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in the House of Representatives and failed there, as has been said, afterwards, on the discussion of the bill, by a scant vote. I do not remember when this scheme first appeared in Congress, but it was soon after I appeared in this Chamber, and annually the same old dry straw which has been thrashed out here to-day was thrashed out in this Chamber, the thrashers sometimes coming from one quarter, sometimes from another.

Certain charges were made of extravagant favoritism to the railway transportation companies, sustained by the authority of the Post-Office Department, and always, after mature investigation by committees in both Houses, the appropriation was sustained. Each House sustained it, and the lawmaking power adjudicated in favor of the proposition. Therefore, when from the other branch of Congress to the Committee on Appropriations came this Post-Office appropriation bill bearing no such appropriation, and to restore to it the position which it occupied in the last bill the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] sent to the Committee on Appropriations an amendment in the exact language indorsed by Congress a year ago, the committee adopted it without hesitation, believing that the half dozen or dozen indorsements already given to the proposition by Congress heretofore fully justified them in so doing. There was absolute unanimity in the committee on the subject, and if there were any railroad influence exercised in behalf of it I certainly did not hear of it. We considered then that it had been settled by long usage and adjudications in Congress to be a meritorious appropriation. We so decided, and we believe it ought to pass.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate long, but I desire to emphasize the point last made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that the opinion of the Post-Office Department that the same speed for its Southern through mails can be obtained after this extra appropriation is withdrawn is a mere matter of opinion.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] has read some portions of the statements made by Second Assistant Postmaster-General Shallenberger before the Postal Commission. The testimony taken before that commission has been printed in sheets, and members of the commission have it, but it has not been made public. I wish to read two or three statements made by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. He says, on page 697, speaking of the New England train which connects with the special train from New England No. 35:

I am not prepared to say that it would not be disastrous if that train should be taken off and nothing substituted for it, but we assume that if the special-facility fund were withdrawn the natural volume of traffic would justify on competing roads sufficient facilities for us to utilize.

Again, being asked what would be the train that the New England mail connected with if this train No. 35 were taken off, he says:

That I could not answer. We would have to cast about for another connection. We would at once appeal to the other roads.

Q. Have you any idea that it would in the end make very much delay to that New England mail in reaching Philadelphia, Washington, and the South?

A. I think not, for the reason that there are two great competing lines which would be extremely anxious for the business that we could give them.

A little later, referring to the discontinuance of the payments out West, he says:

Long since we have ceased to pay any special appropriation to those lines, because traffic is so heavy and competition so active that we have no trouble in securing the very best mail service. Our position is that, while it did not seem reasonable to expect these Southern roads when they put on these fast trains to do so without additional compensation, it does now seem reasonable that that special appropriation should not be required. The Department assumes now that it has sufficient competition over all great routes to secure what it needs without that.

Later he is asked:

How do you expect to have the same fast train if you take away the subsidy?

A. It may be that the special-facility trains would still have the same reason for maintaining a quick schedule for the passenger and freight traffic, so that we could avail ourselves of the commercial requirements between these two points and secure service that formerly we were not able to secure.

Q. Do you mean to say that prior to the subsidy system these trains over the Southern road outstripped the trains over all other roads to such an extent as to secure from them the freight and passenger business?

A. No; I think these trains have been developed since the period when the subsidy became available.

Still later, when asked about the withdrawal of the fast train to Charlotte, he said:

A. Well, I am not prepared to say what effect it might have upon any one train. We take some risk when we say that we hope to have equally good service if the facility appropriation were withdrawn. I do not know what effect it might have upon the railroad interests. We simply speak from our experience in other sections of the country over roads of like character where the traffic is equally great. Up to this time we have been able to secure, in many cases, equally good service. Now, we assume that in this section we would be able to secure satisfactory service; but it remains, as I say, an open question.

When the question was asked whether or not giving one road extra compensation did not result in stimulating the competing roads to increase the speed of their trains, the Assistant Postmaster-General admitted that it would. He was then asked whether, if the special subsidy money was withdrawn, the roads would not fall back in their time, and he said:

A. That would remain to be seen. Some might. We do not think so, but we might be deceived.

Then he was asked the question:

But is there any doubt at all that having established this one fast mail route throughout the South to New Orleans carrying passengers, all the other roads would try to make as good time as that so as to carry passengers into New Orleans at the same time?

A. Yes; that is likely.

Q. Now, if you dispense with this special fund and stimulus there will only remain competition between the railroads, none of them being specially stimulated; and yet you don't think that would lessen the time for mail and passenger transportation?

A. Not to an extent that would seriously cripple our service.

Q. How much time would it lessen the service between Washington and New Orleans?

A. I am of the opinion that it need not lessen it appreciably.

Q. Would the mail train go just as fast?

A. We assume that it would substantially.

Later he was asked:

Q. And yet you think that you can get just as good service and quick speed out of this best line, without this extra money, as you can with it, or substantially?

A. Substantially as good; but I do not say that we could secure just as good. I say, in view of the evils attending the system, that in looking the field over we think the general interests of the service would be subserved.

* * * * * * * *

Q. Then you don't think that the rapidity of trains is increased by the extra mail pay?

A. I would not say that. I think they have been increased; but I think there is now no justification for the Department paying the money to secure reasonable service.

Q. You understand that these systems have reached that point so that you can get just as good speed without the money as with it?

A. That is the idea.

A. Yes.

Q. That is the departmental position, is it?

Mr. President, these extracts show that the idea that we can get as fast a through mail from New York to New Orleans by withdrawing this appropriation for special mail facilities is wholly a matter of opinion, based upon the proposition that by competition among the various roads a time equal to that which is now secured can be obtained. I say, on the other hand, that that is not demonstrated, the subject has not been sufficiently investigated, it stands like all the other questions which are connected with the postal service, undecided by the Postal Commission. The opinion of the commission never has been invoked, and there is not another single reform proposed upon this bill based upon investigation made by the Postal Commission. The whole question of whether this $30,000,000 for the railway-mail pay and the $4,000,000 extra for the postal cars is too much or too little is under investigation, and the Committee on Appropriations has not encountered a single recommendation for any reduction of those expenditures.

Mr. QUAY. The reason is that the Postal Commission has not reported and has made no recommendation.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Postal Commission has not reported and has made no recommendation upon this subject. The opinion of the Department is cited by the Senator from Colorado as a reason why we should make this reduction at this time.

Mr. CULLOM. May I inquire of the Senator if it is not the purpose of the commission to investigate this as well as the other question?

Mr. CHANDLER. The question is under investigation by the Postal Commission and no opinion has been expressed on the subject, and I say no opinion has been expressed upon any one subject connected with the Post-Office Department by the Postal Commission, and I for one believe that the expediting of the mails between New York and New Orleans will cease and the trains will fall back substantially to their old schedule time the moment this compensation is withdrawn.

Mr. CULLOM. The Committee on Appropriations is waiting for the Postal Commission to report on these matters.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will not discuss the question of the action of the Postal Commission. It was only able to take the subject up for a few days last summer, Congress having adjourned on the 8th day of July, and there could not be much work done by the commission prior to the election. The commission went to work immediately after the election, but soon Congress was upon us, and although it has taken a great amount of testimony and been very diligent, according to my observation in its work, the commission has not been able to make any report, and the pending appropriation bill provides for continuing the commission to investigate all these subjects.

Now, Mr. President, I ask why this experimental economy should be tried upon this fast through mail from New York to New Orleans, while every other abuse, if there is any, and while every other extravagance, if there is any, in connection with the postal service is maintained exactly as it has existed for many years in the past?

Mr. LODGE. I wanted to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question before he sat down. I wanted to ask him if he thought the railroads were now inadequately compensated for the general service of carrying the mails?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not; but if the present rate of compensation of $30,000,000 and of $4,000,000 is to be maintained, I think $200,000 to expedite the mails from New York to New Orleans, on to Texas and Mexico, and on to Florida and Cuba is an economical expenditure of the public money if the $30,000,000 and the $4,000,000 is an economical expenditure of the public money.

Mr. LODGE. That was not precisely what I meant. There is a great reluctance, I notice, in certain quarters to call this a subsidy. It does not seem to me to matter much what it is called, but it has been named "extra compensation." The only excuse for extra compensation is that the regular compensation is not sufficient, and I want to find out whether in the Senator's opinion—and he has looked into this subject a great deal, and I remember he said something about it last year—the railroads are inadequately compensated for giving their fast service?

Mr. CHANDLER. What I said last year I say now, that I have a general belief that the railroads are paid too much. I do not know how much in excess is paid to them. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] have investigated this subject, they know just how much, and they are prepared to move a reduction in the $30,000,000 appropriation and the $4,000,000 appropriation, but I am not and the Postal Commission is not. We would be just as much justified, in my judgment, in moving to cut the $30,000,000 down to $27,000,000 and the $4,000,000 down to $3,000,000 as we would be in striking off this little sum of $200,000 which we are expending for the Southern fast mail.

Mr. LODGE. Does not this railroad get any compensation for regularly carrying the mail?

Mr. CHANDLER. It gets the regular compensation, and this is a proposition to give additional compensation.

Mr. LODGE. It amounts, as I understand, to about a million dollars.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not think it does. That is one of the things I just alluded to that I am in doubt about, but the Senator from South Dakota knows all about it. The Postal Commission has not got as far as that. The Southern Railway has a mileage of 5,000 miles, and it gets, I suppose, a half million dollars for carrying the mails, perhaps a million dollars. The Senator from South Dakota said it would be equal to $1,000 per mile when we took into consideration the 5,000 miles and cut it down to 1,300 miles. I do not know by what process the Senator did it, but that is a subject which the Postal Commission is investigating.

Why we should be called upon to begin the work of reform right here and now upon this particular appropriation bill, I have been unable to discover. I disclaim the idea that was advanced by the Senator from Colorado that either the Senator from Massachusetts or any other New England Senator is influenced in voting against this special appropriation because the special appropriation that once existed for the New England mail has been withdrawn. I disclaim that. I voted for the whole appropriation as long as it had been proposed here and had been desired by the people who were to be accommodated by the expenditure. I shall continue to vote for it so long as I have a chance until the Postal Commission puts its evidence before all the Senators and all the members of the House of Representatives, and in its report tells us more distinctly than has been yet stated to the Senate how we can get along without this extra mail compensation.

Mr. QUAY. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], but I am informed that if he were present he would vote in the affirmative. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. BATE (when his name was called). I am paired on this vote with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN], and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I understand he would vote "yea." I should vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON], but on this vote I am informed the Senator from Maryland would vote the same way that I do. We are both opposed to the amendment. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Maryland to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE]. The Senator from Oregon would vote for the amendment and the junior Senator from Maryland would vote against it. They are both absent, and I make this statement in their behalf. I am therefore at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. CAFFERY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. I am not aware how he would vote if present, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. Not seeing him in the Chamber, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], who is absent, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. I do not know how he would vote if present. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON]. I do not know how he would vote upon this question. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY]. I understand that it has been arranged to transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY]. I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH], and if agreeable to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] I will transfer my pair to the Senator with whom he is paired, and that will permit both of us to vote.

Mr. HANNA. That is satisfactory.

Mr. PERKINS. I vote "yea."

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN]. Inasmuch as we agree upon this amendment, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PASCO. I suggest to the Senator from Idaho that we transfer our pairs, if agreeable to him, so that the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] will stand paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. SHOUP. Very well. I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. He is absent, and not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TURLEY (when his name was called). On this question I agreed to pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY]. I understand that if present he would vote "yea." If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (when Mr. TURPIE'S name was called). The Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] is detained from the Senate Chamber by illness.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], but on this vote, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] has been called out of the Chamber, the pair will be transferred, so that the Senator from Indiana will be paired with the Senator from Washington. I will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PASCO. In pursuance of the arrangement under which pairs have been transferred, as announced a few minutes ago, I will vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 10; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. Before proceeding further with the reading of the bill, I desire to turn to page 13, line 12, where I move to insert an amendment there which I have received from the Department since we have passed that clause in the bill. I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 12, strike out "for" and insert "received during," and after the word "year" insert "ending June 30;" so that the line will read:

On a star route received during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, shall be, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. On page 15, line 8, I move to strike out the word "two" and insert the word "sixty-five," and in the same line I move to strike out "five hundred;" so that it will read:

For railway post-office clerks, $8,765,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to state that after concluding the committee amendments, and I believe there is but one unimportant one in the remainder of the bill, I will ask to have the bill laid over until Saturday morning.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill whether, when Saturday morning comes and the bill is taken up, it will be subject to amendment?

Mr. QUAY. It will be subject to all amendments.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is the bill to go over now?

Mr. QUAY. No, not now; when its reading shall have been concluded.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General," on page 19, section 2, line 20, after the word "incapacitated," to strike out "by age or otherwise for employment in" and insert "for performing;" and in line 22, after the word "roll," to strike out "or an honorable service roll;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the appropriations herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the postal service shall not be available for the compensation of any persons permanently incapacitated for performing such service. The establishment of a civil pension roll, or the exemption of any of the officers, clerks, and persons in the postal service from the existing laws respecting employment in such service, is hereby prohibited.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 20, on page 20.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether he has any information as to the work of the Postal Commission during the last twelve months?

Mr. QUAY. I desire to state, in response to the Senator from North Carolina, that I have no evidence of the work accomplished by the commission beyond taking a great mass of testimony——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania please address the Chair, so that he can be heard by the Reporters.

Mr. QUAY. The surface indications are that they have been doing a good deal of work. I have no official information as to what they have done or what they propose to do, but my understanding is that it is the desire of the commission to be continued in office and that the members expect to accomplish very important results in the line along which they have been working.

Mr. CHILTON. We can not hear what is transpiring.

Mr. BUTLER. I certainly hope they will accomplish very important results, for there is a great deal to be investigated and very important results ought to be arrived at. But certainly we do not want to be five or ten years at it. It seems that the commission have already gathered information that they are able to use, at least certain information, and I hope that within twelve months, with such able and astute and diligent commissioners, we will be able to have at least a little information as to some of the important sections of this bill which the commission was created to investigate.

On the very question under discussion and in controversy, which caused this commission to be created—that is, to investigate the pay for railway mail service and postal-car service—we have had no information. I should like to inquire if the commission has not yet gotten hold of some information on those important questions that would throw some light upon this bill and would enable us to act intelligently upon it.

Mr. QUAY. I do not see the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], who is chairman of the commission, in his seat; but the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] is present, as usual, and I refer the Senator from North Carolina to him for information.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is the leading member, I may say, upon the commission, as he is in any body of which he is a member. I am only an humble and diligent member. I stated a little while ago what the commission had been doing. There are a thousand pages of testimony which has been taken by the commission, and it is in my judgment valuable testimony. There is nothing in the testimony that does not bear directly upon the subject-matter of the inquiry.

The Senator from North Carolina will remember, however, that while he and I and one or two other members of the Senate desired to have the subject-matter of the inquiry made nothing but the amount paid the railroads for mail transportation, the Committee on Appropriations of this body, led at that time by the Senator from Pennsylvania in charge of this bill, insisted, against our wishes, on providing that the Postal Commission should investigate the whole question of the receipts and expenditures of the Post-Office Department, not only its expenditures for railway mail transportation, but all other expenditures, and the question of second-class matter, which had previously been the subject of inquiry by both Houses of Congress, and upon which subject a great amount of testimony had been taken and reports made to both Houses of Congress. The Senator will see that that was a very broad field of inquiry, forced upon the Postal Commission against the judgment of many Senators and Representatives, but in accordance with the determination of the majority of Congress.

As I said, Congress adjourned about the 15th of July, in the midst of the hot season. The commission necessarily could make but little progress at that time, and before the commission knew it the fall elections were upon them.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator say that that was before the commissioners knew it?

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the commissioners realized that the time was passing so rapidly the fall elections were upon the country, and it was not possible to do any more work before election. Immediately after election the commission went to Chicago. It there took important testimony. The commission then came to Washington. It has taken testimony in Washington down to a very recent period, and has at last succeeded in having the same printed. The commission, in my judgment, has exercised due diligence in the investigation of this very important subject.

I wish to say that I entered upon the inquiry with the feeling that the railroads were paid too much money for the transportation of the mails. I have not, however, so far satisfied myself upon that point as to undertake to make a demonstration of the fact to the Senate. I am not able to suggest to-day upon any well-considered ground that the compensation should be cut down nor the extent to which it should be cut down, if it is reduced, nor am I able to propose upon any well-considered facts any new method of calculating the compensation which should be paid to the railroads of the country. My mind is entirely at sea upon that subject.

I think, therefore, that this clause in the appropriation bill continuing the commission for another year was wisely conceived in the House of Representatives. I have no doubt that during the coming recess of Congress the Postal Commission will do all the work that was set for it to do, and will do it wisely and well.

Mr. BUTLER. Would the Senator suggest, then, inasmuch as he seems to have had his opinion partly changed so far by the testimony, that we had better create a new commission, putting on it, by reason of converting Senators, those who are not yet converted, leaving out myself? I should wish to be excused, because I would be in such a minority that I would not be troublesome to the Senate; but I would suggest placing others who had any doubts about it on another commission as the most effective way of converting them.

Mr. CHANDLER. What made the Senator say that I have changed my views? I have not changed my views. I said that I entered upon the investigation with a conviction or a belief that the present pay is too excessive. I remain of that conviction. But I am not able, I said, upon well-grounded reasons to propose a reduction. I would not know how much to reduce it, if the mail pay ought to be reduced, and I would not propose a reduction. As I said, I could not propose any different method of calculating the compensation. I stand exactly where I was before. I have not changed my views at all, but the subject is such an uncertain one that I have not reached any new conviction on the subject.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the Senator is still of the opinion that the railway mail pay is entirely too high and that it should be reduced, but so far he has been so confused by the mass of testimony and the multiplicity of the subject that has been forced upon him that his opinions are probably not as clear now as to how to reduce it as they were a year ago.

I submit, Mr. President, that is not very promising as to the clear information that the Senate will get. There is probably no Senator on the commission who was more thoroughly convinced than the Senator from New Hampshire that there should be a reduction of this pay.

The Senator from New Hampshire was very clearly of the opinion that there should be a committee or a commission to investigate the sole question of railway mail pay. He was entirely right in that, in my judgment. I think the Senator had another proposition, possibly that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads or a special committee should investigate the subject. I regret very much that the Senate did not see fit to take that course. But, as the Senator says, those who are opposed to any investigation apparently at last decided that we should have a very broad investigation, and they imposed upon the commission a very broad field of work, one that covered questions which had not aroused the opposition and discussion heretofore in the Senate that the question of railway mail pay had done. So it seems that the commission has been burdened and loaded down with matters to be investigated that were of minor importance, or which were at least not the questions that convinced the Senate that it was necessary to have an investigation on.

What is the result? Just what the Senator so eloquently predicted a year ago would be the result, and just what other Senators predicted, that you would load the committee down with subjects of minor importance to be investigated until it would be impossible for the commission to make any intelligent investigation within the time of even a whole year. That was pointed out to Senators at that time. Probably, like the Senator from New Hampshire, Senators did not think about the fall election coming on them before they were anticipated, and various other things interfered with the investigation.

But, unfortunately, Mr. President, we have got exactly what was predicted, and what was predicted by those who were most active in desiring that the truth about this matter should be known. Those of us who wanted the question of railway mail pay investigated wanted to know exactly what the facts were. We wanted to know how much reduction there should be. We wanted to know whether the facts justified the price that was paid; and if so, every one of us was willing to stand by the price we had been paying, enormous as it was. A year has rolled around. Here comes another appropriation bill along, sailing through quietly, appropriating more money than a year ago, with no investigation concluded and no report made to this body on which we can act.

I submit that if one year from to-day there is no report made we will be in the same condition we are in now, and we will be called upon to vote for an appropriation bill carrying $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 more than we vote for this year; and if we will continue to investigate for the next twenty-five years, during that time we will be asked to vote twice as much as this bill carries, and we will be asked to wait until the next year until we finish the investigation.

Mr. President, I realize the importance of the question of second-class mail matter which the commission was instructed by the Senate to investigate. It is a question that deserves consideration. But I submit now, as I did a year ago, that it ought to have been investigated by a separate committee or commission. We have unfortunately loaded this commission down with more work than they have proven able to do in a year. We should not appoint a committee to get information for the Senate and then load it down with work that it is impossible for it to accomplish in a year. We are not dealing squarely with the country when we do it. We have the appearance, whether it is just or not, of attempting to prevent the investigation from throwing the light upon the next appropriation bill instead of trying to get the light.

A year ago, if the Senate had desired to investigate all these questions, I submit that we ought to have appointed two committees. All Senators now see that we should have had two committees or commissions, one to investigate the other minor or secondary questions, or cognate questions, if you please, and the other committee or commission to investigate the question of railway-mail pay, so that we could have had a report before we were asked to vote upon another appropriation bill. I submit that it is not treating the Senate fair, it is not treating Senators fair who want to know the facts about this matter, to have the commission loaded down with work and let us come around a year later to the appropriation bill before us and we are unable to get information. We are more helpless than we would have been if we had not appointed the commission, because a number of us had proceeded to investigate on our own account and gotten a great deal of information that was correct and uncontradicted from any source.

I myself am to-day—if the Senate will pardon me for making the statement—prepared to present some new light on this question, more than I had a year ago—information that I am satisfied is correct, information that I think that I can establish is correct—showing that there should be a reduction in the railway-mail pay. Yet I am to be told that I must not press the matter now, forsooth; the commission appointed a year ago has not been able to report. I do not criticise the commission.

I realize something of the laborious work they have had upon their shoulders. It is work that no Senator would have willingly undertaken unless he felt it was his duty as a member of the committee or at the request of the Senate. It is labor that I myself would have shunned if I could have done so in justice to the Senate or any committee that I might have served upon. I realize the broad scope of the work. I realize that to go to the bottom of the matter it was probably impossible for them to make their report and reach their conclusion by this time.

But, Mr. President, that does not remove the fact that certain Senators on this floor insisted upon loading and succeeded in loading the commission down with a multiplicity of work, with instructions to investigate a broad field of questions that possibly made it impossible for the commission to do its work in a year. If Senators realized that at the time, then I submit they were not dealing fairly with us. If they did not realize it at the time and thought the commission could finish the work, then I submit that they ought now to agree with us for a certain reduction, a nominal reduction, if you please, such a one as the investigation so far will justify, and then let us a year from now, when the report is completed, make a further reduction according to the facts shown in the report.

Mr. President, I believe that there are Senators who can now present to the Senate sufficient reasons for a reduction without having had the benefit of being on the commission and hearing the testimony that the commission's report so far can not furnish evidence to contradict. I submit that if I can present reasons and arguments and facts here to justify a reduction in this appropriation, and if there is no testimony established and uncontradicted that will prove that my facts are incorrect, the members of the commission and every Senator here ought to be willing to make the appropriation according to the facts presented.

Mr. President, I want to know the facts, and I am willing to vote for an appropriation as big as the facts justify. If the appropriation that we are now making is too small, and the facts show that the railroads deserve more, I will be the first man to cast my vote to increase their compensation.

I give notice that I shall offer an amendment, and I shall give my reasons for supporting it; and I also give notice that I shall ask the members of the commission in good faith and in a spirit of fairness to tell me and to tell the Senate whether they have any information that they have gathered from their investigation that will show that the amendment I offer is not proper, that the reduction I shall advocate is not just.

Of course we all expected the commission to show their report, to show that there ought to be a certain reduction, but nobody knew how much. It may be the commissioners themselves do not know yet approximately how great a reduction should be made. But I take it there is not a single Senator but who would say he believes that report would justify some reduction. There has been no effort to say in the Senate that the amount paid was probably not too high. There have been facts presented by myself and other Senators that no Senator has attempted to contradict or refute. The only answer to it was, "We do not know how much reduction to make. We will appoint a commission to find out exactly how much." We appointed the commission, and here we are asked to vote the appropriation again. The commission have not told us how much we should vote.

Mr. President, we ought to make some reduction. Let us make one, then, since the report is not ready, that is surely in the bounds of justice, both to the railroads and to the taxpayers of the country. I shall offer such an amendment later.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I have but a word to say, called forth by the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina.

The joint Congressional commission to investigate the question of railway mail pay, the question of the second-class mail service, the question of pneumatic tubes, and other kindred questions, was appointed in July last, when the summer had already commenced. It was the year of the Congressional elections. The committee met and through subcommittee and whole committee occupied as much time as could possibly be given to the consideration of the question.

We have accumulated something like a thousand pages of testimony, some of it valuable and some of it valueless. There has been no time wasted. The commission looks forward, if it shall be continued, to devoting very much of the coming summer, after the 4th of March, to the further investigation of this question. There is not a member of the commission who enters into the investigation from other than a sense of public duty, or with other than a very great sacrifice of his personal interests. We may not be intellectually capable of grasping these questions, but in every other respect the commission is entirely able to deal with the questions which have been presented to it under the resolution of Congress.

We expect during the summer to formulate and present to the Senate in December next some plan which we hope will be intelligent and will command the respect of both Houses of Congress upon the questions of the investigation with which we are intrusted. We found ourselves at the threshold of the investigation met with the very serious problem upon what the question of the railway mail pay should be based, whether upon space, whether upon weight, whether upon speed, or upon comparison with the earnings of other departments of railway service. Through experts, through scientists, through people who have studied this subject, as well as through railroad officials, we are now engaged in investigating these questions as carefully and as thoroughly as we can, I beg to assure the Senator from North Carolina; and I trust and believe that our efforts will not be in vain so far as our ability to shed light upon the questions is concerned.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. QUAY. Now the bill may go over until Saturday morning, at the conclusion of the morning business, when I shall call it up; and I will say to the Senate that it will be open to all amendments then.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, some ten days ago the Senate kindly consented that pension bills might be taken up on Monday last. I was absent from the Chamber on that day, suffering from illness, and they were not taken up for consideration. I desire to request that after the routine morning business to-morrow, unless an appropriation bill is before the Senate, the time intervening until 2 o'clock, if so much time be required, be given to the consideration of the Pension Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that immediately after the routine business to-morrow morning the Pension Calendar shall be taken up and considered until 2 o'clock, unless an appropriation bill is before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I do not, of course, like to interfere with pensions, but the personnel bill for the reorganization of the Navy was taken up by the Senate this morning in the morning hour, and it went over to give way to the appropriation bill. It has not been finished. I wish to have the Senate go on with it to-morrow morning. I shall not long be in the way of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will include the naval personnel bill and the appropriation bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that to-morrow morning, after the routine business, the Pension Calendar be taken up, if neither an appropriation bill nor the naval personnel bill is before the Senate, and its consideration continued until 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, the chairman of the Pension Committee of the Senate has been very diligent. He has been diligent day in and day out, in the daytime and in the nighttime, in having pension bills passed. But I do not think they ought to get in the way of the regular order of business any more than they have already done.

Mr. GALLINGER. My reply to the Senator from Alabama is that we have really taken not a great deal of time. In the other branch they have one evening each week, and frequently a half day. We have made a Pension Calendar separate from the other business of the Senate, and our pension bills never would be reached unless we are given a little time now and then. I have meant not to be obtrusive in this matter. I have had at least twelve Senators within the last two hours urge me to ask for this privilege. I have myself no interest in it beyond that of every other Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ALLISON. What is the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from New Hampshire is that to-morrow morning, immediately after the routine business, the Pension Calendar shall be taken up and continued until 2 o'clock, provided that no appropriation bill is before the Senate and that the naval personnel bill is not before the Senate. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR THIRD JUDICIAL CIRCUIT.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7094) providing an additional circuit judge in the Third judicial circuit.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CULLOM. That will not displace the unfinished business?

Mr. SPOONER. Not at all.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that there shall be in the Third judicial circuit an additional circuit judge, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall possess the same qualifications and have the same powers and jurisdiction now prescribed by law in respect to the present circuit judge, and be entitled to the same compensation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that to-morrow morning at a suitable moment I will ask the Senate to take up, or I shall move to take up, the new Army reorganization bill.

Mr. HOAR. For what hour to-morrow does the Senator give the notice?

Mr. HAWLEY. At the earliest moment I can get in. I can not, of course, displace orders already made.

CODE FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in view of the discussion which obtained yesterday evening with reference to the Alaska bill, it became quite manifest to the Committee on Territories that the effort made to add as an amendment to the bill a code of civil procedure would involve an amount of time at this stage in the session of Congress which could not well be spared. With the consent of the committee, or the members of the committee—and I have consulted them all, I believe—the report of the committee may be considered as amended by striking out all after page 248 of the bill as reported. That will leave the code of criminal procedure and the codification of the criminal laws together with various meager amendments made by the committee to the criminal code.

It is a matter of the most grave importance that this criminal code should become law before the conclusion of this session of Congress. As I stated yesterday evening, there can not now be impaneled a legal jury within the district of Alaska. That district, comprising nearly 600,000 square miles, and having a population of over 30,000 white inhabitants at the present time, with fair prospects of a population of over 100,000 during the coming year, will be in a condition of practical anarchy unless we can pass this bill at this session.

The difficulty arises in a manner that Senators, without reflection, would not realize. It was provided by an act of Congress some years ago that the general laws of the State of Oregon should apply to the district of Alaska so far as applicable. It has been found very difficult to determine just what the laws of the State of Oregon were at the date of the passage of that act. There has not been a codification of the laws of that State for many years, and consequently it is necessary to refer to the various session laws of the State.

One of the most serious difficulties encountered was in the qualification of jurors. The laws of Oregon require that a person to be eligible upon either a grand or petit jury in either a civil or criminal case shall be a taxpayer. Now, it so happens that there is no law applicable to the district of Alaska whereby any tax can be assessed or levied. Consequently there can not now be, nor has there been at any time in the past, a legal jury organized within that district. It is unfortunate, but yet true, that persons have been indicted, convicted, and executed under a condition of affairs certainly very lamentable to reflect upon.

Mr. President, this criminal code will provide a guaranty to American citizens residing within the district of Alaska of trial by a legally constituted jury at least.

In order that the bill may pass at the present session of Congress it is essential that the good nature of the Senate should be indulged in to permit a reading of the bill in a formal manner, it being understood that no other business will be transacted during the formal reading, save and except the reading of the bill. I ask unanimous consent that this portion of the bill as reported, to and including page 248, be read this evening before adjournment. It will take probably two hours or two hours and a half to read the bill. I couple with the consent agreement which I seek the statement that no other business of any kind is to be transacted during the formal reading of the bill. I present the request in that form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is unanimous consent given that the reading of the bill may be proceeded with?

Mr. BATE. It can not all be read to-night. Let it be divided, and a portion read to-night and the remainder to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. The reading of the 248 pages will not require more than two hours.

Mr. HALE. And no other business to be done?

Mr. CARTER. No other business to be done but the reading.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the unfinished business will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Of course the understanding being that a quorum is to remain present.

Mr. CARTER. Theoretically it is so understood.

Mr. BATE. Can not half of the bill be read this evening and the remaining half to-morrow?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposition is that the reading be proceeded with and no other business be transacted until the reading is completed.

Mr. CAFFERY. I inquire of the Senator from Montana if the laws of Oregon relating to trial by jury can not be so modified as to suit the conditions in Alaska, without passing this bill, which contains 248 pages?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the difficulty encountered in attempting to impanel a legal jury, which will be found to constitute one of the many objections to the importation of the laws of a State to apply to a district organized as this is, I have cited, because that involves a denial to our citizens residing there of the constitutionally guaranteed right of trial by jury. That flagrant proposition was presented for the purpose of challenging the attention of the Senate. Throughout the entire code of Oregon it will be found in attempting to adjust it to the affairs of the district of Alaska that most serious difficulties are encountered in determining what law is applicable to that district, considering the formation of its government as contradistinguished from the government of a State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is consent given to the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]?

Mr. CAFFERY. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. BATE. I suggest to the Senator from Montana that he move to take up the bill.

WASHINGTON PUBLIC LIBRARY.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 5289) to provide a site for a building for the Washington Public Library.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Michigan?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I will say that the bill has been read in full and the amendments agreed to. So far as I know, the only Senator who desired to debate the bill was the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. He told me this morning that he did not care to say anything further about it, but was quite satisfied to let the bill go as it is.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan what is the limit of the appropriation for this purpose?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The bill provides for the purchase of ground, and the limit is $250,000. The session is approaching so near to a close that it is important to get the bill through; and if we do not get it through now the chances are that it may fail altogether.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been heretofore read at length.

Mr. MCMILLAN. And I understand the amendments to it were acted upon the other day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending, which will be read.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I dislike to antagonize the Senator from Michigan, but I made an inquiry when this bill was called up heretofore which has not been answered, and that is why Mount Vernon square is not a suitable and proper place for this library and why we should appropriate $250,000 to buy a lot?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The answer to that is that a great many Senators and a great many of those interested in the library thought we ought not to build it on any of the public squares in the city of Washington. The objection was so strong on the floor of the Senate that the committee thought it wiser under all the circumstances to buy a site.

Mr. CHANDLER. What will the Senators do who think it is not wise to buy a site, but that it is wise to use Mount Vernon square? What is their duty?

Mr. MCMILLAN. We want to avail ourselves of the offer of Mr. Carnegie to erect a four or five hundred thousand dollar library building in this city. The great object to be accomplished is to secure the erection of the library as proposed by Mr. Carnegie; and it seems to me to accomplish that we can afford to spend a little money.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know that Mr. Carnegie has made a magnificent donation to the District of Columbia, which I wish should be secured for the District, but the idea was that the District should get it without paying any money for it. Mount Vernon Square is absolutely a suitable and proper place, which we can get without money and without price. I am opposed to appropriating $250,000 to buy a lot for the erection of a building, and therefore feel bound to object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

CODE FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate now proceed to the formal reading, to and including page 248, of the bill (H. R. 8571) to define and punish crimes in the district of Alaska and to provide a code of criminal procedure for said district.

Mr. CULLOM. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is in order.

Mr. HOAR. I will move to adjourn unless there be some special reason assigned why an executive session should be held.

Mr. CARTER. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that there is no desire to displace the regular order, except for a purpose that is manifestly and clearly demanded by the public interests and which is self-evident to everybody.

Mr. CULLOM. I am perfectly willing the Senator shall have his bill taken up and allow the unfinished business to be set aside temporarily.

Mr. STEWART. I object.

Mr. CULLOM. But I am not willing that the bill shall now be taken up otherwise.

Mr. STEWART. Objection is made, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him without interfering with the unfinished business.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not object to the bill being taken up if the unfinished business be laid aside informally; but unless that arrangement is made, I propose to proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. HALE. I think if the Senator from Montana will renew his proposition that the formal reading of the bill shall be completed to-night, no other business to be done, that no objection will be made to that request. It will not interfere with anything else, but will simply dispose of the nominal reading. Everything will be left open to amendment after that, and every Senator who wants to scrutinize the bill can scrutinize it and offer amendments to it.

The motion of the Senator from Montana is simply in the direction of disposing of that indispensable thing, if any Senator insists upon it. It gives to the bill of the Senator from Montana the opportunity which was given this morning to the Navy personnel bill, of its being read formally, but it does not in any way commit the Senate or any Senator to any proposition contained in the bill. I hope there will be no objection to the request.

Mr. CAFFERY. I did not hear the statement of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I simply said—and I call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana—that the request of the Senator from Montana, if granted, does not in any way prevent scrutiny, amendment, or whatever may be desired to be done afterwards. It is simply giving the Senator an opportunity of having the formal reading of his bill, with no other business in any way interposing. I do not think that is a serious thing in the business of the Senate or an undue thing for a Senator to ask.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Maine, but if the bill is taken up at all I want it taken up so as to displace the unfinished business. The bill which stands as the unfinished business is, in my opinion, a very important bill, and if we are going to discuss it I want to know it, or if it is merely being held over us as a club.

Mr. HALE. The Senator in charge of that bill can make his own statement.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply want to say, so far as I am concerned, that I am not holding the anti-scalping bill over the Senate as a club, and have only held it, so far as I have had anything to do with it, as the unfinished business for the time being, for the purpose of ascertaining a little later on whether it will be practicable to consider the bill at this session. I had hoped that when the appropriation bills got further along we might have an opportunity to fairly consider the bill in the Senate. It has thus far occupied no time. I have freely allowed it to be set aside temporarily for one bill and another as they came along, believing that they were important bills and that they would take little time.

Now, I think it is but fair to the friends of that measure that it should be allowed to hold its place as unfinished business until it can be demonstrated whether we can take it up and consider it properly, or whether it ought to be set aside. I think that time has not quite come. I hope the bill will not be displaced by any motion at this time.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to again state to the Senate the request I made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill referred to by him may now be proceeded with until it is read through, without action upon the bill, no other business to intervene between now and the time of adjournment.

Mr. CULLOM. And without interfering with the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And without interfering with the unfinished business.

Mr. ALLISON. The long amendment having been eliminated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The long amendment having been eliminated.

Mr. CAFFERY. I see no reason for the reading of the bill now. I am perfectly willing to dispense with the reading of it when the bill comes up.

Mr. BATE and Mr. COCKRELL. You can not do that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL and Mr. TILLMAN. What is the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will restate the request. It is that the formal reading of House bill 8571 be now commenced and proceeded with until the bill is read through so far as it is reported by the committee, including 248 pages, no other business in the meantime to be transacted and the unfinished business not to be displaced.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think we ought to make the clerks stay here until 12 o'clock to-night. I think that is asking a little too much. I am willing for them to stay to a certain fixed hour.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the reading is begun, I give notice that a quorum must stay here to listen to the reading.

Mr. CARTER. I will suggest to the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to state to the Senator from Missouri that the major portion of this bill has been, by the consent of the committee, eliminated, and there are now only 248 pages, which can be read in two hours.

Mr. COCKRELL. That does not dispense with the reading of the bill, Mr. President, and we can not pass a bill without its being read.

Mr. CARTER. I have been directed by the committee to amend the report by striking out all of the bill after page 248, which embodies the code of civil procedure.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us not misunderstand each other. I am perfectly willing the reading shall be commenced and continued to a reasonable hour, but I am not willing that the Senate shall evacuate the Chamber and nobody be here but the clerk who stands at the desk to read the bill. It would be a disgrace to the Senate, a standing and burning shame that a body pretending to be legislative should conduct its business in that way.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have seen the Senator from Missouri passing bills here with others when there were only half a dozen Senators here, and sometimes nobody but the Senator from Missouri himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKRELL. That was when the Senate was legitimately in session, and when Senators were in the cloakrooms and could be readily assembled.

Mr. CHANDLER. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. COCKRELL. But now it is proposed to continue this matter after the hours when the Senate usually transacts business, and to have a clerk standing there at the desk reading the bill while all of us are at home and at dinner would be farcical and ridiculous.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not see any difference in the two cases.

Mr. CARTER. Any Senator may make a motion to adjourn when he feels that the clerks have been burdened sufficiently.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say one thing, if I may be permitted. I have myself in former years sat in that chair, called there temporarily by the permanent occupant, and have seen bills passed for five or six hours at the rate of two a minute, no one of which bills was read. I wish to add that as my contribution to the pending discussion.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Montana has asked me to withdraw the motion for an executive session for a moment; which I do.

Mr. CARTER. I do not understand that any objection has been preferred to proceeding with the formal reading of the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have simply given notice that a quorum must listen to the reading. That is all. I shall not object to the bill being taken up.

Mr. BATE. Let the bill be taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]?

Mr. CAFFERY. We can not stay here to hear the bill read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CAFFERY. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made; and unanimous consent is not given.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 17, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the Agricultural appropriation bill has come back from the Senate with sundry amendments and is now on the Speaker's table. I ask unanimous consent that the House disagree to all the amendments and ask a conference with the Senate on the bill and amendments.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] whether this matter has been considered by his committee since the bill came from the Senate?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not as a committee——

Mr. BAILEY. I mean by the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Then you are not able to say——

Mr. WADSWORTH. There has simply been a conference among several members of the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. The only point of my inquiry is whether the attention of our friends on the committee has been directed to this matter. Of course I have no objection——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not think any members of the committee have any objection. I have seen one or two of them.

Mr. BAILEY. On that statement, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the request of the gentleman from New York will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. WARNER, and Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi as conferees on the part of the House.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For hospital, including the same objects specified under this head for the Central Branch, $30,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the Clerk to read a preamble and resolution adopted by the house of representatives of the State of Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas President McKinley having declared in a recent public address that the "time has come for the Government to aid in the care of the graves of the Confederate dead;" and

Whereas many Confederate cemeteries are now in poor condition;

Resolved, That Congress be requested to at once adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to the end that the Government may take charge of all Confederate graves and cemeteries and bestow upon them the same care and attention as is now given the graves of Union soldiers or soldiers of the United States Army.

Resolved, That the chief clerk of this house send to our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of these resolutions.

Mr. DOCKERY. I call the attention of the House to the resolutions, and having done so, withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling attention to a matter which I may not later on have an opportunity of bringing to the notice of the House, when we reach the item relative to paying $20,000,000 to Spain for the Philippine Islands.

On the 13th of the present month the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Lyman J. Gage, made in Chicago a statement which was published in the Washington Post of the 14th instant, and which may be considered authentic. In the published interview he is reported to have said:

The situation in the Philippines does not give us any uneasiness. The opposition to the American occupation is entirely the effect of manipulation. The leaders have temporarily misled the people. But the strife will soon be over, and as soon as the natives have become quiet, so as to listen to reason, we have no fear that they will not acquiesce in all we propose to do there. As to the islands being a heavy tax on this country, that is all moonshine. The revenues of the Philippines will at all times be ample to defray all possible expenses of government.

Any ordinary expression, even by officials of this Government, might not require notice here; but, Mr. Chairman, when the head of the Treasury Department of the United States gives forth in an authentic interview, published in the newspapers of this country, a statement that the anxiety of the people as to the great expense that will be incurred by our Government in permanently maintaining its power over those islands is "all moonshine," and when it goes out from the Secretary of the Treasury that the revenues to be raised from those islands will be at all times sufficient to defray the expenses incurred by this Government by reason of such a policy, such a statement, if not true, ought to challenge attention and meet contradiction.

This is the first time when anyone has been bold enough to assert that the situation in the Philippine Islands does not give this country any uneasiness. It was left for the head of the Treasury Department to announce the absolute ease with which the great problem that now confronts the American people is to be solved, though it is one at which the wisest may well be perplexed and the boldest staggered; and while he endeavors to mislead by his inaccurate statements, he has the effrontery to charge that other people are temporarily misleading the people of this country. It may be true that the strife in the Philippine Islands may soon be over. Doubtless it will, and doubtless the natives will "soon become quiet and listen to reason." They are being quieted with shot and shell, and no doubt will soon listen to the reason of force and butchery.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to enter into the question of the policy of permanently acquiring the Philippine Islands, or of the power of this Government to permanently govern them by military rule or as a colony. This policy I oppose and shall continue to oppose. It is in opposition to all our known principles of government and to the teachings of the fathers upon which our Republic is founded. It can only lead to disaster and complications which, in my judgment, will eventually aid in overthrowing the liberties of our own people. I desire simply now to put into the RECORD authentic statements furnished by our own Government, in publications authorized and issued in part by the War Department and in part by the Treasury Department itself, showing that at no time in the future, if we are to judge by what has happened in the past, can we expect the revenues to be derived from the Philippine Islands to defray the expenses which this Government will incur in maintaining its power and sovereignty over those islands.

At no time during the three hundred years that Spain has owned and maintained her power over those islands has the revenue she has received from them exceeded the sum of $12,000,000 per annum, and this revenue in large part has been raised by direct taxation—by customs, monopolies, and lotteries. In the imposition and collection of taxes, as we are told, Spanish ingenuity has been exercised to the utmost, and the basis of the financial system in the Philippine Islands, so far as Spain is concerned, has been a poll tax which every adult under 60 years of age, male or female, has been obliged to pay. There is no export duty on tobacco, but almost every article of import is heavily taxed, and on muslin and petroleum the duty is about 100 per cent of the cost.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if Spain, with all its tyrannies, all of its oppressions, its ingenuity, and efforts in the inauguration, development, and execution of an intolerable scheme of oppressive taxation on the people of those islands, has been unable to make the possessions to pay expenses, what should we expect? If, with an oppressive tax on every man, woman, and child in these islands, she has been able to raise only in the neighborhood of $12,000,000 revenue, what will this Government, under any fair and equitable system of taxation, be able to realize? We know that at least it will require 25,000 soldiers to "quiet the natives" and make them "listen to reason." These will cost us $25,000,000 per annum, not taking into consideration their transportation and the 25 per cent additional pay authorized to be paid for service in time of war. Where is the revenue to come from to pay this, if we are to raise it from the Philippines or to receive it from these islands? What are the sources of ample revenue? If we extort the $12,000,000 obtained by Spain, we will not have half enough.

On page 25 of Military Notes on the Philippines, a publication recently issued from the War Department of this Government, it is stated:

The public revenue is about $12,000,000 per annum, of which the larger part is raised from direct taxation, customs, monopolies, and lotteries. For the imposition and collection of taxes Spanish ingenuity has been exercised to the utmost, but the basis of the financial system in the Philippines is the poll tax, which every adult under 60 years of age, male or female, has to pay. There is no export duty on tobacco, but almost every article of import is heavily taxed. On muslin and petroleum the duty is about 100 per cent of cost.

But the expenses of governing these islands can not in the near future be estimated at less than forty millions per annum.

According to a British foreign office report (No. 1932, annual series, 1897), the total imports into the Philippine Islands in 1896 were valued at $10,631,250 and the exports at $20,175,000. The trade with several of the most important countries, compiled from the respective official statistics, was:

Country.	Imports.	Exports.
Great Britain	$2,467,000	$7,467,500
Germany	744,928	223,700
France	1,794,900	1,987,900
Belgium	272,240	45,660
United States	162,446	4,982,857
China	103,680	13,770
Japan	98,782	1,387,909

Whence, then, is to come these "ample revenues" which will at all times defray all possible expenses of government, so flippantly spoken of by Mr. Gage; and who has misled the people, Mr. Gage or those who have stated the facts? Let the facts as furnished by the officials of this Government answer.

But, sir, more than that. I desire to call the attention of the people of this country to the fact that England, which has more and greater and richer colonial possessions than any other nation on the face of the earth, has never yet obtained from any of them, in the administration of their government—in all of the years of her colonial system, and since she has exercised power over her colonial possessions—she has never yet been able, except in extremely rare instances, to obtain sufficient revenues from them to meet the expenditures involved in their control. I hold in my hand a list of the dependencies and colonies of Great Britain, which show the amount of the expenditures and also the total receipts derived from these possessions, and I again repeat that this class of statistics, made by the statistician of the Treasury Department and furnished to each member of the House, will show that in nearly every instance the expenditures of the English Government have been greater than the receipts. And let me call your attention to one or two specially. Take, for instance, British India. The expenditures there over and above the receipts from the revenues are nearly 25,000,000 rupees——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I should like to proceed a few moments longer.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent that additional time be given the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to put these figures in the RECORD solely for the purpose of showing to the country, through official sources, that except in a very few instances the English colonial system has been a burden and a source of expenditure of money to that country over the revenues she has received from them. The figures that I have at hand come from official sources, and I ask particular attention with reference to those showing the revenues derived from the Philippine Islands, which are taken from the military notes of officials there and furnished from the Adjutant-General's Office, under the direction and control of the War Department. The other statistics which I shall furnish are from a recent publication by Mr. Austin, the statistician of the Treasury Department, with reference to the colonial systems of the different nations of the world.

Take, for instance, as I said a moment ago, Great Britain, with more and richer colonies than any other nation on earth. We find that the expenditures that she is called on to meet on account of these great possessions in nine cases out of ten exceed the revenues obtained from them. Taking British India, we find the deficit in the revenues reaches the amount of 24,640,000 rupees. In the Cape Colony settlement the revenues show a deficit of 1,247,688 rupees. Newfoundland and Labrador show a deficit of $256,023; Canada, a deficit of £519,982. Australia shows a deficit of £391,288.

And so I might go through the entire list; and these statistics, these figures furnished by the Treasury Department itself, under the sanction and approval of the present Secretary of the Treasury, show that his statement when he made it to the public that "the Philippine Islands at all times would furnish all necessary and ample revenue to meet the expenses incurred in their government" is unreliable and inaccurate, and that his own statement was the "merest moonshine," and not authorized by the facts that were then resting in the hands and under the control of the Secretary himself. If he was in earnest and knew the facts as they are, it shows another effort on the part of those who essay to speak for the Administration to mislead the public and deceive the country into being satisfied with a policy which the American people do not approve—a policy that will be repudiated by the sober thought of the people when they pass upon it at the polls. When they do, I believe that both this new policy and its inaugurators and advocates will meet at the hands of the people a just and merited rebuke. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to put into the RECORD a statement of the figures to which I have referred and the statistics accompanying, which will be of interest in connection with the statements which have been made concerning the proposed policy of the Administration and the Government in dealing with these islands. I ask permission, therefore, to incorporate these statistics and to extend to some extent my remarks upon this question in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the authority already given the gentleman has that right.

Mr. BARTLETT. The following are the tables and statistics added, compiled from Colonial Systems of the World, recently published by the Government, and prepared by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department:

The Clerk read as follows:

At the Marion Branch, at Marion, Ind.: For current expenses, including the same objects specified under this head for the Central Branch, $25,000.

Mr. STEELE. I move to strike out the word "five" in line 18, and insert the word "six." In line 21, in the next paragraph, I shall move to strike out the words "and five," making the amount in the paragraph just read "twenty-six thousand" instead of "twenty-five thousand," and in the second paragraph "one hundred thousand" instead of "one hundred and five thousand." It is because of the posthumous fund turned into the Treasury not being available for the paying for effects, due the heirs of deceased soldiers, that we must increase this first paragraph to the amount indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 91, line 18, strike out the word "twenty-five" and insert the word "twenty-six."

Mr. CANNON. That is a transposition of appropriation from one item to another. The gentleman being upon the Board of Managers has better knowledge of it than I have, and I have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For subsistence, including the same objects specified under this head for the Central Branch, $105,000.

Mr. STEELE. I move to amend by striking out the words "and five" in the paragraph just read, so as to appropriate $100,000 instead of $105,000.

Mr. CANNON. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $229,750.

Mr. CANNON. I move to amend by striking out "nine" and inserting "five," so as to read "$225,750."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For president of the Board of Managers, $4,000; secretary of the Board of Managers, $2,000; general treasurer, who shall not be a member of the Board of Managers, $3,500; one inspector-general, $2,500; one assistant inspector-general, $2,000; clerical services for the offices of the president and general treasurer, $7,500; messenger service for president's office, $144; clerical services for managers, $2,400; agents, $2,400; for traveling expenses of the Board of Managers, their officers and employees, $10,500; for outdoor relief, $1,500; for rent, medical examinations, stationery, telegrams, and other incidental expenses, $4,000; in all, $42,444.

In all, $3,314,044.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, on page 95, line 3, I move to strike out "fourteen" and insert "ten."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fees of United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, $23,800.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of interrogating the gentleman in charge of this bill as to the paragraph just read, beginning with line 8, on page 99. I notice that the preceding paragraph provides for the salaries and expenses of district attorneys. And the paragraph just read is a provision of $23,800 for the fees of the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia. What does this official get now?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman will recollect that legislation was had two or three years ago, under the lead of the Committee on the Judiciary, touching the salaries, fees, and so on, of district attorneys and other officials of the United States courts. Very radical legislation was had covering all salaries in the main except the compensation of the district attorney for the District of Columbia. That legislation did not apply to the District. His compensation is, then, paid under the old system.

Mr. POWERS. Do you mean that the law allows the district attorney here the sum of $23,800 a year?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; he gets substantially $6,000.

Mr. POWERS. Then what becomes of the balance of this fund?

Mr. CANNON. It goes for the payment of clerks and other expenses, office hire, and incidental and necessary expenses connected with the office. These items are all regulated by law.

Mr. POWERS. How much does the district attorney receive?

Mr. CANNON. Not exceeding $6,000. He is paid, I will state, from fees, excepting the sum of $500, which is set apart as the regular compensation. All compensation in excess of that, up to the sum of $6,000, is paid by fees. Six thousand dollars, however, is the maximum.

Mr. POWERS. Do I understand that the district attorney of the District of Columbia is not classed as a "district attorney of the United States?"

Mr. CANNON. He is of course a district attorney of the United States, but the compensation for some reason was placed upon a different footing.

Mr. POWERS. Should he not come within the provisions of the preceding paragraph?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that this appropriation is in pursuance of the law upon the statute book, and amended under the lead of my colleague from Illinois and the gentleman from Iowa. And the gentleman may recollect that this matter was under consideration and advisement, and the whole scheme of emoluments or payments of these parties was changed. There was a comprehensive amendment offered, which, however, for some reason did not apply to the district attorney for this District. He is paid under the law as it was before the amendment was made, but for what reason the exception was made I am unable to say.

Mr. POWERS. The special information I desire is this, whether the district attorney of the District of Columbia receives $23,800 a year in fees or compensation of any kind?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; $6,000 is the maximum which can be retained by way of compensation from the fees.

Mr. LACEY. What, then, becomes of the balance of the appropriation—nearly $18,000? The general law adopted on the report of the Updegraff committee limited him to $6,000. That was never changed, as I understand it.

Mr. CANNON. The law provides also, however, the number of assistants, and for their payment, and when you add those amounts together you will get this total. That is all there is of it.

Mr. LACEY. But the assistants are salaried, also. There is a limit fixed by the general law. I ask the gentleman if that is not correct, as to their salaries?

Mr. CANNON. But they are paid out of the fees that are collected, and if there is anything left the remainder is covered into the Treasury.

Mr. LACEY. But does the district attorney pay his assistants in the District of Columbia? He does not in any other district.

Mr. CANNON. Why, they are paid out of the fees collected.

Mr. LACEY. But this appropriation is fees to the district attorney, not to his assistants. There is no requirement that he shall apply them in the payment of the salaries of assistants.

Mr. CANNON. The item reads:

For fees of United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, $23,800.

Mr. LACEY. I suggest that we pass this item over for a little further examination. I remember pretty well about this law when it was passed——

Mr. CANNON. Well, now, I will say to the gentleman that it is perfectly simple, I find, after consultation with a gentleman who is more familiar with these matters than I am. The fees earned by the district attorney under the law are covered into the Treasury, all of them. Now, in order to get them out you have got to appropriate them. Therefore it says:

For fees of the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, $23,800.

When you get them out, not exceeding $5,500 would go to the district attorney himself, and the remainder would go to the assistant district attorneys and such other officials as the law provides, and when they are paid the accounts must be audited and passed upon by the Comptroller.

Mr. LACEY. Who are the other officers?

Mr. CANNON. O Lord, I do not know that.

Mr. LACEY. That is the reason why I suggest that it will be better to pass this over until an examination can be made.

Mr. CANNON. This item is not new at all. It has run this way from year to year since the law was amended.

Mr. LACEY. There is nothing so sacred as an abuse after it has run a while.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; but I will say to my friend that there is no abuse in this matter. It is the ordinary method.

Mr. LACEY. The ordinary method used to be a uniform abuse. And I am told that the District of Columbia was not changed by the Updegraff bill. We ought at least to know where these items go.

Mr. CANNON. I will discuss any amendment the gentleman desires to offer. I have said to him frankly what the law is and what this appropriation is for. It is not to give the district attorney $33,000.

Mr. LACEY. I move to strike this item out, and pending that I ask my friend to pass this over for the present without prejudice, so that the item may be examined.

Mr. CANNON. Now, out of regard for my friend, I am perfectly willing on his request to pass it over; but he will have to look it up pretty rapidly, and when he finds it he will find it to be as I told him.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the item will be passed over.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I have had nothing to say in the deliberations of the House, because, being a new member, I felt that it was proper to listen and learn rather than obtrude myself upon those who have been here so much longer. But I hope I may be pardoned for a few minutes to say a word in connection with the $20,000,000 appropriation to be paid to Spain. I say in the outset that I am in favor of the appropriation. I think it was unwise to promise it, but to refuse to pay it would be a breach of faith. The President and the Senate having entered into a treaty contract with Spain agreeing to pay the $20,000,000 for the Philippine Islands, we are honor bound to vote the appropriation.

In fact, there is no escape from it without returning to a state of war or redelivering the islands to Spain—a disgraceful perfidy we could never be guilty of. But while I am in favor of the appropriation, and shall vote for it, I shall also vote for the strongest resolution declaratory of the policy of this country against permanent retention of the Philippine Islands and in favor of the speedy recognition of their independence. I have no sympathy with the idea sometimes expressed that such a declaration would embarrass the Administration. Why so? If the Administration, which means, strictly speaking, the President and his Cabinet, have a policy distinctly different from that of the Congress of the United States, the Administration ought to be embarrassed, and continue to be embarrassed until the voice of the people, as expressed through their representatives in Congress, is heard and heeded. The Administration has no right to a policy hostile to that of the people, unless imperialism is already an accomplished fact and republican government a thing of the past.

I read in an evening paper last night—an expansion paper—that—

> It has been the desire of the Administration to be left free to act as it may seem fit, and not to be hampered by the passage of any resolution declaring the policy of this country toward our recently acquired possessions.

If it be "hampering the Administration" for Congress to have a voice in declaring our policy, then I am in favor of "hampering," and the sooner the "hampering" commences the better for the country. Why should everything be left to the Administration? Is all the wisdom, all the farseeing statesmanship, all the patriotism, concentrated in the President and his official family? I have great respect for the good intentions of the President, but I am not willing to concede to him autocratic powers involving such vast interests for the present and coming generations. To clothe any man with such fearful responsibilities is, to say the least of it, dangerous, and not in accord with the principles of a republican form of government. The Czar of all the Russias would scarcely ask for more power.

Congress should resolutely take hold of the matter and, at least, make an effort to formulate some fixed policy in connection with the Philippine Islands, and when and whatsoever we do, let it be something worthy of the cause and the occasion.

The RECORD shows that the Senate has passed the following joint resolution, now on the Speaker's table, which may mean something, or nothing, according to the temper of the Administration—most likely nothing:

> Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States; but it is the intention of the United States to establish on said islands a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants of said islands to prepare them for local self-government, and in due time to make such disposition of said islands as will best promote the interests of the citizens of the United States and the inhabitants of said islands.

The same evening paper to which I have referred said of the resolution which passed the Senate: "The McEnery resolution is probably as harmless as any resolution could be on that subject." Yes; harmless from the Administration standpoint, because it throws no obstacles in the way; but harmful from an anti-expansion standpoint, because it lays down propositions subversive of our system of government and cold-blooded in its dealing with the Filipinos. If the Bacon resolution or something similar had been adopted, it would have been a step in the direction of a fixed and humane policy, but the McEnery resolution as adopted is like giving a stone in lieu of bread, or a serpent when a fish is asked for. To my mind it means either a colonial policy, that the Islands are to be held and governed, not as States or Territories, but as dependent colonies, or that, in the exercise of an unlimited discretion, they may be bartered or sold in open market to the highest bidder.

Either would be destructive of the fundamental principles upon which our system of government rests. Before we can embark in the business of acquiring and holding colonies, we must rewrite our Declaration of Independence and re-form our Constitution. The declaration "we are of right and ought to be free" would be a mockery in the ears of the liberty-loving people of those islands who for so long a time have struggled to throw off the yoke of Spanish oppression. What a spectacle we would present in the eyes of the world! The greatest Republic that the sun ever shone upon subjugating, by the strong arm of military power, a people not so enlightened as ours, it is true, but whose freedom from political thraldom is as dear to them as ours to us; shooting down the men and impoverishing the women and children that they may enjoy the beneficence of our boasted Christian civilization. Are we willing to throw to the winds the great underlying principle upon which our Republic rests, that "all government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed?"

"Taxation without representation" was one of the rallying cries of the fathers of the American Revolution, and here it is proposed to take and hold these islands subject to all the burdens of taxation, and without holding out the faintest hope that they shall ever become citizens, or their country admitted to statehood, or even be accorded the poor privilege of becoming a Territory.

The Filipino leaders will never be caught by the chaff of the last clause of the resolution: "In due time make such disposition of said islands as will best promote the interests of the citizens of the United States and the inhabitants of the islands."

Much is said about "pacification" and satisfying the Filipinos of our "good intentions," and yet they are told by this resolution, in effect, that the islands and the people are to be "disposed of" as the United States may see proper. No wonder they refuse to be pacified and prefer dying with arms in their hands. The world has seldom seen such a display of sublime courage as that of the brave islanders armed with bows and arrows standing to be mowed down by the shot and shell of American rifles and American cannon. Such a people deserve a better fate than bloody subjugation.

The second proposition presented by this resolution is that it involves the right of this Government to barter or sell the islands in open market to the highest bidder.

I came of a family of former slave owners. I was raised upon a plantation, and from my earliest childhood was taught that African slavery was right, and although only a boy at the breaking out of the civil war, I was thoroughly imbued with all the tenets of the proslavery party, and without entering upon a discussion of the question as to whether slavery was rightfully recognized by the Constitution or not, it is sufficient to say all this was settled by the arbitrament of arms, and to set the matter forever at rest the Constitution was amended so as to declare that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist in the United States or in any place subject to their jurisdiction," and with it came the prohibitive doctrine that never again shall the traffic in human beings be permitted to any individual within the jurisdiction of the United States.

If I had it in my power I would not expunge this constitutional provision, nor fasten again the shackles of slavery upon the poorest and humblest negro in all the land, nor would I again permit the traffic in human beings; and while this is denied to the individual, the Government shall never, with my consent, engage in the business on its own account. What is wrong in the abstract is wrong in the concrete. What is prohibited to the individual citizens must be prohibited to the Government.

We frequently hear it said that the islands may be sold to England or some other foreign power, or may be exchanged for other islands nearer our own shore. Yes, it may be done, but only in the exercise of an imperialistic power which is subversive of our system of government and would render us a republic only in name.

I said it was wrong to buy these islands of the sea, because when we bought the land we bought the people who live there; but I am not in favor of committing a still greater crime against Christian civilization by selling them to the power that will give us the best bargain. Far better that this proud Republic should be true to its traditions as the friend of the oppressed, and let the cost of wresting the islands from Spain be an offering upon the altar of universal liberty, and say to the struggling Filipinos: "We found you fighting for release from merciless oppression and our hearts went out in sympathy to you. With our guns and our gold we struck the shackles from your limbs, and though it cost us much money and many precious lives, we give it all to you and bid you Godspeed in your race for national independence."

I do not mean by this to say that it would be wise to immediately withdraw from the islands and leave them in disorder, but, as in Cuba, encourage and assist them in restoring order and in establishing a government. And whenever this kind of declaration is made known to the Filipinos and they become satisfied of our good faith, then "pacification" will come naturally and not at the muzzles of rifles.

But if we want to get back our gold, let it be, as in Cuba, a charge upon the revenues of the island until paid back. They would gladly agree to it, and this would give us a still better opportunity to exercise a kind of protectorate over them, and thus aid them in setting up a stable government, and secure their lasting good will.

I do not believe we will ever want those islands as a permanent part of our territory, but there will be no difficulty in retaining, by amicable arrangement, sufficient foothold for all naval purposes, and this, I think, is all we need; but if after the native government has been established and it should ever be thought that annexation is desirable by both parties, then it might be considered, but not otherwise; but I do not believe that, upon mature reflection, when the "war blood" has cooled and comes the sober second thought, annexation of these far-away islands, with their mixed population of a people wholly dissimilar to ours, having but little in common with us from a moral, social, religious, or business standpoint, will be seriously considered by our people.

The cost of maintaining our sovereignty, even if it could be peacefully acquired—which is impossible, as the fighting now in progress proves—would be enormous and out of all proportion to the probable, or even possible benefits to be derived. But when we take into consideration the fact that if annexation is now to be the policy of the Government it must mean a protracted war, if not along the lines which accord with the principles of civilized warfare, of a more annoying and demoralizing character, in which the crafty natives, familiar with every foot of the ground, hiding in the jungles and fastnesses, fortified by their burning zeal for freedom and intensified by their memories of centuries of oppression, will wage against us a war which will cost us a vast amount of money and, what is of far more consequence, much of the flower of American young manhood.

I give every meed of praise to our gallant soldiers and sailors who are so proudly and grandly sustaining the honor of the American flag in those islands, but I could wish that they were fighting, not for conquest and the subjugation of a people yearning for liberty, but for those principles of which our flag has been the emblem for more than a hundred years. While they are kept there by the will of the Government I shall favor every measure for their protection, support, and comfort, but I shall hail with delight the day, as doubtless they will, when with honor they can return to their homes and loved ones so anxiously looking forward to their coming.

But, aside from all these considerations, there arises the danger of foreign entanglements and complications in European politics, always treacherous and full of pitfalls.

Upon our own shores and in defense of our own homes, we need not fear the world. With such a navy as I hope soon to see, we can protect our commerce upon all the seas, but with a European war upon our hands and these scattered islands thousands of miles away to be defended, the cost in men and money would be immeasurable. With the lights before me, I am not willing to favor any policy fraught with so much danger to our people and so foreign to our precedents and traditions.

I may not indulge in prophecy, but I wish to sound a note of alarm and express the apprehension that if the policy of territorial expansion and the consequent imperialistic tendencies which must necessarily accompany it are put into effect, irretrievable disaster will be the result, and will bring not only the shame of having abandoned the landmarks erected by the fathers of the Republic to guide us in the march of progress, civilization, and Christianity, but may be the first line of an epitaph to be written upon the headboard of a dead republic. God grant that my fears may be groundless! [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Fees of district attorney, southern district of New York: For fees of district attorney for the southern district of New York, under section 825, Revised Statutes, $100.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I want to make the point of order against the following paragraph, and I can make it now, or shall I wait until the Clerk reads the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph must be read. The Chair understood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BALL] would also make a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the custom to read the paragraph, but in order that I may have an opportunity to make the point of order against it I simply desire to say to the Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Several gentlemen have indicated their desire. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BALL] has informed the Chair that he desires to reserve the point of order against the paragraph. The Clerk will read the paragraph, and then the Chair will hear gentlemen.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purpose of carrying out the obligations of the treaty between the United States and Spain concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, A. D. 1898, to become immediately available upon the exchange of the ratifications of said treaty, $20,000,000.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit the amendment to this paragraph which I send to the desk.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. A point of order. I make the point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BALL] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] have both indicated to the Chair that they desired to make the point of order against the paragraph; and the Chair will hear——

Mr. McRAE. I hope the point of order will be reserved until we can have the general debate that has been agreed upon between the gentleman from Illinois and myself.

Mr. BALL. I make the point of order against the amendment, but am willing that it shall be pending.

Mr. McRAE. I offer this amendment, and ask that it be read without prejudice to the point of order made by the gentlemen.

Mr. BALL. I make the point of order, but reserve it.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that it seems to me, if the point of order is to be made upon this provision, that it had better be disposed of now. I am quite willing, if no point of order is to be made, for the gentleman to offer his amendment——

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The point of order has been made.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). To be read, and then I am quite willing to arrange with him to allow debate on it; but——

Mr. McRAE. Will not the gentleman agree to carry out the private understanding that we had about further general debate, reserving the point of order, if he wishes, until that is done?

Mr. CANNON. I do not feel, at this stage of the session, justified in having debate if a point of order is to be made upon the paragraph as it stands. In the event that the point of order is to stand——

Mr. McRAE. The point of order was not made by me, and of course I can not withdraw it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I made the point of order.

Mr. McRAE. I understand that and I have no chance to make it if I had intended to make it. Now, if the gentleman from Illinois insists upon the debate upon the point of order, perhaps we will be denied the opportunity for those gentlemen I have promised some time since the beginning of this debate. I sincerely trust the gentleman will not now disappoint me and my friends on this side.

Mr. CANNON. I must say to my friend that while I am perfectly willing to agree to an hour on a side, which he and I talked about, I did not know at that time that any point of order would be made to the provision itself.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky makes a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Has the Chair recognized me to make the point of order on the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Texas both on that point.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the Chair indicate which gentleman he desires to hear at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kentucky now.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the point of order I make upon this paragraph I do not care to discuss at any length, because the matter was fully discussed on yesterday. It is in clause 2 of Rule XXI, which provides that—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

In stating my point of order, Mr. Chairman, I shall not go into a discussion of this rule, as I say the matter was fully gone over yesterday. The Chair has ruled upon this question. The only question involved in this discussion, as I conceive it, is as to the status of the treaty between the United States and Spain, which has been formally ratified by the Senate of the United States. If ratification alone gives effect to a treaty, I confess, sir, my point of order is not well taken. But in looking to this treaty itself it seems to me that it has not received life nor become effective, and therefore can not, under the decisions of our Supreme Court, become "the law of the land" until its ratification is complete, according to its own terms and tenor.

In the treaty between the United States and Spain the third article contains this significant language:

> The United States shall pay Spain the sum of $20,000,000 three months after the interchange of the ratification of the present treaty.

That of itself shows, sir, even if the Spanish Cortes do ratify this treaty, if the interchange has not taken place it will not, according to its own terms and tenor, become the law of this land.

But it is known of all men, and I suppose, sir, I am warranted in saying that Congress will take notice of the fact, that the Spanish Cortes has not ratified the treaty, and that the ratification on the part of the Federal Senate of this Republic gives no effect or dignity to that treaty in this country until the other contracting party has consented. And I go further. Even if that were true, even if Spain had formally ratified, in the language of the treaty itself, if the interchange of ratification had not been made, if each Government had not been formally notified of the ratification by the other, and such other indicia as goes to make up a formal ratification had not been gone into, the treaty would not be effective.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Let me suggest to the gentleman the decision of the Supreme Court, in the case of Cross vs. Harrison (16 How.), holds that the territory will not become a part of the territory of the United States until the treaty is ratified by the sovereignties.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Yes; and in another case the Supreme Court some years ago assented to the idea suggested by myself a few days ago in discussing this appropriation, when I stated that treaties ratified by the Federal Senate, if they require any legislation to carry them into effect, that provision requiring legislation is not the law of the land until the legislation necessary to carry it into effect is had.

Now, sir, it is clear that the treaty between Spain and the United States has not been confirmed and ratified; that is, there is no "existing law" to warrant this appropriation. And at the time this bill was introduced into the House of Representatives the Senate of the United States had not ratified the treaty and this appropriation was attempted to be thrust in here before the Senate had ratified the treaty.

The bill was reported on the 6th day of February. That, Mr. Chairman, briefly stated, is my objection to this clause of the bill. I think there can be no doubt but that my position is sound, that the treaty has not been formally ratified by Spain, and although it has been formally ratified by the upper House of Congress, it can in no event become effective until it is ratified, notifications exchanged, and the President of the United States issues his proclamation giving formal notice that it has been ratified by both parties and is the law of the land.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear, before the gentleman sits down, his views upon this point. It is a matter of public notoriety that the treaty has been confirmed by the Senate of the United States and signed by the President. What further is there for the United States to do to create the liability provided for in the third article of the treaty?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I tried to make that clear in my preliminary statement. If the Chair will turn to the third article of the treaty, the last two lines say, "The United States shall pay Spain the sum of $20,000,000 within three months after the interchange of ratifications of the present treaty." Do I understand the Chair claims that there has been any interchange in ratifications of the Treaty?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is claiming nothing; he is asking questions to have the gentleman from Kentucky discuss it fully in all its phases.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I do not understand that anyone claims, or that it is held by any gentleman on this floor, that the treaty becomes the supreme law of the land until the formal ratification, and the question now comes up whether a mere ratification by the Senate of the United States and the signature, as announced by the Chair, of the President to a treaty gives it full force and effect. What would be the effect if the Spanish Cortes should refuse to ratify it? Suppose the Carlists were in majority in the Spanish Cortes, and they should repudiate this treaty.

No contract can be perfect, Mr. Chairman, until both parties to that contract have given their assent to its terms and tenor. A treaty between nations is nothing more or less than a contract between them. No contract between individuals is complete and perfect until each have signed it, if it be a written contract, or until it has been assented to, if it be a verbal contract. The treaty is a contract, upon a larger scale, between the people of the United States and the people of Spain. The people of the United States have indicated their willingness, according to the legal formula, to stand by the written agreement or written contract between these two nations.

Mr. BAIRD. I understood the gentleman in his argument day before yesterday to hold that the treaty was not final and complete until it had become vitalized, as he said, by the payment of this very $20,000,000 provided for.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The gentleman is in error; I took no such position. I stated that the provision which required the appropriation of twenty millions of money by the House of Representatives carried with it the idea of the free and untrammeled volition of this House to grant or refuse the appropriation, and if the House of Representatives refused to appropriate the $20,000,000 it was in the nature of an amendment to that instrument or the acceptance of the treaty with a nullification of the clause requiring the payment of the twenty millions.

Mr. HAY. I heard the gentleman refer to a decision of the Supreme Court which struck me as being very important.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I have the decision here.

Mr. HAY. I should like to hear the points of that decision.

Mr. BARTLETT. Before the gentleman reads from that decision I should like to make a suggestion, if he will permit me. I desire to call his attention and that of the House to the seventeenth article of the treaty, which expressly provides that—

> The present treaty shall be ratified by the Queen Regent of Spain and the President of the United States, in agreement and with the approval of the Senate, and ratifications shall be exchanged in Washington within a delay of six months from this date, or earlier if possible.

I desire to call attention also to the fact, as stated in the pamphlet which I hold in my hand, that—

> It has not infrequently happened that treaties concluded by commissioners have failed to meet the approbation of a two-thirds majority of the Senate. This happened, amongst other instances, in the following cases: Treaty for annexation of Texas; treaty for annexation of San Domingo, 1870; treaty for annexation of Hawaii; Bayard-Chamberlain fisheries treaty, 1888. The treaty of peace in 1848, with Mexico, was not accepted as a whole as it came from the commissioners, but was conditionally ratified with certain amendments and omissions, subject to acceptance by Mexico, and when Mexico accepted the changes the treaty became operative.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I have not had time to examine these authorities as fully as I should like, but in what are known as the Head-money cases, in 112 United States Reports, this language is used by the Supreme Court:

> A treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations, and depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the honor and the interest of the governments which are parties to it.

That, sir, carries out exactly the idea that I was attempting to state when interrupted by the gentleman from Louisiana, that the Senate of the United States has ratified this treaty in as full and complete a manner as it can, and, as I am told, the treaty has been signed by the President of the United States. That completes every action required on our part. But that gives no life to the treaty or the contract, because we can simplify this matter by stating it in the terms of a contract rather than in treaty terms. It is a mere contract between nations, as contracts frequently exist between individuals.

This treaty or compact has no vitality, no life, no force until the Spanish Cortes agrees to it; and until the Queen Regent of Spain has also agreed to it (according to the terms of the treaty as read by the gentleman from Georgia) and until the formal notifications of the ratification have been exchanged the treaty is not in force.

Mr. CARMACK. We appropriate the money now nunc pro tunc.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Yes; as the gentleman from Tennessee suggests, we make the appropriation now nunc pro tunc. We appropriate the money now when there is no existing legal obligation upon us to do so, when we have no reason to know that the Spanish Cortes will ratify the treaty.

Mr. CARMACK. If they do not, the money will not be paid.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this question is deeper than one of dollars and cents. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to this appropriation upon principle, and I am disposed to take advantage of every technicality possible in order to defeat it.

Mr. DRIGGS. Is it not a fact that, so far as the United States are concerned, this treaty is now the supreme law of the land?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. No, sir; it is not the supreme law of the land.

Mr. DRIGGS. Not so far as we are concerned?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. No, sir. Would the gentleman contend that if he and the gentleman beside him had entered into a contract which was to be put into writing, and that contract had been signed only by himself, the contract would be in force against him, but not in force against the other party?

Mr. DRIGGS. I would not for a moment suggest any such position as that. At the same time I would contend that when the Constitution has expressly declared how treaties shall be made, and when a treaty has been ratified by the Senate and signed by the President, it becomes, so far as we are concerned, the supreme law of the land.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Oh, no. The gentleman confuses the case of a proposed treaty and a treaty which has been agreed to by both parties.

Mr. Chairman, I believe I have now about stated my objection, unless the Chair desires to hear something further; and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Chairman, I understood the Chair to recognize me to make the point of order. Not caring by whom it was made, I allowed the gentleman from Kentucky to go on with his statement without interruption. But I do not understand that he can reserve the balance of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no reservation of time on a point of order. The extent of the debate is purely within the discretion of the Chair. If the gentleman from Texas desires to be heard, the Chair will listen to him.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to discuss this matter at any great length. In view of the very full discussion yesterday upon a question precisely similar to the present, and in view of the rule which was invoked in the decision of that question, it seems to me there is hardly any necessity for a discussion to-day. It is true that yesterday I refused, as was my privilege, to sustain by my vote the decision of the Chair. It may be that in my zeal for a great enterprise—the Nicaragua Canal—which has been indorsed, so far as I know, by every national convention, and, so far as I know, by every State convention and by every political party which has taken action on the subject, I was led to favor a violation of Rule XXI, which I now invoke. If so, it was in order to legislate upon a question vital to the American people, upon which a hearing was denied here.

The only question, Mr. Chairman, under that clause in Rule XXI which provides that "no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill for an expenditure not previously authorized by law," the only question for the decision of the Chair turns upon the fact as to whether or not the treaty in question with Spain for the possession of the Philippine Archipelago by the United States and the payment by this country of $20,000,000 is now the supreme law of the land. So far as I am concerned, I am inclined to think that were the treaty ratified by both countries the $20,000,000 would be a just and valid demand upon the Government of the United States, regardless of the action of Congress. But no one will surely contend that where the treaty is made by its terms contingent on its ratification by the Government of Spain as well as by our Government that it will be of any force or effect until so ratified. I read now from the closing paragraph of the third clause of the treaty:

> The United States will pay to Spain the sum of $20,000,000 in three months after the exchange of the ratification of the present treaty.

Again, Article XVII of the same proposed treaty provides:

> That the present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by Her Majesty the Queen Regent of Spain, and the ratification shall be exchanged at Washington within six months from the date hereof, or earlier if possible.

Now, surely it will not be seriously contended that the present treaty has any practical force, effect, or vitality other than is expressed by its own terms. It will not be contended that it has any more force or effect than the treaties which have been characterized by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations on yesterday as "last year's birds' nests that never held an egg." No one will contend that should Spain fail of ratification, or refuse to carry out the treaty, which, so far as we are concerned, has already been ratified, that we would be under any obligation to pay the $20,000,000, or that the territory of the Philippine Archipelago would pass into our possession.

The Chairman properly asked the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] as to whether or not the Government of the United States had not already done all that was incumbent upon it to do and all that it could do to make the treaty of full force and effect. I answer to that question, yes, unquestionably. But, sir, where it requires two parties to a compact—if it requires the joint signature of myself and some other person in order to make a contract complete, it could not be held by any sort of legal reasoning that the contract was complete until both parties who were necessary to the compact had signed and all of the formalities had been complied with.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow an interruption just there?

Mr. BALL. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. Then, if I understand the argument correctly, it is that this will not be existing law until it has been enacted by the Spanish Government. In other words, that the law of this land, in this respect, must be enacted in Spain to make it obligatory and binding?

Mr. BALL. The gentleman from Iowa may have understood me in that way; but if so I did not make myself clear, and I will endeavor now to do so.

I say that while a treaty is the supreme law of the land, this is not yet a treaty, and the gentleman from Iowa is himself too good a lawyer to claim it is a treaty until the ratification of the Spanish Cortes has been secured. Such ratification is absolutely necessary before this proposed treaty can become the supreme law of the land. I think the gentleman understands that position. I think that every man on the floor of the House understands it. Even a tyro in law would understand that if the proposed treaty is rejected by the Spanish Cortes it would not be a treaty, but simply an offer to make one, and that by its terms it is required to be submitted to both Governments, and is of no binding force and effect until each Government shall have ratified and accepted its provisions.

Mr. CARMACK. What is the rule to which the gentleman refers for the statement he is making? I would be very glad if he would quote it.

Mr. BALL. The particular point I am making is sustained by Rule XXI of the House, which was invoked yesterday to defeat the Nicaragua Canal. It reads:

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

Mr. CARMACK. But the point, if the gentleman will permit me, that I suggest is this: This expenditure has been authorized by law so far as this country is concerned or is competent to make the law. It is of course conditioned upon the Spanish ratification. But if that ratification is not secured the money will not be appropriated. It does not, in making the appropriation, make a law for the payment of the money, but it provides that the payment shall go into effect in the event the treaty is ratified by Spain, and the authorization, so far as this country is concerned, for the payment is conditional. Unless Spain ratifies the treaty, therefore, the money will not be expended, because the appropriation is a conditional one.

Mr. BALL. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to make the point that this appropriation is not an appropriation——

Mr. CARMACK. Only a conditional appropriation.

Mr. BALL (continuing). Until certain things are complied with. But if the gentleman from Tennessee will observe the language of this provision he will find that it reads as follows:

> For the purpose of carrying out the obligations of the treaty between the United States and Spain, concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, A. D. 1898, to become immediately available upon the exchange of the ratifications of said treaty, $20,000,000.

Mr. CARMACK. To become available at that time?

Mr. BALL. Yes; but it has been decided time and again that every appropriation which is a charge upon the Treasury is an appropriation in the proper sense of the word. Now, I do not undertake to say that Congress can not make the appropriation in a proper way, but I do say that this is either an effort to make an appropriation or it is not, and that under Rule XXI there can be no appropriation properly put on this bill unless previously authorized by law. Now, surely the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] will not contend that we have any treaty of peace with Spain now, or that that treaty is the supreme law of the land or will become the supreme law of the land until everything that is necessary to vitalize it and to give it force and effect has been complied with.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Nor until the proclamation of the President makes it so.

Mr. BALL. It will not be complete, nor will our authority under the decisions read by the gentleman from Kentucky extend to the Philippine Islands lawfully, nor will they become a part of the territory of the United States, until this treaty is ratified by the Government of Spain.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And not then until the proclamation of the President. It requires the proclamation of the President to make a treaty binding.

Mr. BALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I fail to catch any distinction between the ruling of the Chair upon yesterday, that the appropriation was not in order and was subject to a point of order which provided for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, that is desired by the great bulk of the American people, and this appropriation. So far as I am concerned, if this treaty were ratified, if Spain had ratified the treaty also, I for one would be ready to vote to carry out the obligation of this Government regardless of how much I might deplore the terms of the treaty and the conversion of a war that was begun in the name of liberty and humanity into one of spoil, of conquest, and of greed.

Mr. CANNON. With the gentleman's permission, I should like to ask him there: This item to which the gentleman makes the point of order appropriates the money to be available only after the notice of ratification of the respective Governments has been exchanged. Now, my friend says that if the notice had come of the ratification by the Spanish Queen, or the Cortes, as the case may be, and the formal exchange had been made, he would be willing to appropriate the money. Now, aliunde the point of order, I will ask the gentleman why is he not willing to appropriate the money, not one dollar of which appropriation can be paid out of the Treasury unless the treaty is ratified by the Spanish Cortes and notice of the ratification by the respective Governments exchanged?

Mr. TATE. Because it is a violation of the rule.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman why he is not willing to make it conditionally, as he would be if the contingency had happened?

Mr. BALL. When the gentleman from Illinois, with such dramatic fervor, on day before yesterday held up this copy of the rules——

Mr. CANNON. I am not talking about the rule. [Laughter.]

Mr. BALL. I will answer the gentleman in my own way. The gentleman almost converted me to his side of the question, and to-day he has converted me, because, having retired temporarily from the ranks of the insurgents on yesterday, I now desire to transact the business of this House in the manner in which the gentleman from Illinois would have it transacted—under the due and orderly procedure as laid down by these sacred rules. [Laughter.] And I say now that the very language of the rule——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I am not speaking to the point of order. I think it is entirely likely that the point of order is well taken, but I ask the gentleman the question. He said if this was ratified by Spain, and the notice of ratification was exchanged, then he would be willing to vote the $20,000,000 appropriation. I ask him why not vote the appropriation now, withdrawing the point of order, when not one dollar of the appropriation can be paid unless the thing happens which he says if it does happen he will be willing to appropriate the money?

Mr. BALL. In answer to that, outside of the fact, which I will not plead, that it is an open violation of the rules, the last refuge of the minority on this side of the House——

Mr. CANNON. How did the gentleman vote yesterday?

Mr. BALL. I did not want any refuge.

Mr. CANNON. Oh!

Mr. BALL. But I will say to my friend that I deplore this treaty, that I deplore the payment of this $20,000,000 for subjects who have not yet been delivered; and while I am ready to respect the faith and honor of the United States Government, I never intend to vote for any measure or any purpose looking to the conquest of the Philippine Islands until I am forced to do so for the protection of the honor of this Government. That is why I insist on my position. And I wish to say, in conclusion, that everything about this—the very language of the appropriation—shows a recognition on the part of the great Committee on Appropriations that they well know that it is in violation of the rules of the House, because they undertake to make the appropriation available upon the exchange of the ratification of the treaty. That shows that they realize that the treaty is not the law of the land until such ratifications have been exchanged.

Mr. CANNON. Why, it would be a bold man, indeed, who would propose by any legislative enactment to pay one dollar or one cent until the treaty was ratified by both Governments and formal notice has been given. The gentleman finds authority to satisfy his own judgment, and he is the keeper of his own judgment about making the point of order here. Now, that is for him.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me suggest to my colleague that should the Spanish Cortes make it a condition of ratification that the twenty millions must be first paid, or we should be in favor of paying this sum within this bill, I should be in favor of paying the twenty millions in advance of the ratification if it should become a condition.

Mr. CANNON. I would not. The Spanish Cortes will have to ratify, so far as I am concerned, this treaty as the Senate of the United States have ratified it before I will vote one dollar or one cent to pay them. But as these are the closing hours of the session, and we are soon to depart to our homes, we place this item in the bill for the consideration of the House and committee; and by its very terms not one cent can be paid until after the treaty is approved by both countries and due notice is given. Now, then, I am quite content, if the point of order is well taken, that the gentleman shall insist upon it, because I believe in the substantial enforcement of Rule XXI. Aye, more; I am willing that the gentleman who yesterday sought to trample upon it, and spat upon it and denied it, should here make the bare technical objection, if he wants to; but I would not like to take him into full connection with the church as a convert to Rule XXI. I would keep him about six months under probation, because I do not believe he now believes in Rule XXI. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELL. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois this fact, that all treaties must stand on a different footing from a law. That is, I mean to say this: That if you make a treaty with an Indian tribe or with anybody else, and afterwards that treaty is confirmed by Congress, as it must be, that the law dates from the time the treaty was made between the two powers.

Mr. CANNON. That depends upon the treaty.

Mr. BELL. Yes; it does. It has been decided——

Mr. LINNEY. Absolutely.

Mr. BELL. It has been decided over and over again in criminal cases. For instance, a treaty between the Ute Indians and the Government of the United States was made and it was subject to the approval of Congress. Between the time of the making of the treaty and the ratification that great cannibal, Albert Packer, killed five men in the San Juan country and ate them, wintered on them. The question came up in the court afterwards, Was that Indian ground subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or was it a crime that could be tried by the State of Colorado? Now, the treaty had been made, but had not been confirmed by Congress. All the decisions of the United States courts were gathered, and the line of decisions were that like treaties after confirmation by Congress relate back to the time of the agreement between the treaty-making powers. I think it is the same in this case. Now, suppose that this treaty is made, it relates back, if it is confirmed, to the time of the agreement of the two parties.

Mr. CANNON. Well, now, the gentleman may be correct about that. I know one thing, however. Whether he is correct or not, whether this provision is subject to a technical point of order or not, I know one thing—that there can be no dollar of money go out of the Treasury under this provision until after it is ratified by Spain and due notice is given of exchange of ratifications. Now, if that should not happen for three months, and in the meantime no notice should be given for three months and Congress not in session, it might involve an extraordinary session of Congress. But I think I know another matter. I hope I do. That whether this point of order is well taken or not, so far as this House is concerned, I hope and believe before the expiration of this Congress that this matter will come up under conditions where Rule XXI does not apply, if it applies here. And I am not—I will say it respectfully—I am not here to find fault with the gentleman who makes this point of order. You know what the boy said on the Fourth of July. When he was picking his nose and it was bleeding a little bit, a man said to him, "Sonny, don't pick your nose." "Oh," said he, "it is Fourth of July, and I will pick thunder and lightning out of it if I want to." [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. I am not discussing the point of order. My friend from Iowa is going to do that. He is a lawyer, and I am not much of one.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does not the gentleman from Illinois think that if a mere rule of the House stands between the House and an important matter of legislation like this the House ought to overrule the rule and do what is right on a national and international matter?

Mr. CANNON. No; I do not think so. The rules of this House, made under the Constitution, are the growth of a hundred years and over. Therefore, I believe the rules ought to be enforced, and if it is held that this item or this paragraph is technically subject to the rule, I believe the rule ought to be sustained.

But there are other rules under which there can be legislation as well as appropriation bills which can be invoked to take care of this $20,000,000, and no doubt will be invoked to take care of it. I stand by the rules, and shall vote to enforce the rules; not vote against it, to break it down yesterday and then seek to have it technically enforced to-day. Yes; gentlemen have the right——

Mr. SIMS. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no feeling growing out of the action of this House on yesterday, and I trust that this matter may be approached in no spirit of ill feeling because of any ruling that may have been made yesterday, or by the invoking of the rule yesterday.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. LACEY. I prefer not to be interrupted now, but will answer later.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. But as I made the point of order, I desire to direct the attention of the gentleman to this fact, that several days ago, before the controversy arose yesterday in regard to the construction of this rule, I announced my purpose on the floor of fighting this appropriation in every way that lay in my power. I have no feeling as far as the rule yesterday was concerned. My motives are entirely higher and more patriotic and loftier than any feelings about the construction of the rule.

Mr. LACEY. I am glad to know that my friend takes this lofty view of it. In some discussion we had to-day the action of yesterday was appealed to on the ground of technical invocation and the peculiar construction of this rule. Mr. Chairman, "the letter killeth, but the spirit keepeth it alive." We must go to the spirit of this word "law." What is the meaning of the words "existing law" within the meaning of this rule? It means such authority of law as shows that the legislative body or the authority having the power to act upon it can determine the conditions out of which an appropriation shall arise. We have here a treaty made by the President of the United States, and it is confirmed and ratified by a two-thirds majority of the United States Senate.

As far as the United States of America is concerned, that is existing law within the spirit, the fair spirit, of this rule. It may be true, it no doubt is true, that in order to make this law operative elsewhere the consent of some one else must first be obtained, in accordance with the laws of another country. But we are not legislating for another country; we are legislating for the United States of America. Now, have the previous steps to be taken by the Government which we do control been taken? If so, then it is existing law within the spirit and fair purport of this rule. Otherwise it would be impossible to make a treaty and provide by a law, with that treaty, hand in hand, the money to carry it out.

Then, again, what is existing law? The existing law is a state of war—war with Spain declared by the House and the Senate and approved by the President of the United States. That is existing law. Whatever appropriations may be necessary to carry on that war are authorized by existing law and may be put on appropriation bills. The act declaring war is a law to base it upon. The termination of this war is part of the war itself, just as necessary as to carry it on, and a good deal more important. Is it possible that this House is bound under the effect of some technical rule that prevents it, when the condition of war has been declared, from appropriating money to carry it on and with which to terminate it?

Now, Mr. Chairman, on other grounds this point of order ought to be overruled. First, it is "existing law" within the meaning of that section. It may be true, and I concede it, that the existing law as made by us to be operative requires the signature of Spain or the confirmation by the Cortes, but it is existing law so far as we are concerned. We have enacted it, and it provides that we shall appropriate money. The President of the United States and two-thirds of the Senate have said to Spain: "Here is a treaty; that is the law proposed by us; it is the will of the United States; if you accept it it becomes operative, binding you. Now, here are $20,000,000 that must go with it." It seems to me clear that the term "existing law" does not mean the strict technical thing contended for by the gentleman from Texas. Otherwise a treaty placed in the form and in the manner pointed out by the Constitution of the United States, carrying with it and requiring, in order to make it operative, a payment of money could not, under the rules of this House, carry an appropriation.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It would require a special bill.

Mr. LACEY. A special bill might be offered, but it would require a special rule to get it up. The appropriation would not be authorized by existing law, and it would require a special rule to reach it. The Committee on Appropriations has no privilege in a special appropriation. It seems to me, on the other hand, that this is an appropriation to terminate the war; which war was declared by law, and that the appropriation to terminate it comes within and is authorized by existing law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I entirely concur with the views of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] on this point of order. It seems to me that gentlemen who have spoken in favor of the point of order misunderstood the situation. If it were true that the treaty is the only authority for this appropriation, the point would doubtless be well taken. But it must be kept in mind that the appropriation is a part of the treaty itself; consequently the treaty can not stand as the authority for it; it is in a sense contingent; it is a conditional appropriation, and necessarily so.

In the exercise of the treaty-making function it becomes necessary sometimes to employ the legislative agency of the Government to cooperate with the treaty-making power; the two departments must proceed together; they must do their work in a sense contingently. It seems to me that the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] that the declaration of war is the basis for the treaty and of the appropriation is unanswerable.

It seems to me that no one can doubt the right of this House, under Rule XXI, to appropriate money necessary to carry on a war and to conclude a peace. The declaration of war passed by Congress less than a year ago is all the authority that this House needs, under Rule XXI, to appropriate $20,000,000, or any other sum. To conclude peace is an incident of the power to make war. It grows out of the war. It is as much an incident of warfare as an appropriation of money to arm and equip soldiers in the field, or for any other purpose.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] allow me a suggestion?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARMACK. Rule XXI provides:

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

Now, my suggestion is that this expenditure has been authorized by law—by the treaty-making power of the United States; but it can only be made upon the happening of a future contingency, and when so made it will be made in pursuance of existing law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another provision of the rule which must be taken into consideration in the determination of this question—the provision authorizing appropriations for "public works or objects already in progress." The clause is not confined to the construction of public works. Any "public object in progress" which involves an appropriation for its prosecution or for its conclusion authorizes the House under this rule to make the necessary appropriation.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that the paragraph in this bill instead of being stated in the terms of the text had simply provided that there be appropriated out of the Treasury a sum of money, not otherwise appropriated, not exceeding $20,000,000 be expended by the President in concluding peace with Spain. Is there a man on the floor of this House who believes that such a provision would be open to a point of order? "A public object in progress." A war with a foreign country, under the terms of this rule, authorizes Congressional legislation and Executive action. The very safety and peace of the country lie at the foundation of this proposed Congressional action.

I submit, therefore, that this proposition is clearly within the rule—within its spirit, and I believe clearly within its letter—and I hope the Chair will overrule the point of order.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, this House makes its rules by authority of the Constitution. The treaty-making power, under the Constitution, concludes treaties; and the latter power, if the relative importance may be measured, is superior. Nobody will claim that the House could adopt a rule that in any way infringed upon the treaty-making power. So that it is a power independent of the House. The treaty-making power, in pursuance of its constitutional authority, has concluded a treaty; and I rise to suggest that a rule of this House can not be invoked to defeat a proposition in an appropriation bill or elsewhere to carry out the provisions of a treaty made by the President and the Senate under the Constitution.

Mr. GAINES. I wish to ask the gentleman a question before he sits down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not desire to hear any further discussion on the subject.

Mr. GAINES. I desire simply to ask a question.

Mr. BELL. I desire a moment. I am a member of a committee——

The CHAIRMAN. This is a matter under the control of the Chair.

Mr. GAINES. I desire to address the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not wish to hear any further argument on the point.

Mr. GAINES. I propose to read the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the question. The objection raised to the pending paragraph invokes that part of Rule XXI which provides that "no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law," etc. The question is as to whether there is any law that authorizes this proposed appropriation. Under the Constitution all treaties made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land. A treaty is a compact or agreement between two sovereign, independent states. The treaty does not become binding and effective until it has been executed by both the contracting sovereign states.

The appropriation in the pending bill against which the point of order is made is to carry out and make effective the treaty of peace negotiated and executed by the commissioners on the part of the United States and those representing the Spanish Monarchy at Paris on the 10th day of December last. The question arises, then, whether this treaty has reached that stage of completion, or rather ratification, where it can be treated as the supreme law of the land. Article XVII of the treaty reads as follows:

> The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof and by Her Majesty the Queen Regent of Spain, and the ratification shall be exchanged at Washington within six months from the date hereof, or earlier if possible. * * * Done in duplicate at Paris the 10th day of December, A. D. 1898.

While it is true that the Senate of the United States has approved this treaty and it has been signed by the President, it has not as yet been ratified by Her Majesty the Queen Regent of Spain and there has been no exchange of ratifications at Washington, as provided for in the article of the treaty which the Chair has just read. That part of Article III of the treaty which contains the $20,000,000 clause reads as follows:

The United States will pay to Spain the sum of $20,000,000 within three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty.

This clearly shows that the Government of the United States does not become liable for the payment of the $20,000,000 until the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty at Washington. At the present time, then, there is no existing legal liability for the payment of which it is proposed to make the twenty million appropriation. The treaty itself does not become the supreme law of the land until it is ratified by Spain, as provided in the treaty, and the ratifications of the two Governments are exchanged at Washington. Hence the proposed appropriation is "not previously authorized by law." So the Chair feels constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, from that decision I respectfully take an appeal to the House.

Mr. CANNON. I hope my friend will not filibuster.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; I am not filibustering. I think the Chairman is clearly wrong, and I make the appeal for the purpose of placing the matter before the committee.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, is the appeal from the decision of the Chair debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BELL. Then, I want to ask the attention of the members present for a few moments.

I have been opposed to this entire measure from the first; but I concede that this appropriation becomes a debt of the Government after the treaty has been ratified. Now, there is one thing about which I have no doubt—that is, that it falls beyond and without the rule. If this is not obnoxious to the rule, then we ought to overturn the decision of the Chair.

Now, let us see what the rule is, why it is made, and what purpose is sought to be accomplished. This rule has been enacted for just one purpose, and one only, and that is to say to the House, "You shall not, under the guise of an appropriation bill, enact a statute upon which an appropriation may be made." That is all it does. You can not come in and provide for the employment of a commission, for instance. You can not come in and provide for the expenses of a treaty under this appropriation bill; but you can come in and make an appropriation which does not enact a new law, and provide the money to meet the appropriation which you will make.

Bear in mind when you make this appropriation you are not enacting a statute. You are not putting a law upon the statute books wherein an appropriation must follow as a matter of necessity. And that is the distinction which must be borne in mind—the distinction between an appropriation itself and the enactment of a law requiring an appropriation.

Now, as I said before, the treaty is different from the ordinary law of the land, as treaties take effect from their making and not from their approval. The treaty is the law, to all intents and purposes, as far as the lawmaking power of the United States can make it such. The President has acted upon it under the Constitution, the Senate of the United States has acted upon it, and we have done all that we could do under the Constitution. Now, we make an appropriation, an appropriation for an existing law, as far as this body is concerned, and I take it that if the point is good, that if you enact a law to-morrow and it was to take effect in six months from to-day, on that day, then, you could make the same point of order against that appropriation that you can make against this one. But the making of an appropriation was not what the rule was intended to avoid, but to avoid making the basis for the treaty.

Mr. LINNEY. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion just there?

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. LINNEY. Is this not the case of a condition precedent?

Mr. BELL. That is correct. I say it is. But that does not come within the spirit of the law at all. It was not within the purview of the rule to avoid simple appropriations? It is not within the rule to say that an appropriation could not be made until the law actually existed. The intention of the law was that you should not enact a statute instead of making an appropriation. In other words it was to confine the appropriation bills to their legitimate function of making provision for the expenditures authorized by law made previously. It is not the object of the law to say that we shall not make a provisional appropriation. The object and spirit of the law are that you shall do nothing in the bill except to make appropriations. That is the point in a nutshell.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to suggest, with the gentleman's consent, in this connection that this appropriation is no broader than the treaty.

Mr. BELL. Not a particle.

Mr. LACEY. And if it does not go beyond the terms of the treaty, it is already authorized by law.

Mr. BELL. Certainly. But a complete answer to the whole proposition is embodied in the proposition that the rule is to prevent the House from doing anything under the guise of an appropriation bill except to make an appropriation. We are directly within the rule when we make an appropriation, whether conditional or otherwise, because that is the object of the rule—to confine you to the making of an appropriation and to prohibit you from enacting any other law.

Mr. CARMACK. This money will be expended, when it is expended, in pursuance of existing law.

Mr. BELL. Yes; and under this rule you can not make a law for the spending of the money. Now, that seems to me so clear that it is not subject to mistake.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Colorado allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to say to the gentleman, with his permission, that by the very letter of this provision this appropriation becomes either an appropriation or no appropriation.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is to say, it becomes an appropriation in the event that the treaty is ratified and the notice of ratification exchanged.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And by its own provisions it is so hedged and limited that in the event there shall be no existing law—that is to say, in the event that no ratification shall be exchanged—the appropriation is inoperative. Therefore it is either no appropriation at all or it is an appropriation strictly in accordance with existing law.

Mr. BELL. Yes; but my other position is unanswerable; and that is that this rule is put upon this House for the purpose of warning the House that in this bill it can not enact any legislation except to make appropriation—no legislation enacted in other bills.

Mr. LINNEY. Appropriation founded upon existing law.

Mr. BELL. Founded upon existing law; but the fact that the law is existing or is contingent does not touch the spirit of it at all. The prohibition of the rule is that you shall not enact any other legislation than appropriations. That is all there is to it; and it seems to me it is as clear as day.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am not able to agree with the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL], and now I am not in sympathy with this point of order, or, as it seems to me, with the spirit which inspired it; yet the point of order being made, in my judgment, under Rule XXI the amendment is subject to the point of order and for the following reasons. Just a word, and then I will sit down.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois answer one question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. Have we any information showing that the Spanish Government has ratified the treaty?

Mr. CANNON. We have not. The fact is that a treaty was made which becomes law when ratified by the United States and by Spain.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. This appropriation does not become law until then either, does it?

Mr. CANNON. No; I will come to that in a minute. The United States has ratified the treaty. Spain has not ratified it. Perchance she may never ratify it.

Mr. LACEY. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I did not want to take up much time.

Mr. LACEY. I think you can not take up too much time on a proposition of this kind, whether we shall end this war with Spain or not. Now, if we pass a bill here appropriating $20,000,000 to take effect upon the final ratification of this treaty, then we make an appropriation, do we not, in pursuance of law, authorized by law.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will say to my friend——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. And not available unless there is a law.

Mr. LACEY. Not available unless the law is completed.

Mr. CANNON. I will answer my friend. The condition is this: Technically this treaty does not become law until it is ratified according to its provisions. Nobody will dispute that. Has it been so ratified? Nobody will say that it has.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Illinois pardon one question?

Mr. CANNON. Just let me state my position, and then I will answer my friend.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. This comes in right here and it will help you right here.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to my friend in a moment, but I want to state my position briefly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Very well.

Mr. CANNON. No man in this House claims that the treaty has been ratified so that it is a law to-day. Now, we are morally certain that it will be ratified a little later on, but to-day it is not the law of the land. Gentlemen say we have done all we can to make it law. Yes, except to receive notice of the ratification by Spain, and when that notice is received, then for the first time it becomes a law.

Mr. LACEY. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. CANNON. I want to state my position, and then I will yield. Now, the Committee on Appropriations believed that no harm could come in making this money payable when the notice of ratification is exchanged between the two Governments.

But in comes Rule XXI. I want to state it, just for a minute, and then I will yield. Now, that being the condition, here is the rule. Let me read it:

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

Authorized by law—prior thereto. Now, then, is this authorized by law this minute? No. Now, gentlemen may say that is technical. You may say that it falls in the letter of the rule, and that the rule, when made, did not contemplate such a provision as that. I am not replying to that statement, if it is made. Yet there is a law and a rule, and invoked as it is, and the Chair having ruled as he must rule, to sustain the rule, it destroys the amendment. I believe that the Chair ruled correctly, and therefore shall vote to sustain the Chair.

Now, then, I beg gentlemen to keep this distinction in their minds: This rule was made to cover mere matters of appropriations, and its object was to keep the appropriations in the general appropriation bills in pursuance of law. Now, the House has full authority through its other committees to legislate. We can make this appropriation and legislation both, under other rules of the House, not upon the general appropriation bills, and I have no doubt will before this Congress adjourns. Now, that is all I desire to say about it——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. LACEY. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask the gentleman this question: Suppose the treaty had been made to pay twenty millions at the time of the exchange of the papers. Then do you hold that we could not make an appropriation in this House in advance of that time?

Mr. CANNON. Now, the gentleman supposes an impossible case.

Mr. LACEY. It is quite a possible one.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. LACEY. If the money was coming to us, we would require that Spain should pay it on the spot.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Because it is not in the power of commissioners appointed by two countries to make a treaty that is binding as law I think answers that question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The language of the rule is, "unless previously authorized by law."

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, this treaty will or will not be ratified by the action of the Cortes. If the Cortes shall ratify the treaty, then it becomes law. Now, when it becomes law, of what date does it become law? Why, it becomes law of the date of the making of the treaty and not the day of the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. CANNON. If it does not ratify it, when does it become law?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Never; and your appropriation becomes law then never. The gentleman follows the other line. I am going on a line of what I know will take place. But even if it is never ratified, your appropriation never becomes law; therefore, you can not say an appropriation has been made contrary to existing law, because no appropriation has been made.

Now then, if, upon the other hand, the treaty shall be ratified, then it will be in accordance not only with then existing law, but now existing law. And why? Because when the treaty is ratified, then it dates back as a law of the date of its making. It is not dated from the ratification of the Cortes at all.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if my friend will allow me. If this provision as it is carried in the bill is enacted, it is one of two things. It is an appropriation, or it is legislation. If it is an appropriation, it must be under existing law if the rule is invoked against it. If it is legislation, then it is not in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is not one of two things. On the contrary, it is one thing, and it is a different thing, and that one thing is this: It is an appropriation to take effect upon the happening of a contingency, and if the contingency does not happen, it does not take effect, and if the contingency shall happen, then it will take effect in consequence of and in pursuance of law. It becomes law at the taking effect of the contingency, namely, the ratification, and it becomes a law not on the date of ratification by the Cortes, but the day of the making of the treaty.

Mr. BELL. Prior to the time of ratification?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Prior to the time of ratification.

Mr. CANNON. Now, my friend confuses this rule with other rules, and gets mixed up with what he wants to do. I take this rule and the provision. I regret exceedingly that the point of order was made against the rule, but it was made by two gentlemen on that side of the House. Anybody can invoke the rules of the House, and when invoked, they should be enforced without regard to who invokes them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Unless the interests of the country stand in the way, and then they ought not to be.

Mr. CANNON. If the interests of the country stand in the way, if it can not be reached under this rule, reach it under the other rules.

Mr. BRUCKER. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois one question. Under Article III of the treaty $20,000,000 becomes payable within three months of the time of notice of ratification. Now, unless this money is appropriated at this time and the Spanish Cortes should at once ratify this treaty, is there any authority of law for the payment of this $20,000,000, except by appropriation of an act of Congress?

Mr. CANNON. Of course not.

Mr. BRUCKER. Then, in that event, it would come to this point, that this country would stand in the eyes of the world as a defaulter unless there was a special session of Congress called to appropriate this money?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I recommend my friend to go to the two parties on that side of the House and get them to withdraw their point of order.

Mr. BRUCKER. I not only go to the members making the point of order, but I appeal to every member of this House on both sides not to allow any "technical" construction of this rule to stand in the way of our meeting our obligations, national or otherwise, when they fall due.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, you voted yesterday to spit on the rules, and you are now indulging in a subterfuge to try to justify yourselves.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. They ought to be spit upon when they stand in the way of the public demand.

Mr. BRUCKER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I did vote yesterday to override what seemed to me to be a very technical construction of this rule, not only in justice to myself, but because I was satisfied there was a demand, not only by all the people of my district, but by the people of the United States, for the building of the Nicaragua Canal, for that was the question then before the House, and I plant myself to-day upon that broad ground. The people will demand that our obligations shall be observed, and will not permit any finespun technical construction of some rule of this House to stand in the way. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Let me say to the gentleman that in my judgment there is a majority of the House of Representatives that stands ready when the rules are invoked by any one member of the House to enforce them, the gentleman's notions to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman, in all seriousness, if this rule does not apply to the committee as a committee, without any special invocation, and does it not apply to the House as a House without being invoked, or are the rules simply sleeping giants, to act only when they are invoked?

Mr. CANNON. The rules do not act only when they are invoked, but it is within the power of any man to invoke them. Why the minority, or anyone from the minority, should seek to stamp on them when they constitute the only protection of the minority is more than I can conceive.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard one moment in respect to the new doctrine announced by some gentlemen on the floor—the "higher law" doctrine. It is not Democratic, whatever else it may be. The suggestion has been made in derision, because the technical provisions of the rules are invoked. Are not all rules technical? Undoubtedly they are; and it was intended that they should be. I have understood by the reading of the history of the Democratic party for one hundred years that it has always stood for strict construction.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Missouri is mixed.

Mr. DOCKERY. No, I am not so mixed as my brilliant friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is on this question. The Democratic party has always stood for strict construction. So far as this point of order is concerned, let me say that I did not invoke it, but the gentlemen who interposed it had a technical right under the rules to do so. Until the treaty is finally consummated by the action of the Spanish Cortes, this whole question may possibly be more or less in dispute. When, however, the Spanish Government shall have ratified the treaty, then, in my opinion, no American citizen can antagonize the appropriation except at the menace of national honor. Again let me say that I have not invoked this point of order, but I do desire to sustain the Chair when the Chair stands for the integrity of the rules. And I believe that this side of the House will sustain his decision without regard to the merits of the proposition against which the point of order was made.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate be closed upon the appeal within one hour, that hour to be divided, of course, between the two sides.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I believe I took the appeal from the decision of the Chair. Who is to close the debate?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, another parliamentary inquiry. Is it competent for the committee to close debate?

Mr. CANNON. I think it is; it did yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. In a motion of this kind the Chair thinks that the appeal does not take the control of this matter from the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I did not ask that.

The CHAIRMAN. That would necessarily give the gentleman in charge of the bill the close on this debate.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I hardly think the gentleman's motion is necessary, because I think that the committee will be ready to vote inside of an hour. But I am not willing to see a motion of that kind prevail without raising the point that in my view the Committee of the Whole can not close any debate except the debate under the five-minute rule. I think, however, that if the gentleman asks unanimous consent to close the debate in half an hour, it can be done.

Mr. CANNON. I think probably that gentlemen who wish to take part in the debate will need an hour. Without pressing my first motion—withdrawing it for a moment—I will ask unanimous consent that the debate be closed in an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman in charge of the bill asks unanimous consent that all debate on the question arising on the appeal from the decision of the Chair be closed in one hour. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] be permitted to control thirty minutes of the hour, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas, that the gentleman from Illinois control thirty minutes of the time, and the gentleman from Mississippi the other thirty minutes? The Chair hears no objection; and it is so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARIS].

Mr. FARIS. Mr. Chairman, I had no thought or purpose of interjecting a word into this interesting and important debate until the present condition of the proceedings before the committee arose. I have no doubt, sir, that the decision just announced by the Chair must be sustained by the committee in the pending appeal. The rule which has been invoked has been under such profound and exhaustive discussion and consideration in this committee for the last few days that to my mind there can be no doubt that it applies to the pending question in the manner stated by the occupant of the chair. Mr. Chairman, I believe it is absolutely unwarranted for this House of Representatives, as long as controlled by a rule of this character, to make an appropriation of public money in anticipation of the enactment of some law in the future. I therefore am clear that the Chair is correct in his ruling.

Mr. Chairman, what particularly brought me to my feet is the political phase of the situation on the question now before the committee. I call attention of this body to what I believe the country will take note of in the proceedings here within the last few minutes. This rule would not have been violated in voting the $20,000,000 for payment to Spain under the treaty. The rule could operate to prevent the appropriation only when raised by some member of this House. It has been so raised by gentlemen on the other side. And I would also call attention to what certain gentlemen on the Democratic side are already squirming under—that this rule has been invoked to prevent this appropriation by the very men on that side who placed every obstruction that was placed in the way of the Congress of the United States and every obstruction that was placed in the way of the President of the United States, to strip our country of the glorious benefits of the war with Spain. I call attention to it particularly now in the closing hour of the consideration of this appropriation bill.

Under the terms of the protocol and treaty now pending between the two Governments we are under a sacred obligation as a great people and a great Republic; and I call attention to the fact that gentlemen on the other side, always ready to resort to obstructive tactics, have invoked this rule to impede and obstruct the ordinary proceedings on this floor in this most important matter to the honor and integrity of the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman name one instance in which the minority on this side has done so—just one instance?

Mr. FARIS. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of public history, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia. It is so plain that even he who runs may read; that every obstruction that could be placed in the way of the promotion of our interests in the treaty with Spain has been placed there by gentlemen on that side who share the views of the gentlemen who invoke the rule.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman name one such instance?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to follow the example of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARIS] who has just taken his seat, by injecting a partisan stump speech into this discussion over a point of order. If I should do so, if I were disposed to retort and retaliate, I would say that upon the other side of the Chamber this very rule was yesterday invoked and these very obstructive tactics resorted to for the express and declared purpose of defeating the Nicaragua Canal project, and for no other purpose, as stated by one gentleman on the other side of the Chamber. I must confess that in the midst of conflicting opinions on the part of parliamentary authorities I am not entirely clear in my own view; but I simply want to place before the committee a few suggestions upon this question for whatever they may be worth.

This rule which has been invoked reads:

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

Now, the suggestion that has occurred to me is that this rule in its spirit, and I believe in its letter, does not apply to the appropriation of $20,000,000 now under consideration, for the reason that so far as the lawmaking power—that is, the treaty-making power—of this country is concerned, it has already acted.

The expenditure is authorized by law in so far as the lawmaking powers of this country are concerned. They have authorized the expenditure on a future contingency. That contingency is the ratification of the treaty by the Spanish Government.

This money will not be paid out, Mr. Chairman, then, unless the treaty is so ratified, and it can not be paid and never will be paid except in pursuance of existing law. That complies with all of the reasons, all of the requirements, or all of the arguments that could have been made in favor of the establishment of the rule when it was adopted, and that was to prevent legislation and appropriation from going hand in hand, or making a statute and an appropriation to be carried into effect at the same time. That could not be done under this rule; and that can not be done under this provision as it appears in the bill. The appropriation is made in pursuance of the action of the treaty-making power of the United States, and the money is appropriated and will be spent in pursuance of that treaty on its ratification, and not before, and under no other conditions or circumstances. In other words, the money can not be expended except strictly in pursuance of existing law.

Mr. CANNON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I voted on yesterday to sustain a rule of the House which I was told originated in the days of James K. Polk and had been lived up to ever since, and in sustaining that rule prevented the consideration of a measure that I favored.

Now, I do not think that these rules have no effect except when that effect is favorable to our own views, whatever those views may be. The rules are designed, as I understand them, to apply alike to all measures, whether we favor them or whether we are opposed to them.

The only question, then, as I understand it, before the committee is as to whether or not this provision in the bill against which the point of order is made is existing law. A treaty can not be made, consummated, or completed except by the action of all parties concerned in it; and until that is done, and until a ratification by all the contracting parties has been accomplished, it is not a law, and certainly is not a law within the sense of the rule whereby an appropriation of money from the public treasury may be justified on a general appropriation bill.

Can it be contended for a moment that when an act passed by the House and Senate but not signed by the President is an existing law within the meaning of the term of the rule, or is such a law as would enable an appropriation to be based upon it within the meaning of the rules of the House, although it may be morally certain that the President will sign the act?

I believe, sir, that all rules intended to protect the Treasury of the people, and to protect us in hours of great excitement from hasty or arbitrary action of a majority, should be lived up to in spirit as well as in the letter.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I rise to express my entire approval of every word which has been uttered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] who has just addressed the committee, and of every word that he has uttered in enforcing upon us our duty to sustain our rules. I also voted on yesterday to sustain a rule of the House when it was against my interest and my desire.

But the only question now before us is whether or not this ruling is in accordance with the rule; and to that I wish to address myself. I say the appropriation of the $20,000,000 is clearly within the rule of appropriations, under the rules. We made a law which governs all of us, and under which we prosecuted to a successful termination a great war. When we made the declaration of war we passed a law clearly covering every act necessary to the termination of that war. We did not enter into a condition of interminable war. We pass a law declaring a war—a law presenting a proposition to prosecute, and that involves the idea of some time or other making peace. And any legislation, I say, in the same line—that is, in the line of the prosecution of the war to a successful termination—must provide for its termination.

Now, a treaty of peace was just as much contemplated in passing a declaration of war as the direct prosecution of the war itself.

Mr. LINNEY. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will yield to my friend only for a question.

Mr. LINNEY. Only for a question. You found your argument on the declaration of war. Now, has any declaration of war ever been made that authorized the President or the Senate or anybody else to acquire territory?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. By the payment of money?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. This question can not be confined within any such narrow limits. This is a payment of $20,000,000, which is a part of the proceedings involved in the declaration and termination of war. In other words, it is a war measure, a payment which precedes the termination of war.

We, as gentlemen well know, have assumed many obligations in payment of damages growing out of the war. We have as much right, under the Constitution of the United States, to appropriate the $20,000,000 covered by this bill for bringing the war to a successful conclusion, as to appropriate $20,000,000 or any other sum to provide for the pay of the Army or Navy or to buy provisions or clothing or any other necessary thing which may be demanded by that service or either branch of the war service.

The law under which we have a right to make this appropriation under Rule XXI is the law in which we declared war upon Spain. If it does not stand upon that ground, it has no ground to stand upon. I will vote to sustain the Chair, and have done so during my whole service under every circumstance, whether the decision has been for or against me, or for or against my party.

Mr. SULZER. Or right or wrong.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. And whether this point of order was raised for partisan reasons or for any other reasons, it makes no difference. I will vote to sustain the Chair against any——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman will remember that if a Democrat raised the point of order, a Democrat also took the appeal from the decision of the Chair

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. It makes no difference why this point of order was raised or by whom. The only point for us to decide is whether this appropriation has any justifiable place on this bill, without reference to who raised the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Is it not a fact that we will not have to pay the money until Spain ratifies the treaty?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. We shall not have to pay the money until Spain ratifies the treaty.

Mr. SULZER. Then what is the use of quibbling and splitting hairs?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I should like to do some of the talking in my own time. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I do not see how any gentlemen can vote to sustain the Chair in this ruling unless we are determined that we will not furnish the President with the means of concluding peace.

Mr. BELL. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BELL. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this bill under consideration is a sundry civil bill, gathering up the different——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I think I understand that as well as the gentleman does.

Mr. BELL. Well——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I can not yield. I do not want to be told that the sun shines or that water runs.

Mr. BELL. Well, I want to make a suggestion.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I do not want any suggestions. You said you had a question to ask.

Mr. BELL. I would have asked you a question if you had been patient.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, when this point of order was under discussion before the appeal, I suggested to the Chair and the committee that this rule could not be invoked as against legislation even in an appropriation bill to carry out the obligations of the treaty-making power. The discussion has certainly justified the position. At this moment the entire contention of the other side rests upon the possibility of this treaty being defeated by a future contingency of some sort.

Now, if they are to sustain themselves they must go further and distinguish among contingencies. Under the ruling and the reasons given for sustaining it, we are in this position: If the treaty-making power of this Government entered into a compact with another government to take effect when each government deposited a sum of money with an international trustee, this rule could be successfully invoked to defeat the treaty-making power of the Government under the Constitution.

Mr. BARHAM. Oh, no; we could pass a separate bill.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It could be done under a special bill, but could not be done on an appropriation bill under this rule.

Mr. GARDNER. I repeat what I have said. I wish I could make the gentleman understand what I mean. The answer comes, that it would be in the power of the House of Representatives, by some other proceeding and under some other method, to accomplish this purpose. The point is, the rule can not be invoked to defeat a higher power granted by the Constitution.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to occupy some time?

Mr. CANNON. I will take a little time now, and I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that gentlemen are laboring under some misapprehension as to the proper construction of Rule XXI. Some gentlemen who have discussed this question seem to argue it as if it rested upon the last paragraph of this rule, namely, that it is a provision changing existing law. I insist that the whole question is contained within the first paragraph of the rule, and that the last one has no application whatever. The first paragraph of the rule is:

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill * * * for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

That is this case. This is a general appropriation bill. Here is an appropriation reported by the committee; and the question is, Is it for an expenditure previously authorized by law? It is not a question whether previous existing law has been changed, but whether any law has ever been framed warranting this expenditure.

Now, then, the argument is that this treaty is a law that has been passed warranting this expenditure. But has the treaty been passed? I concede that a treaty duly framed, confirmed, and ratified is a law. By the language of our Constitution it is the supreme law. It overrides every other. But there are successive steps to be taken in the making of a treaty, as there are in the making of a statutory law. The treaty must be agreed to. It is a contract between sovereign nations, and so long as one nation has not as yet concurred in it, agreed to it, there has not been that mutual agreement of minds necessary. It is all in the air, all in fieri. It is not a consummated work. Therefore, there is no existing law upon which you can base this expenditure; and therefore the Chairman is exactly right in holding that this point of order is well taken.

Now, something has been said by the gentleman from Mississippi as to the payment of this money. He argues it as if it were a due in præsenti. It is not so. The provision of the treaty itself, which I say has not yet been adopted, is that this money shall be paid within three months after the exchange of the ratifications. It is the same thing as a promissory note payable three months from a specified day or upon the happening of a particular event. It is a payment in the future. Again, the gentleman from Massachusetts argues that the proposition to appropriate the $20,000,000 is a proposition that is warranted by our declaration of war, and the previous steps taken by this country having gone up to the point of the treaty of peace, that it is already warranted by existing legislation, and therefore the $20,000,000 appropriation is warranted. But how is that?

When this country declared war, Mr. Chairman, was there any appropriation of money? Certainly. It was made for the carrying on of that war. It was not made as a solatium to Spain for her wounded pride for being obliged to surrender the Philippine Islands. But our commissioners of peace, when they sat down to agree upon the terms of peace, concluded to recommend to their respective nations an appropriation of $20,000,000 in exchange for the Philippine Islands. Therefore, it is nothing but a mere recommendation. There is no law ever passed, no position ever been taken, that makes this an expenditure of money for a purpose previously warranted by law.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Vermont invokes the first clause, the first paragraph or sentence of the second clause of Rule XXI, which I intend to read:

No appropriation shall be reported—

I would like that some emphasis be given to the word "reported" in that rule— [Laughter.]

in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

No gentleman would say but what there is a law now existing that would authorize an expenditure in order to prosecute war against Spain, and yet gentlemen will not indulge us authorizing an expenditure to secure peace.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. That is it exactly.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is the object of war? To right wrongs, to punish enemies, and to secure, finally, peace. And yet these gentlemen say that, while we may make appropriations for prosecuting the war, we can make no appropriations to terminate the war. To my mind that position is not correct.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to talk about that particularly. But I want to say something about the sanctified character of the rules of this House that certain gentlemen now seem to be thinking about. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that while the Constitution gives us the power to prescribe rules for the government of the House, it in no way prescribes the time or the manner in which those rules shall be formed. The whole subject is left in the power of the House, the majority of the House, to fix these rules when they want them, and how they want them, to accomplish those purposes that the lawmaking majority choose. I can conceive that the rules of the House are obligatory upon the servants of the House, and that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is guilty of an offense against the House, I say, when he reported this amendment, which he now acknowledges to be a violation of the rules. They are obligatory upon the Speaker of the House.

They control all the servants of the House; but I want it to be understood that the House itself, when it chooses and how it chooses, may, for the then action, make that rule that it desires to make, and that the action of the House at the time that it acts is a rule, and that it has the authority under the Constitution to make it.

Mr. Chairman, let me call your attention to the form in which you must, probably, later on submit this very proposition: "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" That is the form. We will determine then and there whether that is to be the rule of the House, to stand as the judgment of the House, and, in my humble opinion, no man stultifies himself when, on a matter of appeal, he says that he then and there, under the constitutional provision that authorizes him to make a rule, makes a rule for the government of the House, and if it is the rule adopted by the majority on a question of this kind, lawfully and properly submitted to it, it becomes for that occasion at least the rule of the House.

Why, Mr. Chairman, how lightly the rules of the House sit upon gentlemen on occasions. Yesterday was a memorable day. Here were three august personages proclaiming the sanctity of the rules, prophesying the dire calamities that would come upon us if we did not adhere to the rules. Is one rule more sanctified than another? Do they not all derive their authority from the same source? And yet, while these three august gentlemen, the chairman of the committee [Mr. CANNON], a member of the Committee on Rules [Mr. DALZELL], and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], were making their arguments and foretelling the disaster that would come if we did not observe the rules, one, the gentleman from Illinois, violated that rule that attempts to secure decency and order of discussion. He referred to a member of the House as the joker, that comes jumping into the ring turning somersaults and champing his bit. To say nothing about the bad taste and mixture of metaphor, is it not a little singular that the gentleman engaged in the holy labor of sustaining the rules should violate in that manner that rule? [Laughter.] Then comes the gentleman from Missouri, always profound, always oracular, and from his lips there drops nothing but pearls of wisdom.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to have another minute. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman has not the time, I will yield the gentleman another minute.

Mr. HEPBURN. I thank the gentleman from Illinois. Then comes the gentleman from Missouri, insisting on the sacred character of the rules, full of fear that is coming to the Democratic party that fails to observe the rule that came from the wisdom of James K. Polk sixty years ago. [Laughter.] And yet, while the rule required him to confine himself to the subject under discussion, he forgot all about the subject under discussion, and discussed a subject that was not in existence then, and did not become the subject of discussion until after the Chair had decided.

Then comes the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who jumped into the arena to support the immaculate character of the rules, and attempted to apply a rule of the House to the committee that was then sitting, and insisted that he had a right by motion to lay an appeal on the table that had been taken. [Laughter.] So much for the sanctity of the rules.

Mr. DALZELL. My friend from Iowa is mistaken, I did not insist, but yielded gracefully. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; when detected the gentleman attempted to hide the property. [Great laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the simple question is, Is this appropriation authorized by existing law? The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who is generally, at least, more happy in stating legal propositions than to-day, says it is authorized in carrying on the war.

Why, Mr. Chairman, war is inaugurated by the vote of Congress. The President can carry it on, but the President can not conclude peace, or agree upon terms of peace, except through a treaty ratified by the Senate.

It can not be that this appropriation is authorized from a declaration of war. More logical are those who say that it is authorized by a treaty of peace; but the difficulty there is that the treaty of peace is made between two high contracting powers, and it is not a treaty of peace until each contracting power has yielded its full assent and evidenced it by execution of the treaty of peace.

I have heard some gentlemen say that this treaty was existing law, because the terms had been proposed by a commission, ratified by the Senate, and signed by the Executive, and then submitted to Spain for its ratification. They say that that makes it the existing law, so far as we are concerned. It would be no more absurd to claim that because the House of Representatives had passed a bill and sent it over to the Senate for the gentleman from Iowa, standing here with one of his amendments to appropriate under that bill, to claim that it was existing law, so far as the House of Representatives is concerned, although it had not been passed by the Senate and had not been approved by the Executive.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the question is too clear for argument; and hence it is that the gentleman from Iowa is driven to the extremity of saying that the rules of Congress are whatever Congress may choose to make them during every moment of its existence. Sir, we adopt rules; and in those rules we provide how they may be changed. They can not be changed at the individual whim of members. They can not be changed by the gentleman from Iowa trampling them under foot. They can not be changed because the Committee on Appropriations brings in an appropriation that is contrary to the rules. When any proposed appropriation is contrary to the rules, any gentleman in the House may meet it with a point of order.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me a single suggestion? In the admission of Utah and other Territories into the Union we passed enabling acts that were to be accepted by the ratification of a vote of the Territory, and then in subsequent provisions we appropriated money to hold elections. Now, would the gentleman say that such provisions were not in pursuance of existing law?

Mr. PAYNE. The whole subject of the Territories is under the will and dominion of Congress and of the laws of the United States. Spain is not. We are now dealing with a nation equal in contracting power to our own. We can not force a treaty on Spain. Unless Spain accepts it—forced to do so by the duress of our arms or otherwise——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Did we not, in the very provision mentioned by the gentleman from Iowa, make Utah equal with us, so far as that particular matter was concerned?

Mr. PAYNE. We did not make Utah equal with us in that very provision. We had a right to legislate down to that point, and we did legislate; and we were supreme. It was only after Utah had accepted the provision that she became an independent State of this nation.

Mr. RIDGELY rose.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I want to use a little of my time myself.

If gentlemen will read the Annals of Congress, if they will read the debates upon the Jay treaty and the purchase of Louisiana, they will find that statesmen almost equal to the gentlemen who wish to trample down the rules to-day held in those days that the treaty-making power of the United States, lodged as it is in the President and the Senate, can not be completed by their action when there is further legislation required to carry a treaty into effect.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. I will yield the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] five minutes more if he wishes.

Mr. PAYNE. And where an appropriation is required to carry a treaty into effect, the foreign nation deals with us subject to the limitations of our Constitution; and the treaty is not law between the nations concerned until Congress and the President have passed the appropriation which the President and two-thirds of the Senate as the treaty-making power could not authorize. So that according to the construction of the fathers a treaty is not existing law until Congress has by law appropriated the money to carry the treaty into effect.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does the gentleman mean to say that a treaty which has been ratified can not create an obligation—an obligation which has all the sanction of law—until after legislation by Congress has been had?

Mr. PAYNE. "The gentleman" means to say that where the obligation contemplated in the terms of a treaty goes beyond the power of the President and the Senate of the United States to carry it into effect, while there is raised the highest kind of a moral obligation for the nation to carry out such a provision, still the treaty is not complete; and the foreign nation takes the treaty subject to the right of the Congress of the United States and the President to make the appropriation necessary to carry the treaty into effect. That is what "the gentleman" means to say.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am glad to hear him define himself.

Mr. PAYNE. But, Mr. Chairman, the question is not as to existing law. We have got past that point, it would seem, in the last few days. The question is whether the rules shall be observed—nay, whether this salutary rule now under consideration shall be observed. I have heard many debates on our rules, but I never heard a single man say a word in opposition to clause 2 of Rule XXI. I have heard the eloquent gentleman from Iowa talk about his proposed amendment requiring the Speaker to recognize every one of the 360 members of the House at the same time, if they should all rise and cry out "Mr. Speaker." But I never before have heard him inveigh against this clause of our rules, which would separate legislation from appropriation bills, which would take it away from the power of either House to compel the other, by holding back a supply bill, to assent to obnoxious legislation.

We must stand by the rules, Mr. Chairman. When we make the rules in the next Congress we shall then discuss whether the rules proposed to that body are right or wrong. But if we want to avoid confusion and anarchy and chaos we must stand by the rules of the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to interrupt the gentleman from New York solely for the purpose of giving him an opportunity to retract an untruthful statement. He has never heard "the gentleman from Iowa" clamor for a change in the rules whereby the Speaker would be compelled to recognize each one of the 358 men who might be clamoring at once for recognition—never.

Mr. PAYNE. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa was, in effect, that whenever any member arose, or when members arose, and said "Mr. Speaker," the Speaker should recognize them.

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; I deny it emphatically.

Mr. PAYNE. And, therefore, as a consequence, whenever the 360 members arose the Speaker must recognize all of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I am not willing that the gentleman from New York shall, by an untruthful statement, place me in that ridiculous position. I say it is not true; that I have not made any such proposition; never, sir, anywhere, and never proposed to change the rule from what it is now, that where two members rise the Speaker shall determine which he shall recognize. I want the gentleman to make that acknowledgment.

Mr. PAYNE. I stated the amendment of the gentleman fairly and precisely as I recollected it. Of course, it was several years ago——

Mr. HEPBURN. I have never offered such an absurd proposition.

Mr. PAYNE (continuing). And my recollection was that the amendment read that whenever a member or members rose and said "Mr. Speaker," the Speaker should recognize him; and it was pointed out to the gentleman from Iowa at the time he offered the amendment, and it did not arouse his ire as much as it seems to be aroused to-day, that it was entirely impracticable, for if the whole assembly arose and said "Mr. Speaker," under that provision he must recognize all of them.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman must have known—and I charge that the gentleman did know it—that I did not propose to change in the slightest degree the following clause of that rule, that when two or more members arise simultaneously to their feet, the Speaker should determine which one should have precedence.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask how much time is remaining under my control.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eleven minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. How much is remaining to the gentleman from Illinois?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman in opposition to the motion has seven minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY].

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, I would very much like to be able to vote to sustain the decision of my colleague who occupies the chair, and should do so if I felt that that decision was a correct one. I do not.

If this appropriation is authorized by law now, then the decision of the Chair is wrong. There are but two ways in which law can be made in the United States—one by the concurrent action of the House of Representatives, the Senate, and the President of the United States, and the other by the concurrent action of the President and the Senate. When in the process of making a law the President and the Senate have concurred under the Constitution, and have agreed upon a treaty, the whole of the lawmaking power of the United States has been exhausted on that particular question; and while the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] suggests that it may not be a law binding upon Spain, yet it is unquestionably a law binding upon the people of the United States. We have exhausted our lawmaking power, and there is not an ounce of it left in any of the departments of the United States Government.

All laws may not be required to take effect instantly or immediately upon their promulgation. Many laws are passed which take effect upon the occurrence of a contingency which may be very remote in the future. Congress often passes such laws; and whether this law—this treaty—is a law for the United States, it is a law for our citizens and for our Congress.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to read one single section from the decision of the Supreme Court bearing upon this point?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I read from the decision:

> But the ratification by the United States was in February following, and the treaty did not take effect until its ratification by both parties operated like the delivery of a deed to make it the binding act of both.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I understand that. I have alluded to that feature. I have just stated that it may take effect in the future. The law does not necessarily take effect immediately it is passed by Congress. They do that often in the enactment of laws. We may pass a law, for instance, giving the Secretary of War the right to use the troops and money of the Government in building up levees or for the purpose of preventing crevasses on the Mississippi River. We may make a general law and put it on the statute books, and Congress may proceed to make the appropriations. But the law does not take effect at the time it is passed, and does not become operative at all unless the crevasse occurs on the Mississippi River.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CONNOLLY. We have exhausted our lawmaking power in this country. It may not affect Spain. It may not be operative there, but under our Constitution we have made it a law, and, in the language of that Constitution, the supreme law of the United States, overriding all other law. Now, having made it a law, having exhausted our power, shall we be told here now that we have no law until the lawmaking power of Spain has been invoked? I maintain we have a law, we have made a law within the meaning of that rule, and this appropriation is authorized by that law.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MAHANY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONNOLLY. I yield first to the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE], who first expressed a wish to ask me a question.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Has not the President of the United States been operating under the action of the United States Senate ever since the 7th of February in extending the military dominion of this country over the Philippine Islands?

Mr. CONNOLLY. I regard that as an entirely irrelevant question. While it may be true, yet this is the naked question, Have we a law? If we have made a law, I maintain that the highest lawmaking power in this land, in making this treaty, have made it a law. It is not a law for Spain until she acquiesces.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. I understand the gentleman to be urging that, so far as Congress is concerned, the ratification of the treaty makes a law.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Makes a law for the United States and makes a law for our recognition.

Mr. POWERS. Does not the treaty itself in terms say that it shall have effect when ratified by Spain?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes; we often have laws taking effect a year hence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to occupy any time now?

Mr. CANNON. I have but seven minutes.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I should like two or three minutes if I could have it. My time was taken up by questions.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] one minute to finish his last statement.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, in the remaining one minute assigned me, for which I thank the gentleman from Mississippi, I can not elaborate further upon the idea that I have expressed. My idea is simply this: We have made a law, we have exhausted the lawmaking power of the United States and can go no further. When we have done that, shall it be said that we have no law authorizing an appropriation? I think we have.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. R. 227. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint Osborne W. Diegnan a cadet to the Naval Academy at Annapolis; and

S. 5225. An act recognizing the patriotic devotion and benevolence of Helen Miller Gould.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 3307) to increase the pension of Andrew S. Evans; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 6670. An act setting apart a certain tract of land in Oklahoma Territory to the Stella Friends Academy and Church Association; and

H. Res. 307. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to pay certain laborers, workmen, and mechanics at United States navy-yards and naval stations 50 per cent additional for work performed in excess of eight hours per diem.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 5342) granting a pension to John M. Palmer and the message requesting a conference on said bill and amendment.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 11717) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5225. An act recognizing the patriotic devotion and benevolence of Helen Miller Gould—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. R. 227. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint Osborne W. Diegnan a cadet to the Naval Academy at Annapolis—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that a great deal of confusion has grown out of the commingling of two entirely different things. A treaty has a twofold aspect. Internationally speaking, a treaty is a contract. Nationally speaking, it is a law. Now, everything that our country can do which is necessary to make it a law, for the purpose of demanding and compelling the obedience of its own citizens to its provisions, has been done, and yet until the other contracting power has also ratified the treaty it does not become an international contract or binding upon it, but it is a national law. Whenever the Senate and the President have ratified a treaty, whenever there has proceeded from us everything which we can do, when we have done everything which can be sought at our hands, when we have done all that we can do, then we have undoubtedly made it a law from a national aspect. Now, this rule relates to that sort of a law. The language of the rule is:

> Unless authorized by law.

Now, what was the reason of this rule? Why was it brought into existence? Why was the old, time-honored principle by means of which English-speaking freedom had won its every fight with tyranny, namely, the power to make legislation upon appropriation bills in the granting of subsidies and reliefs—why was it surrendered? It was surrendered for a reason, and that was that the right of the king or of the executive to prorogue the assembly and thereby prevent them from legislating no longer existed. Now, when the reason of a rule ceases, the rule ought to cease, and whenever you are confronted with a situation where you can not legislate, then the reason of the rule which is predicated upon the idea that you are free to legislate ceases, and the rule ought to cease with it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Before I ask the question I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi to this clause of the Constitution:

> All treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land.

Now, in order to make this treaty it requires the assent of the United States and of Spain, does it not—requires the assent of both Governments before the treaty is complete?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Wait a moment. Is not that true?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I was about to answer it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is a treaty completed, is it more than half completed, when the United States alone has ratified it?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is just what I am going to answer now. I have only two minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. So that you can answer the whole argument which I am trying to introduce into this question. This is the point: When the United States makes its half of a treaty, the treaty is but half made. When the United States signs a treaty and sends it to Spain to be ratified, Spain being an equal contracting party, the treaty is but half made; and when a treaty is but half made, it is not the supreme law of the land; but a completed treaty, a treaty made by both Spain and the United States, is the supreme law of the land. In other words, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I can not let the gentleman take up all my time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin (continuing). It is begging the question when you say that half a treaty is a treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, when the United States has done its half toward making a treaty it has done all that the United States can do.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has it made a treaty?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It has not made a treaty that is complete in the sense of an international contract. It has not made a treaty that is binding on Spain. It has done all it can do, and it has passed its law for the purpose of making that law the law of the land. We are acting in Porto Rico and the Philippines upon the basis that the treaty is binding on the people of those islands.

Mr. Chairman, one or two words about some of the amusing events that have occurred during this debate. The gentleman from Illinois the other day held up the rules as if we were going to crucify the whole country if we failed strictly to obey one of them, and my colleague from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] stands here this morning engaged in his daily business of throwing bouquets at the gentleman from Illinois [laughter], and whilst——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that the gentleman have two minutes more. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended two minutes.

Mr. LACEY. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes, as he has been interrupted.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri, engaged in his daily business of throwing bouquets at the gentleman from Illinois, while they fondle together with that genial Christian benevolence that distinguishes both of them [laughter], held up his hand this morning in holy horror and said that he had thought for a hundred years that the Democratic party was recognized as a party of strict construction—of what? Rule XXI of the Rules of this House! And when we intimated to him that perhaps he confused the Constitution of the United States, under which the Congress had its being, and the rules, the mere fruit of the work of Congress, the mere children of Congress, the mere instrumentalities by means of which the will of Congress is to be done, he said, "No; he was not as confused as the gentleman from Mississippi was."

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing sacred about the rules of the House as there is about the Constitution. The Speaker of this House sat in that place at one time and made a ruling. He said that a certain ruling made by him in the Fifty-first Congress, which had been questioned, may or may not have been parliamentary law at that time; but when the Speaker had made the ruling and the House had sustained the ruling it became, for the purposes of this body and for that legislative purpose, a rule of the House and parliamentary law for the House.

Now, if it be true that we make parliamentary law in sustaining the Speaker for the purposes of that particular time, why may you not make parliamentary law by overruling the Speaker? Are the rules so very sacred? Why is it that the very gentleman who is now sustaining the Chair in this ruling on this proposition is the very gentleman who, conjointly with my colleague from Missouri, brought that very measure into this House as a part of the bill? What is a rule? It is something to be worked under. It is the creature of the House, the slave of the House, and the House is not to be the slave of the rule.

But, outside of that, Mr. Chairman, I want to résumé very briefly why I think this is "authorized by existing law." It will be partly a restatement of what I have already said.

Mr. ADAMS. Before the gentleman begins, will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have not time. If I get through with my statement and have time, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMS. It bears right on your argument.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The treaty is law now for us, in my opinion. Now, then, from a contract standpoint the treaty does not become law as to the citizens of Spain until agreed to by Spain. Admitting that, for the nonce, then it will become a law at that time.

But gentlemen must not forget that when it becomes law it becomes so retroactively, and that it becomes law from the date of making the treaty—that is, it binds all of our citizens and subjects, if we have any subjects, from that date.

Now, what takes place? You have an appropriation that takes effect on the exchange of ratification. If ratification is not exchanged, it never takes effect. It is not an appropriation, and therefore is not obnoxious to the rule, because the rule calls in question only appropriations. If, upon the other hand, it does take effect, the treaty is ratified by both sides and becomes a law, that law, too, not from the date of the exchange of ratifications, but becomes retroactively the law. Having become a law from this date on, it is now existing law. Now, my contention is that until something is done to keep the treaty from going into effect——

Mr. CANNON. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER].

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote in the affirmative, perhaps for a different reason from that which I have heard assigned by any gentleman who has discussed the subject. Perhaps the most profound writer who has written on the philosophy of government in this country since the days of Thomas Jefferson has said that the chief function of constitutions is to protect minorities; that majorities can take care of themselves. I have looked through this book of rules commonly known as the Reed Code of Rules, and I am unable to find more than three provisions in it which protect the rights of the minority in any respect, and this is one of them.

Further than that, I put it on the ground of the wisdom of the rule itself. While I seriously object to most of the others, this one seems to me to be exceedingly wise. On yesterday there was a proposition brought into this House to tack onto an appropriation bill a scheme for the building of a great canal; perhaps a wise one. I will not discuss that. But, at any rate, the gentleman who presented that proposition as an amendment to this bill stated on the floor of this House that 306 members of Congress joined in a request to the Speaker of this House to allow time for the consideration of that measure, but they had been refused.

Three hundred and six members of Congress refused an opportunity to consider a great public measure! Then they backed down and came and asked other members to assist them by a dodge, by a subterfuge, as it were, to tack that measure onto something else instead of resting it upon its own merits, to put it upon a measure which every man must support and thus, as it were, undertake to climb into heaven up the back stairs, and heaven means to them the United States Treasury, and they wanted to climb into it by the back stairs. When they ask me to do that, I say no, but if they will come to the front door and make a manly fight for recognition of the 306 members, I will stand by them. But I will not support them in a cowardly attempt "by indirection to find directions out."

Mr. CANNON. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RIDGELY].

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to call attention at this stage of the game to the fact that we are discussing our right and privilege under the rules to do that which evidently a very large majority of this House wishes to do. We are discussing the question whether we ourselves shall rest under a rule which we have made and which we can unmake, and invoke that rule to prevent us from doing that which we want to do. The country will hold us responsible if we shall allow this rule to hinder us from doing that which I believe the majority here wish to do. If it shall be decided that the rule as it now stands prevents this action, I appeal to the House that we have the power to give ourselves this privilege. I wish further to call attention to the fact that the country is watching our action and will not take self-made rules for an excuse. I ask if our failure to make this appropriation will not be justly considered a premeditated excuse to be used by those who are seeking for a special session of Congress?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in the two minutes I have remaining I can not very well yield for a question. There is nothing additional I want to say upon the merits of this matter. The Committee on Appropriations reported this item, as they report many other items, because they believed it was eminently proper and would command unanimous consent. It does not command unanimous consent. Two members of the House make the point of order against it and invoke the rule, which rule prohibits it; therefore I am in favor of sustaining the rules. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] seems to want to fight yesterday's battle over again. Yesterday is behind us; we have got to act to-day. And, however much he may criticise the committee of which I am a member, I think the committee and myself can stand it. Roar away, my friend! That is all I have got to say. You do not quite do justice to yourself, because with your splendid ability——

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is violating the rules by addressing me in the second person. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I was not aware I was transgressing the rules; but I will say to the distinguished and irascible gentleman from Iowa that he is one of the ablest men I have ever met, yet for practical purposes as weak as water, because, as it seems to me, he fritters away his magnificent strength upon questions that avail nothing.

Mr. HEPBURN. And that you oppose. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 149, noes 56.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which I send to the desk may be considered and adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

For the purpose of carrying out the obligations of the treaty between the United States and Spain, concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, A. D. 1898, to become immediately available upon the exchange of the ratifications of said treaty, $20,000,000.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 21, page 104, after the word "State," insert the following:

"That for the purpose of concluding peace with the Government of Spain there is hereby appropriated and made immediately available, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended by the President in his discretion."

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I make the point of order that this amendment is subject to the same objection as the one which has been ruled out by the Chair.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Do I understand the gentleman to make a point of order against the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that it is in violation of Rule XXI.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment obviates the objection which was made to the original provision of the bill. It proposes an appropriation without regard to the uncompleted treaty between this country and Spain. The original provision of the bill was based upon the obligation that the treaty was supposed to carry. Now, the amendment just read by the Clerk proposes to put in the hands of the President of the United States the sum of $20,000,000, if it shall be necessary, for the purpose of bringing to a termination hostilities now existing, in the view of the law, with the Government of Spain. And this proposition has its basis upon the resolution originally authorizing the war.

In a legal sense this country is now at war with Spain, and I believe it to be conceded on all hands that Congress has the power to appropriate money to carry on war and for any purpose incident thereto without particular or special legislation, the right of action resting upon the right to adopt legislation necessary to place the country on a war footing. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment, covering the subject-matter of the original provision, is clearly in order.

It occurs to me that it would be an extremely technical construction of the rule to hold that while the country is involved in war with a foreign government in pursuance of legislative authority, that authority giving the right to make appropriations for every exigency of the war, yet that it has not power to appropriate money out of the common fund for the purpose of concluding peace, which is an incident of war. And this appropriation is based upon no contingency. It simply gives the President, in his discretion, the power to use a certain sum of money, if it shall be necessary, to terminate hostilities now existing, in the sense of the law, with the Government of Spain. It obviates the objections that were raised, and perhaps correctly raised, to the original provision in the bill.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, this proposition is the same in substance as a provision of law which was passed many years ago to place $2,000,000 at the disposal of the President to enable him to negotiate a treaty of peace with Mexico, to which law the Wilmot proviso was attached.

The question which we had before us yesterday and the question we have to-day is on the mere construction of the rules of the House. For what are the rules made but to facilitate legislation in the conduct of public business?

If there be a doubt in the construction of the rule, it is the business of the presiding officer to construe it in favor of the public welfare, where the question is one involving some great public interest. There was a dispute as to the construction of a rule on yesterday, and there was a dispute on the construction of the rule to-day, the House being divided purely upon the question of construction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we have such rules so framed that we can not pass a law for the greatest question that can affect the public welfare, then we had better burn our rules. [Applause.] That is the best use we could put them to if that is their effect. There is no trouble getting into war, but it seems there is great trouble getting out. If our rules are such that we can not avail ourselves of them by fair construction to comply with war obligations, the next time we undertake a war we ought to provide at the beginning the way for getting out. It is easy enough, it seems, to begin a war, but the trouble is to get out.

Where there is a doubt in construing a rule the controlling question of construction should be the question of the public welfare. My own view with reference to the question presented was different from that enunciated by the Chair. But I do not complain of that. There were differences of opinion among the members on the floor.

The precedent cited to sustain the ruling of the Chair was the building of court-houses, dry docks, and so on, which are mere questions of detail as to public expenditures.

In such cases a presiding officer is justified, if there be a question raised as to the proper construction of the rule, and it is doubtful, to rule in favor of the Treasury. For the same reason he is bound in construing a rule to give the benefit of a doubt, if there is one, to great public interests, the same as a judge in construing the constitutionality of law if it be doubtful to favor that construction which will most greatly benefit the people at large. Suppose that this was the last day of a session of a Congress and a treaty of peace had been ratified same as this one with Spain and it provided that $20,000,000 should be paid to the Spanish Government as soon as the treaty shall be ratified by Spain.

Are we in such an imbecile position under our rules, as far as legislation is concerned, that we can not provide the money to meet such national obligation, but must go home and have the President call an extra session of Congress for the purpose of carrying out the treaty obligation after it is finally ratified? The absurdity of it is manifest, because it involves the supposition that the legislative body has itself adopted rules by which it is prevented from doing the very things which are necessary to be done for the public welfare and which we were elected to do. [Applause.]

In construing the rules by the presiding officer, where there is a doubt the construction should be such as would permit the House to act in behalf of great public interests—the construction should be in the direction of permitting legislation, not excluding it, on great public interests. And the rules of the House are always subservient to enacted law. Mr. Randall, when Speaker of the House, when the contest arose on the election of President Hayes, and the minority of the House attempted by a strict appeal to the rules to do what we call filibustering to prevent an order of both Houses being executed, decided that a law of Congress was paramount to any rule of the House of Representatives.

Great public questions are to be subserved by the rules in our action, not to be suppressed by a construction in cases of doubt. They are intended to facilitate legislation, not to obstruct it.

That is all I desired to say on the point of construction. I find no fault with the Chair. The members of the House are divided as to the construction of the rule as applicable to these questions; but I rose to call the attention of the House especially to the precedent well known in our history, where $2,000,000 was voted, before the war ended, at the disposal of the President of the United States to negotiate a treaty of peace, and the Wilmot proviso was moved as an amendment to that, restricting the appropriation and providing how it should be expended, against which the point of order was made. But the provision was held to be in order, and yet the rule under which we are operating now is precisely the same rule that was then in operation. Are we wiser than our fathers when great public questions arise for decision and when our legislation is legislation of great public interest, not only to the present, but as well to the future?

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the committee for a moment only I want to call attention to the specific wording of the rule under which we are operating:

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

My contention to you, Mr. Chairman, is that the object of closing this war is now in process of negotiation at least. All that we can do, substantially, has been done upon it, and this amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana is in furtherance of the object, and hence does not, in my judgment, violate the rule.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I have but a word to say upon this question. It seems to be assumed that in enforcing this rule we are preventing the House from legislating on the subject and from appropriating the $20,000,000 involved in the treaty. Not so. A special appropriation bill for that purpose is always in order and can be passed at any time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; not yet. I will in a moment. The reason why the rule says that appropriations which change existing law shall not be put on a general appropriation bill is manifest. On any section of a general appropriation bill debate is only allowed under the five-minute rule and for a short time for each amendment. The reason is that the law already provides that the thing shall be done, and the only question is the amount. When we have to deal with something that contains a new provision, as here, where it provides for a treaty not yet existing, we do it by a special bill.

I have no doubt the Mexican $2,000,000 was appropriated in a special bill. I know that we had a special bill for the $50,000,000 to be placed in the hands of the President for the national defense. We had a special bill for the volunteers. We can bring in at any time a special bill from the Committee on Rules; we can limit debate and pass it at any time; or if we do not, any member can move to go into Committee of the Whole upon a special bill making an appropriation for this purpose. The hands of the House are not tied by this rule as to general appropriation bills. All that the rule says is that if we want to change the law or provide for new matter we shall do it specially and not by putting a single item in an appropriation bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Would it be competent for the House under its rules to pass an appropriation bill appropriating this $20,000,000 before the treaty had been ratified or ratifications exchanged?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Perfectly so. The rule says simply that no appropriation shall be made in any "general" appropriation bill. The word "general" is used in both branches of the rule. Special appropriations may always be made by special acts. That is all I have to say.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington and Mr. SIMPSON arose and addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS] later.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion, and this is backed up by my experience since I have been a member of this Congress and of the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, that the rules, whether they be so intended or not, are generally used to prevent legislation. They are generally invoked to stop the making of laws.

Gentlemen well know that one-half or two-thirds of the legislation passed in this House is passed under a suspension of the rules, under the plea of urgent necessity, and I have been greatly amused at the exhibition, particularly on the Republican side of the House, of gentlemen over there holding up the idea of the sacredness of the rules. We all witnessed the war dance executed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the other day in speaking of the sacredness of the rules. Other gentlemen followed in like manner, notwithstanding the fact that during the extra session of this Congress we sat here for nearly four months and saw the Speaker of the House, himself sworn to obey the rules of the House, violate them by refusing to appoint committees to carry on the legislation of this House.

The rules are all right when gentlemen want to use them, and they are all wrong when gentlemen do not want to use them. They are sacred sometimes, and sometimes they are not. I am reminded of the story of a great Chinese philosopher who was asked the following question by the Emperor: "Yang Foo," said the Emperor, "you have lived ninety years. In that time you must have accumulated a great deal of knowledge. What, in your opinion, is the greatest enemy to the Government?" The philosopher replied, "I think the greatest enemy to the government is the rat in the statue." The Emperor said, "What do you mean?" "Why," he said, "we build statues to our ancestors. These statues are made out of wood and are hollow, and when a rat gets inside you can not put the statue into the water and drown the rat because the statue is glued together and it would come apart. You can not smoke out the rat, because that would disfigure the image of our ancestry, and that would not do. The statue being sacred, the rat is safe." [Laughter.]

Now, that is the trouble with your rules. There is a rat inside of them, and they become so sacred that you can neither drown the rat nor smoke him out. The Speaker, by the power given him to appoint committees, becomes the sacred thing, because so many expect good places on committees they all fall down and worship.

Now, here is a proposition to appropriate $20,000,000 to fulfill a solemn contract, a treaty with a foreign nation. The treaty says that $20,000,000 shall be paid in a stated time after the ratification of this treaty.

All gentlemen here know that Spain will ratify that treaty before the assembling of the regular session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, and to my mind this is another scheme by very wily gentlemen, politicians on the other side, to make it necessary to call an extra session, which they want. So, if the ruling of the Chair is sustained, and we do not appropriate this $20,000,000, then will come the plea for calling an extra session of Congress.

Of course it will be under the guise that we have agreed to pay this $20,000,000, and Congress will be called together for that purpose; and then the Army bill will be passed, and the subsidy bill will be passed, and a lot of other legislation that our friends, the Republicans, know they can not get through at this session. They will fall back on this statement and say, "The last Congress made it necessary to call an extra session to fulfill our treaty obligations to Spain." And I am sorry to see that gentlemen on this side of the House have fallen into the trap and helped our Republican brothers out of the hole. I am also pleased to note that the Populists have stood solidly for fulfilling the treaty obligations of the Government.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday I found it very agreeable to give to the Chair's ruling my support. I announced openly that my vote was for the Nicaragua Canal, although I gave to the Chair's decision my approbation, because my convictions guided me to the conclusion that the Chair was right in the construction of the rule.

My attitude was that I take the circumlocutory process to reach the end. But, Mr. Chairman—I beg the ear of the committee a moment—I wish to address a few words to my Democratic brethren on this side of the House and to my fellow-members on the other. It has been well pointed out by the severe philippic of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and the sarcastic sardonicism of my friend from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] that our distinguished friends are to-day reaping the harvest which they planted.

For weeks and weeks, gentlemen, there were those of us who patiently—and let it be admitted, patriotically—insisted that the present compilation of rules served principally the object of throttling speech and paralyzing action. The distinguished Speaker of the House, who so far as I have been able to observe, is the only real sacred thing to my honorable friends—his intellectual personality was overbalancing to them. They yielded to his judgment on these rules, and they were sacred indeed whenever a word came from us against these rules.

During the debate on the tariff law three gentlemen on my right and many gentlemen on the left offered amendments seeking to restrict the power of trusts by placing several of the commodities in which they indulge either upon the free list or relieving them temporarily of the benefits they enjoyed under the measure. On each of those occasions it was ruled by the Chairman then in the chair that those amendments were contrary to the rule invoked by the gentleman here to-day.

On occasions more numerous than it is necessary now to mention were complaints made against the rulings of the Chair, by which these rules were tending to stifle debate and prevent just action by the House. Rail at these rules as we may, pray to the Speaker as we did, cry for relief, as repeatedly was done, it was all of no avail. I say to my distinguished friends on the other side that they were surrendering their own individuality, and I remind you to-day, gentlemen, that here in this hour you have now met the fate of Actæon; however strong the leash may be, and however powerful the crack of the whip, they ever turn upon their master and devour him for his persecution.

A similar situation has been actually met in this hour by this spectacle. Your invention has returned to plague the inventors and destroy its preservers. I congratulate you, my esteemed friends, that some of you are artful enough and many of you are sagacious enough to find a way around the barriers of the obstacles which now confront you, and which impede our progress by using this Democratic side of the House for your purpose and as the engines of your designs; and to-morrow, or the day following, when this Congress shall have closed and we go to the country, I venture the assertion that we will have it from your lips that there was not found in the Democratic party any respect for the obligations of the country, that in the hour when her soldiers stood in the field, when they were blazing with the flame of death, when they filled the trenches with their lives, and tears were being wrung from their mothers' eyes and moans from their patriotic fathers, there were not to be found in the Democratic party any who were anxious for the country's honor. You will charge that the Democrats were utterly regardless of their duty, oblivious of their country's needs; that they stood an immovable barrier against the fulfillment of a national obligation and doing the duty they owed to the soldiers. You will point to these parliamentary positions so justly taken by the conscientious members of this side as good proof for your political shibboleth. You did it in the late campaign. The people were imposed upon, as they ever are, by you.

Not one of you will admit that these gentlemen on this side of the House were moved by patriotic motives for the purpose of supporting the rules, for the purpose of invoking the law because it was the law, and that it was only for this they made this point of order; but you will be found, as you were in the last campaign, charging them with disloyalty to duty and nation alike.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I shall not need that time. Now, Mr. Chairman, I beg the attention of my friends on this side of the House. If the point of order made against this amendment, tendered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], the point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER], be not clearly well taken, we should be the last to sustain it. I am one of those who would have the honorable obligations of this country fulfilled whenever they have been entered into.

I opposed this purchase at the time; I have continued so to do. I was unable then, as I am now, to see the wisdom of a proposition which compels a nation to fight for a thing and then pay for it, because I was confronted with the unanswerable query, If we are to pay for it, why fight for it; and if we are to fight for it, why pay for it and die for it? But that is passed. It is beyond my reach, and it is before the world at large. We are confronted with the problem and the watchful eyes of the nations of the world are upon us.

I say to the Democratic party, let us not be beguiled by temporary conditions by which we may give our honorable enemy on the other side the opportunity to pillory us before an unthinking public, who are ready to punish the sincere and deserving when they can be deceived by a false appearance. Rather let us stand by this position and vote it down, that we may go on record as maintaining the honorable obligations of this Government to the full extent of the inexorable necessities and of the law and our duty to the country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is no more responsible for Rule XXI than any other member of the committee. The Chair is called upon to interpret the rule, and it is his duty to interpret it as he thinks is right. From the examination given of the amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] and read by the Clerk the Chair thinks it is practically the same amendment that has been ruled out by the Chair and sustained by the committee. There is no existing law for the President of the United States to pay out $20,000,000 at his discretion, and the Chair will sustain the point of order

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri will state it.

Mr. VANDIVER. I wish to ask if there is no other method by which the committee having this matter in charge may bring it before the House in a proper form, so that it may be considered on its merits.

The CHAIRMAN. There are many ways in which this can be provided for, and probably it will be.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I ask to have the Clerk read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 21, page 104, after the word "State," the following:

"For the purpose of carrying out the obligations of such treaty of peace as may be concluded between the United States and Spain, to become immediately available upon the exchange of the ratifications of said treaty, $20,000,000."

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota and others that it is perfectly apparent that there is no way to make this appropriation on this bill. It is desired to finish the bill this afternoon, and it is absolutely certain that this provision can be made and will be made. A resolution will be introduced in the Committee on Rules, which will report it. I suggest that we simply let this matter go and try and conclude the bill to-night. [Applause.]

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire in the world to detain the House. I think the members of the House will agree that I have taken as little of its time as any other member on the floor.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, did the Chair understand that I made the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understood the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] does not, in my judgment, voice the sentiments of the majority of the Democratic members upon the floor of the House in making points of order against the appropriation of $20,000,000 to carry out peace negotiations with Spain.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I am speaking for my own section. I represent the Democracy of Kentucky in fighting this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order; and if there are any differences between members the Chair trusts that they will retire and settle them outside. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I merely wished to suggest to the Chair that I entirely agree with the ruling of the Chair just made. An appropriation of money under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] would be an appropriation for an illegal purpose, because the President of the United States would have no right, nor could Congress give him such right, to spend any money in his discretion for the purpose of making peace. But that objection does not lie to the amendment which I have offered.

This country is at war with Spain under the action of the Congress of the United States. It is a necessary incident to that war that we should appropriate money for the purpose of carrying it on. And surely, after a declaration of war, no member would contend that an appropriation for that purpose would be "for an expenditure not previously authorized by law." The very declaration of war would authorize all expenditures necessary for carrying it on, and any appropriation subsequently made, whether in a general appropriation bill or otherwise, would be in pursuance of such authorization. So, too, it is a necessary incident to all wars that they should result in the making of a treaty of peace at some time.

Now, under the Constitution of the United States the power to make such treaty of peace is lodged with the President and the Senate, which constitute the treaty-making power of the Government. Under this power they have the right to stipulate for the payment of money, whether by way of indemnity or otherwise, and the expenditure of money thus stipulated to be paid is authorized by the very highest law of the land, the Constitution. When the treaty is made, it becomes the supreme law of the land. But the treaty only determines whether any money is to be paid and fixes the amount. It is the Constitution which authorizes the making of the treaty and the expenditures thereunder. Now, for the purpose of carrying out such treaty as may hereafter be made—and this covers the exact objection made by the gentlemen on the other side that there is no such treaty as a treaty made at Paris on the 10th of December, 1898, referred to in this provision of the bill—the amendment which I propose appropriates the sum of $20,000,000.

All gentlemen of the House recognize that a treaty may be made hereafter; that it will be made hereafter, and will become a treaty binding upon this country and Spain, and will, with the Constitution under which it is negotiated, be the supreme law of the land immediately upon the exchange of ratifications.

Now, what does the amendment which I offer propose? It proposes to appropriate money for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of such treaty as may hereafter be made between this country and Spain, not to be spent at the discretion of the President of the United States, but such sum as that treaty may hereafter prescribe.

A MEMBER. Is that in pursuance of existing law?

Mr. MORRIS. That is existing law. The existing law, the Constitution of the United States, is that the Congress of the United States has a right to make war; the existing law is that Congress has the right to appropriate money for the purpose of carrying on that war; the existing law is that the President of the United States and the Senate have the right to make a treaty of peace, under which an expenditure of money is to be made; the existing law is that Congress has the right to appropriate money for that expenditure. That is the law, and it is existing law. This is all I desire to say.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not appear to the Chair that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS] differs in principle from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] or from the clause which was stricken from the bill on the point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. There is a paragraph which was passed over by unanimous consent and to which I now ask we may return.

The Clerk read the paragraph, as follows:

For fees of United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, $23,800.

No amendment was offered.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 10, line 5, at which point in the bill the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] wishes to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to the part of the bill indicated?

There was no objection.

Mr. WISE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, between the words "Virginia" and "Cape," in line 5, insert "James River, Virginia."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I desire consent to return to page 27, line 8.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to the portion of the bill indicated by the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I move to amend by striking out, in line 8, page 27, the word "seventy" and inserting "seventy-five," and by inserting, at the end of line 9, the following:

And $5,000 shall be expended in widening the Adams Mill road entrance to the Zoological Park, from the corner of Eighteenth street and Columbia road, by acquiring by purchase or condemnation a strip on the northeasterly side of said road sufficient to widen the same to a width of 100 feet; and such road so widened shall form a park under the control of the Zoological Park.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LINNEY. I ask unanimous consent to return to line 7, page 33, that I may offer an amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. LINNEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 7, page 33, insert the following:

"Edenton, N. C., station: Superintendent, $1,500; fish culturist, $900; two laborers, at $540 each, $1,080; in all, $3,480."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to return to page 47.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 20, page 47, insert the following:

"That the Commissioner of Patents, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to have printed and bound by contract an alphabetical list or index of patentees from 1790 to 1873, inclusive, the cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $16,000, which sum shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated: Provided, however, That no contract shall be entered into for the printing and binding of said index unless and until subscriptions for the same shall amount to the sum of $10,000."

Mr. DOCKERY. I object to returning to that paragraph.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have already returned to the paragraph.

Mr. DOCKERY. There can be no return to the paragraph until the amendment is read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] asked unanimous consent to return to this part of the bill, and there was no objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. I make a point of order then. I do not want the Patent Office to get all the money of the United States. I want to reserve all rights and all points of order that I have under the rule against that provision.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman state that he did not hear the request when it was put to the committee?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will not make that point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Chair to put the request again. If the gentleman from Missouri desires to object, let him object.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not say——

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Chair to put the request again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the request again.

Mr. DOCKERY. I object. I did not state that I misunderstood the request. I did not know what the amendment was.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there was considerable confusion in the Hall at the time, and in justice to the gentleman as well as to the Chair, the Chair will put the request again. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] requests that the committee return to page 47, line 3, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. DOCKERY. I object.

Mr. BARTLETT. I hope the gentleman will not object, because the gentleman from New York was snowbound and could not be here at the time the paragraph was reached in regular order.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will not interpose the one-man power. I will withdraw the objection and let the amendment come up.

Mr. COX. I renew the objection.

Mr. CANNON. It is clearly subject to a point of order, and so it is a waste of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox] has objected.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12008) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with amendments, and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass——

Mr. HEPBURN. I have a motion to recommit the bill with instructions, which I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa desires to move a recommittal.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to inquire whether that is in order or not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I desire to make a privileged report.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me it is not in order. If I recollect aright, the motion to recommit comes after the previous question has been ordered and after the third reading, and not upon the passage. As I understand it, the motion has been made to reconsider.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is the point of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. CANNON. The point of order is, first, that there was no previous question ordered, and therefore the motion to recommit would not lie, the previous question not being ordered. Secondly, that the bill had passed a third reading and had passed the House, and a motion to reconsider and lay on the table had been made.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, no. I submit that the right to make this motion does not depend upon whether the previous question is ordered or not, and that the time to make it is just previous to the question, Shall the bill pass? and after the third reading.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is regular, and the Clerk will present it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEPBURN moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back with the following amendment:

After line 21, page 71, insert the following——

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time, I would state that that has been read three or four times to the House. I do not demand the reading of it. I would ask unanimous consent that the reading be dispensed with.

Mr. CANNON. What is it?

Mr. HEPBURN. It is in substance the proposition that I offered the other day.

Mr. CANNON. You mean the bill reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal?

Mr. HEPBURN. Not exactly that bill, but substantially, I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. CANNON. I do not desire to await the reading, but I do desire to ask if it is the same proposition that was offered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; substantially.

Mr. DOCKERY. A point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly it is subject to a point of order, and I desire to make it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The point of order is that it is an attempt, under the guise of a motion for recommittal with instructions, to accomplish what could not be accomplished by an amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman who passes upon that motion is not yet advised and can not be advised that this is a copy of any bill pending before this body.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman requested that it should not be read, upon the ground that it had been read two or three times to the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; I said that substantially it was the same, and I say that yet.

The SPEAKER. Then if it is substantially the same, it is obnoxious to the same objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. I respectfully appeal from that decision of the Chair.

Mr. PAYNE. And I move to lay that appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa appeals from the decision of the Chair——

Mr. HEPBURN. And upon that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from New York moves to lay the appeal on the table, and upon that the gentleman from Iowa demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the appeal on the table; and there were—yeas 96, nays 68, answered "present" 10, not voting 177; as follows:

Mr. BRUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. BISHOP, has voted?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, Mr. BISHOP, did not vote.

Mr. BRUCKER. I have a general pair with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. BISHOP. I presumed myself it had expired, and voted. I voted in the negative; but for fear my colleague, Mr. BISHOP, thought the pair was a continuing one, I withdraw my negative vote, and desire to be marked "present."

The following pairs were announced:

On this vote:

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa with Mr. BARRETT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] has voted. I voted "nay."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has not voted, the Chair is informed.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understood that he did; but I withdraw my vote if he did not.

Mr. WANGER. I was present and voted, and my name was not called on the second roll call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. ADAMSON. I so understood it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want my vote to stand in the negative, then.

Mr. HILL. I am announced as paired. That is evidently a mistake. I asked to be paired to-morrow and next day.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I understood that the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MAHON. I am paired with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COOPER], and want to be marked "present."

Mr. HEPBURN. I simply observed, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] both voted yea; and in the reading of the pairs I noticed that Mr. BOUTELL was paired with some gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am not paired with anyone. I voted "yea."

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I was paired yesterday with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS], but he was in the House this afternoon and voted "nay." The pair should be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made. The Clerk will recapitulate the vote.

During the recapitulation:

Mr. HEPBURN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Was a recapitulation of the vote demanded by any member?

The SPEAKER. It is ordered by the Chair.

Mr. HEPBURN. I had noticed the reading of the Clerk, as if it were to take time, in order to bring in recruits.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the question is the presence of a quorum, and the Chair is having this matter gone over carefully, so as to be sure that the record is right.

The Clerk proceeded to recapitulate the vote.

Mr. MANN. May I inquire whether this is the time to correct an error in the vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it should be done after the recapitulation is finished.

The Clerk continued and concluded the recapitulation.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, in the recapitulation my name was called as "present." I voted in the negative, and desire to be so recorded.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understood the Clerk to read as one of the persons voting "yea" the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. GRAFF. May I be informed if that is correct?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. GRAFF, is reported as paired.

Mr. MANN. The Clerk read his name as voting "yea."

The SPEAKER. If it was, it is an error. The roll does not show him to have voted. The Clerk has handed to the Chair a roll of those members not voting—Mr. BRADLEY of New York, Mr. SOUTHARD of Ohio, and Mr. BAILEY of Texas.

Mr. BRADLEY. I voted "no."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be recorded as voting in the negative.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I was present, and ordered myself marked as "present." I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MAHON.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recorded as "present." If there is any other gentleman who should be recorded "present," if he will kindly state he has not voted and desires himself to be "present"——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to be noted as

"present" by the Chair. I am paired. I am present and desire to be recorded as answering "present."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be recorded as "present." The yeas are 96, the nays 68, those who have reported themselves "present" 9, and 1 that has been noted by the Clerk. That is not a quorum, 177 being a quorum.

Mr. CANNON. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is a call of the House; the yeas and nays are ordered, and the doors will be closed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the House should adjourn now, would the first thing in the morning be the taking of this vote?

Mr. CANNON. I hope the House will not adjourn, for the Senate awaits this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this would be in order to-morrow, but is not entirely sure, no previous question having been ordered. There are five more members needed for a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am anxious to have another vote on the proposition, and if this vote will be the first thing in order to-morrow morning, then I desire to move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that we can solve all doubts by having the other members brought in; but that is for the House to determine.

Mr. SULZER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Is a motion to adjourn in order during a call of the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if it is proper for the parliamentary inquiry to be answered—and I wish to ask nothing that is improper—I will again ask the Chair to decide the question whether the roll call will be in order on this question the first thing in the morning.

Mr. TAWNEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. A call of the House having been ordered, would a motion to adjourn be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks one motion to adjourn was provided for in the rule. The Chair thinks the House has a right to adjourn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And this question will be in order the first thing in the morning?

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, the Military Academy appropriation bill has come over from the Senate with some amendments, and I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. There being no quorum, unanimous consent can not be given.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERWOOD and others) there were—ayes 69, noes 70.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The vote is so close, Mr. Speaker, that I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CANNON and Mr. UNDERWOOD were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 66.

So the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 12 minutes) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KYLE presented a petition of the legislature of South Dakota, praying for the establishment of a safe, convenient, and beneficial plan for systematic saving through postal savings banks; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States for the enactment of a law providing a safe, convenient, and beneficial plan for systematic saving through postal savings banks.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the legislature of the State of South Dakota respectfully and earnestly petition and memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact a postal savings bank system, and provide for its conduct, control, and management.

We believe such a system would demonstrate its utility and prove a great benefit to the people at large as well as to the Government itself. Its creation and management by the Post-Office Department would not involve a large expenditure, and the completeness and security of its present management could be made available to reach every section of the country and every class of our population.

The pledge of the Government to repay investments would inspire confidence in the depositor and make it available especially for small savings. It would encourage economy, promote thrift and industry, attach a large element in closer and more interested sympathy with the National Government, and make available, we believe, a large sum for the use of the Treasury at a low and fair rate of interest.

The adoption and carrying out of the system by other governments has demonstrated its utility, and has proved not only to be of the highest service and benefit to the people, but to the State.

Such a system would be safe and economical, would be highly beneficial to all classes of our population, and would encourage systematic saving by the people.

That the secretary of state is authorized and directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to the President of the Senate.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

Mr. KYLE presented a petition of the legislature of South Dakota, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the paying of taxes on Indian allotments; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A joint resolution memorializing Congress for the payment of taxes on Indian allotments.

Whereas the Congress of the United States has enacted a law by which Indians are permitted to take homestead allotments of lands, which shall be free from taxation for a period of twenty-five years; and

Whereas the Indians so taking lands in severalty become full citizens, having the right to vote at all elections and by their votes to lay the burden of taxes which they do not help to bear; and

Whereas this action of Congress has reduced the amount of taxable property in certain counties and districts in this State to such an extent that other property holders in those counties and districts are severely burdened by taxation, and the administration of justice greatly embarrassed: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That the legislature of South Dakota hereby petition and memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact a law for the payment by the United States of the taxes thus remitted, the taxes so to be paid to be fixed by the county commissioners of the county in which such lands are situated, subject to the approval of the State board of equalization; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forthwith transmitted by the president of the senate to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

I, William H. Mr. KYLE presented a petition of the legislature of South Dakota, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the interstate-commerce law authorizing and empowering the commission to fix reasonable and just rates on all interstate freight and passenger traffic, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to amend the law, known as the interstate-commerce act, authorizing and empowering the commission to fix reasonable and just rates on all interstate freight and passenger traffic; also for the proper enforcement and carrying out their orders and decisions therefor.

Be it resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That the legislature of the State of South Dakota respectfully and earnestly petition and memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact legislation amending the law, known as the interstate-commerce act, authorizing and empowering the commission to fix reasonable and just rates for the transportation of passengers and property on all interstate traffic; and also adequate and well-defined procedure for the proper enforcement and carrying into effect their decision and orders therefor issued in the premises. We believe the commission should be given adequate power to determine and fix rates within the purview of the law, and that their orders made therein should have the utmost conclusiveness consistent with the nature of their powers. This enlargement of the statute is imperatively needed to give the law efficiency and effectiveness, so that the object, purposes, and benefits originally designed by the legislation may be fully secured to the people. The commission not being clothed with the power to enforce its own orders, these should at least have that finality, together with their findings and record, that the courts could carry out and enforce the same, unless upon appeal thereto injustice or error in law or fact was disclosed.

The necessity for such legislation, we believe, is urgent, and is demanded by the highest considerations of every public interest in behalf of the producing as well as the consuming classes of our population. Every interest of our people is largely dependent upon the problem of transportation, and of its wise and just solution. No other legislation, we believe, would so speedily secure the desired result, or be so effective in promoting in a large degree the prosperity and well-being of the nation. The enormous powers possessed by these great corporations and the great public agencies they subserve, effecting practically the marketable value of all products of whatever character and the values and interests of every locality and individual, make it of the highest importance to every interest of the people and of the nation that all legitimate, efficient, and ample authority be exercised to hold the great agencies within the strictest, broadest, and most ample governmental control, that they may in the highest degree serve the purposes of their creation, and with exact justice to them and to the whole people. That the Secretary of State is authorized and directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to the President of the Senate. And your memorialists will ever pray.

Concurrent resolution.

Whereas there is now pending before the Senate of the United States a treaty of peace between Spain and the United States in which the greatest, most painstaking, as well as the most distinguished services of our honored Senator, C. K. DAVIS, form a large part;

Whereas we believe that undue delay and unnecessary discussion will hamper the President and retard the Congress of the United States in taking such action in regard to the government and welfare of the people of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines as is imperatively and urgently necessary; and

Whereas such delay and discussion must necessarily tend to raise and create, among the inhabitants of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, uncertainty as to the outcome and final result of the action upon such treaty and as to the early and successful end of our present war with Spain, and affords aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States in Spain and elsewhere, and an opportunity for constant agitation, disturbance, and obstruction to our military forces in those islands on the part of thoughtless, ignorant, or dishonest inhabitants thereof, as well as by mercenary persons elsewhere, and thereby compels the retention in those islands, otherwise unnecessarily, of a large number of our volunteer soldiers, in the duty of keeping the peace and order thereof, and with constantly aggravating danger to the lives of our brave soldiers, among whom many are patriotic citizens of Minnesota: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That we earnestly urge upon the Senate of the United States that the treaty of peace between Spain and the United States, now pending before that body, be as promptly ratified as the importance of the subject will permit.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] wishes to be heard just a moment on this report.

Mr. MASON. I desire to ask unanimous consent that the bill be put upon its passage. It is one that I introduced at the request of the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], who is now absent. He asked me to make this request in his name.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from Maine will not object. It is a matter of very little consequence to the public, but very important to private individuals in California.

Mr. HALE. I will not object unless the bill gives rise to debate.

Mr. CULLOM. It will not, I think, at all.

Mr. MASON. Oh, no; there will be no debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

DONATION OF HISTORICAL PAINTINGS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter which I ask may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

1011 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK, February 12, 1899.

MY DEAR SIR: By inheritance I am the owner of three noted historical paintings, designed and executed by that old American master, the late John Blake White, of South Carolina.

In pious memory of the distinguished artist—my father—I desire to donate these pictures in perpetuo to the United States Senate, requesting that they be accorded worthy niches in the Capitol at Washington, and I ask your aid to effect this cherished purpose.

One of the pictures is the famous one representing General Marion inviting a British officer to share his meal of sweet potatoes, roasted in the ashes of his camp fire.

The second depicts the scene where Sergeant Jasper and Newton, members of Marion's band, unaided, rescued a body of American prisoners who were being conducted by a force of British soldiers to the prison camp at Savannah. The female in the foreground was the wife of one of the prisoners, who devotedly accompanied her husband.

The third represents the patriotic action of Mistress Motte, of Edge Hill district, South Carolina, in furnishing to General Marion and Light-Horse Harry Lee fire arrows with which to destroy her own mansion, then held by the British and used by them as a fort.

These pictures form a group of interesting historical incidents, illustrating the heroic spirit which animated our fathers in the stormy days of the Revolution. Each picture has in turn been awarded prizes at art exhibitions, and each has been engraved as of first merit. These engravings are now extremely rare and valuable. Historical painting, I need hardly remind you, is conceded to be the highest expression of art, and is an uncommon gift of genius in any race, yet they are inspiring creations upon canvas, painted by an American artist nearly a century ago, and they will therefore ever be esteemed specimens of early art in America.

I may add here that the figure of Marion is a portrait from memory, as my father, when a boy, knew him well, Marion's farm adjoining the plantation of my grandfather. No other portrait of Marion is known to exist.

I have the honor to be your very obedient servant,

OCTAVIUS A. WHITE, M. D.

Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN,
United States Senator, South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will state, in further explanation of the letter, that I conferred with the Committee on the Library in regard to this matter, and the pictures were sent on here for examination, the committee deeming it improper to accept any works of art unless they were really worthy of a place in the Capitol.

The committee has had the matter under consideration, and it finds the paintings really meritorious as works of art and of great historical interest besides, and the acting chairman, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], will state what its action is.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Under section 1831 of the Revised Statutes the Joint Committee on the Library are "authorized to accept any work of the fine arts, on behalf of Congress, which may be offered, and to assign the same such place in the Capitol as they may deem suitable;" and it is provided that they "shall have the supervision of all works of art that may be placed in the Capitol." In pursuance of that section, I report a resolution from the Committee on the Library, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library of the Senate be, and it is hereby, authorized to accept the three historical paintings donated by Dr. Octavius A. White to the Senate, and described in a letter addressed to Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN, dated February 12, 1899, and to have paintings suitably placed in the Senate wing of the Capitol, and the thanks of the Senate are hereby tendered to the donor.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit an amendment proposing to appropriate $375,000 for the purchase of a site in the city of Washington, D. C., bounded by Ohio avenue, Fifteenth and C streets NW., for the erection of a public building, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE submitted an amendment authorizing the Postmaster-General to contract with an American cable company for the payment by the United States of a sum not exceeding $100,000 per year, payable quarterly, for twenty years, for the transmission by electrical means of messages of the United States, from a point on the Pacific coast of the United States to be designated by the Postmaster-General to Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Mr. STEWART submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 11629) for the extension of Pennsylvania avenue SE. to the District line; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to Gen. James Longstreet to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers relating to his application for an increase of pension (S. 2272, Fifty-third Congress), there having been no adverse report thereon.

DEATH OF PRESIDENT FAURE.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the cable has transmitted to the people of the United States the very sorrowful information of the sudden death of President Faure, of France. I think it is fitting that the Senate of the United States should make some expression of its sympathy with the French people upon this very sad occasion, which is not only troublesome to France, but which may be troublesome to the entire world. I therefore offer a resolution and ask that the Senate proceed to its present consideration.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Vice-President of the United States, President of the Senate, is requested to express to the Government and people of France the sympathy of the Senate of the United States in the bereavement that has so suddenly fallen upon that Republic in the death of President Faure.

JULIUS A. KAISER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives to be furnished a duplicate copy of the engrossed bill (S. 1227) for the relief of Julius A. Kaiser, the same having been lost or misplaced; and, by unanimous consent, the request was ordered to be complied with.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10403) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States. I yielded yesterday to the two appropriation bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business appearing to be closed, the Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Pending the motion, I rise to make a request. If the naval personnel bill is completed at an hour to-day that will admit of the consideration of the Pension Calendar, I ask that we shall then proceed to the consideration of the Pension Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to that request? The Chair hears none.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10403) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HALE. The first amendment of the committee is on page 3.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read through, and the amendments of the Committee on Naval Affairs will be acted upon in their order.

The first amendment was, on page 3, in section 4, line 12, after the word "Navy," to strike out "except watch duty in the engine room;" so as to read:

SEC. 4. That engineer officers transferred to the line who are below the rank of commander, and extending down to, but not including, the first engineer who entered the Naval Academy as cadet midshipman, shall perform sea or shore duty, and such duty shall be such as is performed by engineers in the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, section 7, line 13, after the word "ensigns," to insert:

Provided, That each rear-admiral embraced in the nine lower numbers of that grade shall receive the same pay and allowance as are now allowed a brigadier-general of infantry in the Army.

So as to read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, on page 4, line 20, after the words "rank of," to strike out "commodore" and insert "rear-admiral;" in line 21, after the word "shall," to strike out:

have the rank of commodore during the time he holds said office: And provided further, That a captain or commander, when specifically detailed by the Department to command a squadron of two or more vessels, shall have the rank and pay of a commodore while so detailed.

And insert:

while holding said office, have the rank of rear-admiral and receive the same pay and allowance as are now allowed a brigadier-general of infantry in the Army.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That when the office of chief of bureau is filled by an officer below the rank of rear-admiral, said officer shall, while holding said office, have the rank of rear-admiral and receive the same pay and allowance as are now allowed a brigadier-general of infantry in the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, on page 5, line 5, after the word "officers," to insert "who now have the rank or relative rank of commodore;" and in line 7, after the words "pay of," to strike out "commodore" and insert "that grade;" so as to make the proviso read:

And provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to prevent the retirement of officers who now have the rank or relative rank of commodore, with the rank and pay of that grade.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 6, line 4, after the word "grade," to insert "as now existing, including the grade of commodore;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That officers of the line in the grades of captain, commander, and lieutenant-commander may, by official application to the Secretary of the Navy, have their names placed on a list which shall be known as the list of "Applicants for voluntary retirement," and when at the end of any fiscal year the average vacancies for the fiscal years subsequent to the passage of this act above the grade of commander have been less than 13, above the grade of lieutenant-commander less than 20, above the grade of lieutenant less than 29, and above the grade of lieutenant (junior grade) less than 40, the President may, in the order of the rank of the applicants, place a sufficient number on the retired list with the rank and three-fourths the pay of the next higher grade, as now existing, including the grade of commodore, to cause the aforesaid vacancies for the fiscal year then being considered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 6, line 13, after the words "board of," to strike out "not less than three nor more than;" so as to read:

SEC. 9. That should it be found at the end of any fiscal year that the retirements pursuant to the provisions of law now in force, the voluntary retirements provided for in this act, and casualties are not sufficient to cause the average vacancies enumerated in section 8 of this act, the Secretary of the Navy shall, on or about the 1st day of June, convene a board of five rear-admirals, and shall place at its disposal the service and medical records on file in the Navy Department of all the officers in the grades of captain, commander, lieutenant-commander, and lieutenant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, on page 7, line 2, after the word "members," to strike out "a majority" and to insert "not less than four;" so as to read:

Each member of said board shall swear, or affirm, that he will, without prejudice or partiality, and having in view solely the special fitness of officers and the efficiency of the naval service, perform the duties imposed upon him by this act. Its finding, which shall be in writing, signed by all the members, not less than four governing, shall be transmitted to the President, who shall thereupon, by order, make the transfers of such officers to the retired list as are selected by the board.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, on page 7, line 12, before the word "grade," to strike out "the next higher" and to insert "his;" so as to read:

Provided, That not more than 5 captains, 4 commanders, 4 lieutenant-commanders, and 2 lieutenants are so retired in any one year. The promotions to fill the vacancies thus created shall date from the 30th day of June of the current year: And provided further, That any officer retired under the provisions of this section shall be retired with the rank and three-fourths the pay of his grade.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, on page 7, in line 12, after the word "grade," to insert:

But, upon the recommendation of not less than four members of said board and for special reasons given, such officer may, in the discretion of the President, be retired with the rank and three-fourths the pay of the next higher grade as now existing, including the grade of commodore: And provided further, That whenever the actual needs of the naval service require it the President is authorized, after reserving vacancies sufficient for the six classes of cadets now at the Naval Academy or at sea, as they may respectively graduate, to appoint from time to time ensigns in the Navy, not to exceed 40 in all: And provided further, That no person shall be so appointed who, at the time of said appointment, is more than 25 years of age, and no person shall be appointed unless he has had meritorious service, in the Navy or Marine Corps, in the war with Spain; and no person shall be appointed except upon such physical and professional examination as the Secretary of the Navy shall require.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, in section 10, line 7, after the word "lieutenant-commander," to strike out:

or lieutenant. Assistant naval constructors shall have the rank of lieutenant or lieutenant (junior grade). Assistant naval constructors shall be promoted to the grade of naval constructor after not less than eight or more than fourteen years' service as assistant naval constructor.

So as to read:

That of the naval constructors 5 shall have the rank of captain, 5 of commander, and all others that of lieutenant-commander.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, to add to section 10 the following:

Assistant naval constructors shall have the rank of lieutenants on being commissioned after the satisfactory completion of a special course of instruction prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, and shall be promoted to the grade of naval constructor after not more than twelve years' service as assistant naval constructors: Provided, That the whole number of naval constructors and assistant naval constructors on the active list shall not exceed 40 in all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, to strike out the following sections of the bill:

SEC. 11. That a judge-advocate's corps in the Navy is hereby established, to consist of one judge-advocate-general, with the rank of captain; one assistant judge-advocate-general, with the rank of commander; one deputy judge-advocate-general, with the rank of lieutenant-commander; and two judge-advocates, with the rank of lieutenant.

Appointments to the judge-advocate's corps shall be made from officers of the Navy or Marine Corps, or from civil life: Provided, That persons only shall be so appointed who are learned in the common as well as in naval law. Promotions in the corps shall be by seniority up to and including the grade of commander.

All officers of the judge-advocate's corps, except the judge-advocate-general, shall be available for duty at sea or on shore, as the Secretary of the Navy may direct.

SEC. 12. That any officer of the Navy, with a creditable record, who served during the civil war, shall, when retired, be retired with the rank and three-fourths the pay of the next higher grade.

SEC. 13. That from and after the passage of this act the students at the Naval Academy shall have the title of midshipman, and on successfully completing the course at that institution each shall be commissioned in the lowest grade of the line or Marine Corps, the two years' course at sea being hereby abolished.

SEC. 14. That upon the passage of this act all the naval cadets of the line and engineer divisions, who have completed the four years' course at the Naval Academy and are performing duty at sea, shall be commissioned in the lowest grade of the line or Marine Corps, and the members of each class shall take rank among themselves according to their graduating multiples as was determined at the end of the four years' course at the Naval Academy.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like the Senator in charge of the bill to explain, first, why the entire Judge-Advocate-General's branch has been taken out, and then to explain about the change which has been made in regard to the naval cadets. It seems that these provisions are stricken out, and I should like to know whether the four years' course or the six years' course is continued by the operation of the bill.

Mr. HALE. The bill does not strike out the Judge-Advocate's Office or the service under that office now rendered in the Navy Department; but it does strike out what the House put in and what is nowhere else found in the Navy Department, a permanent Judge-Advocate's corps.

The Senator knows that the difference which has always been maintained, and a very important and useful difference between the Army and the Navy, is that all of these corps and the heads of the corps are subject at any time for proper cause to removal, and that they only hold for four years at any rate. So the Secretary of the Navy does not find himself, as the Secretary of War does, confronted with bureaus over which he has no control and whose positions last for life. There is nothing of that kind in the Navy.

The House put in these sections making a permanent corps of the Judge-Advocate's corps, a feature which does not apply to any other corps in the Navy, and the Senate committee struck them out. That is the reason for it. But it does not interfere with the Judge-Advocate, who is an officer who now serves for four years and then may be reappointed, or another appointed if it is desirable. It does not interfere with his corps of assistants who are engaged with him in the work. It is simply that we do not consent to a permanent corps being injected into the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. In this connection I should like to ask the Senator whether all the bureau officers in the Navy Department are not filled merely by assignment practically to the duty of any naval officer the President may choose, and the officer so assigned retains his staff position at the pleasure of the President, not exceeding four years, unless he is reassigned?

Mr. HALE. He is appointed and confirmed by the Senate, and when his duties as chief of a bureau end he returns to the rank that he holds in the line or staff of the Navy. But it is not permanent.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is what the Senator from Missouri very aptly calls it, an assignment to that duty, with the consent of the Senate, for the time being.

Mr. HALE. That is it.

Mr. COCKRELL. But that does not destroy his permanent position in the Navy.

Mr. HALE. He returns.

Mr. COCKRELL. And when he gives up the position to which he was assigned he goes back where he was, unless in the meantime he has been promoted.

Mr. HALE. He returns to his rank in the Naval Register, as scores and hundreds of officers have done and are doing, and as they will continue to do under the bill as we have now framed it.

Mr. COCKRELL. In this connection I should like to ask for information whether there has been any change in the last fifteen or twenty years in regard to the methods of supplying the naval service?

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator mean the question of supplies, the purchase of coal, etc.?

Mr. COCKRELL. Supplies of all kinds.

Mr. HALE. That is all conducted now in the Pay Department, the head of which is practically the Quartermaster-General and Commissary-General.

Mr. COCKRELL. A Paymaster-General?

Mr. HALE. A Paymaster-General of the Navy. I am glad to say that it is to-day under the management of a distinguished officer and that there has been less friction in the immense business of that corps than in any branch of the Government that I know of. The business is done promptly and done efficiently. There is no scandal about it and there is no hurry about it. It is all done methodically and it works better than any division that ever existed as to the responsibility. It is all done now by the Pay Corps.

Mr. COCKRELL. I believe the change was made from the old method about 1885 or 1886.

Mr. HALE. Yes; along there.

Mr. COCKRELL. And it has been approved and enforced by all the subsequent Secretaries, and it proved efficient during the last war.

Mr. HALE. It has worked admirably.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, about the cadets. How is that provision left?

Mr. HALE. That is section 13. The committee did not see any reason why the old term designation of midshipmen should be restored. It was deliberately abolished, and the title of cadet was substituted for it. There is no harm in it; it works well; and it describes more what the officer is than the term midshipman. A midshipman was originally applied to the boys in the British navy. The Senator has read Marryat's novels and other naval works of fiction, and he knows what the middies were. It was thought when the change was made to cadets that that described and defined and presented to the mind a better description of what the officer is than midshipman. The Senate committee did not see any reason for going back and restoring the old term.

Mr. COCKRELL. But about the length of service. It used to be, as I recollect, about four years, the same as at the Military Academy. I do not know whether this is the section that affects that or not.

Mr. HALE. That section has not been reached. When that comes up I will explain it, or I will do so now if the Senator desires.

Mr. COCKRELL. This does not affect that question?

Mr. HALE. No; it does not affect that question.

Mr. COCKRELL. There have been a number of persons to see me in regard to the Judge-Advocate-General's Office, and that is the reason why I asked in regard to that provision. I have been furnished with a copy of the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, from which I desire to read for a moment.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 9, 1898.

SIR: By existing laws (sections 1198 to 1200, Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of July 6, 1884, 23 Stats., page 113) the Judge-Advocate-General's Department of the Army consists of the following officers:

One Judge-Advocate-General, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a brigadier-general;

One Assistant Judge-Advocate-General, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel;

Three deputy judge-advocate-generals, with the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant-colonels; and

Three judge-advocates, with the rank, pay, and allowances of majors.

In addition, the Secretary of War is "authorized to detail such number of officers of the line as he may deem necessary as acting judge-advocates of military departments, who shall have, while on such duty, the rank, pay, and allowances of captains of cavalry."

It is understood that the legal department of the Army as above organized is by no means too large, and that an increase thereof is deemed desirable.

In the corresponding branch of the Navy existing law provides for but one officer, a Judge-Advocate-General, with the rank and highest pay of captain in the Navy or colonel in the Marine Corps, as the case may be; and no express provision authorizing the detail of officers with specific rank, pay, and allowances as acting judge-advocates exists with respect to this branch of the service.

Now, has any change been made as to this point, and I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to it—

In the corresponding branch of the Navy existing law provides for but one officer, a Judge-Advocate-General, with the rank and highest pay of captain in the Navy or colonel in the Marine Corps, as the case may be—

This is the point I call attention to—

and no express provision authorizing the detail of officers with specific rank, pay, and allowances as acting judge-advocates exists with respect to this branch of the service.

In other words, this would indicate that he can detail only one. Is there any authority given for him to detail any assistant?

Mr. HALE. No; his assistants are accomplished men in the civilian line in the Department. There is only one detail or appointment, and that is the Judge-Advocate-General. The committee struck out the whole provision, with, of course, as the Senator knows from his great experience, the chance, the proper and fitting chance, that in conference something may be established here that will not make it a permanent corps and yet giving the Judge-Advocate all the assistants he needs.

Mr. COCKRELL. He certainly ought to have some assistants.

Mr. HALE. That will be cared for.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that, having examined this subject very carefully and having been very insistent that we should not create one bureau in the Department the chief of which should hold for life, while no other chiefs of bureaus remain longer than for four-year terms, I have felt that it would be wise to provide for perhaps two officers in the Navy Department, learned in the law, civil and military, who could do work which can not be perhaps so well done by the detail of other naval officers. If this clause is stricken out, I hope the committee of conference will make that provision. I have a draft of such a provision, introducing two officers into the Department as assistant judge-advocates-general, which I can not at this moment find, but which I will hand to the committee of conference.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Secretary of the Navy says further:

The office of Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy was established eighteen years ago (act of June 6, 1880, 21 Stats., page 164), at a time when the Navy was small and inactive. Since then its expansion and the activities consequent thereupon have occasioned an enormous increase of business, which will be permanent. In my judgment it is better that the requirements of these new conditions should be met completely and directly, under express provisions of law, rather than partially and indirectly by the unsatisfactory and certainly no less costly method of temporary details, which must result in occasionally assigning officers to important legal duty who have had no opportunity to acquire, by preliminary training, the qualifications for its efficient discharge. Naval jurisprudence is a branch of the law no simpler than others and no less important. It requires for its mastery the patient study and experience of years, and for its uniform and successful administration a trained corps of officers who devote themselves wholly to such a career. A wise and alert administration of naval jurisprudence, such as will give to every officer and man in the service the confident assurance that, duty performed, his rights and privileges are safe and will be zealously and equitably guarded, is of the highest importance, if, indeed, it be not essential to the maintenance of the efficiency of the service.

A careful consideration of this subject satisfies me that some such organization as that now existing in the Army must ultimately be adopted in the legal branch of the Navy, and a just regard for the interests of the service appears to demand that it should not be longer delayed, but that the benefits to the service of such systematic organization should be secured during the present formative period in naval affairs. I have the honor, therefore, to submit herewith and to commend to the favorable consideration of the committee a bill providing for the establishment of a judge-advocate's corps in the Navy similar as to organization to that at present existing in the Army, although much smaller, and with officers of less relative rank and pay. For these reasons the annual cost of the corps as above outlined would, it may be added, be materially less than that of the Army, and also because the pay of officers of corresponding rank is less in the Navy, and they have no "allowances." The actual additional cost of the corps to the Government would not be great, since it is simply proposed to assign to a legally recognized and trained organization work which must be done and is now done by officers incidentally detailed to such duty, and whose services, under present and prospective conditions, are and will be urgently needed elsewhere.

For this reason, and as the number of officers of the Navy available for general duty is insufficient to meet the demands of the service, the early enactment of legislation of the character herein suggested is recommended.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

Hon. EUGENE HALE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

I suppose the committee had this paper before them and discussed it fully.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think I ought to say that when the Secretary himself came to contemplate what was involved in providing for a permanent judge-advocate's corps in the Department he came to the conclusion that it was not advisable; and while he would like some provision made, he would not insist upon this permanent judge-advocate's corps.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, the striking out of section 14 necessarily followed the striking out of section 13, but I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs why it is that the young men of the graduating class at the Naval Academy this year, who have served at sea during the Spanish war, should be delayed two years in receiving their commissions? The service rendered by those young men during the Spanish war was certainly equal to the ordinary two years' service at sea in time of peace. While I do not object to striking out the provision which abolishes absolutely the two years' sea service, it occurs to me that some saving ought to have been made in favor of this graduating class, and, in fact, in favor of all the cadets who rendered actual sea service during the Spanish war.

Mr. HALE. There are a good many reasons why this provision, if enacted into law, would operate badly in the Navy. In the first place, it would break in on the general rule, which is a wise one, for a six years' course, which the Senate committee provide for in this bill. The committee provide for that because now of all times is the worst time to cut short the course of these students, when we have provided that the course hereafter shall comprise a complete education, not only in the line duties, but in the engineer duties. The boys who go to Annapolis at the tender age at which they are received there can not, the committee believe, in anything less than a six years' course, compass all the instruction that is necessary for complete graduation.

That is one reason why the committee did not think it ought to make an exception of these two classes who have served in the Spanish war.

But another and a greater reason is that if you put all of these young men into the Navy now, and thrust them in at the bottom, you are making what has always been a strong reason urged for the legislation covered by this bill, another hump, as it is called, and you are getting at one time a large number injected or put into the Navy that will tend naturally to prevent the members of other graduating classes having a proper chance for promotion.

The Senate committee recognize the services of these young men, still, as the Senator from Kentucky knows, it was not a long service, it was not an arduous service, it was not a service attended with any great danger, it was not a service which involved loss or mortality; but it was a sea service which all of them were desirous of entering.

For these reasons, and others which I might give—though I think these sufficient—the committee did not believe it advisable to dump these classes into the lower end of the line officers of the Navy.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, the service rendered by these young men in the Spanish war was the same character of service as that rendered by the officers of the Navy who have been advanced by wholesale on account of the character of the service they rendered. Now, if you minimize the service rendered by these young men, where is the excuse for the advancement of practically every officer in the Navy who was close enough to an engagement to hear the reports of the guns?

Mr. HALE. Now, the Senator brings up what is an illustration of the difficulty. The advancement of the officers of the Navy to which he refers was not very great; it was not of any such salient importance as this is; it was only an advance of a few numbers in their grades; it did not disturb the normal condition of affairs in any way, as this would; and yet we found on examination, as little and as slight as was the promotion of those officers, only varying from two or three numbers to five or six numbers, that made so much trouble that we had to prepare and frame an elaborate bill providing that they should be extras, so as not to interfere with the flow of promotion.

Even in that case we had to do the thing which we would have to do here, which would be largely more disturbing in this case than it was in that; and it is a very sensitive and difficult thing to touch any of the different grades of the Navy and, I presume—although I do not know so much about that—of the Army, the disturbing of the natural relations that go along from year to year, the expectancy of promotion on the part of each officer, the expectancy of graduation of each class; but if you dump two classes right into the Navy you make trouble for those who are beyond, just as we did make trouble, as I have said, by the small promotion of the line officers—only a few, perhaps, at a time—and we had to cure that by legislation. It is a thing you can not take hold of; you can not tackle it with safety. The moment you do you begin to see the bad results.

Mr. LINDSAY. I submit that the advancement of the class that has just been graduated would not tend to create a hump in the Navy, and the succeeding class would have to have its two years at sea.

Mr. HALE. The class that graduates of course goes into the Navy.

Mr. LINDSAY. It goes in after two years' sea service.

Mr. HALE. No; the class that graduates at the end of six years.

Mr. LINDSAY. I am speaking of the class that graduates at the end of four years.

Mr. HALE. There is no class that graduates at the end of four years.

Mr. LINDSAY. Well, they finish their four years' course at Annapolis.

Mr. HALE. No; they do not. Of the six years' course they finish four at Annapolis; but there is no graduation; there is no receiving of commissions until after two years more of the course, which has proved to be very valuable, which is the sea service. There was an additional reason why the committee stuck to that, which was that, with these added burdens to the studies and duties of officers, these cadets ought to have six years. There is no graduation at the end of four years.

Mr. LINDSAY. The action of the committee is a very strong argument against the advancement of these officers, I think, 25 or 30 in one fleet, for catching and destroying the Spanish fleet, which was trying to run away from them; and I understand there are others that boards of promotion have recommended for advancement.

The House bill provides that two years' sea service should be deducted, and that all cadets should hereafter graduate at the end of four years. The point I make is not that the committee erred in striking out that general provision, but that if it is proper to advance everybody who was in the naval service during the Spanish war who held a commission, it will not go very far toward doing these young men justice to excuse them from two years' sea service.

At the proper time I shall offer an amendment which will reach these young gentlemen who have served in the Spanish war.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I will say for the benefit of the Senator from Kentucky that if he will examine this bill critically from end to end he will find that it is a scheme of legislation, of law, that will promote officers of the Navy very rapidly. In other words, it is a rush from the time they enter the Academy until they are retired at a much more rapid pace than has existed hitherto. We offer premiums here for retirement for the purpose of getting some of the younger men up toward the top before they have to be retired—before they get so old that they are not fit to fight.

Now, if you begin in the Naval Academy by doing away with the two years' sea service and promoting officers or commissioning officers immediately after their graduation on completing the four years' course at Annapolis, while at the same time you provide and make necessary a familiarity with the duties of a line officer and an engineer both, on the part of every graduate, you will undoubtedly put into the Navy incompetent men with commissions, who at some time may be in command of a ship or a small vessel, a gunboat, or something of that kind.

I will remind the Senator that we have had an illustration of the danger of incompetent or green men being in charge of valuable Government property in the shape of costly vessels in the accident in the Mediterranean, which sunk one of the British vessels, the Victoria. The Camperdown sunk her consort, the Victoria, in maneuvering, because the British admiral was too green a man, was too inexperienced, and knew too little about handling a vessel to know how to properly give an order, and yet he was in command of the fleet. The result was that, by his subordinate obeying his order, his own vessel was sunk, and he, along with nearly all of her crew, went to Davy Jones's locker.

We do not want to have these green cadets or inexperienced officers put in charge of vessels until they have been seasoned somewhat, so to speak, by a cruise, and have learned the duties of commanding and navigating, as well as of running engines in the engine room. For that reason we have stricken out the House provision giving these cadets their commissions at the end of four years. That, together with the fact, as I said, that the whole scheme looks to rapid promotion—the placing of men on the retired list, in our judgment—made it necessary that we should have these young boys thoroughly drilled and put in a position to be competent to command vessels before we gave them a commission.

Mr. LINDSAY. I concur in the propriety of striking out these two sections, and that, generally, cadets should serve the full six years' course.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the Senator, I hope, will not bring into this discussion of the naval personnel bill, which looks to legislation for the Navy for possibly a quarter of a century, the quarrel which we have had here in regard to the promotion of certain officers who were in the battle off Santiago. It may be that the President ought not to have promoted those officers, but that is a different thing, and does not properly come into this discussion.

If you are going to reach down to the cadets and give them commissions because they served during the Spanish war, let us go down to the privates, and let us take the whole of them and promote them. I am in favor of justice for the man at the bottom as well as the man at the top.

Mr. LINDSAY. There is no provision made here for promoting the privates.

Mr. TILLMAN. No.

Mr. LINDSAY. These young cadets are to be promoted either at the end of four or six years. The only question is whether those who served in the Spanish war shall wait the full six years. It would not put another commissioned officer in the Navy, but would give the cadets their commissions now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Nobody takes their places in the meantime.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to say one word there, because it is exactly pertinent to his inquiry?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. When the Senator concedes that the six years' course shall be preserved, he concedes the whole question raised by the Committee on Naval Affairs. If we were by an act of Congress to prematurely take two classes from the Naval Academy and give them commissions at the end of a four years' course, if we keep the six years' course we will have a gap for two years.

Mr. LINDSAY. That is right.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is, you crowd the lowest grade in the service, the grade of ensign, with 60 or 70 young men now at the end of a four years' course, and then you will have no graduates.

Mr. LINDSAY. That is right.

Mr. CHANDLER. And there will be sixty or seventy vacancies for one or two years longer than would otherwise exist. That, I think the Senator will see, is unwise.

There are two methods of doing this thing. One is to do as the House of Representatives has done—shorten the course to four years, and then you would take in the two classes—one immediately and one a year from now. Then, as the classes finishing their four years' course in the future do not have to go two years at sea, there would be a regular flow of appointments into the line of the Navy, and that would be right; but if, on the other hand, Mr. President, you retain the six years' course, you must necessarily keep these two classes where they now are until the proper time arrives for them to enter the Navy.

I want to say, Mr. President, that this is a vital question, in my judgment, in connection with this bill. The six years' course at the Naval Academy is highly important, and the two years' cruise at sea is of the utmost importance. I am not willing to take into the Navy for life young men who have not been to sea any more than they go to sea while they are at the Naval Academy. I am not saying that to the Senator from Kentucky, because he concedes that, but as bearing upon the difference between the House of Representatives and the Senate in connection with this point. The six years' course ought to be retained, and if it is retained, then we must strike out the provision which puts these two classes of cadets at once into the Navy, leaving a great gap, no portion of which will be filled for two years.

Mr. TILLMAN. I call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the provision in section 9, which I think will show him that we have carefully considered and guarded the rights of these young men:

And provided further, That whenever the actual needs of the naval service require it the President is authorized, after reserving vacancies sufficient for the six classes of cadets now at the Naval Academy or at sea.

We do not propose that these young men shall lose their places and their commissions as soon as they have had the necessary drill and experience. We are not going to supplant them by anybody. We will hold their places for them. We simply want them to get ready to be officers before we give them their commissions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee to strike out sections 11, 12, 13, and 14.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, in section [15] 11, line 10, after the word "as," to strike out "that" and insert "are;" and in line 18, after the word "this," to strike out "law" and insert "section;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. [15] 11. That boatswains, gunners, carpenters, and sailmakers shall after ten years from date of warrant be commissioned chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief carpenters, and chief sailmakers, to rank with but after ensign: Provided, That the chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief carpenters, and chief sailmakers shall on promotion have the same pay and allowances as are now allowed a second lieutenant in the Marine Corps: Provided, That the pay of boatswains, gunners, carpenters, and sailmakers shall be the same as that now allowed by law: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall give additional rights to quarters on board ship or to command, and that immediately after the passage of this act boatswains, gunners, carpenters, and sailmakers, who have served in the Navy as such for fifteen years, shall be commissioned in accordance with the provisions of this section, and thereafter no warrant officer shall be promoted until he shall have passed an examination before a board of chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief carpenters, and chief sailmakers, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, to strike out section [16] 12, as follows:

SEC. [16] 12. The commissioned officers of the line of the Navy, including staff officers of like grade or rank, other than naval constructors and chaplains, shall receive the same pay and allowances, except forage, as are or may be provided by or in pursuance of law for the officers of corresponding rank in the Army or Marine Corps. And all provisions of law authorizing the distribution among captors of the whole or any portion of the proceeds of vessels, or other property, hereafter captured, condemned as prize, or providing for the payment of bounty for the sinking or destruction of vessels of the enemy in time of war, are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, to insert as a new section, the following:

SEC. 12. That commissioned officers of the line of the Navy and staff officers of like grade or rank shall receive the same pay and allowances, except forage, as are or may be provided by or in pursuance of law for the officers of corresponding rank in the infantry of the Army: Provided, That officers of the line of the Navy and of the medical and pay corps and chaplains (except officers above the rank of commander, who shall receive, both when at sea and ashore, an amount equal to the pay and allowances, except forage, of officers in the infantry of the Army of corresponding rank), shall, when on sea duty, receive no allowances, but 15 per cent in addition to the pay of the corresponding rank in the infantry of the Army; and when on shore shall receive the allowances, but 15 per cent less pay than is now or may be provided by or in pursuance of law for the corresponding rank in the infantry of the Army: Provided further, That when naval officers are detailed for shore duty beyond seas they shall receive the same pay and allowances as are or may be provided by or in pursuance of law for officers of the infantry of the Army detailed for duty in similar places: Provided further, That naval chaplains, who do not possess relative rank, shall have the rank of lieutenant in the Navy; and that all officers above the grade of warrant officers who have been or may be appointed to the Navy from civil life shall, on the date of appointment, be credited, for computing their pay, with five years' service. And all provisions of law authorizing the distribution among captors of the whole or any portion of the proceeds of vessels, or any property hereafter captured, condemned as prize, or providing for the payment of bounty for the sinking or destruction of vessels of the enemy hereafter occurring in time of war, are hereby repealed: And provided further, That no provision of this act shall operate to reduce the present pay of any commissioned officer now in the Navy; and in any case in which the pay of such an officer would otherwise be reduced he shall continue to receive pay according to existing law.

Mr. HALE. At the bottom of page 11, in the new section 12, reported by the committee, in line 25, after the word "Army," I move to insert:

But this provision shall apply to warrant officers commissioned under section 11 of this act when on sea duty only.

The committee did not consider this before the bill was reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. There is another amendment that goes with the one which has just been adopted. In the same section, on page 12, line 7, before the words "warrant officers," I move to strike out the words "above the grade of" and to insert "including;" so that it will read:

And that all officers, including warrant officers, who have been or may be appointed to the Navy from civil life, shall, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I inquire of the Senator from Maine whether the proviso that this section shall apply to warrant officers would not come in better on page 12, line 21, at the end of the section?

Mr. HALE. No; I think it is better where it is; and that point was selected, when it was drawn, by the officers interested in the matter.

Mr. BUTLER. Is this in accordance with their suggestion?

Mr. HALE. Yes; and they suggested also the other amendment, on page 12,

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the effect of that provision in section 12 as to the increase or decrease of pay and allowances?

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator refer to what is found along by line 20?

Mr. COCKRELL. The whole provision. What change does it make? What additions does it make to the pay and allowances of the officers?

Mr. HALE. The original bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, absolutely ignored the present discrimination as to sea pay and shore pay. In fact, it was found on examination by the Senate committee that in some cases it gave more pay to an officer who was on shore than to one at sea. The committee did not think that that was a fitting thing to do and therefore introduced this feature, which does to an extent restore—not completely, but somewhat—the old difference between sea pay and shore pay, making it, as it ought to be, a premium instead of a disadvantage for sea service. That is the operation of this provision.

Mr. COCKRELL. And that increases the compensation now allowed?

Mr. HALE. At sea, and reduces the proportion on shore.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, line 7, on page 12, provides:

And that all officers above the grade of warrant officers who have been or may be appointed to the Navy from civil life shall, on the date of appointment, be credited, for computing their pay, with five years' service.

I understand the effect of that to be that an appointment from civil life to the lowest grade will give the appointee five years advantage of the cadet at the Naval Academy who has served his full six years and received his appointment. I ask the chairman why this distinction between the man who has been thoroughly educated for the place and the landsman who, by some influence or other, succeeds in getting a commission?

Mr. CHANDLER. With the permission of the chairman of the committee, of whom the question is asked, I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that the object is not to put the graduates of the Naval Academy at a disadvantage with the appointees from civil life, but to give the appointees from civil life, in computing longevity in the future of their service, advantages equal to those which the graduates of the Naval Academy possess. That is to say, the officers who come in from civil life are supposed to have obtained their education at their own expense in private life.

Take engineer officers, for instance. The men come in from civil life. They have their education. If they are paymasters, they have their education, and paid for it themselves; and the opinion of the Navy Department is that in order that appointees from civil life shall stand not better but as well as the graduates of the Academy when they do come in they shall be credited in reckoning longevity pay—that is all—with five years as the estimated time which must have been occupied in fitting themselves for appointment in the Navy. The Senator will also notice that there are very few appointments from civil life under the present system, almost none.

Mr. LINDSAY. There ought to be none.

Mr. HALE. Very few.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will state further that the purpose of this provision is to prevent the civil engineers and physicians or surgeons from receiving less pay than they receive now, because under the ratings of pay here we have reduced some of the lower grades of officers by putting them on a par with the Army. The purpose of this provision is to prevent civil engineers from leaving the service of the Government because they would be discriminated against by this bill and would get less pay than they are now receiving. Surgeons who must have a general education and then study their profession and serve in hospitals and perfect themselves, and get in a position to stand the rigid examination before they can be appointed, would, under the provisions of the proposed act, receive a cut in their pay, unless this provision were in there.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Kentucky will see that this is especially fair in the case of surgeons. An assistant surgeon comes in. He has educated himself up to the time of his appointment as a naval officer, and he is credited with the five years that it may have taken him to be qualified for assistant surgeon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the amendment as amended? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I think it is hardly possible that Senators understand the entire scope of the pending bill. In fact the members of the committee, who have given a great deal of attention and study to it, are no doubt not fully aware of all its effects. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee, if he has no objection to doing so, on behalf of the committee, to make at this point a statement to the Senate about the general effect of the bill, its scope, and how it will increase the Navy, its cost, and what will be the general increase not only of the personnel of the Navy, but of the pay.

Mr. HALE. My attention was diverted for a moment. Was the Senator from North Carolina appealing to me?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator repeat his statement?

Mr. BUTLER. I was calling the attention of the Senate to the importance of this bill. It is a bill which radically changes the personnel of the Navy. It not only greatly increases the force and increases the cost, but it is a radical departure not only from the personnel of our Navy in the past, but it is an untried experiment. I do not think Senators realize that this bill provides for a system that is not now in operation in any other country in the world. It has not been experimented with in any other country. It is entirely new and untried with us. The very first section of the bill reads:

> That the officers constituting the Engineer Corps of the Navy be, and are hereby, transferred to the line of the Navy, and shall be commissioned accordingly.

In no country in the world is the Engineer Corps of the Navy a part of the line. It is true that this bill has been considered for some time, and carefully, by the Department; that many of the most experienced officers of our Government have given their best thought to it; but at best it is simply an experiment, and an experiment on a gigantic scale.

I think it proper that the attention of the Senate should be called to this fact, which probably no Senator not a member of the committee would realize from a casual reading of the bill. For that reason I make the request that on behalf of the committee the chairman of the committee state to the Senate the general effect and scope and purpose of the bill and how it radically changes the personnel of the Navy.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was a written report made on the bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Before the statement is made by the chairman of the committee, I wish to state that I think it should be made to a full Senate, because the Senators have to trust the committee about such matters. The committee has given a great deal of patient attention to this bill, and yet I am frank to say that, as one member of the committee, I have grave doubts about its wisdom. I think we should have a full Senate to hear the statement of the chairman of the committee, who has given it a great deal of attention. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARTER in the chair). The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Frye,	Mantle,	Shoup,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, when the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] asks me to make a general statement as to the objects and results of the bill, without occupying too much of the time of the Senate I may say this: It is a new step, as he has said, but it is a new step because a new step needed to be taken. The subject of the reorganization of the different ranks, grades, and corps of the Navy is an old one. It has been agitated in and out of Congress. There have been committees which have given much labor to it, a special commission made up of members of both Houses of Congress, which have studied the subject; naval officers have been summoned, Secretaries have given their opinions, first upon one plan and then upon another, but all the time the necessity for something to be done has been growing.

It culminated in the early part of the life of this Congress in the preparation of what is known as the personnel bill, reorganizing the personnel of the Navy. For the first time the different corps in the ranks of the Navy fell into a condition of harmony. It was said when the bill was prepared that 95 per cent of the representatives of the Navy were in accord in desiring its passage. So it came before Congress. It was not thought by the Senate committee, at least, that pending the war Congress should undertake the subject, but it was hoped the war would not be a very great war, as it was not, and would not last very long, as it did not, and that then the House and the Senate could set themselves to the task of adjusting the personnel of the Navy.

The bill, in short, covers certain important features. One is—and that is very important—the amalgamation of the officers of the line and the Engineer Corps. Now, as the Senator from North Carolina has said, that is a departure. I do not myself feel that it has been demonstrated that it will work completely to the satisfaction of the Navy, but I legislate upon the theory that you can not demonstrate everything. We are all the time engaged in experimental legislation. Whether the youth of the country who are taken to Annapolis at a tender age can, in the six years' course, master all the details that will make their professional life, both in the line and Engineer Corps, nobody can say with certainty. But so great has been the friction heretofore between the line and the Engineer Corps, who are brought together in the little world of a battle ship, with every human jealousy likely to be aroused, and with constant complaint from one and the other, it is deemed wise to try the experiment. There are many reasons why it may be believed that it will work well.

The bill has been prepared with great care in adjusting this important feature of amalgamation and the Senate committee has retained what makes it much more likely that it can work well—the six years' feature. We did not see our way clear to crowd this course in both lines of duty and yet shorten it. So, for that matter, I will say to the Senator I am willing as one to try this experiment and see if it will work.

The bill provides also, which is a very important matter, for what the Navy has lacked, what may be best described by the phrase the flow of promotion.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator from Maine excuse me before he leaves the question of the Engineer Corps? Why is it that younger officers are relieved from watch duty, as I notice by the Senate amendment? What is the reason for that, in the judgment of the Senate committee?

Mr. HALE. The Senate committee did not believe that it ought to declare arbitrarily that under no circumstances should certain officers be ordered to watch duty. That is too extreme and drastic a provision. There may occur emergencies when anybody might be ordered for watch duty, no matter who. The Senate committee did not want to put in the law the direct prohibition that under no circumstances should certain men be ordered to watch duty. The natural course of events will take care of that.

The matter of the flow of promotion is most important. It is important to the comfort of the officers, it is important for their ambition, it is important for the good of the service that men should not be kept back in the lower grades so long that they become comparatively old men before they reach the upper grades. That is important, as I say, in their work, in their life, in their ambition, and it is important in the uses of the Navy that men who have the rank which will give them the command of ships, large or small, or squadrons, or whatever it may be, shall not be the old men in the Navy. Therefore, the bill has been so framed that that is provided for.

The appointment of 100 warrant machinists is almost the solving of the question of the working of the amalgamation feature, bringing the line and engineers together, because, while it takes the engineers and puts them into the line, relegates to them the duties of the line, and would otherwise leave an important gap unfilled, this brings into the Navy a new grade of officers, the machinists, who will be educated men, getting good, fair pay, who will do a great deal of valuable work and important work that is now done by the lower officers in the Engineer Corps of the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Maine will pardon me, you take the present engineers, who do the practical engineering, and promote them to the line, and then you put machinists in to do the work that the engineer officers have been doing.

Mr. HALE. We were met by this condition, that if we did not do something of the kind we would have to increase the Engineer Corps anyway. The adapting of these new officers to this work I deem a very happy thought, whoever it came from, and undoubtedly it will do a great deal of good.

Now, there are other features, but these are the important provisions of the bill. Of course you can not undertake the task of reorganizing the Navy upon the basis that it is now and will be in the future, compared with what it was in the past, without being at once met with the fact that you increase expenditures. If any man supposes that you can deal with either of the military establishments of the Government upon the new basis and can run it on the old basis of cost, he is mistaken. If you have a good Navy, well manned, well equipped, and everything adjusted properly to its new size and importance, you have to pay the bills. If we are going to lead a great naval dance around the world, we will have to pay the fiddler.

While this bill involves expense, it is not, when looked into, alarming or extravagant. I have been surprised that we will get out of this matter with no more increased expenditure than is covered by the bill. Inquiry has been made of the Department, and careful examination given, estimates made, information returned here, showing what will be the cost. In the line part of the Navy the increase amounts to $773,731. There are 99 new officers in addition to the present number. In the Marine Corps—which is to be thoroughly reorganized and is made more adaptable to the importance and size of our Navy, as is the marine corps in the English navy, than it has ever been before—the additional cost is, for officers $231,580, and enlisted men $997,258, or $1,228,000; making $2,002,569.

Now, while I wish that anywhere we could save money and lessen expenditures rather than increase them, I do not believe that that can be done in the Navy. As I said, I have been surprised that the increase is not more. Mr. President, when you consider the important part the Navy plays, not simply the part it has played in the war, because that came as a matter of course, but that it is to play hereafter, the undoubted admission of everybody that we are to have not an enormous navy, not a great navy, but a great navy well equipped, well officered, well manned, well paid (and in pay we only assimilate the pay of the officers to that of the Army), I do not think it is disproportionate to pass a bill that involves the annual expenditure of $2,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Two million dollars, if the Senator will pardon me, does not cover all the expenditures.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly; it includes all those covered by this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. But not what will follow as a necessary result.

Mr. HALE. Of course, what will follow will not be from this bill; but the bill is made to fit in officers and men to the Navy that will be created by other acts of Congress and which has already been created by other acts. This is only an incident. If we had not built another ship——

Mr. BUTLER. It makes the other legislation necessary.

Mr. HALE. It is the reverse of that, if the Senator will allow me. The fact that we are building up a navy and increasing the number of our ships——

Mr. BUTLER. But I say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina must observe the rule in taking the floor, and address the Chair and obtain permission to interrupt the Senator who is speaking.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg the pardon of the Chair.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, he has got the cart before the horse. The cost and expenditure of building ships and maintaining the establishment does not come from this bill, but the bill comes from the recognized condition that the American people are in and that Congress has created of the larger Navy that necessitates this measure. Therefore this is one of the things that go along with the increase of the Navy; and as I have said more than once, in this incidental bill, which goes along with the reorganization and the rebuilding and the extension of the American Navy, I have been surprised that the expenditure was not greater. It will compare favorably, I will assure the Senator, with any other branch of the Government, particularly with the other branch of the military part of the Government—the Army.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will pardon me, I suppose everybody favors the enlargement of the Navy to a certain extent, but the passage of this bill makes that increase more expensive than it otherwise would be. The Senator will agree to that.

Mr. HALE. You may say that it costs a man more to maintain two houses than one. Of course it does.

Mr. BUTLER. That is not the point. Suppose we increase in size our Navy 50 per cent, and suppose that under existing law, before this bill is passed, that it would increase the cost 50 per cent. Admit that for argument's sake. Then, passage of this bill makes the 50 per cent increase of the Navy increase the cost much more than 50 per cent.

Mr. HALE. The Senator made his proposition in such a way that I was not able to follow him.

Mr. BUTLER. I am unfortunate that I have not made it clearer. This bill increases the salaries. This bill increases the expenditures of the Navy at present, even if we do not increase the size of the Navy. Suppose the bill did not provide for adding another officer, still the bill would greatly increase the annual charge upon the Treasury for sustaining the Navy Department. Now, we increase the cost of maintaining the Navy as it is and then largely increase the size of the Navy. So we not only largely increase the Navy, but we make even the present Navy cost more. That is as clear as I can state it.

Mr. HALE. I see the Senator's point, and to an extent he is right. We do make an increase here in the way of increasing the pay of the officers now in the Navy and in the future, but we have only done that to assimilate them to corresponding ranks and grades in the Army of the United States, which is the other seat of the military establishment of the Government. I repeat myself somewhat in answering the Senator's question. The committee did not feel that at present it was unjust to do that. It felt that the Navy was of sufficient importance and had its claims upon the American people rested so securely in the regard of the American people that it was not objectionable to raise their pay somewhat and make them equal to corresponding ranks in the Army. To that extent it is an increase undoubtedly, but the answer to it is very frankly given. It is simply putting them on the same basis with the corresponding grades in the Army, and we do not believe the American people will object to this, considering that it amounts to so little, only about $600,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Still the Senator will admit that the increase is remarkably large. For instance, the present pay of a Rear-Admiral on shore is $5,000, and the pay of a Rear-Admiral on sea duty at present is $6,000. The pay that they will receive after this bill is passed is $7,500 on shore or on sea, and after five years' service it is $8,364 per annum, which is an increase of more than 50 per cent in their salaries at one jump. In some cases it makes the increase of their salaries almost double. I submit, Mr. President, that it is a very radical increase, to say nothing of the radical departure made by this bill in amalgamating the Marine Corps with the line, something which has never been done by this or any other country.

It is an entirely new experiment, radical, and fundamentally radical; but it is further radical to increase at one stroke the pay of every officer in the Navy 50 per cent and more than 50 per cent at a jump when we are to have greatly increased cost put upon us by building new battle ships and manning them. If we did not increase the salaries the annual charge upon the Treasury would be greatly increased on account of the ships that are now being built. We have between forty and fifty ships now being constructed; they will soon be in service, and there will be an annual charge to maintain them, for men to officer them, and all that, so that the annual increase under the present law will be enormous; and now we propose to increase the salaries of all the officers in the service, and all who will come in hereafter, at one jump, something like 50 per cent, making an annual charge in increased pay of nearly $800,000 a year. I have not the exact figures before me. I think that is correct.

Mr. HALE. Seven hundred and seventy-three thousand dollars.

Mr. BUTLER. An increase of $773,731 for the present service. Of course when you double the personnel of the Navy you not only double the cost but you add on this 50 per cent increase to every new officer put in, and it means piling up expenditures in the future. Besides, the resultant increased cost in other directions which this bill will necessitate will run the additional annual charge in the millions of dollars.

I am in favor of a large navy. I think, situated as we are, possibly the wisest thing we could do would be to have about as strong a navy as any country in the world, and possibly as small an army. Certainly it is not necessary to increase the size of the Army in proportion to the proposed increased size of the Navy, for our battles in the future will clearly be naval battles. If we maintain our supremacy upon the sea, our supremacy upon the land will never be questioned. But I submit that, admitting it is wise to increase the Navy, say to double it, we should be careful not to load down this country with an enormous expense by increasing the cost of the salary of every officer 50 per cent at the same time.

Mr. HALE. Well, Mr. President, the answer to that is what I have already given. The committee had no hesitation in adopting it. The committee did not believe that it was putting the naval officer on too high a rate of pay to make him the equal of the corresponding rank in the Army. The service in the Navy is certainly as important as that in the Army. It is attended with more risks. The expenditures are far greater. The naval officer is in competition with the officers of the great powers of the globe wherever he goes. He has none of the things to eke out his salary that other navies provide for their officers. He has no entertaining fund. He must hold his own with the admirals, the captains, the commanders, and lieutenants of every navy in the world. The pay that we give him in this bill will only be a reasonably fair compensation for any naval officer who performs his duty, maintains his family, and tries to get along in comfort.

I do not believe that the American people will be shocked because we have at the time of this departure in reorganizing the naval service added seven hundred and thirty-odd thousand dollars and no more to the pay of the gallant officers of the United States Navy.

I am very desirous that the bill shall be finished and gotten out of the way of other matters, and therefore I will take no more time, Mr. President.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I desire to say one word in response to my friend from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. I have been a member of this committee for several sessions and we have given the subject-matter considerable thought and consideration. As the chairman of the committee states, your committee have had the benefit of the Secretary of the Navy, his able corps of assistants, and other naval officers. And here I want to say, in passing, that the pay of a naval officer is not as large comparatively as the same class of ability and the same class of service command in the private walks of life. The president of a railroad corporation, of a bank, of a manufacturing establishment receives ten times the pay of many of our naval officers holding corresponding positions that require the same ability to fill.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from California permit me?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina must observe the rule in taking the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from California will pardon me, I would like to suggest in this connection that his argument would apply to United States Senators as well as to officers of the Navy.

Mr. PERKINS. That is very true, Mr. President; but the same qualifications are not required to become a Senator of the United States which are required to become a commodore in the Navy. I venture to say that a very small percentage of those who occupy seats upon this floor could pass an examination and be received as a commodore in the Navy, even aside from the nautical qualifications required. But, be that as it may, the officers of the Navy are obliged to entertain to a greater or less degree. My friend here undoubtedly visited the White Squadron when it anchored at Newport News, in Hampton Roads. If he did, and partook of the hospitality of the commander of that ship, it was paid out of his own private fund. The Government allows nothing for his entertainment of others except that which is given as his salary.

Mr. President, I believe the salaries paid to these men, who must first devote six years of life to study in order to enter into the minor grades and then devote thirty or forty years of life before they can become one of the eighteen admirals, is meager enough. It is not as great as that paid by England and France and other foreign countries to those holding these positions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will please suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1575) to amend an act entitled, "An act to regulate commerce."

Mr. CULLOM. I consent to the unfinished business being temporarily laid aside until the conclusion of the pending bill.

Mr. HALE. Let it be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. I will detain the Senate but a few moments. A case recently came to my knowledge, that of Admiral Kirkland, commandant at the Mare Island Navy-Yard, in California, called to that bourne from whence no traveler returns. When an account was taken of his effects, there was not sufficient to pay the funeral expenses. That, to my mind, is sufficient evidence that there is no officer in the Navy who can lay up a dollar for a cold day from the salary that is given to him by the Government.

I want to refer to the criticism of the 100 machinists that the bill provides for. Mr. President, it is an absolute necessity. I call my friend's attention to a fact regarding the new Ironsides, which thirty years ago, at the close of our civil war, was, I think, the largest steam vessel we had then in the Navy. That vessel had but 1 engine with 2 cylinders. To-day the battle ship Iowa has 70 separate engines with from 140 to 150 cylinders. Each of those engines is a piece of mechanism that requires one to be skilled in mechanics, raised or educated or serving his trade as a machinist, in order to properly manipulate and operate economically and safely.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator mean by his argument to say that by taking the Engineer Corps away from the active duty of engineers and employing machinists to whom we give smaller pay, machinists who have had less training, we are getting better men for the service, men who can better handle intricate machinery, and better perform the duties the engineers have been performing upon our ships? Are the 100 machinists necessary in addition to the Engineer Corps that we have, or are they made necessary because we take the engineers and put them in the line? Would we need as many if we kept the Engineer Corps as practical engineers, specially drilling them and educating them and training them as engineers, and kept them doing that class of work while we educated another class of officers for the line?

In that case would we need all these machinists to assist them? If so, why do we need two classes of them? Do we need a class of underlings to do their work, and are the others simply to be their superiors and directors? And have not the Engineer Corps, the superiors and directors no less than the practical machinists, been doing in the past the very work that the machinists are now going to do? Are not these machinists, who are paid less, less qualified for the work than the Engineer Corps which has been doing it in the past? It was the Engineer Corps which made it possible for us to sweep Spain's fleet from the sea. Certainly we ought to be proud of our fleet, and I am proud of it; but why do we change a system that has won such laurels for this country?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, that is a long question. I could make equally as long a reply, but my remarks can not be construed by any such implication as that placed upon them by the Senator from North Carolina. He knows more about running a newspaper than I do; but I know more about running a ship than he does, and I say it without egotism. The company with which I am associated is operating some 30 steamships. I know the duties of the engineer and his assistants, of the water tender, the oiler, and the machinist on shipboard. While this bill, in my judgment, very properly places the Engineer Corps on a par with the line officers, it provides that they shall have a knowledge, and most of them do in a degree have a knowledge, of the duties of the line officer, of the deck officer, of the navigating officer.

It also provides that if the engineer or his assistant in an action is shot down the deck officer shall take his place. He will have some knowledge of the marine engines, of the triple or quadruple expansion cylinders, of the bearings and of the various other pieces of mechanism. Anyone without a practical knowledge and without experience would be lost in an engine room as much as in a dark night surrounded by a dense fog. These machinists will be selected by reason of their qualifications for the position. They have served their trade in a machine shop and they understand operating a lathe, a planing machine, the working of tools, the calipers, and all that which is necessary for any machinist to have a knowledge of in order to properly do his work.

The chief engineer to-day on those steamships goes practically into the engine room to run the engines, not placing his hands upon the throttle valve or working the levers that run the machinery, but he is there to direct it in case of an accident. His master mind is enabled to direct the machinists, his assistants, what they shall do to remedy the damage, the injury, the defect. Only a few days since, one of our trans-Atlantic liners met with an accident at sea. The engineer, having first learned his trade as a machinist and gone up step by step until he became the chief engineer of that magnificent vessel, annihilating time between this continent and Europe, by his knowledge and skill so managed that engine, that cylinder, that the vessel was enabled to proceed on her voyage, with reduced speed.

These machinists do the practical work. Every day there is work to be done in the lathes, in the engine room, and at the anvil, Something perhaps has occurred with the furnace, a bolt is out, a pin is loose, something which it requires a skilled mechanic to replace. The chief engineer could not do it without neglecting other duties. His assistants must be at all times at their station to answer to the bell of the directing mind that is guiding the ship navigating the waters. So these subordinates do the work.

We have been sadly hampered in the Navy because we have not had a sufficient corps of mechanics to assist in doing this work and keeping the machinery in order. Only a few months since a case came to my knowledge where an inexperienced engineer, although he had his papers, was placed in charge of a marine engine, necessitated by the sickness of his superior officer; and by his want of experience an accident occurred that cost the owners of that ship $10,000. This loss might be duplicated, aye, quadrupled, in the case of one of our great battle ships or cruisers.

Another thing the bill provides for, and I think it is a most wise provision. The boatswain, the gunner, the carpenter, and the sailmaker can not be appointed a warrant officer unless he has passed an examination as to a knowledge of the duties of those respective positions; and after he has been ten years a warrant officer he may be commissioned a warrant officer and rank with an ensign on the ship. It gives him a dignity, it gives him a consciousness and a pride in the position he has, for he becomes a commissioned warrant officer of this great Government.

I would have gone further in the bill if I could have had my way, and I would have made him eligible to be a line officer, as is done in Italy and, I think, some other countries of Europe. We are sadly behind the rule which prevails in the navies of some European countries. I believe in giving the poor boy who has merit and has the nerve and has shown his capacity a chance to become a Paul Jones or a Farragut, aye, or an Admiral Dewey, if the opportunity is given him to distinguish himself. This bill is not one step, but five steps in advance of this line.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will do me the justice to say that I agree with him and that I favored such an amendment to the bill. I do not like to have him make the impression that he seems to make in replying to me that I was opposed to giving any person in the Navy an opportunity for promotion according to merit. In fact, I distinctly favored such a proposition, and I entirely agree with the Senator in what he says.

Mr. PERKINS. I am very glad to give my testimony in behalf of my friend. He has worked zealously and faithfully upon the committee, and he had, I believe, the same object in view that the chairman or any other member of the committee had in framing a bill that will redound to the general interest and welfare of our Navy, and will commend itself to the people of this country. The only thing we differ about, perhaps, is how the object may be attained. I believe it the part of wisdom to profit by the experience of others. I believe the committee have acted wisely in taking into their counsel our naval officers, every branch of the naval commanders from the line officers, the engineers, the medical department, the paymaster's department, the warrant officers, aye, the seamen themselves, and out of it we formulated this bill, which we now present to you for the consideration and we trust for the adoption of the Senate.

If time shows that we have made any mistakes, they can be readily rectified. To-day necessity demands it. Our ships were propelled thirty years ago entirely by the winds of the ocean, entirely by sail. Since then a great revolution has taken place. The great motive power is steam and electricity, and we are sending these great battle ships, these great engines of war, on voyages of 14,000 miles, as we did the Oregon from the Pacific coast around Cape Horn or through the Straits of Magellan, and we brought her up here on the Atlantic shore to take part in one of the great naval battles of the world, and which history will record as such.

New conditions require new appliances. So, with these great ships propelled by steam, we must have machinists and engineers to so man them that there will be no mistakes, no errors.

But I will not weary the Senate. I simply wanted to reply to the criticism upon the machinists. I think this one of the wisest provisions in this bill, providing as it does for the enlistment of a hundred machinists who shall be skilled workmen, giving preference to those who have had experience on our ships and who have passed their examination satisfactorily to the naval board.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] intended to say that I had criticised the machinists—those were his words—but I do not think he intended to say what his words seem to imply. If I have any special sympathies for one class of men above another, it is with the under dog, or the man who has to do the most work and who gets the least money for it. My sympathies go out to that class in the Navy and in the Army and in every department of the Government and in all the industries in this country more than to any other class.

This bill promotes the engineer officers to the line, with increased pay, and then provides for machinists, at less pay, to do their work. They will be responsible men, and they will do the burden of the work; and I regret, since we are paying everybody else big salaries—increasing the salary of everybody else—that these men and the gunners and other minor officers will get smaller pay than some who are less meritorious and who will do less work in the future to maintain the Navy, to defend our country, and uphold the flag. Instead of criticising the machinists, I stand here to defend them, and am only sorry that the men who are to have the real burden of work upon them will have less of honor and less of pay than others.

Mr. President, I am not criticising the proposition to increase the pay of officers when they deserve an increase of pay; I do not stand as an advocate for a niggardly policy with reference to the Navy or with reference to any other department of our Government, for I have never believed in the wisdom of niggardly salaries for public officials. I have believed, and I believe now, that many of our States make, and often Congress makes, a mistake in giving too small salaries to certain officers and employees upon whom there is put great responsibility and great labor. I should, however, like to see more equity done—that is, to see those upon whom the greatest work and greatest responsibility rest receive a more equitable share of the salaries paid by the Government than they do. Whenever it can be shown that we can get better service by an increase of salary, it is, nine times out of ten, economy to increase the salary.

I think many of the State legislatures make a grievous mistake in the salaries they pay. But, Mr. President, I felt that it was my duty as a member of this committee to make these observations, although I am not prepared to say that this bill should not pass, and did not bring in a minority report or give notice that I should fight it and ask the Senate to reject it, because I am not clear what is best. It may be that the bill will turn out to be best for the Navy. I do not know, but I have serious doubts about it.

I am always glad to learn from my distinguished friend from California. It is true he knows more about a ship than I shall ever know, and probably knows more about a ship than any other man in the Senate, and it is, as a rule, safe to follow his advice about nautical matters. He also probably knows more about the Philippine Islands than any other man in the Senate; he is the only Senator who has ever set foot on the islands, and I hope Congress will follow his advice as to what we shall do with those islands in the future. I am glad to learn from that Senator, but still it is the duty of each Senator to act as a juror in passing upon questions after having heard all the evidence, even though it comes from an expert as distinguished as the Senator from California.

I do not think the Senator from California will say that he is absolutely certain that this bill is the best that we could pass. In fact, just as he was closing his remarks he admitted that this bill might be a mistake; but he said, if it is, we can remedy it in the future. Now, I wish the attention of that Senator. I should like to ask that Senator if he thinks we will ever be able to change or repeal the principle of this bill if we once adopt it? I want to ask him if we once amalgamate the Engineer Corps with the line, if we once raise these salaries to this scale, if we once change the personnel of the Navy and make every officer in the Engineer Corps a line officer, he believes that, if we find in the future that that is a mistake, it will ever be possible to change it?

Mr. PERKINS. I think there is no question but——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator asked me a question, Mr. President, and I shall endeavor to reply. There is no question but that the same power which invoked this legislation may repeal it. Perhaps as to those we have advanced to this grade it will not affect them; but the Good Book tells us that the average man's life is three-score years and ten, and we retire officers at the age of 62 in the Navy. We certainly can also make it apply to their successors who are to come after them.

I do not think we shall ever want to repeal this law, so far as the line officers and the engineer officers are concerned. I think it is wise policy to have those who walk the quarter-deck able to go into the engineer's room and upon the engineer's platform propel the vessel by the steam that is there generated by the boilers. So I hardly think the Senator's question is pertinent so far as it affects the wisdom or policy of the enactment of this bill into a law.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the Senator now says that he does not think we shall ever want to change this law, and yet the Senator himself admits that it is an untried experiment, that it is not to-day in operation in any other navy in the world. One thing is certain, with all these salaries once increased 50 per cent, we will never be able to reduce them. It is almost equally certain that with these engineer officers once promoted to the line, we will never be able to undo it.

This is a new policy. It is untried; it is experimental; and with all the wisdom of the Senator from California with refe ence to naval affairs and ships, surely he does not mean to say in an experiment like this, that is as radical as this, that he is absolutely certain that we shall never want to change our legislation, but that it is just the very thing we and all the nations of the world have been looking for for six thousand years, and we have only accidentally found it and have not yet tried it. That is a proposition that does not appeal to my average common sense, notwithstanding my scarcity of knowledge of naval affairs. I think it possible, if not probable, that in such an experiment, so radical, we may want to change our legislation; and I think that we shall find the extremest difficulty in doing so. In other words, it is a step that we take that we shall hardly ever be able to undo, even if we find that it works unsatisfactorily.

Besides, when you once put salaries up to the point that this bill puts them, from top to bottom—but mostly at the top—if we find in the future the burden upon the taxpayers of this country to be too heavy, if we find that the Navy is costing us more than it ought to cost us, it will be very difficult indeed, if not practically impossible, to ever reverse that step. You will simply have to lay heavier taxes and search out new ways for raising them.

Mr. President, we are starting on a policy not only with reference to our Navy, but with reference to the Army, and with reference to colonial—I will not say "colonial," for I hope that that word will never come into our official vocabulary, but with reference to certain foreign possessions that are now, fortunately or unfortunately, under our control and direction—we are starting on a policy that no man in this Chamber can see the end of, and one that in the near future means a considerable, a radical, and an enormous increase of expenditure.

Where is the money to come from, Mr. President? The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who is not now in the Senate and who is not in the city, stated, when presenting the last tariff bill to this body, that we had about reached the period in our life as a nation when we could not depend upon a tariff for revenue in the future; that is, for sufficient revenue.

He laid down the doctrine from the Republican standpoint, for the first time stated, to my knowledge, that we had stimulated our home industries until we had gotten to a point when we must seek foreign markets to sell our goods for less than we sold them at home; that it was profitable to overflow and sell our goods in foreign markets for less than the price for which we sold them at home, and that the result of that would be a reduction of revenues; that we should each year buy less from abroad; that the revenues which would come under any tariff, whether you called it a high protective tariff or a revenue tariff, would decrease, and that therefore we must in the near future look to new sources of revenue.

Where are we going to look, Mr. President? Are we going to keep the present burdensome war taxes, the odious stamp taxes, which the monopolists have managed to evade in most cases altogether and put on the shoulders of the people, though Congress thought it was distributing them so that the great monopolists would bear their share? Are we to keep those indefinitely? Are we to go out and hunt up more ways to put stamp taxes and other odious and oppressive taxes upon our people? The war is over and the stamp taxes have not been repealed; but, on the other hand, we are told each day that more revenue must be raised.

We have just begun in this new policy of enormous expenditures and doubtful expediency. The end is not in sight, but the beginning is just in sight. Mr. President, is it not the part of prudence, does not a just regard for the taxpayers of this country demand that before going recklessly, I might say without any disrespect for the committee—for I mean none—should we not, before taking a step like this, stop and count the cost?

Is it possible that we are going to make as radical an increase in the cost of the Army as is provided in this bill for the cost of the Navy? Is it possible that we are going into an inflated scale of cost in the whole governmental system from top to bottom? Are we going to do this without stopping to see where the money is to come from? Is it possible that any Senator will be satisfied to borrow? When you borrow, that means more taxation than if you did not borrow.

It is an easy expedient and a shifty one for politicians and public men who do not want to face the people to-day or to-morrow on an issue of increased taxes to say, "Let us borrow;" but every dollar borrowed simply shifts these burdens from to-day and to-morrow on the next generation. You not only make it as inevitable that the taxes have got to come from the people to pay that amount sooner or later, but they must come with interest charges added. A people that are not bankrupt had better pay taxes to meet expenses as they come. That was the policy laid down in England by the great Gladstone. He went so far as to say that he never wanted to see England borrow even in time of war; that the present generation had no right to burden and saddle upon future generations the debts of this with interest added.

Mr. President, we would all like to see a big navy. We are proud—everybody is proud—of what our Navy did in the last war. We have cause to be proud, but our pride in the Navy and our enthusiasm over a successful war should not make us forget the people at home, upon whose shoulders are the burdens of Government; it should not make us forget the private at home and his family; he who left his home and went into this war and gave not only his taxes to support the Government, but his life in the face of a foreign foe. When we have war, this Government depends upon the masses of the people who send forth their sons as volunteers to face the foe. They come from the homes and firesides of the humble as well as those of the rich; they come chiefly from amidst and among the great masses of the taxpayers of the country.

Let us so conduct this Government, Mr. President, that the Government will not only maintain its respect abroad, but will hold the love and allegiance of the man at home who pays the taxes to support the Government, and who must give his life, if necessary, when war comes.

We would all like to see the officers of the Government paid as much salary as they want; we would all like to see the salaries made as large as our pride would demand or as any possible contingencies in the future might require, but we should never take any step of this kind until we have duly considered the cost and what it will lead to in the future.

Mr. President, I shall not discuss what I consider the most serious feature of this bill, that is, the amalgamation of the Engineer Corps with the line, because that policy seems to have been settled by the Department; it seems to have been settled by the House of Representatives in its wisdom; it has been settled by the committee of the Senate, and it will soon, no doubt, be also and finally settled. The Senate itself has had no time to consider it fully. It is a radical departure; it is untried. But I am not an expert. I simply know how it impresses me. I shall not discuss that feature, I say, but it deserves the attention of every Senator who votes on this measure, as well as does the question of cost.

Mr. President, I shall not oppose the passage of this bill, because the committee after long consideration have reported it, but I did not think it should pass without the chairman of the committee making a statement to the Senate such as he has made and without some discussion which would call the attention of Senators and of the country to what the bill contains and what will be the almost certain result if it passes. Since it is to pass, I trust it is not a mistake, but I am impelled to say that I seriously doubt its wisdom from both standpoints.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 13, in section [17] 13, line 4, after the word "character," to insert "not above 30 years of age;" and in line 10, after the word "character," to insert "not above 30 years of age;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. [17] 13. That upon the passage of this act the Secretary of the Navy shall appoint a board for the examination of men for the position of warrant machinists, 100 of whom are hereby authorized. The said examination shall be open, first, to all machinists by trade, of good record in the naval service, and if a sufficient number of machinists from the Navy are not found duly qualified, then any machinist of good character, not above 30 years of age, in civil life shall be eligible for such examination and appointment to fill the remaining vacancies. All subsequent vacancies in the list of warrant machinists shall be filled by competitive examination before a board ordered by the Secretary of the Navy, and open to all machinists by trade who are in the Navy, and machinists of good character, not above 30 years of age, in civil life authorized by the Secretary of the Navy to appear before said board, and where candidates from civil life and from the naval service possess equal qualifications, the preference shall be given to those from the naval service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, in section [20] 16, line 7, after the words "under this," to strike out "act, as far as the Navy is concerned" and insert "section;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. [20] 16. That when an enlisted man or appointed petty officer has served as such thirty years in the United States Navy, either as an enlisted man or petty officer, or both, he shall, by making application to the President, be placed on the retired list hereby created, with the rank held by him at the date of retirement; and he shall thereafter receive 75 per cent of the pay and allowances of the rank or rating upon which he was retired: Provided, That if said enlisted man or appointed petty officer had active service in the Navy or in the Army or Marine Corps, either as volunteer or regular, during the civil or Spanish-American war, such war service shall be computed as double time in computing the thirty years necessary to entitle him to be retired: And provided further, That applicants for retirement under this section shall, unless physically disqualified for service, be at least 50 years of age.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 15, section [21] 17, line 12, after the word "brigadier-general," I move to insert the word "commandant;" so as to read:

That from and after the date of the approval of this act the active list of the line officers of the United States Marine Corps shall consist of one brigadier-general, commandant, etc.

It is simply a technical designation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 15, section [21] 17, line 15, after the word "this," to strike out "act" and insert "section;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. [21] 17. That from and after the date of the approval of this act the active list of the line officers of the United States Marine Corps shall consist of one brigadier-general, five colonels, five lieutenant-colonels, ten majors, sixty captains, sixty first lieutenants, and sixty second lieutenants: Provided, That vacancies in all grades in the line created by this section shall be filled as far as possible by promotion by seniority from the line officers on the active list of said corps: And provided further, That the commissions of officers now in the Marine Corps shall not be vacated by this act: And provided further, That vacancies in the grade of brigadier-general shall be filled by selection from officers on the active list of the Marine Corps not below the grade of field officer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, section [22] 18, line 25, after the word "President," to strike out:

Either first, by the transfer of such officers of the line of the Navy who are graduates of the Naval Academy, and who are not above the grade of junior lieutenant, as may apply therefor within ninety days after the passage of this act, said officers to take rank in the Marine Corps next after the junior second lieutenant now in said corps who is a graduate of the Naval Academy, or.

And to insert:

From time to time, whenever the actual needs of the naval service require it, after reserving vacancies sufficient for the six classes of cadets now at the Naval Academy or at sea, as they may respectively graduate.

And in line 15, at the end of the section, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That after said vacancies are once filled there shall be no further appointments from civil life.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. [22] 18. That the vacancies existing in said corps after the promotions and appointments herein provided for shall be filled by the President from time to time, whenever the actual needs of the naval service require it, after reserving vacancies sufficient for the six classes of cadets now at the Naval Academy or at sea, as they may respectively graduate, from the graduates of the Naval Academy in the manner now provided by law; or from those who are serving or who have served as second lieutenants in the Marine Corps during the war with Spain; or, second, from meritorious noncommissioned officers of the Marine Corps; or, third, from civil life: Provided, That after said vacancies are once filled there shall be no further appointments from civil life.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, section [23] 19, line 18, after the word "person," to strike out "except such officers as may be transferred from the Navy, and;" in line 19, after the word "officers," to strike out "and" and insert "or;" in line 23, before the word "years," to strike out "twenty-six" and insert "thirty;" and in line 2, page 17, after the word "Academy," to strike out "and those transferred from the Navy to the Marine Corps;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. [23] 19. That no person except such officers or former graduates of the Naval Academy as have served in the war with Spain, as hereinbefore provided for, shall be appointed a commissioned officer in the Marine Corps who is under 20 or over 30 years of age; and that no person shall be appointed a commissioned officer in said corps until he shall have passed such examination as may be prescribed by the President of the United States, except graduates of the Naval Academy, as above provided. That the officers of the Marine Corps above the grade of captain, except brigadier-general, shall, before being promoted, be subject to such physical, mental, and moral examination as is now, or may hereafter be, prescribed by law for other officers of the Marine Corps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, to strike out section 26, as follows:

SEC. 26. That the senior officers of marines of fleets or squadrons shall, while so serving, have the rank of the grade next above their lineal rank in the Marine Corps: Provided, That such temporary increase of rank shall cease on the relief of such officers from duty as senior officers of marines of fleets or squadrons.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer an amendment to come in on page 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 7, on page 5, after the word "Navy," at the end of line 15, it is proposed to insert:

No appointment shall be hereafter made of civil engineers in the Navy under section 1413 of the Revised Statutes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 8, at the end of section 10, I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, at the end of section 10, it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That any officer who has been or may be transferred to the construction corps for special ordnance duty shall be considered an additional officer in such corps, and shall take rank with other members of such corps according to the respective dates of completion of their four years' course at the Naval Academy and standing on the merit roll, and shall be promoted to higher rank with the officer next below him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments which have been made as in Committee of the Whole. If there be no objection, the amendments will be regarded as concurred in.

Mr. LINDSAY. I object to two amendments, striking out sections 13 and 14, on page 9.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the others be concurred in.

Mr. HALE. Let the others be concurred in, and the Senator can reserve those amendments.

Mr. LINDSAY. If those two amendments be not concurred in, then there are other amendments proposed by the Committee on Naval Affairs which ought not to be adopted. All that do not depend upon those two amendments I am perfectly willing to have concurred in.

Mr. HALE. Let a vote be taken on those two amendments, and after that the others can be adopted if those amendments are carried. I do not myself care to further discuss the bill, Mr. President.

Mr. LINDSAY. The bill as it came over from the House of Representatives required:

SEC. 13. That from and after the passage of this act the students at the Naval Academy shall have the title of midshipman, and on successfully completing the course at that institution each shall be commissioned in the lowest grade of the line or Marine Corps, the two years' course at sea being hereby abolished.

Section 14 required:

That upon the passage of this act all the naval cadets of the line and engineer divisions who have completed the four years' course at the Naval Academy and are performing duty at sea shall be commissioned in the lowest grade of the line or Marine Corps, and the members of each class shall take rank among themselves according to their graduating multiples as was determined at the end of the four years' course at the Naval Academy.

Now, I understand that this bill creates 90 additional commissioned officers in the Navy, and that the young men who have completed their course at the Naval Academy and who are now serving out the two years at sea, if commissioned at this time, would not be sufficient in number to fill the vacancies created by this bill.

The whole theory of the bill as it came over to the Senate was that these vacancies created by the provisions for additional officers should be filled from the graduates at Annapolis without regard to the two years' sea service, and from this time forward at the end of each four years of service at Annapolis the young men should go directly into the Navy, instead of spending two years at sea neither as officers nor as privates, with no defined rights and no special duties to perform.

By postponing the time when these young men, who have been educated at the public expense for the naval service, shall receive their commissions as officers, we leave forty new positions to be filled by appointment from civil life. Now, then, why should we go to civil life to get our officers for the Navy when we have a sufficient number of young men especially educated for these positions, who can take the offices now, instead of waiting two years for their commissions to be issued to them?

The chairman of the committee said awhile ago that the danger was that if these young men were now commissioned we would get what is called a hump in the Navy—more officers than we need. If we hold these young men back two years and fill these positions with appointments from civil life, leaving these young men to take their places at the end of two years, we will have the very condition which the personnel bill was intended to relieve.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have already called the Senator's attention to a provision here, found on page 7, in which the naval authorities are especially required to reserve vacancies for every one of the six classes now at the Academy.

Then I will call the Senator's attention to another phase of the bill, which possibly may explain what he considers as a wrong. That is this: We had some volunteers in this war who served in the Navy. The Naval Reserves all along the coast were called out. Some of them were on ships and went down to Cuba, and I simply submit to the Senator whether it is not proper that we should leave a small place through which meritorious young men, who have volunteered and have shown their willingness and who can stand the necessary examination, should be able to get into the Navy—a few of them, for we limit the number?

Mr. LINDSAY. If the Senator will permit me, for whom have we reserved these places? I read from the bill:

From time to time, whenever the actual needs of the naval service require it, after reserving vacancies sufficient for the six classes of cadets now at the Naval Academy or at sea, as they may respectively graduate, from the graduates of the Naval Academy in the manner now provided by law; or from those who are serving or who have served as second lieutenants in the Marine Corps during the war with Spain; or, second, from meritorious noncommissioned officers of the Marine Corps; or, third, from civil life.

Now, when we come to civil life the bars are down. We do not need to take the volunteer officers who have served in the war with Spain at all. Under that reservation any man can be appointed, without regard to whether he served as a volunteer or served in the Spanish war at all. We save places for the Marine Corps officers, but when that has been done we open the doors to any man in the United States to come in and receive appointment without regard to any service.

Mr. HALE. That is the provision in regard to the Marine Corps.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is the Marine Corps itself, and not the Navy.

Mr. LINDSAY. That is the provision to which the Senator called my attention.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; it is on page 7.

Mr. HALE. Page 7. The Senator from Kentucky has the wrong provision.

Mr. TILLMAN. I read from line 18:

That whenever the actual needs of the naval service require it the President is authorized, after reserving vacancies sufficient for the six classes of cadets now at the Naval Academy or at sea, as they may respectively graduate, to appoint from time to time, ensigns in the Navy, not to exceed 40 in all: And provided further, That no person shall be so appointed who, at the time of said appointment, is more than 25 years of age, and no person shall be appointed unless he has had meritorious service, in the Navy or Marine Corps, in the war with Spain; and no person shall be appointed except upon such physical and professional examination as the Secretary of the Navy shall require.

Mr. HALE. There you see it is so guarded, so restricted, so tied up that precious few will ever get into the Navy under this provision. It will give an opportunity, as the Senator from South Carolina has said, where possibly some few meritorious cases from civil life or men who have served in the war and can pass the examination can get in. The committee thought, with the Senator from South Carolina, that that was nothing more than fair; and we provided that it should not interfere with these classes. We let the regular classes go on; they graduate at the end of their six years, as they do now; every man cared for; not one shut out. Then, if on actual need a few more are required, the President shall have the chance to go into civil life and appoint perhaps ten or a dozen bright young men who have served in the Navy during the war and can pass all these examinations.

Mr. LINDSAY. And to put these young men as seniors to the graduates at Annapolis. I understand that they do graduate and deliver certificates of graduation, although the cadets are not entitled to commissions at the time their service at the Naval Academy ceases.

Mr. HALE. They complete their course, just as every other class. Places will be left for them. It is jealously guarded.

Mr. LINDSAY. After the appointees from civil life have gotten in, with the advantage in pay of five years' service and the advantage of seniority in rank, which they are to carry to end of their service.

Mr. HALE. If there are a few appointments—six or eight or ten—they will be appointed, and will enter for examination at the time of the graduation of the classes, and will go to the foot of the classes. When they come in they have to be examined. They enter the service at the same time with the others. Only they are taken from civil life—these few—and they will be placed below those who have graduated from the Academy.

Mr. LINDSAY. They will be placed below those who have served six years—four years at the Academy and two at sea—but ahead of those who have graduated at the end of their four years' course at the Academy.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me?

Mr. HALE. Nobody graduates at the end of four years.

Mr. LINDSAY. I know there is a difference of opinion on that point. I think they do graduate; they receive certificates of graduation, but they are not entitled to their commissions until after sea service and after they have taken their final examinations. But they receive their certificates of graduation at the end of four years. They have their commencement ceremonies at the end of four years.

Mr. TILLMAN. The naval cadets who get into Annapolis are the favorites of the Government to the extent that they are given their education free; they are furnished board and everything they may need; and I want to know by what right they have the preference over the older men who have educated themselves, who volunteered in this war, who showed they were as willing to serve in the Navy as these cadets are, and who are able to stand the examination. I want to know why the cadets, who are younger, should be preferred and their commissions taken care of, and they be made the seniors of these men who came forward and volunteered in the time of the country's need?

Mr. LINDSAY. I will tell the Senator from South Carolina what I am afraid of. It is that these people who get in under this provision from civil life will not be the favorites of the Government, but the favorites of somebody who has the influence to secure their nomination. Now, we have had enough discussion about civilians in time of war monopolizing the staff positions in the Army. Why do we want the liability of the same abuse in the Navy, when we have a set of young men who from their boyhood have been taken and educated especially to serve as officers in the Navy?

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator see no difference between the examination required here, as to technical knowledge and navigation and engineering and everything, and the men whom he and I and other Senators went to the War Department and begged to get into the Army last spring without any examination?

Mr. LINDSAY. I neither begged for them nor did I get any.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought the War Department gave nearly everybody a place or two. I am sure I got one or two appointments there, and I am certain the Senator is in nearer touch with the Administration and more its favorite than I am.

Mr. LINDSAY. For that reason it was not necessary to reward the Senator from Kentucky. [Laughter.] He did not need any patronage. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not get any reward, and I did not do any begging. I went to the President when the war broke out and I said, "Mr. President, so far as I can judge from your utterances, you have no partisan bias in this matter, and I want to know from your own lips whether you are going to recognize those of us who are on the opposite side in politics?" He said, "There is no politics in it. I propose to give every section and every man his just proportion, provided he will offer me good material." I never went near him any more. I simply made out a list and sent it forward.

Mr. LINDSAY. Of course I never intimated that the Senator from South Carolina——

Mr. TILLMAN. There was no reward in it, because I assure you I have felt compelled to vote against him on every proposition he has sent here since.

Mr. LINDSAY. It was a very proper thing for the President to say that which he said to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I so thought, and I respected him for it.

Mr. LINDSAY. I never hesitated to indorse any worthy man who deserved a position, if he asked me for my indorsement, but it did not make the slightest personal difference to me whether the President appointed him or not. I claimed no patronage; I asked for no patronage; I expected no personal patronage. The point I make is not that anything wrong has been done, but that there is no reason why we shall open up the Navy to the appointment of men under conditions which will bring about, whether just or unjust, the criticism about which we have heard so much in regard to appointments in the Army. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is simply a reflection upon the good faith of the President in making these appointments and the examining board as to whether they would pass men because of favoritism or on merit. I do not believe a naval board would ever disgrace itself by letting any man into the Navy who is not competent.

Mr. LINDSAY. What I want to do is to keep these questions out of the range of suspicion.

Mr. TILLMAN. We have not now enough men, competent and educated, to fill these places, and we are allowing the President the liberty to select among those volunteers who went into the Navy and went into this war if he can find those who are fit and who can pass the examination.

Mr. LINDSAY. We are setting aside the graduates of Annapolis and requiring them to serve two years at sea in order to leave open the vacancies that will make this thing necessary.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say we simply want to pickle them and make sailors of them before we send them out in charge of vessels.

Mr. LINDSAY. I do not think any officer of the Navy will say that the two years' service results in any substantial, practical improvement of the young man who goes to sea. He is neither an officer nor a seaman. His position is such that he can not exercise the functions of an officer nor render the service of a seaman.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is not the Senator aware that these young men have to stand a further examination when they have finished the two years' cruise, and unless they have learned certain things which are required, and which they do not learn at the Academy, they can not get their commissions?

Mr. LINDSAY. I understand that, and I understand that the four years at the Academy qualifies the young men, so far as mental improvement is concerned, to become officers of the lowest rank in the Navy.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the Senator would contend, if that is his argument, that four years at college makes a man fit for the profession of a lawyer or that of a doctor, whereas most people have to go and spend four or five or ten years afterwards learning those professions?

Mr. LINDSAY. If a young man studied law for four years at college, I would say he is ready to commence the practice of the law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Where will he get his grammar and his arithmetic, and the other necessary ground work, if he studied law for four years and nothing else?

Mr. LINDSAY. I did not say "nothing else." These young men at Annapolis study navigation as well as the sciences.

Mr. TILLMAN. They practice it at sea. They only theoretically study it at Annapolis, and when they go to sea they are made to navigate and are responsible to their superiors. They get marks for their work.

Mr. LINDSAY. I do not think the Senator from South Carolina and I, neither of us having ever seen the sea until we were mature men, are capable of settling this question with absolute accuracy. My information is that this bill came recommended by the Navy Department, excluding the two years at sea, and recommending that these young men be commissioned at the end of their four years' study at the Naval Academy.

Mr. TILLMAN. So we took it; but we thought a little something about it, and we did not want them to get in too easily and too frequently or too many of them in a bunch.

Mr. LINDSAY. As the Committee on Naval Affairs admit that they differ with the Navy Department, which is especially charged with the management of our naval affairs, it is not presumptuous on my part to decline to follow the committee and to insist that the Navy Department probably understood this question as well or better than the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me? The Navy Department did recommend this plan as a whole, but the present Secretary of the Navy has at least once, I think more than once, called attention to the great importance of their two years' service at sea before the final graduation of the cadets. I wish to emphasize what was said by the Senator from South Carolina by repeating that the instruction at the Academy for four years is academic. The one thing the cadets do not know anything about and in which they have had very little experience is the sea, the ocean, which is to be the place of their vocation for life.

For my part, I think it was a great blunder to think for one moment of reducing the course from six years to four years. It was four years until about 1872, when it was deliberately changed, and it has been a course of six years ever since. I think it would be the greatest injury that could happen to the Academy and to the Navy to shorten the course to four years and to take upon the naval list for life—for life, be it understood—all these graduates of the Academy at the end of four years who may know their academic studies well but do not know anything about the ocean.

Mr. LINDSAY. It is a very singular statement to make upon the floor of the Senate of the United States that after the young men have been educated for four years with a special view to making them seamen they come out knowing less about the sea than they know about anything else.

Mr. CHANDLER. Who said anything of that sort—if the Senator will allow me? I did not.

Mr. LINDSAY. I think if the Senator will have read from the stenographer's notes he will find that I have not misstated him.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will trust the stenographic report. They take short cruises at sea, but they do not go out upon the ocean and they do not find out whether seasickness will drive them ashore again.

Mr. LINDSAY. Then, if that be the case, we had practically as well abolish the Naval Academy and make the test two years service at sea for any man who has received a fairly good scholastic education.

In 1872, when we added these two years' sea service to the course at Annapolis, we had more naval officers than we could find places for. Our navy was going downhill. We had no places to assign these cadets to, and therefore we attempted to stop the accumulation of officers who could not be put to service, by adding the two years' sea service before they should be commissioned. But in 1899, when we are about to have a navy that requires additional officers, the theory of the committee is that we shall go into civil life and find them, instead of taking the men we have educated with a special view for service at sea. I think the Navy Department is right, and I think the House is right, and I think it will be a great mistake to strike out these two sections, and thus make places for men who have not been educated with a special view to serving as officers in the Navy of the United States, however deserving or meritorious they may be.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me, for just a moment, to repeat a quotation?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will simply quote some doggerel poetry I learned some time ago, as exemplifying the argument of the Senator from Kentucky. As I understand it, his idea is:

"Mother, may I go out to swim?"
"Yes, my darling daughter;
Hang your clothes on a hickory limb
And don't go near the water."

[Laughter.]

Mr. LINDSAY. I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that that is probably the best speech he has made since he has been a member of this body. [Laughter.]

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I perhaps do not give the same importance to the question involved in this amendment that the members of the committee do or that the Senator from Kentucky, on the other side, gives to it, but I do think that the change proposed by the committee is a sound and sensible one. I think to abolish the two years' cruise at the end of the four years' academic course would be a mistake in the education of our naval officers. I believe very firmly that the only place to make a seaman is at sea, and for that reason I am utterly opposed to the present tendency to educate our naval apprentices in barracks. I think our naval apprentices ought to go to sea and learn their profession there, and I think the men whom we train as officers, to whom we give four careful years of academic education, with a special fitting for their future life, should have the two years at sea.

I also think, Mr. President, that no possible harm can be done by the proposed appointments from civil life. In my judgment, they will be very few. I doubt very much if, under the restrictions made, they will reach ten or a dozen in all; and I confess I can not see any objection to taking in a few men who served in the war with Spain, who showed special aptitude for naval life, and who are so energetic and determined that they are ready to train and fit themselves to pass the necessary examination. Therefore, I shall vote for this amendment, and I hope it will be retained; but it does not seem to me that this or any other amendment touches the vital points of this measure, which are three in number.

The first and most important is that it relieves the present stagnation in promotion, making it impossible, so far as we can devise, that men 50 years of age shall find themselves still on the lieutenants' list. The other great point is the merging of the Engineer Corps, getting that great corps into a proper position, and getting rid, once and for all, of the controversy between the engineers as part of the staff and the line. The importance of that corps has risen with the change in the ships, and I think no wiser measure could have been proposed than to give the engineers a place in the line, which this bill proposes. The third and, to my mind, one of the most important advantages in the bill is that which increases the pay of naval officers. I can not see why naval officers should not have the same rates of pay as officers of the Army and the Marine Corps, and that is all the bill undertakes to do in that direction.

The Navy of the United States has never failed the country in any war in which we have been engaged. Its whole history is a record of unbroken victory; and it seems to me that it is in the highest degree unjust that the victors of Manila and Santiago, men like Dewey, in command of the fleet, or like Wainwright, in command of the Gloucester, should receive less pay than an officer of the Army or an officer of the Marine Corps with whom he stands side by side. We pay our sailors better than the sailors of any other country are paid, but we pay our officers, especially in the higher grades, much less. There is no danger, in my judgment, that the officers of the American Navy will ever receive compensation at all adequate to the great debt which the country owes them. I think giving them the same pay as is given to officers of the Army and the Marine Corps is not giving them so much compensation as they really deserve, but it is at least a bare act of justice.

This bill, Mr. President, in my opinion, is one of the best and most useful measures that have been before Congress. It will be worth to the Navy, in my opinion, many ships, for it will put the organization once and for all on a proper basis. With respect to a great and useful measure like this it seems to me no amendment should be allowed to interfere with its passage. I do not think any amendment has been proposed in the Senate which does not distinctly benefit the bill. I hope that whatever happens we shall in any event secure the passage of this great bill for the benefit of the American Navy, whatever may be the fate of particular amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it is so important that the pending bill shall pass this afternoon, if it is to become a law, that I shall take only a moment to assure the Senate that there is no danger of any injurious increase of the Navy by appointments from civil life. Senators will observe that the amendment on page 7, in the first place, limits the number of appointments to 40 in all.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator excuse me? Does he understand that that power will be exhausted whenever the 40 are appointed; it will not be continuing?

Mr. CHANDLER. There can never be more than 40 appointments made in all. Then no person can be appointed who is more than 25 years of age; no person can be appointed unless he has had meritorious service in the Navy or Marine Corps during the war with Spain; no person can be appointed unless he has had a physical and professional examination. And before any appointment can be made the President is charged with the duty of making it certain that every one of the six classes now at the Naval Academy who shall finally graduate shall receive his commission in the Navy. More than that, these appointments are only to be made from time to time as the actual needs of the naval service require.

Mr. President, it is my belief that there will not result from these appointments more than two or three or four or five appointments a year during the next five or six years. I am just as much opposed as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] to opening a wide door into the Navy from civil life; and if there were danger of any injury to result from this clause, I would be as anxious as the Senator from Kentucky to have it stricken out. But I beg to assure Senators that there is no such danger.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has concisely stated the great merits of this bill. The amendments which have been made by the Senate, the retention of the six years' course at the Naval Academy and the discrimination in the pay of the officers of the Navy between sea pay and shore pay, are, in my judgment, vital. With those clauses in the bill I believe it can become a law at the present session of Congress. Without those clauses in the bill I fear there will be so much debate, discussion, and controversy that the bill will not become a law. As a most useful and important bill to the welfare of the Navy, I hope it may be passed this afternoon.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, what is the pending question? I understand the bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole, but that the question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate, and the question is on concurring in the amendments striking out sections 13 and 14.

Mr. LINDSAY. I desire to offer an amendment to take the place of section 13.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As a new section?

Mr. LINDSAY. As a new section to take the place of section 13.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 13. That all the naval cadets of the line and engineer divisions who shall have completed the four years' course at the Naval Academy and who served at sea in the late war with Spain shall be commissioned in the lowest grade of the line or Marine Corps, and the members of each class shall take rank among themselves according to their graduating multiples as determined at the end of the four years' course at the Naval Academy.

Mr. LINDSAY. That amendment places the cadets who have served four years at Annapolis and are now at sea, and who served at sea during the recent war with Spain, upon the same footing with the civilians whom the bill proposes to make eligible to appointment in the Navy.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. LINDSAY. If that amendment can be adopted, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. HALE. It simply gives them the preference in appointment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator from New Hampshire did not seem to catch the point of the inquiry which I made a few moments ago, and I desire to present a similar inquiry to the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the committee.

The section which has been adopted as an amendment as in Committee of the Whole, commencing at line 17 of page 7, reads:

And provided further, That whenever the actual needs of the naval service require it the President is authorized, after reserving vacancies sufficient for the six classes of cadets now at the Naval Academy or at sea, as they may respectively graduate, to appoint from time to time ensigns in the Navy, not to exceed 40 in all.

Then it proceeds to give the qualifications, which are, in my judgment, very appropriate. It seems to me, however, that that language might possibly bear the construction that 40 more appointments, continuous appointments, are vested in the President. For example, he now has 10 and it might be construed to vest in him, until there shall be a repeal of the law, a continuous power of making 40 appointments.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the number of that section?

Mr. CHILTON. It is on page 7.

Mr. SPOONER. It is section 9.

Mr. CHILTON. I am assured by members of the committee that the design is simply to give the President authority to make 40 appointments, and that whenever those 40 appointments are made his authority is exhausted and that it is not the intention to give him a continuous power of keeping 40 more appointees in the Navy. I should like to hear from the chairman of the committee on that subject.

Mr. HALE. It clearly is not intended to be a continuing provision. If the Senator can suggest any language that would make that an absolute certainty, I would be entirely willing to accept it. I think the provision is clear in connection with what goes before it and what comes after it.

Mr. CHILTON. I would suggest that the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Maine are very familiar with the subject, and they may suggest appropriate language to make the meaning clear.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me correct the statement the Senator from Texas made when he spoke of the President having authority to appoint 10 now. He has authority to keep 10 cadets at the Naval Academy at all times. That has no relation to this subject. He can appoint 40 ensigns in the Navy, and no more, and of course when he has appointed those his authority ceases; and the limitation of the number of ensigns is that made by existing law or by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move, after the word "all," in line 22, to insert "at any one time."

Mr. CHILTON. I do not think that would help it. That would make it the other way, if anything.

Mr. HALE. It would work the other way.

Mr. COCKRELL. How would it work the other way?

Mr. HALE. We do not want it to be 40 at any time. We want it to be exhaustive in itself, and to be only 40 in the whole time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Only 40, and then drop back to 10.

Mr. HALE. It has nothing to do with the 10.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no question of 10 in the case.

Mr. CHILTON. It has nothing to do with that. I merely mentioned by way of illustration that the President now appoints 10, and it might be said that he is hereafter to have 40 appointments in his power.

Mr. COCKRELL. What time does he have in which to make these appointments? It looks to me like a continuing clause from time to time.

Mr. HALE. He has to adjust it to the needs of the six classes, which is the conservative feature of the provision. He can not rush them all in.

Mr. CHILTON. That is all right.

Mr. HALE. I doubt whether as many as 6 or 8 or 10 in all will be put in under this provision. He has got to adapt the whole thing to the needs and possibilities of graduation of the six classes. He has got to save places for them as they are needed, and the limitation of 40 in all, with attainments that they must have, with the qualifications and examinations, will prevent almost every appointment. In looking at it I doubt whether when the President comes to undertake it he can find any bright young men who will stand the examination and will be under 25 years of age, and every year makes it less and less likely, because they are getting older and older. We guarded it as well as we could.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have drawn an amendment. I think it is entirely unnecessary, but if the Senator from Texas wishes to have it made I will offer it.

Mr. CHILTON. I suggested to the Senator to draw it. He is very apt in such matters.

Mr. CHANDLER. After the word "all" insert:

And no additional appointments after that number has been appointed shall be made.

Mr. SPOONER. That will not help it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us hear how it will read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 22, after the word "all," insert:

And no additional appointments after that number has been appointed shall be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HALE, Mr. CHANDLER, and Mr. TILLMAN were appointed.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. HAWLEY. I give notice that on Monday, as soon as convenient after the morning business, I shall move to take up for consideration the Army reorganization bill and make it the unfinished business, and I shall try to the best of my ability to press it to some conclusion.

Mr. HAWLEY subsequently said: I find that I did not speak with precision or I was not clearly heard. I wish to give notice again that on Monday, immediately after the morning business, I shall move to take up the Army reorganization bill.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 600 additional copies of House bill 11022 and Senate bill 5516, and the reports of the Military Committee thereon.

PENSACOLA AND NORTHWESTERN RAILROAD.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 11736.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know that I shall object to the Senator's bill, but I will call the attention of the Chair to the fact that a unanimous agreement was reached that at the conclusion of the naval personnel bill the Pension Calendar should be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair announces to the Senate that under the unanimous-consent agreement it will now proceed with the Pension Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator from Florida if the bill does not provoke debate.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11736) granting the right and authority to the Pensacola and Northwestern Railroad Company to build bridges over certain rivers in the State of Alabama.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATUE OF FRANCIS E. SPINNER.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will yield to me a moment to call up Senate joint resolution No. 73?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the request if the joint resolution does not provoke debate.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It will not lead to any debate. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 73) for the location and erection of a statue of Francis E. Spinner at the Treasury Department building in Washington.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on the Library with an amendment, which was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That permission be, and the same is hereby, granted to the General Spinner Memorial Association to erect said statue at such place in the city of Washington, other than the Capitol or Library grounds, as shall be designated by a committee composed of the Joint Committee on the Library, the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, and the president of the General Spinner Memorial Association; and the sum of $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection of a pedestal upon which to place said statue.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The committee reported the following preamble, which was agreed to:

Whereas the ladies employed in the United States Treasury Department and others have raised a fund for and have caused to be executed a bronze statue of Gen. Francis E. Spinner, Treasurer of the United States from March 16, 1861, to June 30, 1875, in commemoration of his faithful public service, and especially as a token of their admiration and gratitude for his successful endeavors in behalf of the employment of women in the civil service of the United States: Therefore,

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution granting permission for the erection of a bronze statue in Washington, D. C., in honor of Gen. Francis E. Spinner, late Treasurer of the United States."

CODE FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER. With the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire, I renew my request for unanimous consent that immediately after the conclusion of the order of business which the Senator from New Hampshire has in charge, the Secretary shall proceed with the formal reading of the House bill 8571, known as the Alaska bill, to and including page 248 of the bill, that being the criminal code.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is asked by the Senator from Montana that, immediately after the conclusion of the Pension Calendar, the bill known as the Alaska bill shall be taken up for a formal reading. Is there objection?

Mr. TILLMAN. When will the reading begin?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the conclusion of the Pension Calendar.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is an indefinite time. We do not know when it will be. That will depend upon how much of a Pension Calendar we have.

Mr. CARTER. I am advised by the Senator from New Hampshire that the Pension Calendar will require about one hour's time, and my request is that thereafter the reading of the Alaska bill shall proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly it will take a little longer. I did not indicate that definitely as the time.

Mr. TILLMAN. The idea, then, is to get through with the reading this evening?

Mr. CARTER. To get through this evening. It will not take over an hour and a half or two hours.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand that the Senator has eliminated all of the Senate committee amendments?

Mr. CARTER. Not all of the Senate committee amendments.

Mr. TILLMAN. But practically all?

Mr. CARTER. Practically all, save and except those that relate to the criminal code, or code of criminal procedure, known as the Senate bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to say to the Senator from Montana that that agreement will not interfere with what I am about to propose and ask, and that is unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of House bill 1217.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Senator from Ohio to desist for a moment until the unanimous consent proposed shall have been presented to the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. I am only stating what it is that I propose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection made to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us hear it exactly.

Mr. CARTER. The request for unanimous consent is that immediately on the conclusion of the business presented by the Senator from New Hampshire under the order heretofore made the formal reading of the Alaska bill shall proceed, the bill as amended by the statement yesterday made only to be read—that is, the criminal code, the code of criminal procedure, and the amendments germane thereto—being that portion of the bill as reported to and including page 248, which eliminates more than two-thirds of the bill as reported to the Senate. The reading will require probably an hour and a half to two hours.

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall not object to the commencement of the reading and to reading as far as we can; but the request does not include that it shall be completed to-night?

Mr. CARTER. I do not so understand, if any Senator desires to move an adjournment before the completion of the reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any further objection? The Chair hears none. The order is made.

THOMAS G. TIERNON.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 1217.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will take the liberty to state at this point that I want to be very courteous to all Senators, but at the same time I have a duty to perform as regards the Pension Calendar. I will yield to the Senator from Ohio, and likewise to the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], who has a bill in which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] is interested, and who is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. Then I must insist upon the regular order.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1217) for the relief of Thomas G. Tiernon, late captain of Company H, Tenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to revoke the order dishonorably discharging Thomas G. Tiernon, late captain of Company H, Tenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and to issue to him an honorable discharge, to date from the 12th of December, 1861, and provides that no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the Agricultural appropriation bill, so that a conference committee may be appointed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11266) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. CULLOM, Mr. QUAY, and Mr. PETTIGREW were appointed.

GEORGE ALCOTT.

Mr. PASCO. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has kindly yielded to me that I may ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the consideration at this time of the bill (H. R. 1794) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against George Alcott on rolls of the War Department.

I am advised that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], who is now absent, is interested in this bill, which has received the unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to remove from the rolls and records of the War Department the charge of desertion now standing against George Alcott, late a private in Company C, One hundred and fifty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and to issue to him an honorable discharge to bear date June 13, 1865, and provides that no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROCEDURE IN PENSION CASES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Pension Calendar is now in order.

Mr. LINDSAY. Notwithstanding the very peremptory statement of the chairman of the Pension Committee that he would give way to no other business, I desire to call his attention to House bill No. 80, providing procedure in certain pension cases, reported from the Pensions Committee with instructions that I should call it up at the first favorable opportunity. I take it that I will get no more favorable opportunity than when the chairman of the Pension Committee has the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a general pension bill in which I am interested, and I should be very glad to yield for that bill to be considered. I think it will probably provoke no debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 80) providing procedure in certain pension cases.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments reported by the Committee on Pensions will be stated.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Chair to delay putting the question one moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are certain amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the chairman of the committee or some member of the committee would explain what that bill is. It seems to me a pretty important bill to be passed here without any debate or any knowledge on the part of many Senators of what it contains.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say, in response to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] has had charge of this bill. It was considered by the Committee on Pensions and referred to a subcommittee, of which the Senator from Kentucky was chairman. So he is better acquainted with it than I am, and I wish he would take charge of it and answer the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, the character of the bill is this: The practice of discontinuing or modifying pensions by the Pension Bureau on information which comes in a confidential way, of which the pensioner has no knowledge and as to which he has no access, has led to controversies, as Senators all know. Some years ago, I believe, Congress undertook to treat a pension as a vested right, but the courts did not sustain that proposition.

This bill now provides that wherever the fact comes to the notice of the Pension Commissioner that a pension ought to be discontinued he shall cause to be prepared a statement of facts upon which action is to be taken; that before the pension shall be set aside or discontinued a notice of these facts shall be furnished to the pensioner; that thereupon a special commissioner shall be appointed, before whom the Government and the pensioner may each have a hearing, and that the testimony, when taken, shall be sent to the Pension Bureau and passed upon by the Pension Bureau authorities, the question then to be there finally disposed of.

It seems to be only fair to the pensioner, who is prima facie entitled to his pension, that he shall have a hearing and an opportunity to meet charges which may be made against him before final action shall be taken; and this bill provides a process by and through which that may be done.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky where this hearing is to be had?

Mr. LINDSAY. The hearing is to be had at the post-office or town nearest the residence of the pensioner.

Mr. HOAR. I believe we have a considerable number of pensioners residing out of the country, have we not?

Mr. TELLER. Yes. We have some in Canada and some in various parts of Europe.

Mr. HOAR. Such cases ought to be in some way provided for.

Mr. TELLER. I want to ask the Senator from Kentucky if what he has stated is all that the bill contains?

Mr. LINDSAY. That is all the bill contains.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to retard the passage of the bill. I think it is a very good thing. I know myself of some very great hardships which have been inflicted upon good, honest pensioners. There fell under my observation a case where for ten or twelve years a pensioner had been unable to secure his pension and was unable to ascertain what complaint had been made against him. Finally, after eight or ten years or more, he succeeded in convincing the Department that they never ought to have suspended his pension. I am in hearty sympathy with the movement as I now understand it.

Mr. LINDSAY. The bill as it came from the House of Representatives provided that the confidential letters sent to the Pension Bureau should be shown or exhibited to the pensioner. The committee of the Senate were of opinion that under such conditions very few men would care to write or furnish information. So we struck out that provision and inserted in lieu thereof a provision that a statement of facts upon which the action was to be based should be prepared by the Commissioner of Pensions, or under his direction, and that statement furnished to the pensioner.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that there should be a provision that in the case of a pensioner residing out of the country the hearing should be at some convenient place, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, or some other authority, who would have the direction of it; otherwise I do not see how the act can operate at all upon such a pensioner.

Mr. LINDSAY. I will say to the Senator that the attention of the committee was not called to that fact; it did not occur to any member of the committee; there was no provision made for it by the House of Representatives, and the session being so nearly at a close, we thought it not prudent to make any amendment that would not commend itself to everybody.

Mr. HOAR. I thought that the committee had proposed amendments.

Mr. LINDSAY. We propose only this amendment, that instead of exhibiting to the pensioner the confidential communication upon which the Pension Office proposes to act, the facts stated should be embodied in a statement made by the Commissioner and the confidence of the correspondent not betrayed. If the Senator will prepare such an amendment as he suggests, the committee will doubtless accept it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understood the Senator from Kentucky to state that the hearing provided for should be had before a special commissioner.

Mr. LINDSAY. A special examiner.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. A special examiner. Does the Senator mean that an examiner is to be appointed for a single hearing?

Mr. LINDSAY. Oh, no. I take it, and the committee so understood, that the special examiners now in the field——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Those already employed?

Mr. LINDSAY. Those already employed should give the hearing.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that on page 3, line 6, there should be inserted:

Or if the pensioner reside outside of the limits of the United States, then at some convenient place within the United States, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LINDSAY. For the committee I will accept that amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, what objection is there to informing the pensioner whose pension is attacked of the names of the witnesses upon whose statements the attack has been made?

Mr. LINDSAY. The pensioner will have an opportunity to cross-examine all the witnesses. The point is that many men may know a man is drawing a pension who is not entitled to it, but he is their neighbor, perhaps the kinsman of their neighbors, and they are willing to give information, although they are not witnesses, to the Pension Department, but will not do it if their letters are exposed and the odium of being informers is to be attached to them.

Mr. SPOONER. It may be wise to withhold the letters, but why may the pensioner not have the names of the writers?

Mr. LINDSAY. There is nothing in the bill to prevent him having the names. The bill says that a statement of facts shall be prepared. I ask the Secretary to read lines 14, 15, 16, and 17 of section 2, on page 2 of the bill.

The Secretary read as follows:

Such special examiner shall, as soon as practicable thereafter, and having first given such pensioner and the person making such statement at least twenty days' notice thereof, in writing, proceed to take such evidence as may be submitted to him touching the merits of such case.

Mr. LINDSAY. There is no secrecy about this. The pensioner has twenty days' notice before the examination commences, and I take it there is no more reason why the Government should give him the names of the witnesses it intends to call than that any other litigant should give the names of the witnesses on whom he expects to rely.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not mean the names of the witnesses to be called by the Government, but the name or names of the person or the persons who make the charges.

Mr. LINDSAY. That was the very thing we were trying to provide against. No man is likely to make a charge against his neighbor in a matter in which he has no interest, except the interest which attaches to good citizenship, if his name is to be exposed and he is to incur the antagonism, odium, and hostility of the party whom he supposes to be fraudulently drawing a pension and all his kinsfolk. There is no reason why the name should be given to the pensioner. The question is to try whether or not he is entitled to the pension he has been drawing and not who has given the information to the Government, which the Government never could acquire unless somebody should furnish it.

I now ask that the committee amendments may be acted upon.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions was, in section 2, on page 2, line 5, after the word "facts," to strike out "duly sworn to;" after the words "shall be," at the end of the same line, to strike out "filled with" and insert "first prepared by or under the direction of;" in line 7, after the word "Pensions," to strike out "by the person or officer of the United States making such allegation, when said statement is filed in the Pension Department, or within thirty days thereafter" and insert "and;" and in line 10, before the word "transmitted," to strike out "shall be;" so as to read:

That in every case where an adjudicated pension is sought to be withheld, suspended, modified, or canceled, a full statement of all the facts shall be first prepared by or under the direction of the Commissioner of Pensions, and a certified copy of the same transmitted to the pensioner whose pension is sought to be so withheld, suspended, modified, or canceled, and the case assigned to a special examiner of the Pension Department for investigation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, on page 3, line 15, before the word "Interior," to strike out "Pension and;" and after the word "Interior," to strike out "Departments" and insert "Department;" so as to make the clause read:

If said charge is sustained, then said pension shall be withheld, modified, suspended, or canceled, as the Commissioner of Pensions shall determine; but no pension shall be withheld, suspended, modified, or canceled until a full determination of said investigation. The right of appeal shall remain as now allowed by the Interior Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will now be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, section 2, line 6, after the word "resides," it is proposed to insert:

Or if the pensioner reside outside of the limits of the United States, then at some convenient place within the United States, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 9801) granting an increase of pension to Emer H. Aldrich.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that that bill has been read in full, as in Committee of the Whole, and reported to the Senate. The only question was as to the discrepancy between the name in the title and in the body of the bill. It should be "Emer H. Aldrich" in line 6, to correspond with the name in the title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon the correction of the name.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to substitute the initial "H" for the initial "A," in line 6; so as to read "Emer H. Aldrich."

Brooks, late of Company I, One hundred and fortieth New York Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

Mr. GALLINGER. While this bill coming from the House of Representatives is in bad form and the committee propose an amendment to it, I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment of the committee and that the bill be passed in the form it came from the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions.

Foster, of the One hundred and seventy-fifth Regiment of New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of the pension she now receives.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know why this pension is left at $40 per month and the pension of the widow of a brevet major-general was cut down from $50 to $30?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I think there is no reason on earth why it should be so, but the bill came over from the other House in this form.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the rate of pension for the widow of a lieutenant-colonel?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator before he makes the motion which I suppose he intends to make that if the bill is reduced, as I think he proposes to reduce it, it will not benefit the claimant at all, as she is now receiving $30 per month.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I object to the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET A. LOWTHER.

The bill (H. R. 11382) granting a pension to Margaret A. Lowther was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Margaret Ann Lowther, widow of Henry Lowther, deceased, late of Company E, First West Virginia Volunteers, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY C. BATES.

The bill (H. R. 2459) granting a pension to Mary C. Bates was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of Mary C. Bates, widow of the late Maj. Francis H. Bates, United States Army, on the pension roll, and to pay her a pension of $17 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCIS SCOTT.

The bill (S. 1649) granting an increase of pension to Francis Scott was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that Francis Scott, late a private in Company B, Twenty-third Regiment of Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, now on the pension roll at the rate of $36 per month, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to receive the same pension as a soldier now receives or which shall be allowed hereafter by law to one who has lost an arm at the shoulder joint or a leg at the hip joint.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. PALMER.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the message from the House of Representatives in reference to the bill granting a pension to John M. Palmer be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the message from the House of Representatives returning to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 5342) granting a pension to John M. Palmer.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to say a single word in reference to this bill. Senators all know who John M. Palmer is—a man distinguished both in civil and military life, once a member of this body, and for a time chairman of the Committee on Pensions of the Senate. General Palmer is now in circumstances, as I understand, of destitution and practical blindness.

Mr. CULLOM. And 80 years old?

Mr. GALLINGER. And 80 years old. The Senate passed a bill granting him a pension of $100 per month, but the House of Representatives, in its wisdom, reduced the amount to $50 a month. A committee of conference was ordered, which, however, has not met. The friends of General Palmer, recognizing his urgent necessities, fearing that the bill may fail if it goes to a conference, it being so near the end of the session, prefer that he shall receive the pension of $50 per month. For that reason only, on my motion the bill has been returned to the Senate.

I now move to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate asked for a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that motion will be agreed to, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now move that the Senate agree to the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I hope that will be done, notwithstanding I very greatly regret that the other body should have declined to give so distinguished a man as General Palmer a pension of $100 a month in view of the service he has rendered to his country both in war and in peace.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

CODE FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER. I now ask that the Secretary proceed with the reading of the Alaska bill, in conformity with the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the reading of the bill with be proceeded with.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill (H. R. 8571) to define and punish crimes in the district of Alaska and to provide a code of criminal procedure for said district.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). The Chair asks the attention of the Senator from Montana. It is the understanding of the Chair that this is simply the first formal reading of the bill, and that it is not read for amendment. Is that correct?

Mr. CARTER. It is the formal reading of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Not for amendment?

Mr. CARTER. Not for amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. The bill is not to be acted on to-night?

Mr. CARTER. The bill is not to be acted on, nor is any other business to be transacted to-night save and except the formal reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And no amendment to be acted upon?

Mr. BATE. No amendments to be either proposed or acted upon.

Mr. CARTER. That is correct; no amendment to be proposed or acted upon.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of section 39, on page 14.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to one matter which perhaps I had better call attention to now than to wait for the consideration of the bill, and I ask him to look into it overnight. It has been of late years the policy of Congress—certainly ever since I have been in the Senate I have striven for that policy—never to have in ordinary legislation minimum punishments, especially where imprisonment is provided, except in some cases where the crime is always and must be an abomination. The Secretary just read a provision that in case of burglary the punishment shall be imprisonment for not less than one year.

Now, it always ought, in my judgment, to be in the discretion of the presiding judge to inflict a small and in many cases a nominal punishment. Some boy just above the age of criminal capacity does something which is a technical burglary, or a person with intellect so feeble that he is in the hands and under the influence of somebody else, commits a crime, where the judge would be very glad indeed to let him off with a slight punishment. It is not necessary, I am sure, to the Senator from Montana to amplify the suggestion. I suggest to my honorable friend to look into the matter overnight, and see if his committee or if he will not correct it when the bill comes up for actual enactment by striking out the minimum punishment, as we have done ever since I have been on the Judiciary Committee; and, indeed, before that time the Senate in every instance where the matter was called to its attention struck out the minimum punishment.

Mr. CARTER. I shall consider the point suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of section 62, on page 24.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply wish to give notice that I shall propose some amendments to section 62 when we get to the stage of amendment.

Mr. BATE. We are not amending the bill now. It is being read formally.

Mr. CARTER. To what section did the Senator from Missouri refer?

Mr. BATE. Section 62.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it is entirely too broad.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of section 118, of chapter 6, Title I, on page 50.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it has been suggested that the Secretary is quite weary and that Senators are anxious to retire from the Chamber at this time. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 18, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 17, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JULIUS A. KAISER.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Does the giving of unanimous consent interfere in any way with the vote that we were taking last night when the House adjourned?

The SPEAKER. No; if any gentleman calls for the regular order, the vote will proceed. The Chair is proceeding entirely upon unanimous consent of the House. This is a matter that can be disposed of in no other way.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate be requested to furnish the House of Representatives a duplicate copy of the engrossed bill of the Senate (S. 1227) for the relief of Julius A. Kaiser, the original of the same having been lost or misplaced.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF THE EMPLOYEES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I have a resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the authority vested in the Committee on Accounts by resolution of the House of May 12, 1898, No. 208, to make investigation of the employees of the House, be extended to authorize said committee to administer oaths to witnesses and to sit during the sessions of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS WHITE RIVER, ARKANSAS.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5126) to authorize the St. Louis, Siloam and Southern Railroad Company, of Missouri and Arkansas, to construct a bridge across White River, in the State of Arkansas.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DINSMORE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SETH H. SMITH.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11504) to extend certain patents of Seth H. Smith.

The bill, with the amendments reported by the Committee on Patents, was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. Reserving the right to object, I shall be glad if the gentleman from Ohio would give us some explanation of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order. This is a proposition to extend a patent.

Mr. DOCKERY. I thought it was.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, this is unquestionably a very meritorious case. The bill has received the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Patents. It is a proposition to extend the patent on a wooden dish and on the machine that makes it. The patent has nearly expired. The man who owns it is a poor man, by reason of losses by fire and by reason of infringements upon the patent, the costly litigation in which he became involved having only been settled as late as 1894. The expense of this litigation has absorbed practically all the profits he might have made, and up to this time he has derived no benefit from his invention. The article manufactured under the patent is designed to be sold to grocers and other dealers for the purpose of being given away to their customers, just as brown paper is given away. It is a product that comes into competition with various other products of similar character. It is not anything which is in its nature a monopoly. I repeat that the bill is in every sense a very meritorious proposition.

Mr. BRUCKER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio when this bill was introduced?

Mr. SOUTHARD. In the early part of the session.

Mr. BRUCKER. Can not the gentleman give me the date of its introduction?

Mr. SOUTHARD. The date is on the bill. I have not a copy of it in my hand.

Mr. BRUCKER. I would like to know the date before agreeing to the request that the bill be now considered.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I will say to the gentleman that the bill has been fully considered by the Committee on Patents.

The SPEAKER. It appears by the printed copy of the bill that it was referred to the Committee on Patents January 9 and reported to the House February 8.

Mr. BRUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I received a few days ago from some of my constituents a telegram with reference to some bill that had been introduced concerning the extension of a patent.

Mr. SOUTHARD. The chairman of the committee says this is not that bill.

Mr. BRUCKER. I want to be very sure in regard to the matter, and for that reason I shall this morning object to the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I think the gentleman can easily satisfy himself that this is not the bill to which the telegram had reference.

Mr. BRUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I have positive assurance from one of my colleagues that this is not the bill with reference to which some of my constituents telegraphed me, and for that reason I withdraw my objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. As this is a proposition to extend the life of a patent beyond the seventeen years fixed by general statute, I hope the gentleman from Ohio will consent to allow the matter to go over. I do not think it ought to be considered just now.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. DOCKERY. I do.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH SAN GABRIEL FOREST RESERVE.

Mr. BARLOW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11618) to grant to the Pasadena and Mount Wilson Railway Company right of way and certain lands for railway purposes through the San Gabriel Forest Reserve.

Mr. LACEY. A request was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] that no action be taken on this bill for a certain time, so that he might have an opportunity to confer with some persons about it. I do not know whether he desires that action shall be longer deferred or not.

Mr. WANGER. I withdraw that request.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to; the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BARLOW, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THE CENSUS BILL.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 11815) to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses be disagreed to, and that a conference with the Senate be ordered on the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HOPKINS, Mr. RUSSELL, and Mr. DE VRIES.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH NEZ PERCES INDIAN LANDS, IDAHO.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5265) granting to the Clearwater Valley Railroad Company the right of way through the Nez Perces Indian Lands in Idaho.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Oregon if this bill has been reported by a committee of the House?

Mr. TONGUE. It has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House and a similar report was made in the Senate, the bill having passed that body on the report of the committee.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to ask further if this bill has in it the usual provisions to protect and conserve the rights of the Indians? As I said the other day, I intend to see that the Indians are not cheated.

Mr. TONGUE. It has. It provides that if this company fails to make satisfactory provision to pay the Indians, or a satisfactory agreement with the Indians, either side may take their claim into the district court in the county in which the lands are situated and obtain a judicial decision on any disputed question.

The rights of the Indians are fully protected, I think, by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. SULZER. Is it provided for in the bill that this company shall pay the Indians for the lands that may be taken?

Mr. TONGUE. It is provided that they shall be paid. The bill provides either for a private agreement with them or under such terms as the district court of the county in which the lands are situated may fix.

It further provides, I will state to the gentleman from New York, that all rights which are granted by the bill shall be void unless the entire line of 145 miles is completed within three years. Further than that, I will say to the gentleman that the bill will be as much benefit to the Indians as to anyone else.

Mr. SULZER. I rely on the gentleman's statement and withdraw my objection. The Indians are not represented here, and we should be careful not to invade their rights or infringe their privileges.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to the consideration of the bill, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. TONGUE. Certainly.

Mr. HARTMAN. Has this bill been submitted to the Representative from the State of Idaho?

Mr. TONGUE. The Representative from Idaho, I understand, is not present. I tried to find him myself, but was told that he was not on the floor of the House. But I do not believe that the bill would be opposed by him. It is a Senate bill, and the Senators from Idaho, to whom it was submitted, have given their indorsement of it.

Mr. HARTMAN. The reason I make the suggestion is this: Everyone is aware that the gentleman from Idaho has been confined to the hospital for many months and is unable to be present. I noticed that he was here this morning, but do not see him now.

Mr. TONGUE. I was not aware of the fact that he was here to-day.

Mr. HARTMAN. He was here this morning; and while I do not wish to interpose any objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon—because it would be presumptuous on my part to do so—I should like to be assured by the gentleman from Oregon, one way or the other, that the gentleman from Idaho has been consulted in reference to the matter and that the bill meets his approval.

Mr. TONGUE. As far as I know, he has not been consulted, but I requested the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] to confer with him upon the subject, and I do not think there is any objection. As far as I know, there is none.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think I can assure the gentleman from Montana that this legislation is unanimously desired by the people of Idaho.

Mr. HARTMAN. I wish the gentleman to understand me as not objecting at all. It is only to have some assurance that this met the approval of the Representative from Idaho, and, with the statement of the gentleman from Washington, I do not desire to interpose any objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say further to the gentleman that the Senator from Idaho who resides at Lewiston, which community is especially concerned in this project, is also in favor of the bill.

Mr. HARTMAN. I am satisfied.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered and was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. TONGUE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 599. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sum of $400 to The Brownell & Co., Dayton, Ohio, on account of penalty erroneously imposed by the Light-House Board;

H. R. 10281. An act authorizing the Light-House Board to provide a steam whistle at Michigan City, Ind.;

H. R. 11440. An act to locate the office of the deputy collector of the port of East Pascagoula, Mississippi, at Scranton, Miss.;

H. R. 5796. An act granting an increase of pension to Peter E. Shipler; and

H. R. 12094. An act making an appropriation for clearing the Potomac River of ice.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR WALTHALL AND THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE LOVE.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, February 25, 1899, be set apart for the purpose of paying tribute to the memory of Hon. EDWARD A. WALTHALL, late a Senator from the State of Mississippi, and also Hon. WILLIAM F. LOVE, late a Representative from the State of Mississippi.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CADETS AT THE NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4808) authorizing the President to appoint additional cadets at large at the United States Naval Academy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to appoint during the next fiscal year five cadets at large at the United States Naval Academy, to be in addition to the number heretofore authorized by law, said appointments to be subject to the conditions and requirements of existing laws and regulations.

Mr. HILBORN. I move to amend by striking out the word "next" in the fourth line and inserting the word "present."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand that one of the purposes of this bill is to provide for the appointment of a brother of the late Ensign Worth Bagley, and I shall not object.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will state that another purpose in the mind of the committee was to enable the President to appoint a son of the late Captain Gridley, who was commander of Dewey's flagship, the Olympia, in the battle of Manila, and who, for his gallant conduct on that occasion, received the thanks of Congress and was advanced several numbers, but who died immediately thereafter.

Therefore neither he nor his family have in any way received any advantage from the recognition which Congress gave to his gallantry in that fight. He has a splendid boy who is fully qualified in every way for a cadetship, and I will state as a personal matter that I know the President of the United States is exceedingly anxious to exercise such authority as Congress may give him to appoint that young man to the Naval Academy.

Mr. BAILEY. My judgment is that it is a very excellent way in which to recognize the heroism both of young Bagley and of Captain Gridley. Of the other three appointments I know nothing.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The other three were provided for such similar exigencies as might possibly arise in connection with the great deeds performed during the last year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment offered by Mr. HILBORN was read, as follows:

In line 4 strike out the word "next" and insert in lieu thereof the word "present."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ISAIAH MITCHELL.

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7915) allowing Isaiah Mitchell, of Denver, Colo., seven years within which to make a homestead entry upon certain land.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Isaiah Mitchell, of Denver, Colo., late a corporal of Company G, One hundred and fiftieth Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry, who, on March 22, 1890, made a homestead application in the Denver (Colo.), land office for entry of the SW. ¼ of sec. 28, T. 2 S., of R. 64 W., and by reason of disabilities incurred consequent upon his service as a soldier during the late war of the rebellion was compelled to abandon said land, be, and he is hereby, granted further time and until seven years from the passage of this act within which to make final entry upon said land: Provided, That no adverse claim shall exist at the date of the passage of this act, and that within six months from that date he shall go upon said land and establish his residence thereupon, and that he shall thereafter continue to reside upon and cultivate the same as his home for the proper period according to the provisions of the homestead laws.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Reserving the right to object, I should like to know what is the object of the bill?

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who introduced the bill, can explain it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the gentleman that the land described in this bill was located upon by Isaiah Mitchell some four or five years ago. He nearly lost his eyesight and has been compelled to leave the land. This simply gives him the right to reenter that land, provided no one else has taken it up. It is land which I do not regard as worth a great deal of money. It is in the arid region. It is under no ditch. I do not see how he can ever make any money on it or ever complete his homestead entry.

Mr. LOUD. Why do you reserve it for seven years, which is a longer period than the homestead law requires?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is a copy of a Senate bill and is offered in the form in which it was reported in the Senate. I do not know the particular reason.

Mr. LOUD. This man evidently had some service during the war and he could prove up in a couple of years.

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. This is strictly under the rules of the Interior Department, as shown in the report of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This land is located about 30 miles east of Denver, and the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] is acquainted with the character of the land there. It is very rich land if it is irrigated, but if it is not under an irrigating ditch it is not worth anything. It seems to me there can be no harm in permitting him to prove this up within seven years.

Mr. LOUD. I can not see any objection to his going there and being permitted to prove up, but why reserve this for seven years when he can prove up in two or three years?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is a copy of a Senate bill and is offered in the form in which it was reported in the Senate. I did not want to change the bill.

Mr. LOUD. That ought to be a very good reason.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that this is not a Senate bill.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. This reservation was——

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is a copy of the bill that the Senate passed last year. The language was taken from that bill. I will state to the gentleman that that is the only reason I know of. I do not think the land is worth much if anything; that is my judgment about it.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. Under this bill if it becomes law that land would have to lie there seven years under the option of this claimant, and nobody else could take it during that time. Is not that the truth about this bill?

Mr. LACEY. Let me answer that question. The bill provides that he shall within six months of the passage of the bill reenter upon the land; so that it can only be kept out from entry six months.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And the land is lying with thousands and thousands of acres there that nobody desires to locate upon.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. Why give him seven years to prove up if he must enter in six months?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado a question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If a railroad company wanted this land, do you think there would be any objection?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know.

Mr. STEELE. Why should he be compelled to take seven years when he can prove up in five?

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. I can not understand why you want to give him seven years to prove up in and require him to enter in six months when he can prove up in five years.

Mr. LACEY. Under existing laws he would have eight years.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. He could prove up in five years.

Mr. LACEY. We give him seven.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. Why give him seven years if he already has eight years?

Mr. LACEY. Because he lost his time. This is a limitation or a reduction.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. Why do you want to reduce the man's time?

Mr. LACEY. A moment ago you asked, "Why increase from five to eight years?" It is because he has already had one chance.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WHITE of North Carolina, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

APPEAL FROM DECISION OF THE CHAIR.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the regular order. The question now before the House is on an appeal from the decision of the Chair and a motion to lay that appeal on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 158, nays 95, answered "present" 10, not voting 88; as follows:

On this vote:

Mr. GROSVENOR with Mr. MOODY.

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I voted in the affirmative, but I observe that I am paired with the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. CURTIS, and as he is not here, I wish to withdraw my vote and be marked "present."

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be marked as "present," although I am paired.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that as the gentleman from Indiana did not respond, he can not be marked "present."

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. But I am paired and was present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman should have answered when his name was called. However, the RECORD will show that he was present.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. JOY. I voted in the negative, and I wish to withdraw that vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's vote will be withdrawn.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHN M. PALMER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 5342) granting a pension to John M. Palmer and the message requesting a conference on said bill and amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be considered as granted.

There was no objection.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report the annual naval appropriation bill, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine reports the bill (H. R. 12122) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes, which will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the naval appropriation bill, and on that I move the previous question.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman from Maine has moved the previous question. If the previous question should be voted down, would it be competent for me to move an amendment to his motion that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union consider Senate bill 4792?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Maine can not ask for the previous question upon the motion which he has made, and the question is upon the motion that he has made.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it competent for me to move an amendment? I make the motion to amend his motion by instructing the committee to take up and consider Senate bill 4792, relating to the Nicaragua Canal.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order, because this is a general appropriation bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry and point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point of order that this bill has been this moment reported and has not been printed.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is printed and the bill is in the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not the printed bill which has been reported. It has not been printed since it was reported.

The SPEAKER. As matter of fact, the bill is printed.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Gentlemen can have a copy of it by sending to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I can not get the reported bill, because it has just been reported.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will say to the gentleman that the printed bill is the same as the reported bill verbatim et literatim et punctuatim. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. If I move to strike out that part of the gentleman's motion that refers to this particular bill, and we go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the committee not being instructed to take up a particular bill, under the rule does it give to the committee the right to decide what bill should be considered? Would that be competent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would not be competent, because the gentleman from Maine makes a privileged motion, and the other is not. One can not be substituted for the other.

Mr. HEPBURN. Another parliamentary inquiry. If this motion is voted down, would it then be competent for me to move that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the bill I have referred to?

The SPEAKER. It would not. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the Chair to make any formal ruling on the point of order I made; that is, that the bill has just been reported and we have no printed copy of the reported bill.

The SPEAKER. There are printed copies of the reported bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It could not be of the bill which has just this moment been reported, and the House, under the rules, must order the reported bill printed. The rules require that the bill as reported must be printed, and it has not been printed. I understand the rules to require that every bill when reported must be printed and referred to the proper Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The House has ordered it printed, and the copies are here, but it was an anticipatory printing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Ah, but the Speaker can not assume that this bill as the gentleman has reported it is the printed bill that we have.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I state that it is.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not contradict that gentleman's statement, but the rule requires that the reported bill must be printed. However, I make the formal point of order, and the Chair can rule.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Does the gentleman wish to delay the consideration of this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. If there is any necessity for haste in this matter, and the gentleman from Maine will ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, I shall not interpose any objection. It is simply in the interest of the orderly transaction of business that I have made the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. With the same view and in order that the point of order may be saved, I suggest (for I think it important that the bill should be considered at once) that the gentleman from Maine now ask unanimous consent.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am perfectly willing to ask unanimous consent for so obviously proper a purpose if I shall not thereby lose my privilege upon the motion I have made.

Mr. BAILEY. You will not.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I ask unanimous consent, then, Mr. Speaker, that we proceed at once to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine? The Chair hears none; and the point of order is by consent of the House waived.

On motion of Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12122) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of economizing time, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of this bill be dispensed with.

Mr. MUDD. Reserving the right to object, I ask the gentleman whether he will not include in his request the proposition that the portion of the bill relating to the buildings and grounds of the Naval Academy at Annapolis be passed over until the other portions of the bill have been considered. We may desire to offer an amendment in relation to that portion of the bill after the rest of the bill is concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine simply asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am not authorized to include in my request any such thing as the gentleman from Maryland proposes.

Mr. MUDD. But because this bill has just been furnished to members and we have had no opportunity to know what it contains with reference to this important item, I must ask that the bill be read through unless unanimous consent be given for the course I have suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. MUDD. I object, unless the agreement I have suggested be made.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am not authorized to make such an agreement as that.

Mr. MUDD. I have simply asked the gentleman whether he would not include in his request for unanimous consent the proposition I have stated, or allow me to make it.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The gentleman must understand that, as chairman of the committee having charge of this bill, it is impossible for me to ask unanimous consent for the postponement of every particular clause that some member may desire to be considered at the conclusion of the bill.

Mr. MUDD. But members have the right to know what is in the bill; and I will myself ask unanimous consent for the proposition I have stated.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I suggest to the gentleman from Maryland that he withdraw his proposition, because it certainly is not in order to ask the postponement of any section or paragraph until we have reached it.

Mr. MUDD. It can be done by unanimous consent at any time. I am not making any captious objection. No member of the House except gentlemen on the committee has had opportunity to know what is in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest to the gentleman from Maryland that this whole difficulty can be obviated if the gentleman from Maine will except from his motion to dispense with the reading of the bill that portion relating to the Naval Academy.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. In one word I can satisfy gentlemen that this request of the gentleman from Maryland is an unreasonable one.

Mr. MUDD rose.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. If the gentleman will permit me to hold the floor for a moment——

Mr. MUDD. But the gentleman can not do so without unanimous consent.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Then I will wait until I can hold the floor in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. This whole proceeding is by unanimous consent. The regular order is the first reading of the bill, and the gentleman from Maine has asked to dispense with that for the purpose of saving time.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Before I object to the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland, I want to make a statement. The gentleman is asking that consideration of a certain item be postponed until the rest of the bill has been concluded. Now, the item to which he refers is almost the last item in the bill, and in the regular order of procedure it would not be reached until almost all the rest of the bill had been concluded.

Mr. PAYNE. If the item in question is almost the last one in the bill it seems to me there ought to be no difficulty in these gentlemen coming to an agreement.

Mr. MUDD. The item to which I refer is on page 31 of the bill. I simply want time to investigate the matter and get information.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I withdraw my request. Let the Clerk read the bill.

Mr. MUDD. If I may be allowed, by unanimous consent, to make a statement——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I object. Or rather I should say I withdraw my request to dispense with the first formal reading of the bill. I desired to save the time of the committee, if possible.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, then——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I will not punish the House for the gentleman from Maine. I ask unanimous consent that the first formal reading be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am very much obliged for the assistance of my friend from Maryland.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill, if no gentleman desires to discuss it.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding briefly to explain the provisions of the bill, I wish to ask gentlemen on the other side of the House—this not being in any sense of the word a political measure—whether there is any desire on the part of members for debate upon the bill? It is important that we should get through with it as rapidly as possible. And I want to state that I am indebted to the very great courtesy and generosity of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs for yielding priority to this bill, because in his belief it would expedite the public business and enable us more certainly and more rapidly to utilize the brief time now remaining of this session of Congress.

It is the purpose of the Naval Committee, therefore, to consume but very little time in the general discussion, and to reserve the consumption of time for any debate that might arise when we reach the various provisions of the bill under the five-minute rule. However, it is the right of the committee to determine upon such debate as it may deem necessary; and, in view of that fact, I would like to know from gentlemen on the other side if there is any disposition to enter into a general discussion of the features of the bill; and if so, how much time gentlemen would desire?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that I have had no application for time on this side of the House at all. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine that we go on with the consideration of the bill now, under the five-minute rule, and I think there will be no disposition to debate it.

If the gentleman from Maine will allow me——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Then I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed right here.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire——

[Cries of "Regular order."]

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded, and that is the reading of the bill under the rule.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do not desire to discuss the bill, but simply to call attention to a fact which may be of interest to the members.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the pay of officers on sea duty; officers on shore and other duty; officers on waiting orders; officers on the retired list; clerks to commandants of yards and stations; clerks to paymasters at yards and stations; general storekeepers, receiving ships and other vessels; extra pay to men reenlisting under honorable discharge; interest on deposits by men; pay of petty officers, seamen, landsmen, and apprentice boys, including men in the engineers' force and for the Coast Survey Service and Fish Commission, 20,000 men and 2,500 apprentices under training at training stations and on board training ships, and for men detailed for duty with naval militia at the pay prescribed by law, $12,726,440.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I move to strike out the last word, Mr. Chairman, for the simple purpose of saying to the members of the committee present that in my efforts to reduce the time to be consumed in debate as much as possible it was my purpose to ask that the members of the committee would resort to the printed report submitted by the Naval Committee for their consideration and information in regard to the pending bill. I have no desire to go further and make a restatement, orally, of the provisions which are embodied in the report, and I think the members of the committee will derive all the information that may be necessary in regard to the preparation of the bill and the items contained if they will carefully read the report which has been submitted.

That is all I desired to say. I ask a continuation of the reading of the bill and withdraw the pro forma amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RUSSELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7094) providing an additional circuit judge in the Third judicial circuit.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 5465. An act authorizing the renewal of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines who served during the war with Spain; and

S. 5446. An act to grant to the Pasadena and Mount Wilson Railway Company right of way and certain lands for railroad purposes through the San Gabriel Forest Reserve.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase and manufacture of smokeless powder, $1,000,000.

Mr. BRUCKER. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the gentleman in charge of this bill, how much of that fund of $1,000,000 is to be used in the manufacture and how much in the purchase of this smokeless powder?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That is left to the Navy Department. I will state to the gentleman that last year we appropriated for the construction of a powder plant, which is nearing completion, but we did not feel that we had better undertake to fix what amount should be manufactured and what amount should be purchased. So we left that to the discretion of the Department.

Mr. BRUCKER. So that the ultimate intention of the United States Government is to establish a plant for the manufacture of its own smokeless powder?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Yes; that is the object. I will state to the gentleman that as a practical matter it is not the intention of the Department, nor was it the intention when the appropriation was made for the Government factory, that the Government should attempt to supply itself entirely or very largely by this plant; but there were various reasons why it was deemed necessary to have the plant, for the purpose of carrying experiments forward, and also that the Government might have a nucleus for manufacture if the exigency arose.

The Clerk read as follows:

Smokeless-powder factory: Necessary expenses incident to the work of continuing the development of the smokeless-powder factory, $25,000.

Mr. BRUMM. I move the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 9, line 8, after the word "dollars," insert the following paragraph: "Smokeless coal: The necessary expenses incident to experiments to test the qualities of smokeless coal for use on all vessels of the Navy, $30,000."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I must make the point of order on that.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask the gentleman to reserve the point for one moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Maine reserve the point of order?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. I merely ask that I may be permitted to print certain remarks and some statistics showing why that ought to be done. That is all I ask.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that he may be permitted to print certain remarks in the RECORD on this subject. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Arming and equipping Naval Militia: For arms, accouterments, signal outfits, boats and their equipments, and the printing of the necessary books of instruction for the Naval Militia of the various States, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, $60,000.

Mr. BRUCKER. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out the word "sixty," in line 22, page 10, and inserting the words "one hundred;" so that it will read "$100,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BRUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I have no set speech to offer in support of this amendment, but I desire to submit a few impromptu observations in support thereof.

Whether we will or not, this nation is destined to become one of the great naval powers, if not the greatest in the world, and that, too, in the near future. In this bill, and in the report of the committee accompanying it, we find that something like $45,000,000 is here appropriated for the purpose of establishing this nation as a great naval power, and yet we provide in this bill, in this section, the "extravagant" sum of $60,000 for the purpose of aiding and encouraging the youth of the several States to enlist, procure boats, uniforms, arms, and all the paraphernalia necessary to drill and familiarize themselves with navy service and fit themselves to go into the regular Navy in case of actual hostilities.

Now, I think that this great Government, especially under the present complications, actual and impending, if it expects to rely at all on these naval-reserve companies which we find organized throughout the different States of the Union, if we are to seek their aid and support in time of actual hostilities, we ought, in a bill in which we appropriate $45,000,000 for the Navy, to be willing to deal, not generously, not extravagantly, but at least fairly with them in the matter of appropriations. Now, in my home city of Saginaw, in the State of Michigan, we have one of these naval-reserve commands. It joined with the command at Detroit, Mich., during the late unpleasantness with Spain, manning the good ship Yosemite, and doing valiant service both in Cuban and Porto Rican waters, at one time maintaining for forty-eight hours, single-handed and alone, a successful blockade of San Juan Harbor, Porto Rico, repulsing every attempt to run the blockade, for the United States Government.

I think the House owes it to the different commands throughout the Union that we extend not only a helping hand but encouragement to those young men who belong to these naval-reserve commands, encouragement to enlist and become members of them, and in this way build up this reserve force, which will do us good service in times of need. I do not think we will be wasting public money. I do not think it will be extravagant if, under the circumstances, we increase this appropriation from $60,000 to $100,000, and therefore, Mr. Chairman, I have proposed the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I desire to state simply that the committee have reported here the full amount recommended by the Navy Department. That Department is the best advised as to the needs of this service, and in granting the full appropriation that the Department recommended to be desirable, the committee felt that they had taken the wisest action under the circumstances. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like to say a word or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, line 22, strike out "sixty" and insert "one hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I want to make one suggestion. Within six years this paragraph has been increased from $25,000 to $60,000. We give all that the Secretary of the Navy asks in giving $60,000. I think the gentleman will find that this sum will increase each year. I believe within four years the Secretary will recommend $100,000.

Mr. BRUCKER. I would like to ask the gentleman how much the naval budget has increased within the past six years? Has it increased in proportion to the appropriation made for the Naval Reserves?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The appropriation for the Naval Reserves has increased far more in proportion. It has been more than doubled within four years.

Mr. BRUCKER. Has not your bill been increased twice as much?

Mr. CUMMINGS. No.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to transfer to the officers of Yale University the custody of the two Maxim rapid-fire guns, with their mounts and the stand of colors, presented by its students and graduates to the United States at the opening of the war with Spain for use upon the auxiliary cruiser Yale, to be retained until said guns may be required for use by the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I understand there was a stand of colors presented by the Harvard University to the cruiser Harvard; and I understand also that there is a provision in this bill which allows the Yale University to get back their stand of colors. I would like to know if any application was made for the stand of colors presented from Harvard?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is in reference to this paragraph:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to transfer to the officers of Yale University the custody of two Maxim rapid-fire guns, with their mounts and the stand of colors.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. You mean for the stand of colors——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Presented by Harvard University.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The committee and officers of Harvard University made a request of the Navy Department to transfer the two guns——

Mr. FITZGERALD. You mean Yale University. My object in making the inquiry was to furnish through this bill the same opportunity for Harvard University to obtain possession of the stand of colors presented by that institution to the cruiser Harvard as is afforded to Yale. Certainly if Harvard has made no request I will not ask that the legislation be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. None at all.

Mr. CUMMINGS. None at all.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The gentleman inadvertently said Harvard University.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ocean and lake surveys: Ocean and lake surveys; the publication and care of the results thereof; the purchase of nautical books, charts, and sailing directions, and freight and express charges on the same; preparing and engraving on copperplates the surveys of the Mexican coasts, and the publication of a series of charts of the coasts of Central and South America, and for surveys of the imperfectly known parts of the coasts and harbors of the Philippine Archipelago and the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, with their bordering keys and waters and the minor outlying islands; to be made immediately available, $100,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. I notice a provision for the preparation of a series of charts for the islands of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Archipelago. I am not sure but this is a duplication of appropriation carried in the sundry civil bill. I simply wanted to call the attention of the chairman to that matter.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. If so, it is an inadvertence. I hardly think it is. Twenty-four thousand dollars was appropriated last year for this purpose in the appropriation bill of May, 1898, and in the estimates sent to us——

Mr. DOCKERY. I will look it up; and if it is a duplication, I have no boubt the gentleman will have it stricken out.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will be very much obliged to the gentleman if he will inform me if this has been provided for anywhere else.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to provide for the enlargement of the slip or dock at the southern boundary of the United States navy-yard at Boston, Mass., partly upon the land of the navy-yard and partly upon lands belonging to the Fitchburg Railroad Company, said slip to be enlarged beyond its present width 80 feet upon the lands of the United States and 20 feet upon the lands of the Fitchburg Railroad Company, so that the same shall be 160 feet in width, measured northerly from the land parallel to and 20 feet southerly from the boundary between the lands of the United States and the lands of the Fitchburg Railroad Company, and to be increased in length to a total of 570 feet, measured from the harbor commissioner's line as now established upon the front of the said railroad company's property; the said slip to be used by both the Fitchburg Railroad and the United States for the berthing of vessels at their respective wharves; and the Secretary of the Navy is empowered to make a contract with the said Fitchburg Railroad Company pursuant to the provisons of this act.

That in consideration of the privileges granted by this act to the Fitchburg Railroad Company for the use of a portion of this slip extending northerly of the boundary line of the United States navy-yard, said railroad company shall build suitable retaining walls upon the east side and at the head of the slip upon the Government lands, or in lieu thereof shall pay to the United States such sums of money as may be determined by arbitration, and shall dredge the entire slip or basin to a depth of 30 feet at mean low water and maintain such depth as long as it enjoys the privileges above stated. It is further provided that the said railroad company shall use and occupy only 60 feet of the width of the said basin within the limits of the navy-yard property, and is to erect no construction of any kind within the limits of the said basin, either upon the lands of the Government or upon that portion of the said railroad company's lands included in the basin.

That the right to use said dock or any part thereof by said railroad company may be temporarily suspended by the Secretary of the Navy whenever in case of war or other emergency it shall be necessary, in his judgment, for the United States Government to have the exclusive use of the same, and for any such suspension said company shall not be entitled to any compensation. The Secretary of the Navy shall notify the railroad company to that effect, and thereupon and during the continuance of such emergency the Government shall have the sole use of said dock. That the entire expense of the construction of the said slip or basin shall be borne by the said railroad company, including the excavation and removal of any wharves, piers, buildings, earth, or constructions of any kind that may be upon the said site, and said materials and constructions shall be disposed of in such a manner or deposited in such places as shall be designated, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, and the construction and improvement herein provided for shall be without any expense whatever to the United States. That the privileges hereby granted to the Fitchburg Railroad Company shall become null and void unless the improvements hereby authorized are begun within six calendar months from the date of the approval of this act, and completed in every respect in accordance with the terms hereof, and to the acceptance of the Secretary of the Navy, within eighteen calendar months from the same date.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to reserve the question of order against the paragraph just read, beginning with line 1, page 23, down to and including line 12, on page 25.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the gentleman from Missouri has felt constrained to make this point of order against that legislation.

Mr. DOCKERY. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I challenge the record as to whether the gentleman made the point of order.

Mr. DOCKERY. I made the point of order, but I will reserve the point of order to hear from the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine has the floor. The point of order is reserved.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I want to explain to the gentleman from Missouri the exact purport and purpose of this legislation. A paragraph covering this subject was inserted in the naval appropriation bill last spring in the Senate. It came up near the close of the session of this House, and in conference the appearance presented was that of a joint operation between the Government of the United States and a private corporation, and inasmuch as there were several propositions of joint action of the Government and private individuals for the erection of dry docks and some other subjects, and the time for consideration being very short, all of these propositions were left out of the bill.

I have taken occasion since that time to make a personal examination of the facts in that case, and also a personal examination of the premises involved, and I have found that it is the consensus of the judgment of all the officers of the Government who have given the matter their attention, including the commandant of the yard at Boston and the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks in Washington and the Secretary of the Navy, that this proposition is a very desirable one for the Government.

Mr. DOCKERY. Has the gentleman a letter from the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish you would read the letter.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. And prior to reading them, I want to state to the gentleman the ground work of this proposition.

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I know of only one officer at the Department who takes any exception whatever to this proposition, and that was in its early stages, before the bill had been so modified as to remove some of the suppositious objections that might arise. The Boston Navy-Yard, situated in Charlestown, abuts directly on the premises of the Fitchburg Railroad Company, which is both a private corporation and a corporation in which the State of Massachusetts holds a great deal of stock, and to which it has furnished more or less subsidy. It connects with the Hoosac Tunnel, and forms one of the most important outlets to the seaboard for grain and other products of the West. Their terminal facilities are unavoidably crowded, coming up against the bridge on the Charles River on the one hand and the boundary of the navy-yard on the other.

It is impossible for them to extend their premises laterally. They are obliged to accommodate, for the transshipment of a great amount of grain and other products, berths for the largest steamships in the freight business that we have afloat, and it is daily becoming more desirable that they should accommodate still other lines of trans-Atlantic traffic at their wharves. Between the premises of the Fitchburg Railroad and the navy-yard there is now a narrow slip which is in a state of innocuous desuetude, we might say. On the one side is the wharf line of the Fitchburg Railroad Company's property and on the other side a very dilapidated wall on the navy-yard property.

The Government line extends out into the water, so that the boundary of the navy-yard property is a water line; but the dock is very narrow—too narrow for use and too shallow for use, and too short from the outer ends of the pier to the inner ends for use by large vessels in the Navy.

It is now used by smaller vessels and to some extent for coaling purposes. Along near the Government property, near the wall, are old sheds of a dilapidated character, entirely unfit under modern methods for coaling naval ships. It is intended by the Navy Department to build there, as we are building at other points, a permanent system of tramways and chutes along the edge of this wharf for the purpose of coaling our ships; in other words, making a practical coaling station there. That is an impossibility now. I wish I had a diagram here.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I have a diagram.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That is not large enough to show to the members of the House. To-day that passageway between the Fitchburg road and the navy-yard is of practically no use. There is practically no facilities for either the navy-yard or the Fitchburg Railroad Company to transact business on a large scale with large ships. Now, this railroad company, for purposes of its own advantage and for the advantage of the general trade facilities of that great port, has made what, to my mind and to the Secretary of the Navy and the other officers of the survey with the exception of one, appears to be a most advantageous proposition.

Mr. DOCKERY. What officer objects to it?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Commander Bradford raised some technical objection which I would not like to characterize, but he seemed to feel that, it being a private corporation, this was giving an advantage to a private corporation that perhaps the Government ought not to do. My conception has been entirely different. I have looked upon the management of the Navy and its administration as intended for the general public benefit. I have always felt that one primary object of the Navy was to maintain, protect, and promote commerce.

Here is an opportunity where, by permitting this railroad company to carry out a very liberal proposition, the United States Government will get a dock dredged out to 597 feet in length, and walls built along the Government end and along the Government side of the dock, maintaining a maximum depth great enough for our largest ships, and done by this railroad company. The Government is not asked to spend a dollar; it is simply asking a grant, for the prosecution of this joint enterprise, of a certain amount of space, part of it water and part of it on this old pier, amounting to about 80 feet.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And 20 feet of which belongs to the Fitchburg road?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Yes; 60 feet from the Government, thereby making a width of 160 feet, which is regarded as ample for the berthing on the one side of one of the largest freight steamers and on the other side of one of the largest battle ships at the coal wharf.

Mr. RIDGELY. Does the Government part with its title to the land by this provision?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No, it does not; we have remodeled the bill on that line. The Fitchburg Company gives 20 feet of its width, and would give more except that the bridge beyond limits the amount it can yield from this line.

The Government is asked to give 60 feet, making, with the 20 feet, 80 feet water space. Admiral Howison, commandant of the yard, recommends this measure in the strongest terms. The Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks also recommends it very emphatically, and the Secretary of the Navy has written a letter, which I have here. This project has been gone over at the Navy Department with the utmost care.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me ask the gentleman whether this arrangement is not in fact a partnership between the Government and the railroad company?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No; it is not, because every right of the Government is retained.

Mr. DOCKERY. But it seems to me that if the Government has use for this property it ought to condemn it and own it in fee simple. If it has no use for it, and if the railroad company needs it, then the railroad company should buy it.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The railroad company does not want to buy the whole of it. Let me illustrate. We will suppose [illustrating] that this is the railroad company's wharf. Here is the Government land. The company wants to extend this slip (which, perhaps, is that broad) at their own expense—to extend and broaden it so as to put big ships alongside of the wharf, and at the same time make it broad enough for the Government to put battle ships or other large vessels on its own side. The company agrees to do the whole work, the cost of which amounts to some two or three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. GAINES. Will not that lessen the space controlled by the Government and hereafter would it not have less land for its operations?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GAINES. How much land is there?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Sixty feet.

Mr. GAINES. How long is the tract?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. They are to build 597 feet; but that is now occupied by those old, dilapidated coal sheds. It is a part of the Government scheme recommended by the board that investigated the subject of coal stations last year to build there proper facilities for the rapid coaling of our ships.

Mr. GAINES. Do you propose to give this privilege to the railroad company?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The privilege of coaling?

Mr. GAINES. No; the right to make this change there and to take charge of that property.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The proposition is to allow the railroad company to build that dock at its own expense, to dredge it out for its full width and depth; and all the company will have will be the use of their own side of the dock, which they have put back 20 feet; and by reason of the Government going back 60 feet they will be enabled to receive the largest ships in their docks, while at the same time the Government can put its largest ships in on its side.

Mr. GAINES. Is this a mere license, or does the railroad company take the fee?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That is a question for some one more of a lawyer than myself to discuss. The other day in the committee room some question was raised over the phraseology of this proposition; and the lawyers of that committee, who I believe are among the very ablest in this House, concluded that under this provision the interests of the Government will be entirely safe.

Mr. GAINES. I really should like to have that question answered.

Mr. DAYTON. The railroad company will have a perpetual easement on the land; and without that no railroad company would undertake such an immense work.

Mr. GAINES. Then they can perpetually exclude the Government unless it comes in and condemns the land.

Mr. DAYTON. The rights of the Government are entirely protected by its being authorized to use this dock always in connection with the railroad company.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And to use it absolutely in time of war.

Mr. DAYTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is the committee unanimously in favor of this partnership agreement?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes, so far as I know.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I wish to say that I was not present at the committee meeting at which this measure was passed, and if I had been I should have opposed it.

Mr. GAINES. Then, as a proposition of law, the railroad company is to take the fee of this property, and to that extent it will have the power to exclude the Government.

Mr. DAYTON. Oh, no.

Mr. GAINES. A perpetual lease will be practically the same as a title in fee.

Mr. DAYTON. The railroad company will have the perpetual right to the use of this land for its purposes, subject to the right of the Government to use it for the same purposes, and to have the exclusive use of it in case of necessity.

Mr. HILBORN. Without compensation?

Mr. DAYTON. Without compensation; and substantially it is fit for no other purpose.

Mr. GAINES. It seems, however, that the Government at one time took it for another purpose.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. But I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that the only dock or slip there has fallen into decay and disuse. I have photographs of it, which of course could not be seen by the whole House, but gentlemen can inspect if they desire to do so, which will show the condition of it at the present time. It is too narrow to be utilized for any other purpose, and has fallen into decay, and must be built over to be of any service whatever. Congress would not authorize an expenditure for the enlargement of it, because we would not go to the expense of building a wall there, which must be built, and inclose a water space which is too narrow for any public use. That is the condition at the present time.

We think that in this provision we are getting a very advantageous bargain, and we lose nothing. The gain is all on our side. Besides that, it is provided that at any time when the public interests or exigency may require it, the Secretary of the Navy may take possession of it immediately and without notice.

Mr. DAYTON. In other words, we are getting practically a work which costs $300,000, and the advantage of it, for nothing.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. As my colleague says, we are getting the advantage of the expenditure of $300,000 without any cost to ourselves. The Government will not be at the expenditure of a dollar, and when the work is done the Government will have the dock and will be able to utilize it and make available the expenditure which the railroad company will put upon the construction there. It will be of great benefit to us in cases of emergency.

Mr. GAINES. Let me ask the gentleman another question. Is the Committee on Naval Affairs unanimous on this question?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I had supposed, Mr. Chairman, that the committee were unanimous until my colleague from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] stated that he was not in favor of it. I did not know it before.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman from Maine yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. RIXEY. I do not think I was present when this matter was first considered. Afterwards I made a suggestion in connection with it that the Government should reserve the right to rescind the concession at any time if they chose to do so. I think that right ought to be retained at all times by the Government. It is a right we now have as to other property, and it seems to me, when we give this railroad company such a privilege as is proposed in this paragraph of the bill, it should not be a right which is not revocable at the instance of the Government at any time it sees proper to do so.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I want to read in this connection a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, which explains the importance and necessity of the work; and in the same connection to read a report from the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 9, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor, replying to your letter of the 20th ultimo with reference to H. R. 11185, "To provide for enlarging a slip or wet dock at the United States Navy-Yard, Boston, Mass.," to say that the Department approves the bill as advantageous to the Government, and incloses herewith a letter of even date of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, recommending that it receive the approval of the Department.

While the dock will undoubtedly be of great advantage to the Fitchburg Railroad Company, yet as the bill provides for its construction at the expense of that company, it is believed that the opportunity is one which ought not to be lost for securing to the United States, without expense to itself, the permanent use of it for the berthing of vessels at its own wharf, and, in case of war or other emergency, the exclusive use of it.

In accordance with the further request stated in your letter asking for any official reports or surveys made in connection with the project, I inclose copies of an indorsement of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, dated October 8, 1898, and an indorsement of the Bureau of Equipment, dated October 1, 1898, which indorsements were made upon the report of a naval coal board upon the location of coaling depots at the different navy-yards and stations, also Sketch A, made to accompany said third indorsement, being a plan of the premises.

Very respectfully, JOHN D. LONG,
Secretary.

Hon. CHAS. A. BOUTELLE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I will state that this bill was forwarded to the Secretary of the Navy in the usual form for his approval or for suggestions, and this letter was in response thereto.

The report of the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks is as follows. But before reading the report I will say that the bill has been further modified to meet the views of the Chief of that Bureau at this time. I beg the attention of the committee to the statement embodied:

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS,
Washington, D. C., January 9, 1899.

SIR: Referring to a bill (H. R. 11185) providing for enlarging a slip or wet dock at the United States navy-yard, Boston, Mass., handed to me this morning by you for comment, I have examined its provisions, and would respectfully state that while they are somewhat different from those originally contemplated and recommended by this Bureau, I believe them to be in the main fair, equitable, and advantageous to the Government for the purposes had in view, and recommend that the same receive the approval of the Department.

The Navy has at this point at the present time a small slip, which is only about 60 feet in width at its widest part, and would have to be widened 40 feet more upon Government lands in order to make it sufficient for the convenient handling of vessels of the Navy. The enlargement of the slip as proposed by the accompanying bill involves a greater extension upon Government lands than just stated; but in consideration of the mutual advantages of having an ample and deep slip for all purposes, that the entire expense of the construction of the slip is to be borne and its depth maintained by the Fitchburg Railroad Company, and that authority is vested in the Secretary of the Navy to suspend the use of the slip by the said railroad at any time that the interests of the service may require it, I believe that the interests of the Government in the matter will be subserved by the construction now proposed.

Very respectfully, MORDECAI T. ENDICOTT,
Chief of Bureau.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Navy Department.

Of course, where he refers there to the "small slip only 60 feet in width," and the necessity of widening it "40 feet more upon the Government lands," it means at the expense of the Government.

In this same connection there is a further indorsement of the naval coal board, to which I ask attention.

The document is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 8, 1898.

Respectfully forwarded to the Department.

This Bureau concurs in the recommendations of the board, with the following exceptions:

NAVY-YARD, BOSTON.

The recommendation of the board that the slip at the western end of the yard be enlarged upon lands belonging to the Fitchburg Railroad Company and upon lands belonging to the United States navy-yard is approved, and the conditions to govern such improvement are approved, with modifications.

The Bureau regards the construction of the basin in this slip in this section of the yard, to be used in connection with the naval coaling station, as important and necessary, the present slip being too narrow for the purposes of the Navy when its largest vessels are coaling. It will therefore become necessary to enlarge this slip upon the Government land to a considerable extent, certainly for a width of 40 feet, in order to make it convenient for berthing and handling the largest vessels.

In view of the proposition submitted by the Fitchburg Railroad Company to add 20 feet from lands belonging to them to the width of this basin, it is believed that it will be advantageous to the Government to enlarge it upon its own land 40 feet in addition to the 40 stated above as necessary, and provide a large basin sufficient for the purposes of both the railroad company and the Government.

The Bureau recommends, however, that such concession on the part of the Government be met by the following obligations on the part of the railroad company and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which has a large proprietary interest in the Fitchburg Railroad Company. The conditions and obligations on the part of both the railroad company and the Government which are suggested are briefly as follows:

1. The railroad company to contribute a strip of land 20 feet wide and of the depth proposed for the basin.

2. The United States Government to contribute a width of 140 feet of land and water and of the same depth, lying immediately east of its western boundary line; this area and that mentioned above to constitute a slip or basin 160 feet in width and 570 feet in depth, measured from the harbor commissioner's line as now established in front of the railroad company's property. The location of such basin is shown upon the sketch marked "A" accompanying this indorsement.

3. The railroad company to build retaining walls of construction approved by the Navy Department at the head and on the east side of the proposed slip.

4. The railroad company to dredge the entire basin to a depth of 30 feet at mean low water, and maintain such depth.

5. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts, as part owner of the Fitchburg Railroad Company, to cede to the United States the land under water in front of the navy-yard and extending outward to the harbor line recently established by the United States War Department, shown in a plan accompanying this indorsement, marked "B."

6. The railroad company to have the use of 60 feet of the basin lying immediately east of the Government's western property line, but to erect no constructions of any kind within the limits of the basin as proposed.

7. The Government to grant the railroad company the right to the use of the portion of the basin within the Government lines, subject to revocation by the Secretary of the Navy upon ninety days' notice, or immediately when the military necessities of the United States Government require it.

The Bureau does not regard it as necessary that the railroad company should be granted a lease of any of the lands of the Government for this purpose, and it is deemed better that such concession as may be granted them in this matter be in the form of a simple grant by Congress for the use and occupancy of the portion of the lands indicated above during such time as the Secretary of the Navy may consider it to be to the interests of the Government to continue such grant or concession.

PORTLAND, ME.

This Bureau concurs in the recommendation of the Bureau of Equipment that a coaling station be established at Portland, Me., for the reasons that it is regarded safer and better that the Government should own and control a coaling station in its own right at this point, notwithstanding its proximity to the navy-yard at Portsmouth, N. H., in consideration of the fact that the Portsmouth yard is not easily and safely accessible for the largest war vessels of the Navy at all times of the tide.

FRENCHMANS BAY.

The Bureau would add that it strongly approves the recommendation of the board that a coaling station be established at Frenchmans Bay, not only because of the local advantages of the site, but particularly because it is near the northern extremity of the United States possessions upon the Atlantic coast.

Very respectfully, MORDECAI T. ENDICOTT,
Chief of Bureau.

In addition to what I have already said, I want to add that the State of Massachusetts has already adopted legislation authorizing its State harbor commissioners to grant to the United States the privilege of extending its territory beyond the harbor lines, to enable the Government to create on the front of the dock a very large addition to the present property by filling in; and this has been done because the State of Massachusetts, aside from its general interest in the prosperity of the harbor of Boston, is directly interested in helping to improve and advance the facilities of this great highway of commerce from the West, and is desirous of meeting the Government of the United States under the most liberal terms possible in every feature, as I conceive, in extending the offer.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. RIDGELY. I notice that while you put on the company the expense of making the improvement, you are granting to them the perpetual use, jointly with the Government, of this property, but say nothing about the expense of maintenance and repairs. Would it not be well to put that provision into the bill?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Yes; it is all covered there.

Mr. RIDGELY. I do not so read the language of the bill. There is nothing said about maintenance, is there?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. They must maintain it at a certain depth.

Mr. RIDGELY. In what part of the bill is that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. On line 4, page 24—

And maintain such depth as long as it enjoys the privileges above stated.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I call the gentleman's attention to the provision beginning near the bottom of page 23, in line 20:

That in consideration of the privileges granted by this act to the Fitchburg Railroad Company for the use of a portion of this slip extending northerly of the boundary line of the United States navy-yard said railroad company shall build suitable retaining walls upon the east side—

That is the Government side—and at the head of the slip upon the Government lands—

The east side is the Government side, the navy-yard side, and the Government property runs across the larger portion of the head. Of course they take care of their own side—or in lieu thereof shall pay to the United States such sums of money as may be determined by arbitration.

Now, that was put in the bill on the ground that the Government of the United States might desire to build on its own side something more than an ordinary retaining wall for the purpose of constructing there the great tramways that would be necessary for a modern coal delivery for ships; that the Government may desire to build a very much heavier wall than would ordinarily be required as a retaining wall, and that unless the wall that the railroad company might build would suffice for all the purposes of the Government, in case the Government desired to build a much larger and more expensive wall there purely for Government purposes, that the railroad company shall contribute such share of that expense as an arbitration may determine.

Further on it says:

And shall dredge the entire slip or basin to a depth of 30 feet at mean low water and maintain such depth as long as it enjoys the privileges above stated.

Mr. LACEY. Let me call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the clause beginning "or in lieu thereof." That does not seem to me to protect the Government in the respect which the gentleman speaks of. It does not provide that the Government shall at its option make the change which the gentleman suggests, but it seems to leave it at the option of the railroad company. They might not wish to have it constructed in the way the gentleman states.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That was not the intention. If the legal verbiage is faulty, I should be glad to have it amended.

Mr. LACEY. I suggest that it should read:

Or if the Government of the United States shall so elect—

Leaving the option with the Government rather than with the company.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Where will the gentleman have that language inserted?

Mr. LACEY. In line 1, of page 24, instead of the words—

Or in lieu thereof—

Insert the words—

Or if the Government of the United States shall so elect.

Under the explanation which the gentleman has made, that will carry out the intention.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That was the intention.

Mr. HILBORN. The gentleman ought to accept that amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am glad to do so. I will ask unanimous consent, while we are considering it, to accept that amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. The point of order is still reserved. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Let the Clerk report the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. This proviso seemed to me to be unsatisfactory, and I have reserved the point of order against it. With entire respect to the members of the committee, let me say that it does not address itself to my judgment at all, because it proposes a partnership with a railroad company, and I do not think it wise for the Government to enter into a partnership of this sort, or any other sort.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is a pretty good thing when we get the best of the bargain.

Mr. DAYTON. Under the law, if they should abandon this——

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] informs me that he is opposed to this project, and other gentlemen say they were not there at the time the matter was considered in committee.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will give my reasons when I get the floor.

Mr. DOCKERY. Under the circumstances, I feel that members of the committee should determine whether the point of order should be insisted upon. I am against the proposition and shall vote against it, but I think gentlemen of the committee who are much more familiar with it than I am should determine whether the point of order shall be insisted upon. If it is not insisted upon, I shall simply antagonize the proposition with my vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The bill is here, subject to any amendment which seems to be desirable.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have simply indicated that I think gentlemen who are familiar with the matter should assume the responsibility, without requiring me to bear the "odium" of insisting upon the point of order.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If the gentleman desires to withdraw his point of order, I will renew it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I withdraw the point of order, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] says he will renew.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to make one additional statement, and then I close. This proposition has been before the committee, was before the committee a year ago, and published to the world at that time. Up to the present day I have heard of no opposition to this proposition from any source until to-day. I was unable to conceive that there was likely to be opposition to it on the part of the interests of the Government. The only conjecture that I could make as to any source from which any opposition might possibly come was that something of that kind might proceed from some railroad rivalry—rivalry of some other corporation. But if there is rivalry or antagonism of that kind, I am unable to see how it could be based upon any claim of any other corporation that it is to be injured by this legislation. It must be based simply, it seems to me, on the plea that this legislation is beneficial to the Fitchburg Railroad.

It seems to me that if such a plea as that is made, or opposition proceeds from any such consideration as that, it ought not to prevail in the House of Representatives, because wherever the Government has prosecuted any great public work for its own benefit I believe that where there are two or three different methods of doing it, that if there is a method of carrying out the improvement not involving any expense or burden on the Government, and if it may be carried out in a certain way, will surely prove of great benefit to the commerce and business of the United States or the city in which it is located or the neighborhood, that the Government ought to be very glad to carry on its business in that way. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I was sorry that sickness prevented me from attending the meeting of the Naval Committee when this proposition was brought forward. Since then I have endeavored to get at the facts of the case. It came before us originally in the last Congress as an amendment put upon the appropriation bill by the Senate. The honored chairman of the committee and myself agreeing at that time in opposing it, it went out. You will notice that this railroad company is seeking, and has been seeking, this arrangement, and not the Government. A commission was appointed by the Secretary of the Navy to look out for coaling stations in the United States, and they were examining the navy-yards when the Secretary received the following letter:

226 DEVONSHIRE STREET, BOSTON, MASS., June 16, 1898.

DEAR MR. LONG: I noticed a statement recently in the papers that a commission has been appointed to select coaling stations for the Navy. As previously suggested, the United States Government, by timely action now, can secure a coaling station at the Charlestown Navy-Yard, by building a dock of sufficient depth and width, from which, with modern facilities and appliances, it would be practicable to coal the largest ship of the Navy in ten hours. Probably a more advantageous site for such a dock is not available at any point on either coast, there being ample room in the yard itself for suitable sheds and appliances, while the situation of the navy-yard insures freedom from attack and from rough winds and water. You will perceive that this is in line with the plan formerly indicated in connection with the Commonwealth's interests adjoining the navy-yard. Doubtless it will have occurred to you to direct the attention of the commission to the points noted.

With my best remembrances, I am, yours, faithfully,

J. R. LEESON.

Hon. JOHN D. LONG,
Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

The following letter was afterwards received by Mr. Leeson:

BROOKLINE, MASS., June 2, 1898.

DEAR SIR: The members of the coal board are going south to-morrow for the examination of the coaling facilities at the different navy-yards, but will return here to prepare their report.

Meanwhile will you be good enough to request President Codman, of the Fitchburg Railroad, to put his proposition in writing as regards the joint interests of the board, the Commonwealth, and the Government in the matter of suggested coaling facilities at the Boston Navy-Yard. If you will also, as the commissioner of the Commonwealth, send to the board a brief statement of your views in writing it will be of great assistance in the preparation of the report to be submitted to the Navy Department.

Respectfully,

GEO. E. BELKNAP,
Rear-Admiral, United States Navy, Retired, President of Board.

Hon. J. R. LEESON,
Boston, Mass.

The following letter explains itself:

226 DEVONSHIRE STREET, BOSTON, MASS., June 27, 1898.

MY DEAR SIR: Following the line of your very courteous suggestions June 22, it gives me pleasure, as a State director of the Fitchburg Railroad Corporation, also in behalf of the railroad, to submit briefly an outline of propositions in regard to the establishment of a coaling station for the United States Navy on the south side of the navy-yard at Charlestown, Mass.

Believing that an examination of the ground will satisfy your honorable board of the desirability of the particular location named for serving the purposes involved in the board's appointment, it seems unnecessary for me to say more on that subject than to express my entire coincidence with such plans.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts having invested nearly $30,000,000 in the construction of the Hoosac Tunnel and its approaches, for the purpose of enabling not only its own citizens but also the important producing interests originating in Western territory to avail themselves thereof and enable those interests to place their products in the world's markets successfully in competition with the producers of foreign lands, necessarily is deeply interested in the maintenance of existing, and the securing of increased, facilities in the port of Boston, essential for the furtherance of the original design. As the largest single owner in the Fitchburg Railroad, the Commonwealth imposes upon its representatives on the board the duty of seeing to it that facilities for performing the functions committed to it shall not be in any way abridged.

To illustrate the wisdom of the State's expenditures, it is probably known to your honorable board that of all the merchandise exported over the seas from the port of Boston in 1897, 51¼ per cent was brought to tide water over the rails of the Fitchburg Railroad. The volume of business offered the road being constantly increased as the wealth of the country is added to, and its capacity to meet the demand of foreign consumers multiplied, it necessarily follows that the board must add to its terminal facilities in order to enable it to fulfill the objects for which so large a portion of public money has been expended. There is only one direction in which such additional facilities may be secured, owing to the physical conditions by which the board is surrounded. That, as you have already informed yourselves by personal inspection, is on the north side of the railroad wharves, and adjoining the property comprising the United States navy-yard.

I can but feel that a careful and candid examination of the ground and conditions will lead your honorable board to the conclusion reached by myself and others, that in the construction of the proposed dock for the accommodation of the coaling business of the Navy it will be practicable, while securing a coaling station for the Navy of the first class, to give the Fitchburg Railroad Company the facilities which are imperatively needed, without loss to the Navy—in fact, as it would appear, with a positive gain. In carrying out this suggestion in its broadest application, of the 87½ acres comprising the navy-yard area not more than half an acre will be required, and at the point designated this space can well be spared without the slightest detriment to the convenience or value of what remains.

It is doubtless well known to your honorable board that for the transaction of ocean commerce ships of large tonnage are now essential, so as to reduce the cost of transportation and handling to a minimum. These large vessels, bringing and taking enormous cargoes, require piers of much greater width than those formerly needed for the service of smaller vessels. This being the condition under which alone ocean commerce may be profitably carried on, it follows, in order to procure its share of such business, and thus meet the ends proposed, it is essential that the width of the pier of the railroad known as No. 7 be in no way curtailed; hence, in order to secure the necessary width and at the same time a dock of sufficient width and length to accommodate the large steamers now employed in the foreign service, the line needs to be pushed farther into the navy-yard, thus giving ample accommodation for the ships of the Navy and the vessels running to the railroad wharf to use the dock simultaneously without friction or danger. To meet this requirement it seems necessary to have a dock of 160 feet in width from the outside line of the railroad property, as shown by plans now on file with the honorable the Secretary of the Navy, at Washington, indorsed by the Secretary.

My proposal to your honorable board, therefore, is, as representing the large stake of the State of Massachusetts in this matter, that, as representing the United States, you approach the consideration of this question in a spirit of amity and upon broad line of public policy, with the purpose to give to both sides, without detriment to either, conveniences and facilities which the large interest of both upon a fair consideration would seem to demand.

I would further say, as representing the Commonwealth and the Fitchburg Company in this matter, that should your honorable board see fit to recommend and the Navy Department adopt the proposition as substantially outlined, in defraying the costs and expenses which may be involved the railroad company will bear such proportion as in the judgment of your board may be deemed equitable and just.

Thanking you for the opportunity to make these suggestions and for your courtesy, and trusting to see you personally upon your return to Boston, I am,

Yours, faithfully,

J. R. LEESON.

Admiral GEORGE E. BELKNAP,
Chairman Naval Coaling Station Commission,
Care Commissioner's Office, State House, Boston.

Admiral Belknap replied as follows:

JULY 27, 1898.

MY DEAR SIR: The board having the coal matter in hand is about to make its report. Will it be possible for the president of the Fitchburg Railroad to lay before the board a written statement as to what the road proposes to do toward the enlargement of the docking facilities at the navy-yard here adjoining the wharves of the Fitchburg Railroad Company? In order that the board may proceed intelligently to make their report to the Navy Department, in so far as it relates to navy-yard at this port, it is very desirable to have such proposition laid before it in writing.

Will you, therefore, as chairman of the Massachusetts railroad commission, kindly do what you can to forward this matter, in so far as it pertains to the interest of the Fitchburg Railroad and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, as well as that of the United States?

I make this request of you because in your letter to the board, under date of June 27, 1898, "as a State director of the Fitchburg Railroad corporation, and also in behalf of the railroad," the proposition you outline does not seem to be sufficiently explicit to lay before the Navy Department in the positive manner in which the board desires to deal with it.

With high respect, I am, faithfully, yours,

GEO. E. BELKNAP,
Rear-Admiral, United States Navy, Retired, President of the Board.

Mr. J. R. LEESON,
226 Devonshire street, Boston, Mass.

The president of the company responded as follows:

FITCHBURG RAILROAD COMPANY, OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Boston, July 30, 1898.

DEAR SIR: I have been directed by Mr. J. R. Leeson, State director of this company's board, to make a written proposition to you, as president of the Naval Coal Board, with regard to the construction of a dock on the navy-yard property here in Boston, alongside the company's Hoosac Tunnel dock premises.

Accordingly I beg to lay before you the following: If the United States Government will grant to the Fitchburg Railroad the right to use the adjoining half of a proposed dock alongside the Fitchburg Railroad property in Charlestown, the railroad company will agree to contribute to the area of said dock a strip of land 20 feet wide extending the full length thereof, will build the pier on its own side for its own use, will build a concrete or masonry wall at the head of said dock, the full width thereof, and excavate the whole area to a depth of 30 feet below mean low water. Said dock shall be 160 feet wide and about 570 feet long.

Yours, truly,

E. D. CODMAN,
President.

Rear-Admiral GEORGE E. BELKNAP, U. S. N.,
President Naval Coal Board, Statehouse, Boston.

I will say right here that the Fitchburg Railroad Company, while it contributes 20 feet to the pier, asks for 80 feet from the Government of the United States. Here is the recommendation of the Belknap board after that proposition was offered:

BOSTON, MASS., August 16, 1898.

2. The president of the board, having put himself in communication by letter with the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment, Navy Department, pursuant to paragraph 3 of orders No. 117306, assembled the board at Boston, Mass., on the 16th of June, 1898, and began its work.

3. The first point visited was the navy-yard at Boston, Mass. This yard, located at the head of a deep and well-fortified harbor and in the center of a large manufacturing and commercial population, presents many advantages of site, of railway communication, ready supply of material of every sort, and limitless skilled labor to draw upon. Such advantages would seem to suggest the wisdom of its fullest development into a dock, building, and equipping yard of latest improved plant and best appliances for economical and efficient working as a great public workshop. But it is submitted that such national establishment will not be complete until equipped with the most approved receptacles and appliances for the receipt and handling and the storage and delivery of coal, whether pertaining to ships or to yard furnaces and workshops.

4. The present coal sheds at this yard are located at its extreme western end adjacent to the ocean freight wharves of the Fitchburg Railroad. The best water along the water front is to be had there, and such location for coal storage could not be bettered. The board therefore recommends the erection of coal pockets and machinery on that site, so arranged that ships can be moored to a wharf and take coal from the coal pockets, and also, if necessary, from lighters on the other side of the ship at the same time. This would require the construction of a slip of sufficient dimensions to admit a battle ship for coaling from coal pockets on the wharf, either at the side or at the end of the slip.

5. The Fitchburg Railroad and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, as largest owners of Fitchburg Railroad stock, desire, as shown by correspondence marked Appendix B and map marked Appendix C, to have the Navy Department confirm this site for a coal pocket and construct a slip of such width and length as will enable the railroad company to use one side of the slip, while the ships of the Government use the other side. This proposition demands, if carried out, the relinquishment of the use of some portion of the area of the navy-yard, but in consideration of such relinquishment Mr. E. D. Codman, president of the Fitchburg Railroad Company, in a letter addressed to the board under date of July 30, 1898, hereto appended, marked D, states:

"If the United States Government grants to the Fitchburg Railroad the right to use the adjoining half of the proposed dock along the Fitchburg Railroad property of Charlestown, the railroad company will agree to contribute to the area of said dock a strip of land 20 feet wide extending the full length thereof; will build a pier on its own site for its own use; will build a concrete or masonry wall at the head of said dock the full width thereof, and excavate the whole area to a depth of 30 feet below mean low water. Said dock will be 160 feet wide and about 570 feet long."

6. In view of such proposition, the board is of the opinion that the plan proposed would be of mutual benefit to the United States and to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, as well as an advantage to the Fitchburg Railroad and to the commerce of this the second commercial port in importance of the United States. The board, while recommending the adoption of such proposed measure, is of the opinion that the Commonwealth should release to the General Government the title of its land in front of the navy-yard between the present shore line and the new line to be determined upon by the Navy Department. The board in its investigation of the whole matter has consulted freely with the harbor commissioners of the State of Massachusetts, as well as Mr. J. R. Leeson, chairman of the railroad commission of the Commonwealth. Those officials have been much interested in the proposed improvement, and will recommend to the general court of the State such legislation as may be necessary on the part of the Commonwealth to secure the favorable action of the Government of the United States.

7. The benefit from such extension of the water front, thus increasing the area of the navy-yard, would accrue not only to the General Government but also to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in making it possible to develop more perfectly the yard in varied directions and furnish highly paid employment to an increased number of residents of the Commonwealth.

8. In view of the foregoing consideration and conclusions, the board recommends that a slip 550 feet long and 180 feet wide be constructed at the point indicated, i. e., the western end of the yard, adjacent to the property of the Fitchburg Railroad Company, and that coal-handling machinery and pockets to hold 15,000 tons be built on the east side of the slip. This, from its several personal examinations of the site and its surroundings, the board believes to be entirely feasible.

9. In the event of the adoption of these recommendations it is suggested that in the interest of all parties concerned the Fichburg Railroad Company be given a perpetual lease to the use of 8 feet of the western side of the slip, on condition that said railroad bears all the expense of dredging the slip, and the Commonwealth will release to the United States all title to and rights and interest in land now included between the present water front of the navy-yard and a new line to be determined upon and defined by the joint action of the Navy and War Departments and harbor and land commissioners of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

10. In its several visits to the yard the board noticed that large quantities of coal were being unloaded from colliers and carted to different parts of the yard at considerable distance from the water front and piled in the open air. Such incident of dock-yard procedure was evidently unavoidable because of the fact that the present coal shed, where it is proposed to erect coal pockets with appropriate handling machinery, was already full; but it suggested double labor in the handling of the coal before it reached its ultimate destination of ship or shore furnaces, together with the increased expense attendant upon such crude, old-time method.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is what the Bureau of Equipment and Repair had to say regarding the Belknap report:

4. Navy-yard, Boston.—The recommendation of the board that coal pockets and machinery for stowing and handling coal be erected at this yard is approved.

(a) In reference to that part of the report discussing a proposition of the Fitchburg Railroad Company to dredge a slip for the joint use of the Fitchburg Railroad Company and the navy-yard, the Bureau submits the following:

The Fitchburg Railroad Company offers to dredge a slip 570 feet long, 160 feet wide, and 30 feet deep, one-half to belong to the railroad company and one-half to the navy-yard.

The site for this slip is entirely navy-yard property with the exception of a strip 20 feet wide on one side belonging to the railroad company. In addition to dredging this slip, the railroad company propose to build a retaining wall across its inner end. The board recommends that the slip be 550 feet long instead of 570 feet, and 180 feet wide instead of 160. The board also recommends that, in addition to the retaining wall and the work of dredging, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which is a large owner of stock in the Fitchburg Railroad, be required to cede to the General Government the right to advance the pier heads of the navy-yard to deeper water as may be desired. This privilege has already been granted to the Fitchburg Railroad Company.

(b) The Bureau apprehends no difficulty in acquiring authority to extend the pier heads of the navy-yard toward the channel as desired. Should there be, however, the remedy for the General Government is simple. The proposition therefore resolves itself to this: The Government obtains a slip 90 feet wide by 550 feet long, with a retaining wall at the end, for which it presents to the Fitchburg Railroad a slip 70 feet wide and 550 feet long. The necessary dredging to construct the slip is easy and of small cost. This alone does not fairly represent the situation. Upon examining the plan, Appendix C, it will be observed that the Government loses a granite pier, which will of course supply stone for the retaining wall of the proposed slip. In addition, the eastern boundary of the proposed slip passes through a slip of the navy-yard on the east side of the granite pier above mentioned and reduces its width so much that it will be useless. Two coal houses, although not at present of great value, also disappear, and no retaining wall is left on the east side of the proposed slip, where the boundary is now a portion of the navy-yard land. Furthermore, the great depth of the proposed slip cuts off a portion of a brick house near the railway entrance to the yard.

(c) Upon inquiry, in regard to the object of the Fitchburg Railroad Company for making such a proposition, the Bureau learns that with the additional slip the railroad can load an additional large trans-Atlantic freight steamer each week, which will add $9,000 a week income to the company, or $486,000 per year.

(d) There is another objection to the construction of a slip of this kind for the purpose of coaling ships. A coal wharf should be accessible at any stage of the tide, and should be one which ships can approach or depart from without loss of time. The proposed slip under construction is in direction across the flow of the tide. It would therefore be unsafe for a large battle ship to enter the slip, particularly with another vessel inside, except at slack water. This occurs only twice every twenty-four hours, and as one period occurs during the night it would practically reduce the time to the entrance or departure of one vessel a day.

(f) The water front at the Boston Navy-Yard is of limited extent and very valuable. The Bureau therefore recommends that it all be retained; that the present western slip, which is shallow, be filled in up to the navy-yard boundary; also, that the slip next east of it be filled in; and that coal houses be erected on the ground thus prepared in a direction parallel to the water front. This will permit ships to come alongside the coal wharf at any stage of the tide, as they will move in the direction of its ebb and flow.

(g) In the opinion of the Bureau, the interests of the Government demand that the proposition of the Fitchburg Railroad Company be rejected in its entirety. In fact, from a naval point of view, it is not worthy of a moment's consideration.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Who is that signed by?

Mr. CUMMINGS. By the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I want to remind the gentleman that the Secretary of the Navy and other officers entirely disagree with my friend Captain Bradford, for whom I have a very high regard.

Mr. CUMMINGS. He probably knows very well what he is talking about; and he is not from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. He comes from Maine, and so do I; and we do not agree on that.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. Can the gentleman from New York state what is the value of this strip of land 80 feet wide by 570 feet long that it is proposed to turn over to this railroad?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The value of it to this railroad company is $486,000 a year, as I have just described.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not worth 5 cents, and the wharf is rotting down.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. If we can add $480,000 a year to the business of Boston without costing us a single cent, I would like to know who is hurt?

Mr. CUMMINGS. If the gentleman will allow me to finish.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I add a letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Repair in response to my request for the above documents:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY, BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 13, 1899.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with your verbal request, made during the absence of the Chief of Bureau on Friday last, the Bureau takes pleasure in inclosing the following information, viz:

(a) Correspondence between Mr. J. R. Leeson, State director of the Fitchburg Railroad Corporation and Rear-Admiral George E. Belknap, United States Navy (retired), president of a board for the purpose of recommending the construction of necessary facilities for storing coal at navy-yards and other places along the northern Atlantic seaboard.

(c) Comments of this Bureau on the board's recommendation.

(d) A blue print showing the proposed slip urged by the Fitchburg Railroad corporation.

2. In explanation, the Bureau desires to state that the proposition of Mr. Leeson was made to the Navy Department more than a year ago. It is understood, in a general way, that an amendment to the last naval appropriation bill favoring this proposition was proposed in the Senate Naval Committee, but not accepted.

3. In accordance with directions from the Department, the Chief of Bureau inspected the site of the proposed slip last July, and reported against it.

4. The war developed great deficiencies in facilities for storing coal at navy-yards, the custom having been to rely upon contractors to supply necessary coal for naval purposes. During the war the supplies of coal in the hands of contractors were inadequate and the prices very high. The Bureau, finding that it was unsafe to trust to them for furnishing the requisite amount of coal, requested the Department to detail a board to visit the various navy-yards and stations along the northern Atlantic seaboard and other places where coal was needed and to recommend what steps should be taken to insure the necessary supplies of coal and fresh water for naval ships. In accordance with this request, the Belknap board was ordered. Besides Rear-Admiral Belknap, it consisted of Capt. Allen V. Reed, U. S. N. (retired), and Civil Engineer Charles W. Parks, U. S. N., members.

5. Mr. Leeson, having failed in his former efforts to acquire by legislation the necessary cession of territory belonging to the Boston Navy-Yard, and learning by the newspapers the appointment of the above-mentioned board, took up the question, as will be seen by the correspondence marked "A."

6. The Bureau further adds that the water front of the Boston Navy-Yard is limited, and, in its opinion, should all be retained. The particular site in question was purchased during the civil war and added to the territory already possessed. The experience of that war demonstrated the necessity of this addition.

7. The Bureau desires to emphasize what it states in the indorsement C as to the difficulties of entering the slip across the tide; also the fact that the slips already existing should be filled in, and that slips for rapid coaling should head in the direction of the moving tide.

8. Referring to the blue print inclosed, attention is called to the fact that the slip already existing next to the Fitchburg Railroad property is used at present for discharging colliers. The dock belonging to the navy-yard, now marked "Proposed dock," is a granite pier. In the proposed dredging this granite will of course supply the necessary stone for a retaining wall across the inner end which the Fitchburg Railroad proposes to erect. The present coal houses will also disappear, and the next slip to the above mentioned in the navy-yard property will be encroached upon seriously.

Very respectfully,

R. B. BRADFORD,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. AMOS CUMMINGS, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is this proposition? The Fitchburg Railroad Company is already in partnership with the State of Massachusetts, and they ask the United States Government virtually to furnish further capital and enter into the partnership. They can very well afford to pay for building the pier when they furnish 20 feet in return for 80 feet from the United States. The profit of $485,000 in one year is more than double the cost of the pier, and this profit is to be increased each year under a perpetual lease. Four hundred and eighty thousand dollars a year is turned over to this company by the aid of the Government of the United States.

If the pier had been given for the use of all the steamship companies in Boston, or for the use of the State, there might have been some excuse for the demand, but when it is given for the use of a private corporation entirely it seems to me a proposition, in view of the statement of the Bureau of Equipment and Repairs, that ought to be refused. It ought not to be entertained for a minute. There is no question, after reading these reports, but that it will injure instead of benefit the interests of the Government.

Let us look at another thing. Why should the United States give a private railroad corporation in Massachusetts facilities for contending with other great traffic lines from the West?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Do you not practically discriminate against the city of New York by doing it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the trouble; that is the milk in the cocoanut.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Do you not practically discriminate against Newport News, Baltimore, Savannah, and all other cities on the Atlantic coast? Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to waste the time of the committee, but I want to outline this situation so that the members of the House can see it and vote upon it, for I am going to give you an opportunity to do so. There is nothing mean about me. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized for a few moments only. This is a simple proposition, and I think the committee must understand it. If this proposition is obnoxious to the judgment of this committee because one of the results of adopting this measure shall be to increase the prosperity of the city of Boston, then it ought to be voted down. If it is a disadvantage to the United States that in building a slip or rearranging the line of one of its navy-yards—if one of the collateral results is to increase the facilities of a great traffic line, one of the greatest export terminals in the United States; if it is to result in enabling the farmer of the West to crowd his products through nearer to the European markets, shortening the sea voyage, and thereby shortening the time of transportation, then you ought to vote it down.

But if it is true, as recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, by the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, by Admiral Howison, chief of the navy-yard at Boston; if it be true, as shown by photographs taken on the spot, that this proposition is calculated to replace this dock, decayed wall, this tumbled-down rookery, this half-filled-up old basin, so small that you can not put an ordinary torpedo boat in it with any facility——

Mr. FITZGERALD. You can not get a tugboat into it.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. So small that you can not get a tug boat in, as my friend says—if that can be done without costing the Government a dollar, if the result is to replace that situation on the site of our navy-yard in Boston, next to this property by a dock 570 feet long, broad enough for our largest battle ship, and to furnish us with the facilities recommended by a competent board of skilled naval officers who examined this last year, and freely selected the Boston Navy-Yard as one of the points at which it is absolutely desirable that we should establish a coal depot, and where we will establish a coal depot in the near future at the Government's expense, if we refuse to let the Fitchburg Railroad build it, then this ought to be voted down.

This talk about how much the Fitchburg Railroad may make in a year is fanciful conjecture. Not a dollar comes from the United States, not a dollar of the profit made by the transportation which is cheapened by furnishing the facilities comes out of the pockets of the people. If it be true, as Commodore Howelson says, that the Fitchburg Railroad—talking about this valuable property—that the Fitchburg Railroad Company asks the Government to give nearly one-half of the land largely covered by water, making about $60,000, estimated of the value at the time of the purchase, and that the building of this dock by this company granted this privilege will be of advantage to the Government of between $200,000 and $300,000, I do not see how the Government can be injured.

Mr. BURKE. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me a question?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE. Is there any other railroad convenient to this proposed dock other than the Fitchburg Railroad?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No, sir; I do not think there is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Boston and Maine is near, but it has no western connections.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that although this is a railroad corporation, the facilities to be extended are for the water transportation. The gentleman will understand that it is for the foreign commerce that will be facilitated at this point.

Mr. BURKE. Yes. My motive in asking the question is this: If there are other railways convenient, I could not see the necessity of the Government giving an exclusive privilege to one without giving it to another.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I think the gentleman from Texas is entirely right in making that suggestion. I will say that I have heard up to this point not a solitary word of objection from any corporation in the vicinity of Boston; and the only hint that has come to us that any corporation or any community would object to this proposition you have heard as I have this afternoon.

If it be true that building a wharf at the navy-yard at Boston and granting permission to a railroad company whose stock is owned largely by the State to build a dock which otherwise we must build ourselves, thus relieving the Government of all expense—if it be true that this measure, while adding to the prosperity of the port of Boston is a detriment to the interests of the port of New York, then I can see some force in this objection. But, in my judgment, the building up of the commerce of any port in the United States is an advantage to the whole people of the United States. This railroad company is a corporation; but it is a corporation deemed by the State of Massachusetts so important to the business of the whole country that the State has invested millions of dollars in the building of the Hoosac Tunnel, one of the greatest and most important outlets of the products of the West in this country, not simply for local interests, but because this road was a great national highway.

I want to say further, and I wish to have gentlemen take in the full force of the remark, that, as I am informed, one of the principal sources from which any objection that might arise was expected was the Fitchburg Railroad, because the great liberal State of Massachusetts has put its money into this great Hoosac Tunnel and opened this through line, thus enabling the products of the West to get to the Eastern seaboard cheaper than ever before. If that is not true, I am perfectly willing to have the statement corrected. But that is my information.

Now, I do not undertake to say that the vitality of this nation depends upon whether we shall pass this provision in this bill. But I do undertake to say that the prosperity of this country depends upon the principle involved. And I do insist that when a provision in this bill accomplishes all the objects that the Government has in view, and at the same time advances the general prosperity of the whole people of this country, it would be strange indeed for the House of Representatives to turn its back upon it and vote it down on the ground that the people are to be benefited. Navy-yards are built for the people. If a navy-yard is not constructed for the people and to promote their interests, what do we want with it? I would not vote to drive a bolt or a rivet in a naval ship if the principle were to be laid down that the country is made for the Navy, not the Navy for the country.

For sixteen years I have advocated on this floor the rebuilding of the American Navy. I have advocated it on what I believe to have been patriotic grounds, and one of the grounds I have never failed to put forward has been a reminder to the Congress of the United States that commerce follows the flag and that the duty we owe to the upbuilding of every industry in this country in any way connected with ocean traffic requires that we should improve and extend our Navy, because it is the great encouragement and promoter of the commercial prosperity of this country.

Here is the report of the commandant of the Boston Navy-Yard, and he shows us what this improvement will accomplish:

> The water front of the yard now embraced along the harbor front of our westernmost wharf, commonly known as White's Wharf, is about 70 feet, with about 200 feet within the comparatively shallow slip.
> Should the dock, as proposed, be constructed 80 feet wide, the front of White's Wharf, would be reduced to about 45 feet, and the wharfage for the navy-yard along the navy-yard side of the new dock would be 570 feet, making a gain of wharfage for the yard of some 345 feet, all of deep water, as against the 70 feet of deep water and the 200 feet of shallow water, as now. Should the dock be 160 feet in width, then the whole of White's Wharf would be taken into the new dock, making a gain of wharfage to the navy-yard of about 300 feet of deep water.

Gentlemen who know anything about commerce, who have any understanding about water fronts, know very well that along the commercial wharves of a great city a concession that gives away land to extend water facilities is not a sacrifice; that water facilities are what we want. What is needed at the Boston yard to-day is water frontage, wharfage for ships. And a specific purpose for which the dock board appointed by the Secretary of the Navy reported it desirable for us to extend facilities at that yard is along this very line, where the Government, if it carries out the recommendation of its own board, has got to dredge away at its own expense the very same soil that this company proposes to dredge away at its expense and maintain a dock there 30 feet deep in perpetuity so long as it is granted the privilege of landing steamers at its own wharf.

I was in Boston last fall and visited this yard. I have gone all over it. I do not mean to say ad captandum that this is any reason why members should vote one way or the other, but it does bring to this House the information of one who has looked at the situation, who has consulted with every man of authority connected with that navy-yard. And I say to you that to-day this wharf is absolutely worthless so far as large ships of the Navy are concerned. No ship of any considerable size can get in there. We have got to go to work and spend money. And I know in regard to the Fitchburg Railroad side of the question, which, in my judgment, so far as this proposition is concerned, is the side of the people of the United States.

I know positively that while I was in that city the agents of a great trans-Atlantic corporation, running a line of the largest steamers on the ocean, came down to Boston and interviewed the people having charge of this great railroad to find out whether they were going to be able to increase their wharf facilities; and the object of this trans-Atlantic steamer line in obtaining this information was to determine whether they could change the terminal of their great ocean line from a port in Canada, where they now have their facilities, to the port of Boston. The president of that company said that they wanted to come to the United States; that they could do business better in the United States; that it was better for them in every way; but that they did not want to come too far south; that they preferred to come out of Canada and preferred to come to Boston, and were ready to come there, and would make a contract to bring their line there if the Fitchburg Railroad Company would give any assurance that they would have a wharf to tie u[illegible]o when they got there.

Now, because that is an American railroad corporation and will enable the enormous traffic, which is increasing every year, to be brought to the port of Boston, is that a reason why we should say, in prosecuting a Government work and making a slight improvement beside a Government navy-yard, that we must refuse because we might make a great addition to the commerce of one of the greatest ports in the United States by allowing the slight privilege which the bill proposes in this respect?

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask, before taking the floor to speak on the subject under consideration, what the parliamentary situation is at this time? I understood the point of order was reserved by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] and subsequently withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The parliamentary status is that the debate on the informal amendment, to strike out the last word, is exhausted, and the question would be on the next paragraph, which the Clerk will read. If there be no objection, the informal amendment will be considered as withdrawn. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is in order.

Mr. DAYTON. And upon that I desire to be heard. I supposed that was the motion my colleague on the committee intended to make.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from New York had heretofore made the motion. But it is in order now.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this question is one largely between the State of Massachusetts and the Government of the United States, and it is not a question, it seems to me, for the committee to consider whether or not it will give some special advantage or privilege to the port of Boston which is not enjoyed by any other port. In other words, it is not a question between two of the great cities of the country.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask the gentleman does the State of Massachusetts ask this legislation?

Mr. DAYTON. I understand that the State of Massachusetts has $10,000,000 of the stock of the Fitchburg Railroad Company and that the proposition now pending came directly from the State director in that railroad company.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. And further, if my colleague will allow me, the legislature of Massachusetts has already passed upon this question.

Mr. DAYTON. Yes; authorizing us to have 20 acres of her land on these conditions.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The State of Massachusetts, by its legislature, has already granted to the United States, in consideration of the proposed legislation, the privilege of advancing in the harbor beyond the State harbor lines along its whole harbor front.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Embracing some 20 acres of ground.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And had already granted this privilege to the railroad company.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It had done so, and now it proposes to grant it to the Government of the United States. And that only adds force to what I have already stated, that the State regards it as a great public measure and one of national importance.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If the railroad company did not pay for the privilege, why should we?

Mr. DAYTON. It is not a question of profit to the railroad company. It is not a question as to what they may derive from it. It is a question far beyond that. It is a question, and a question only, for us to consider as to how much advantage the Government of the United States will derive from the proposed arrangement.

There can not be any dispute or doubt about the fact that this is a right granted perpetually, though I think the Government of the United States is fully protected and its rights absolutely maintained by the privilege which is embodied in the provision of taking possession of this wharf property at any time, in any emergency, where it appears necessary to do so without cost to the Government.

There is no question but that the whole strip of land, half of which is to be taken for the railroad, cost the Government only $123,000. One-half of this is to be taken and improved for the benefit of the Government at a cost to the railroad company of $300,000. It is a mistake to say that the Government is paying anything for it, then. And if it is not done by the railroad company in this way, the Government must do the work and pay the cost itself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me under these circumstances that your committee has been wise in recommending this arrangement. Work amounting to $300,000 is to be done by a corporation—a railway company—and all of the rights, uses, and privileges are retained by the Government without a dollar of expenditure to the Government. Under these circumstances, I repeat that the committee was wise in making the arrangement, notwithstanding it might be profitable to the railroad company also. And when you remember that this company is largely owned by the State of Massachusetts, certainly a spirit of charity and good will toward this great Commonwealth should make us glad and urgent to formulate so satisfactory an arrangement so beneficial to all parties concerned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I was utterly unable to understand the opposition of the gentleman from New York to this measure until the closing minutes of his remarks. He practically says that this improvement should not be made because of the advantage that would accrue to Boston and the State of Massachusetts in the matter of increased opportunities for the exportation of breadstuffs. New York is jealous of the increasing export and import trade of Boston, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] is only acting in the interest of that port when he makes objection to this improvement.

It is true, as some of the gentlemen who have preceded me have stated, that the State of Massachusetts is greatly interested in this project. Many years ago the great Commonwealth, realizing the benefits that would accrue to the working classes of people from the cheaper transportation of breadstuffs to the great city of Boston, and wishing to avail itself of the opportunity to cheapen the cost of transportation from the granaries of the West to the markets of the world, invested millions of money in helping this railroad to construct the great Hoosac Tunnel. Boston was enabled thus to compete better with New York, and the cost of transporting grains from the West was greatly reduced.

The enterprise of the Boston merchants and her railroads has caused Boston to be a dangerous competitor with New York for the export trade of the country, and the opposition of the gentleman from New York to-day emphasizes this fact. I think this proposition should be accepted by the House. Under its provisions the Government will obtain for all time the use of one-half of a large dock 580 feet long, 180 feet wide, and 30 feet deep. The Fitchburg Railroad Company is to bear all the expense of dredging and putting this dock in order, and in time of war or at any time the Secretary of the Navy may determine, the entire dock is given over to the exclusive possession of the Government. Since my entrance into Congress I have found that a great prejudice has existed against the Charlestown Navy-Yard, and it is only within the past two years that this yard has received any consideration.

It is only during the past two Congresses that appropriations of any account have been made for the Charlestown Navy-Yard. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been appropriated every year for New York, Mare Island, League Island, and Norfolk navy-yards, while the Boston Navy-Yard was practically closed.

The situation is now happily changed. We have been getting our share the past few years, and I intend, as far as my efforts are concerned, to fight every inch of the ground until the Charlestown yard gets everything that belongs to it.

To-day it is impossible to dock a second-class battle ship in this yard, and many vessels are turned away to New York and Norfolk which should be repaired in this yard, because of insufficient dock accommodations. This is not fair to the large body of mechanics and laboring men in the city of Boston who would receive employment if these conditions did not exist.

Every foot of land southwest of this proposed dock to the bridge is now used, and the only manner in which increased accommodations for the large ocean steamers which dock in this vicinity can be obtained is to take land bordering near the navy-yard. The people are bound to be benefited. It means an increased commerce for Boston and the employment of additional laboring men in loading and unloading steamers. It means cheaper food products for the working classes as well as increased prices to the farmer, by reason of more competition with New York and other large exporting centers.

It means also great advantage to Boston's navy-yard at no cost to the Government. When the dock is built and the dry dock already provided for is constructed, Boston will have obtained her share of the privileges which have been in other years doled out to other yards. It will mean the repairs of the larger vessels of the Navy, and the consequent employment of laborers and mechanics; it will mean the coaling of the larger vessels of the Navy, and in time of war it will mean the opportunity of the Government to obtain absolute possession as long as may be necessary, without a dollar of cost, of one of the largest docks in the world.

I appeal, therefore, to my colleagues upon the floor of the House not to be led astray by the sophistry of the gentleman from New York into believing that this measure is in the sole interest of the Fitchburg Railroad corporation and possesses no compensating advantages to the Government and the people.

No man on the floor of this House has fought or will fight the unjust exactions of corporations more than I, but upon this proposition I am willing to go before the people of my district and abide by the results.

The railroad has made, to my mind, an eminently fair proposition. The plan is indorsed by the naval board who investigated the matter; it is indorsed by the commandant of the navy-yard as essential for the prosperity of the yard; it is indorsed by the State directors of the Fitchburg Railroad, Hon. J. R. Leeson, one of our foremost and most representative business men, and finally it has the unqualified approval of Secretary Long. The gentleman from New York means to strike a blow at the commerce of the city of Boston, and I know the members of this House will not follow him by indorsing his proposition to strike out this legislation from the naval bill.

Mr. LOW. Now, will my friend permit me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. LOW. Is this the granite dock shown in this photograph which the gentleman from New York referred to?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe so.

Mr. LOW. That is not a granite dock; it is only a granite bulkhead.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to have the members of the House look at the photograph of this dock.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Show them the plans, too.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly. I wish members would look at the plans and specifications, and there would not be a member of this House who would vote against this proposition if they saw the photograph and the plans.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS. I should like, for my own information, to know the exact status of this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor and yields to the gentleman from Vermont for a question.

Mr. POWERS. Do I understand that the Government proposes to increase its dockage opportunities or possibilities at Boston?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; under this bill, if it can, and if this bill fail, the Government must undertake the work on its own account.

Mr. POWERS. And it will cost the Government three or four hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will cost the Government nothing under this bill.

Mr. POWERS. If they do not take this proposition?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will certainly cost the Government one-half million dollars.

Mr. POWERS. And if this privilege be allowed the Fitchburg Railroad it will cost the Government nothing?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly not.

Mr. POWERS. Will you tell me why that is not a good proposition for the Government?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a good proposition for the Government and an excellent opportunity to obtain increased docking accommodations free of cost. It will cost, as I said before, the Government half a million dollars if it has to do it, and it will cost them nothing if this proposition is accepted.

Mr. BURKE. How much land is given by this proposition?

Mr. FITZGERALD. About 60 feet wide.

Mr. BURKE. What is the area?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is about 570 feet long, which would be about 35,000 feet. This land originally cost the Government $60,000, and to fit it up with proper dock facilities would require nearly $500,000 more. I understand that the State of Massachusetts has given many hundred thousand feet of land for this same project, and there was never a whimper about it. The State felt that the improvement increased commerce as well as aided the Government, and gladly contributed her share to the enterprise.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, what is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out the paragraph, made by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I hope we may have a negative vote.

Mr. LACEY. I wish to offer an amendment to the paragraph. It is one that was agreed to by the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire recognition prior to action on the amendment?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I do, for one minute.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the statements of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] and that of the Bureau of Equipment and Repair do not agree at all. They are as wide apart as the poles. I want to add, Mr. Chairman, that in my opinion this is special legislation of the worst sort. The Government had to pay $122,000 for this land. You give it away to a railroad company for nothing, because you make this lease perpetual. I would rather see the railroad company buy that land and the navy-yard be circumscribed than that the Government cahoot with a railroad company.

Mr. Chairman, we are already paying money to increase the area of the Norfolk yard. They are asking for money to increase the area of the Port Royal yard. Six years ago you sold a portion of the Brooklyn Navy-Yard, and to-day the naval authorities are complaining because they need more land there. You can not afford to lessen the area of this Boston yard. The gentleman from Boston says that the Navy Committee never does anything for Boston. Why, we gave them last year over a million of dollars to construct a granite dock there. Even a cormorant would be satisfied with over a million a year.

Mr. Chairman, I have said all I desire to say. I have called the attention of the House to the facts in the case, and if it sees fit to give to this railroad corporation what it asks, I must content myself by voting against it, and hereafter maintain my peace when such propositions come before this House.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I hope we will have a vote now.

Mr. LACEY. I desire to offer the amendment that I suggested to the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the measure, H. R. 11312, that has been reported to this House by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which I am a member, known as the Hanna-Payne subsidy bill. Whenever that bill comes up for consideration I intend to make an argument against it. At this time I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of printing a criticism of the bill prepared by Dr. Samuel Adams Robinson. Dr. Robinson is a highly respected and influential citizen of New York. He is a prominent Republican and a member of the Protective Tariff League of America. He was a delegate from the Board of Trade of New York City to the last convention, composed of the representatives of boards of trade throughout the country, and in that body was a member of its committee on merchant marine.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I hope there will be no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on granting unanimous consent to the gentleman from Alabama to print certain remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The document is as follows:

SOME FACTS REGARDING THE HANNA-PAYNE SHIPPING BILL.

[By Samuel Adams Robinson, M. D., with a thorough study of its probable cost by Capt. William W. Bates, author of American Marine, etc., and late United States Commissioner of Navigation.]

To those who know me it is not necessary to explain the incentive of this appeal in order to prevent them from misunderstanding my position, but for those who do not I will say that as I own property in New York City, including deep-water front, which this bill would surely increase the value of, and have no property or other interest, except my interest in the general welfare of the country, that it could injure, its enactment into law would certainly benefit me pecuniarily.

About two months ago, while a delegate to the leading commercial organization of the United States and a member of its committee on merchant marine, I first heard of this bill. It had not been published and was not introduced into Congress until four days after we adjourned, but those interested in shipping and in railroads knew so much about it that I learned from them at that convention most of its provisions—indeed, every one of importance. Those interested were fully and ably represented and were thoroughly prepared to induce the convention to indorse this bill, which had been conceived in their interests, though it had not been officially born. I was informed in the most positive manner that it would be useless to oppose it, as it would surely become a law by the 4th of March, 1899.

Knowing that a committee largely composed of representatives of the most powerful transportation lines in the United States and Europe had been for a number of years working to secure legislation in the interest of those great corporations, I could but infer that they were the authors of this bill, and thought it fair to conclude that it was intended to benefit the interests they represented, regardless of all else. Though as anxious as anyone to restore our merchant marine, duty compelled me to oppose the indorsement of a measure so prepared and proposed, and I succeeded in inducing the committee to make a report strongly urging the restoration and maintenance of our merchant marine without recommending specific legislation. Shortly before we submitted our report an able director of one of our largest railroads appeared, upon the scene with a very shrewdly drawn resolution recommending legislation upon the lines of this bill, and I was urged to permit his resolution to be made a part of our report.

As I positively refused to consent, he presented it as a separate measure and after considerable opposition the convention adopted it, though not as a part of the report of its committee on merchant marine. If he had introduced the Hanna-Payne bill, I am confident that the convention would not have indorsed it, but his resolution was simply an approval of the message of the President and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury with the recommendation of a law to carry them into effect, and it would probably have received a majority vote in any commercial body in the United States at that time, as nearly everyone felt like standing by the Administration until after the ratification of the treaty of peace. It is likely that no delegate except those pecuniarily interested in the Hanna-Payne bill knew enough about it or understood the connection between it and the railroad director's resolution well enough to know what his vote really signified.

To show how unreliable the adoption of such resolutions by commercial bodies is, so far as indicating the judgment or wishes of their members, I will cite the fact that a prominent New York newspaper recently published a list of 163 organizations which it said had adopted resolutions indorsing the Hanna-Payne bill, and at the head of the list was the name of the organization above referred to. To illustrate how such indorsements are secured, I will say that one of the printed resolutions which the Press Bureau, organized to promote the Hanna-Payne bill, sends out with letters urging their adoption, was presented to the board of directors, of which I am a member, of a chamber of commerce.

The resolution and accompanying letter were read by our secretary, and the board was about to recommend the indorsement of the resolution at our next meeting, which would have probably secured its adoption by that chamber of commerce. I had refrained from saying anything in order to observe how such things were apt to go through, but just before action was taken I briefly outlined the Hanna-Payne bill, with the result that that board unanimously refused to indorse it. I hope Representatives and Senators who are daily deluged with accounts of bodies having indorsed the Hanna-Payne bill will carefully consider these facts. I also wish to warn them against attaching too much importance to what newspapers say regarding this bill.

During the six years in which I have devoted my time and income to economic work I have always been able to secure a fair presentation of my views in such newspapers as I selected, and although, owing to a desire to avoid notoriety, I rarely signed an article, and, indeed, seldom presented my views in my own words, thousands of newspapers all over the land have published what I sent them. Though an active advocate of the gold standard and currency reform, I have very seldom found a man or paper advocating free silver that would not give a fair hearing to my side of the case, and this has done much to convince me that the great majority of our so-called silver men are sincere and honest in their belief; certainly if they thought they were wrong they would not court discussion.

It has remained for those who advocate this bill to teach me that a large part of the press of the United States can be so muzzled as to make it wellnigh impossible to get the truth before the public. Only inability to get what I have said and will say in this circular to the people in the usual way has induced me to publish it in this manner. I am by no means alone in this experience, as will be seen by the following, which is one of numerous instances that have come to my knowledge.

One of the most prominent, able, and honorable officers of labor organizations, members of which are engaged in the shipbuilding trades, as well as in other industries, informs me that in his long experience he has always found newspapers ready to print any information which he gave them and anxious to interview him upon subjects in which the organizations he represents were interested, but that he has seen the editors of many papers that had heretofore been anxious to publish his contributions, and has been unable to induce one of them to print a line against the Hanna-Payne bill, though he knew that some of them were personally opposed to it.

I know instances in which newspapers have been compelled by those advocating the bill to stop the publication of anything calculated to teach the people its true character. Men in very high positions have amazed me by their efforts to muzzle the press with regard to this bill. In view of these facts Representatives and Senators must not think that because much is said for and almost nothing against the Hanna-Payne bill in the newspapers that the people will approve it when they learn its character. Indeed, I read a newspaper almost daily whose editor is to my certain knowledge very much opposed to the bill, while every issue of the paper advocates it and urges its passage.

Whether this is done through the great advertising patronage of the railroads, steamships, and other corporate interests which are beneficiaries of the bill, or whether more specific and direct influence is necessary to secure it, I do not know; but I do know that never before in a long and busy life, during which I have always kept in reasonably close touch with the press of my country, have I had reason to suspect that the brutal power of capital and corporations could so suppress the truth, and I warn them that our free schools have taught our people the importance of a free press. As indicative of how the most influential labor organizations engaged in the shipbuilding trades feel regarding the Hanna-Payne bill, I will say that for about a month largely attended meetings of various branches of them have been held, at which such resolutions as that from which I now quote have, after open and thorough discussion, been unanimously adopted.

"The third is known as the Hanna-Payne bill, officially entitled S. 5024, and is one of the most un-American bills ever presented in the interest of foreign corporations, being practically a free-ship bill, with sufficient Americanism held in reserve to enable its progenitors to loot the United States Treasury, and even barring itself from being compelled to employ American crews. It asks for the admission of foreign ships to our registry in the ratio of 2 to 1; it asks for a bounty to owners of these foreign-built vessels of the larger and swifter class of approximately 4½ cents per gross ton on every 100 miles sailed, leaving a small inducement to the owners of lesser craft.

"Its provisions would debar the ships constructed by its requirements in American shipyards from employment in our coasting trade, and the bill is so covertly worded as to mislead any but those thoroughly acquainted with matters marine, and is intended only for the benefit of gigantic corporations which are largely alien. * * * We denounce in the most emphatic terms the bill commonly known as the Hanna-Payne shipping bill." * * *

I know of bodies containing over 45,000 voters that have unanimously adopted this resolution. There are so many more workers than employers, so many more poor and well-to-do men than rich men, that it would be well to consider the fact, and to remember that each man is a voter, and that the Australian ballot protects him from coercion. a 3,001 tons. b 7,999 tons. c 8,001 tons. d 9,999 tons.

It has been impossible to get the promoters of this bill to express a definite opinion as to the amount that it would take from the United States Treasury. Indeed, the chief among them have said that they do not know; that no one can tell how much shipping would enter under it, etc., and such opinions as they have dared to express differ widely. The most cautious among them say that not less than 250,000 tons of foreign-built steamships which were in service December 1, 1898, would be admitted under it.

This is equal to 25 steamers of 10,000 tons each, which would, if they had shown a speed of 21 knots in a four hours' trial, and should make 13 round trips from New York to Liverpool in a year, or the equivalent of this on some other line, each draw $277,758 a year, which would give the twenty-five $6,943,950 annually, and $138,879,000 during the twenty years of their contract. Adding to this the one-half as much tonnage required to be built in the United States, which would draw from the Treasury during the twenty years $69,439,500, would give a total of $208,318,500 to these ships during the term of their contracts. This makes no provision for the many vessels now carrying our flag which would be subsidized, nor for the large amount of shipping other than that above mentioned that would be built here, while it is probable that a much greater number of foreign-built ships would enter under the clause admitting those under contract for construction on the 1st day of February, 1899.

One of the letters which their press bureau has sent to commercial bodies says that the "bill will compel the building of $60,000,000 worth of new shipping in the United States during the next five years." This means that $120,000,000 worth of foreign-built steamships would be entered.

Mr. Clement A. Griscom, president of the International Navigation Company, in an address before the Senate Committee on Commerce, January 12, 1899 (see page 29 of the official report), said his company would have to build 60,000 tons of ships, at a cost of $7,500,000, if the bill became a law. This is equivalent to his saying that such ships cost $125 a ton.

Taking this as a basis, the $120,000,000 would represent 960,000 tons, which, in ships of 10,000 tons each, would give 96 ships, which could, if they had shown 21 knots an hour in a four hours' trial, draw $277,758 each annually, which would amount to $26,664,768 a year, and to $533,295,360 during the 20 years of their contract. This would be money paid to foreign-built ships, and, as one-half as much tonnage would have to be built here, it would, if costing the same price per ton and in the same class of ships, build ships which could draw $266,647,680 during the 20 years of their contract, making an aggregate of subsidies for shipping, based on foreign ships and the tonnage required on account of their registering, of $799,943,040. Of course Mr. Griscom and the very competent head of their press bureau did not intend that the above statements should be brought together as a basis for estimating a part of the cost of the Hanna-Payne bill.

As the advocates of this bill mention only smaller and medium ships in their published statements, carefully avoiding anything over 8,000 tons, and as such ships draw smaller subsidies than ships of 10,000 tons and over, I presume they will say that it is unfair to base estimates on the provision made for large ships. A few facts will answer this objection. There are now 92 steamers running to New York on regular trans-Atlantic passenger lines. They have an aggregate of 683,232 gross tons, which is an average of 7,426.43+ tons each. As many of the older ships are from 2,524 to 4,000 tons, it is evident that the modern ships average much more than 8,000 tons. Indeed, 30 of the above-named ships are over 8,000 tons, while 22 are more than 10,000 tons each.

At a recent hearing of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors I heard the best representatives of leading European and American steamship lines say that not less than 70 vessels of from 10,000 to 18,000 tons each would be in service within four years, and that many of them were then building and others contracted for. In view of the above it is clear that estimates based on ships of less than 10,000 tons would be misleading.

The vast sum which this bill would take from the taxpayers of the United States for subsidies is not its most dangerous feature. The gigantic monopoly which it would create is much more to be feared. It would certainly give to a few railroads and the steamship lines which they own, together with other steamship lines and railroads which they would control, an almost absolute monopoly of our foreign carrying trade. For a better understanding of this, let us consider some of the factors involved and their relations to each other.

The sailing vessel is the ship most reliably advantageous to farmers, lumbermen, iron producers, and all those whose products are shipped over sea and do not require rapid transportation. It is also the nursery of our Navy. No man is considered a thorough seaman until he has had the training of experience as a sailor on a sailing vessel. Not having the heavy machinery of a steamer, nor to carry coal to furnish the power that moves her, she can carry a much larger cargo in proportion to her size, and, especially when schooner rigged (as the largest sailing vessels are now built), needs a much smaller crew. A good specimen of this class of ship is the 5-masted schooner Prescott, recently launched, which has a carrying capacity of 4,300 tons.

One of her principal owners is her captain, and as she will probably carry not more than 12 men all told it is likely that her crew will all be citizens of the United States. For many generations it has been customary for families and communities of our seafaring men to unite in building and manning sailing vessels, and among them are found the most intelligent, brave, and patriotic seamen. As a class they are probably the best all-round seamen in the world.

The worst enemy these men and their ships have had is the tramp steamer, but as a tramp steamer of 4,000 tons has to carry her machinery and coal and requires about five times as many men as a 4,000-ton schooner, while four of her men have to be educated engineers, our ships have been able to remain in business. The competition of these sailing vessels has done much to keep down the cost of carrying grain, lumber, and similar products, and has thereby protected the producers of such products as well as their over-sea consumers from extortionate charges. Inasmuch as they have done this they have interfered with the business of the large steamship lines, and the corporations owning these lines have realized it.

The commerce of the Pacific has become important and many think that it will in time exceed that of the Atlantic, and as distances are great and coal costly in that part of the world, the large steamship companies have decided that they must, if possible, prevent sailing vessels from competing with them for that trade. The above are some of the facts which account for the Hanna-Payne bill, which is much the worst enemy the American sailor has ever had and from which nothing but the Congress of the United States can protect him.

Of course this bill had to be so drawn as to appear to protect our sailing vessels; if it had not been, its purpose to force them out of all business except in our coastwise trade would have been too obvious; hence this bill assumes a virtue it does not possess. It proposes that a sailing vessel of 4,000 tons shall receive for a voyage from New York to Liverpool and back $3,008. When we consider that heretofore this vessel had to make the voyage for nothing, except what she received for freight and perhaps a stray passenger, this seems fair and even generous.

But in connection with the fact that the bill provides that a steamer of 4,000 tons, which has shown a speed of 19 knots during a four hours' trial under favorable conditions, shall receive $7,342.40 for the same trip, while one of 10,000 tons, which has shown 21 knots speed in a similar trial, shall receive $21,366 for the same trip, and that one of 17,000 tons and a speed of 21 knots under similar conditions shall receive $36,322.02 for the same voyage, it is plain that the bill, if enacted into law, would compel the sailing vessel to retire from business.

A 4,000-ton sailing vessel might, under favorable conditions, make this voyage 4 times in a year and receive $12,032, while the 4,000-ton steamer can easily make 13 voyages in a year (the bill permits each class to make 16) and would receive $95,451.20; the 10,000-ton steamer could easily make 13 voyages in a year, for which she would receive $277,758, and a 17,000-ton steamer, like the Oceanic, could easily make 13 trips a year, for which she would receive $472,186.26.

During the five years allowed for those entering foreign-built ships under this bill to build half as much tonnage in this country as they bring in from Europe, our American-owned and American-manned sailing vessel might receive $60,160, while the steamships, at least half of them of foreign build, and all of them (with the exception of one-fourth of the navigating crew and one American boy to each 1,000 tons, which would give about 11 Americans, among from 400 to 500 men, on a 10,000-ton ship) manned by foreigners, could receive for a 4,000-ton ship $477,256, for a 10,000-ton ship $1,388,790, and for a 17,000-ton ship $2,360,931.30.

As the contract under this bill is for twenty years, the sailing vessel could receive $242,640 and the steamships $1,909,024, $5,555,160, and $9,443,725 each, respectively. The bill provides for the payment of much greater subsidies to large ships of 22 and 23 knots speed, but wishing to be entirely fair and to present what might reasonably be supposed to be an average cost, I have omitted those ships from this calculation.

But the steamship and railroad companies that dictated this bill intend to destroy the business of ordinary tramp steamers as well as that of sailing vessels. With this object in view they have provided in the bill that no steamer of not over 1,500 gross tons or having a speed of less than 14 knots an hour shall be paid any more than sailing vessels. As but few tramp steamers can show a speed of 14 knots an hour this would give the faster steamers of the corporations back of this bill absolute control of our foreign commerce and would make them by far the greatest monopoly in the world.

What the result of this would be is plainly indicated by the expression so common with transportation men, that they "charge all that the traffic will bear," which means all that can be charged without seriously restricting production or consumption and thereby injuring their business; in short, the producer and consumer would only have left what the transportation lines could not take without injuring themselves. Every large shipper knows this to be true. It costs as much to bring freight from less than 200 miles east of New York to New York as to send the same freight to Chicago. This is because the Sound steamers and the railroads with which they should compete, agree, and of course "charge all that the traffic will bear."

I wish to warn everyone who is not more interested in the transportation lines which this bill favors than in production and consumption that it is a dangerous bill for them, and that if they wish to defeat it they can only do so by prompt, energetic, and united effort. It is promoted by the most powerful influences I have ever known advocate a bill. To indicate what one of these influences is I quote from a recent number of the New York Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin:

"Whether it is entirely consistent with dignity to resign a Senatorship and undertake the promotion of legislation and visit the committees of Congress in the interest of measures of great pecuniary value to their proposed beneficiaries, is a problem regarding which we will enter into no controversy with ex-Senator Edmunds; and whether his value to the shipowners and shipbuilders * * * lies in his legal erudition or his personal and political influence with his recent colleagues in Congress is a matter that only the gentlemen who have retained him can absolutely know.

"Senator Matt Carpenter used to joke in a rather undignified way about the great access of law business that came to him when he became chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, which passes upon all nominations of judges, and its decrease when he retired from that position. Senator Edmunds also was for many years chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and he had very much more business before the Supreme Court than any of his colleagues.

"But we have no hesitation in controverting some of the statistics of Mr. Edmunds's brief."

Mr. Edmunds probably feels that he has a perfect right to advocate this bill notwithstanding the fact that he voted in the Senate against the bill under which the Griscom, which is our only subsidized line, now runs; he was then a Senator from Vermont, and being now a Philadelphia lawyer his position is of course entirely different; indeed, I am told by one of the men on the inside of shipping circles that he now receives only $1,000 for each time he goes to Washington to promote the passage of the bill. This is a very moderate charge for an attorney of his ability and commanding position in regard to Congressional legislation.

In considering the interests involved in this bill we must remember that it would subsidize railroads as well as ships, because they own more than half of the stock of some of the most important steamship companies, and some of them are now building ships to run in connection with their cars. These railroad companies, some of which own leading transcontinental lines, would of course concentrate all the freight they could control at the ports that their steamers entered. By being able to bill freight from any point on their lines to the foreign ports to which their steamships run, they would have such an advantage over other railroads that they could compel them to unite with them in concentrating business at the ports from which the monopolistic lines could ship it to its foreign destination. They already have great power in this direction.

More than 50 per cent of the wharf and dock privileges of our Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts are owned by railroad corporations as terminals, while more than 32 per cent of the remaining half is leased and controlled by railroads and shipping companies which work in harmony. The passage of this bill would lead to an alliance or trust embracing practically all of the transcontinental and trunk lines of railroad and the over-sea transportation interest, which would be much the greatest monopoly the world has ever known. All our foreign trade would be concentrated at a few of the large ports, and the producer and his over-sea consumer would be at the mercy of the monopoly. Individual enterprise would be powerless under this subsidy and bounty plan, and I think our people would soon conclude that they had been mortgaged to a gigantic monopoly for thirty years.

Perhaps one outside corporation would be able to profit by the bill. This is the Standard Oil Company. It has a large fleet of steamers and sailing vessels, nearly all of which, I am credibly informed, could draw subsidies under this bill. It has over 35 steamers, which, I am told, made 211 entries at Bayone in New York Harbor last year. They vary in size from the Ocean, which is 1,656 tons, to the Tuscarora, which is 3,955 tons, and average about 2,600 gross tons, all of them being over 1,500 tons and engaged in foreign trade.

I think the slowest of them could show more than 14 knots speed in a four hours' trial, and some of them are much faster; so that they would be pretty heavily subsidized. Having its own pipe lines to bring its oil to the coast, as well as enjoying fairly friendly relations with the railroads, it might be able to maintain its independence. As each $100 share of its stock sells readily for $472, our people might think it unnecessary to tax them to pay it over $1,000,000 a year for attending to its own business.

It would admit not less than 250,000 tons of foreign-built ships already in service and many of them old, and an ominously unknown but certainly very large number of foreign ships which were contracted for on or before February 1, 1899, to our register and let them carry our flag over foreign crews. It gives them exorbitant subsidies and requires nothing of them except that they "shall have received or shall be fit to receive" a certain rating which need never be renewed. If they show a given speed during a four hours' trial, the subsidy is permanently increased, and they can be worn out at any speed their owners prefer.

The "one-fourth of her navigating crew" required to be citizens of the United States need never be more than one man, while the "one American boy for each 1,000 tons" would employ but one American among from twenty to fifty aliens or more, according to the size and class of the ship. The clause relating to the 80 per cent of the stock of American or foreign corporations, which the bill stipulates shall have been owned by citizens of the United States on December 1, 1898, and until the bill is passed, can be justly regarded as a subterfuge, for the entire stock of a corporation can be transferred with a pen full of ink, and stock is habitually transferred and held for specific purposes.

During the first ten years owners of ships can contract to receive bounties for twenty years, but after the said ten years no such contract can be made; this would overstimulate shipbuilding for ten years, and kill it for the next twenty, as no ship built after the ten years could be subsidized, and of course could not compete with the ships that were. The great corporations would be able to secure enough ships during the ten years to give them absolute control during the remaining twenty. This is rotten economics. The drawers and promoters of this bill ask Congress to mortgage the right of eminent domain for thirty years. They seem to fear that the people would resort to it to rid themselves of the terrible burden their representatives are urged and expected to impose upon them. I think this fear well founded, for, after a few sales of Government bonds to pay the subsidies, the people would surely insist that the robbery must stop.

After devoting over a month to the study of the Hanna-Payne bill, under favorable conditions, I decided that I did not know enough of what it would cost us to be entitled to a definite opinion and that its promotors intended that no one should learn. Feeling that the truth must be ascertained and published, the highest authority in the United States was appealed to for a statement of the probable cost, and I herewith present a table giving the result of a most thorough study of this subject by Capt. William W. Bates, author of "American Marine," "Rules for the Construction and Classification of Vessels," formerly manager of the Inland Lloyd's Register, and late United States Commissioner of Navigation.

This table came without comment of any kind upon the merits of the bill or the motives of its promoters. It is simply the result of a long, careful, and thorough study of every factor involved, from a cold-blooded scientific standpoint. I presume no one will claim that there is anyone else as able and well qualified to make such a study. His American Marine is the book which a person wishing to understand the subject must read, and he is in all respects the best authority. I commend this table to those who wish to learn the truth regarding the Hanna-Payne bill.

It shows that if but 5 per cent of the ships engaged in our foreign commerce the first year after the bill was enacted into law were subsidized, and but 80 per cent the ninth year and thereafter during the term of the subsidy contracts, it would cost the taxpayers of the United States $52,222,699 for the first five years; $193,914,329 for the next five years; $281,948,408 for the next five years; $332,296,210 for the next five years; $382,803,930 for the next five years, and $350,202,048 for the remaining four years of the contracts—a total of $1,573,367,622 for the entire period.

If an average of but 50 per cent of the ships engaged in our foreign commerce during the thirty years were subsidized, the bill would cost us $1,087,514,510.

As 90 per cent of our exports and 93 per cent of our imports were American carried in 1810, when we were comparatively poor and powerless, and we carried 71 per cent of our exports and 77 per cent of our imports in 1815, after a war which England forced upon us for the purpose of destroying our sea power, it is highly probable that much more than an average of 50 per cent of the ships engaged in our foreign commerce during the thirty years would be subsidized. In former times we only charged "10 per cent discriminating duty on all imports in ships or vessels not of the United States," whereas the Hanna-Payne bill proposes to pay so much to the owners of high-class ships under our register that, as one of them recently told me, they can "carry cargo one way and go empty the other and do well."

Please note that we used to favor American ships only on what they actually carried. This bill proposes to pay them not for what they carry, or for what they could carry, but for their gross tonnage, which includes all their machinery, coal, etc., the full measured capacity of the ships; in short, to pay them roundly for every mile they move themselves. How long would our people submit to the Government's selling bonds to pay these subsidies? But how could they help themselves when their Congressmen had mortgaged even the right of eminent domain to the corporations owning the ships, and the mortgage was for thirty years?

The genesis of this bill is greed, its mask enterprise and patriotism, and its purpose monopoly. No foreign-built or foreign-manned ship should be subsidized with American money. If ships must be subsidized, let them be American built and American manned, and let the law give all citizens of the United States equal opportunity.

SAMUEL ADAMS ROBINSON.

Mr. LACEY. I now offer an amendment. It is the amendment that the chairman thought ought to go into the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is a motion to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. LACEY. I will let that be read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this an amendment to the paragraph?

Mr. LACEY. It is an amendment to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert on page 24, line 1, after the word "or," the following: "if the United States shall so elect."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I accept the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. What line is that?

Mr. LACEY. Page 24, line 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. I offer another amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 23, page 24, after the word "basin," the following: "and all future repairs thereto."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to have the bill amended in any way to better it, but I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he knows what the repairs of a basin are?

Mr. LACEY. I do not. The statement was made by the chairman of the committee that the repairs were provided for by the bill. It turns out that they are not, and so I offered this amendment. There are necessary repairs in any basin; there must be. There is dredging, building of retaining walls, etc. I see there is a wall provided for here. We have been shown the picture of a wall badly out of repair, and I think perhaps the chairman can tell us better what the repairs are than anybody else. If it is not the purpose that the company shall keep up the repairs, then this ought not to go in.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do not think it ought to go in.

Mr. DOCKERY. Did I understand the chairman to say that it is not the purpose of the company to keep up the repairs?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. If anybody can tell me what the repairs are on a wet dock, I will put it in. I never heard of the water in a dock being repaired; I never heard of the mud under the water in the dock being repaired.

Mr. DOCKERY. No; but I understand there is something about a dock that you can repair. Of course you can not repair the water. What is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report again the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I want to state to the gentleman from Iowa that the purpose is——

Mr. LACEY. I will withdraw the amendment if it is objectionable. The gentleman stated that it was proposed to build these walls and to keep this dock in repair, and I wanted to carry out his suggestion.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The Fitchburg Railroad Company keep their own side of the wharf in repair. They are bound under this act to build a portion of the sea wall on the Government side, but the bill is so prepared as to permit the Government to build the sea wall in a peculiar manner if it sees fit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to renew the amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I accept it, Mr. Chairman.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] to strike out the section.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CUMMINGS) there were—ayes 27, noes 66.

So the motion was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Navy-yard, Norfolk, Va.: Quay wall for fitting out basin, $100,000; ship fitters' shop for construction and repair, $100,000; building for electric plant, plumbers' shop, and machine shop (yards and docks) $75,000; blacksmith shop and plumbers' shop, $50,000; 120-ton floating derrick, $70,000; 2 officers' quarters, $10,000; grading and paving streets and for sewers, $20,000: storehouse for torpedoes, etc., $75,000; in all, navy-yard, Norfolk, $500,000.

And the sum of $145,687.50, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to pay and satisfy the amount awarded to the property owners as found by the final judgment to be rendered in the matter of the condemnation proceedings begun under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States under the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia on the 24th day of June, 1898, for the condemnation of the tract of land mentioned therein for the use of the United States at Norfolk, Va.; and such further sum is appropriated as may be necessary to pay the costs of said proceedings: Provided, That said sum, the purchase money, shall be paid into court to be distributed among those entitled thereto, or their attorneys of record, under said judgment and decree in full satisfaction of the payment for the lands mentioned and described therein.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, a verbal correction. On page 28, line 9, strike out the word "under" and insert the word "in."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 9, strike out the word "under" and insert the word "in;" so that it will read, "in the district court of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Building and grounds, Naval Academy: A joint select committee of Congress is hereby constituted, to consist of members of the Fifty-fifth Congress who are also accredited members of the Fifty-sixth Congress, three of whom shall be appointed by the President of the Senate and three by the Speaker of the House, whose duty it shall be to examine the present condition of the buildings and grounds of the Naval Academy at Annapolis, and to report to the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress a comprehensive plan for such rearrangement and reconstruction of the said buildings and grounds as they may deem expedient, together with an estimate of the cost of the same.

For the purpose of such examination and report said committee is authorized, in its discretion, to employ experts in engineering and construction, and to procure preliminary plans from five architects or firms of architects of conspicuous ability and experience, the cost of such examination, employment, and plans not to exceed the sum of the appropriation herein made for the purposes of said committee. The committee is also empowered to visit the Naval Academy; to call for and examine such persons and papers as may be required in the prosecution of this inquiry; to employ a clerk and stenographer, and to sit at any time during the recess or the sessions of Congress. For the expenditures herein authorized there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available. And all operations and expenditures under the following paragraph in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, namely, "The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to contract for the construction, at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., of a building suitable for use as an armory, at a cost not to exceed $300,000; a boathouse, at a cost not to exceed $300,000; a power house, at a cost not to exceed $100,000; four double houses for officers' quarters, at a cost not to exceed $80,000; for grading, electric-light wiring, removing old buildings, and preparing plans, at a cost not to exceed $90,000; for constructing the line of sea wall on the river side, piling, dredging, and filling in, as may be necessary, $150,000; and the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated toward the construction of the public works herein authorized," are hereby suspended and made inoperative and dependent upon such future legislation as may result from the examination and report of the committee hereby constituted, except where and in so far only as it shall be necessary to fulfill contracts already made and entered upon.

During the reading of the paragraph:

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, there seem to be two paragraphs that are objectionable and subject to a point of order. Out of abundant caution I thought I had better interpose one at this point, and I make the point of order against all that is contained between line 16, page 31, down to and including all that is in line 17, page 33. With that understanding, I suggest that the Clerk read until he comes to line 17, page 33; but I want it understood that I make the point of order as to all of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the provision down to the word "available," in line 18, page 32, is one proposition and what follows is another.

Mr. MUDD. Well, I make the point of order at this time.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. That it is obnoxious to clause 2, Rule XXI, I suppose.

Mr. MUDD. I think, Mr. Chairman, that all of this is one proposition, because it will be seen, when the Clerk reads further along, that the rest of the paragraph suspends the work until the committee goes down there and makes its report. It is all connected, all a part of one general provision. It contemplates the appointment of a committee, and it suspends the work until the report of that committee. I contend that it is all a part of one general provision, all of which is obnoxious to clause 2, Rule XXI, as new legislation.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MUDD. Certainly.

Mr. DAYTON. Does the gentleman admit that the work that is suspended has been authorized by law?

Mr. MUDD. Unquestionably.

Mr. DAYTON. Then your point is that it can not be suspended or investigated or in any manner examined into by a subsequent bill because it is new legislation. Is that true?

Mr. MUDD. Not on a general appropriation bill. It can be inquired into and examined into and legislated about, but not on a general appropriation bill. The language of the rule is as clear as crystal and has been decided upon a thousand times in this House. The rule says:

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

This so clearly changes existing law, Mr. Chairman, that it suspends, and qualifies, and, pro tanto, repeals, the act which was passed in a similar bill, the Naval appropriation bill, at the last session of Congress.

It creates a commission, and it has been decided hundreds of times in this House that language creating commissions of this kind upon general appropriation bills is obnoxious to the point of order. I apprehend there can be no doubt whatever as to that. I do not think there can be any necessity to argue the question.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, this provision in the bill does not seem to me obnoxious to the rule. An appropriation was made last year authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to erect certain buildings and to do certain things at the Naval Academy. The Naval Committee, owing to the circumstances with which these appropriations are surrounded, have asked the House of Representatives to modify the action under that appropriation. There is nothing that prevents. We do not propose the repeal of any law. Every dollar heretofore appropriated may yet be utilized and expended to carry out the objects of the appropriation of last year. The present provision proposes simply a method of ascertaining more fully the conditions under which the appropriation should be expended.

I apprehend that if a direct provision were inserted in the bill taking issue with some action that the Secretary of the Navy might have adopted under that appropriation, on the ground that he was not properly carrying out the law or the spirit of the law, it would not be obnoxious to the rule which prohibits the changing of any existing law upon an appropriation bill. This provision proposes simply to call a halt until Congress can ascertain, through a properly appointed committee or commission, how this money ought to be expended. It is absolutely essential that this power should exist. Under the appropriation of last year action has been taken at the Naval Academy which clearly is not authorized by any existing law. Public buildings which have cost a great deal of money have been demolished, and entirely removed from the grounds, without any action of Congress authorizing the removal.

It seems to me that this provision is merely directory as to the manner in which the appropriation of last year shall be utilized. The object of the appropriation, the spirit of the law, was to provide means for the erection of certain structures at Annapolis. This provision simply directs that the operations under that law be suspended until Congress can advise itself as to the proper manner of utilizing the appropriation.

Mr. MUDD. Possibly the Chair does not want to hear from me further.

Mr. DAYTON. I hope the Chair will hear some other members of the committee who honestly believe this point of order is not properly taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear one gentleman on each side.

Mr. MUDD. If other gentlemen wish to be heard, I will yield now.

Mr. DAYTON. Very well. I am ready to say what I have to say. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the situation, the House of Representatives at its last session provided for the erection of certain buildings in connection with the Naval Academy at Annapolis. That appropriation was made upon the motion, I believe, of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] who now raises this point of order against the provision in this bill. At least it was placed upon the appropriation bill by an amendment offered in the House.

The gentleman himself has distinctly admitted that he understands that by that provision the erection of those buildings at Annapolis has been authorized by law, and that the law exists today. Now, analyze the provision of this bill against which this objection is made by the gentleman from Maryland and you will ascertain it to be simply and purely this: The appointment of a legislative committee to investigate the plans adopted to carry out the law, and also the character and plans of the buildings that are to be erected in accordance with the appropriation of last session, which the gentleman admits is the foundation of the work which is being done. The provision in this bill proposes not a repeal of the appropriation of the last session, but a suspension of its expenditure until there can be a proper plan adopted for the purpose of carrying on those improvements.

Now, I do not believe in discussing the merits of a proposition upon a point of order, but I think it is just to the Naval Committee that the House and the Chairman should understand the necessity of this provision. At the last session of Congress, after the Naval Committee had determined that it was unwise to take up a general plan for the reconstruction of the Naval Academy buildings and grounds at Annapolis, the gentleman came here with an amendment which seemed to be an appropriation for $500,000 for the erection of certain buildings on those grounds. That amendment involves, in fact, an expenditure of eight to twenty million dollars, with no plans prepared, with no arrangements made, no understanding as to what buildings shall be removed or what shall be the character of the buildings constructed in their stead, with no man in charge of the work by any authorization of law.

Now, some action by Congress has become necessary, because of the appropriation made in that slipshod and indefinite manner——

Mr. HENDERSON. And put in as limitations upon the appropriation.

Mr. DAYTON. Yes; put in as limitations upon the appropriation, as the gentleman from Iowa so aptly suggests, and I thank him for the suggestion.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if the pending provision of this bill be not authorized by law, how in the name of reason and common sense can we ever get at the proper solution of the difficulty in which we are involved by the very fact that the gentleman had placed upon the statute books at the last session a provision of law so objectionable that we are undertaking a work involving an expenditure of $8,000,000, with no plans, with nothing to base it upon.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion?

Mr. DAYTON. With pleasure.

Mr. DOCKERY. I know nothing whatever of the controversy between the committee and the gentleman from Maryland. It seems to me, however, that the point of order is well taken. But that question, of course, will be determined by the Chairman of the committee.

I only desired to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the committee by this proposition propose to exercise executive functions, which is unusual, to say the least.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. How so?

Mr. DOCKERY. In the mode of exercising the power you have conferred upon the committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to interrupt for a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. Would it not be in the power of the House—had a fair, reasonable, and appropriate limitation been placed upon the appropriation—would it not be in the power of the House to provide suitable means for acquiring the necessary information, with a view to intelligently and properly expending the money which had been appropriated? Now, if that could have been done at the time that this provision was inserted in the appropriation bill, and was not done, the money not being expended which has been appropriated, is it not still within the power of the House to fix a limitation upon the expenditure according to its judgment and discretion?

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman must not understand me as opposing that proposition. I am in sympathy with fixing a limitation upon such expenditures. I am only discussing the form in which this matter is presented.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Does the gentleman from Missouri mean to say that the point of order applies to this provision for a commission?

Mr. DOCKERY. I am calling the attention of the committee to the facts. You devolve on a commission the power to report a comprehensive plan for rearrangement and reconstruction of the buildings, which seems to be an executive function and outside of the province of an ordinary commission.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. They are simply directed to report to Congress.

Mr. DOCKERY. But they are clothed with executive functions. They are to provide for a rearrangement or a reconstruction of buildings, and matters of that kind.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Oh, no; if the gentleman will pardon me. It is simply to make a report for legislation subsequently.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not wish, I repeat, to be understood as antagonizing the committee, for I know nothing whatever of the matter.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The gentleman from Missouri understands, of course, the distinction between a commission appointed to make a report to Congress and a commission appointed to take cognizance of matters of this kind, which would involve the expenditure of the money appropriated by Congress.

Mr. DOCKERY. Of course——

Mr. DAYTON. Extraordinary emergencies sometimes require extraordinary action. Here is a dilemma which we must meet. We embarked on the work two years ago, covered by the paragraph in question, under a provision which the House did not understand and could not have understood, or certainly it would not have adopted it in that form. That is the full extent and meaning of the paragraph in question. Now, we do not desire to undo the action of the last House, but we desire to have a basis or foundation for the work already authorized.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like to ask the gentleman if plans have been prepared? Have any plans been prepared by the Supervising Architect, and submitted, in accordance with the provision to which reference is made?

Mr. DAYTON. None whatever.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Nothing of the kind has been done.

Mr. DAYTON. And the Supervising Architect had nothing whatever to do with the matter. There is not a line or a syllable in any plan of any kind or character on the subject from him.

Mr. BELKNAP. Has anything been done with the $500,000 which was appropriated?

Mr. DAYTON. I have already said that the Secretary states that some part of it has been expended on a wall——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. And they removed some structures that had been already erected.

Mr. DAYTON. I was going on to remark that in accordance with the plans there has been some pulling down of old buildings that, with all due respect, I have the opinion should not have been torn down.

So it is time, Mr. Chairman, that we should get to some point and provide some scheme, if Congress intends to go any further, to put it in proper shape. That is the object of the provision of the pending bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is a very important section of our bill, not only in the amount of expenditure, but in relation to the utility, usefulness, and convenience, as well as the safety, of one of the greatest institutions of the country.

My colleague has stated with great precision the situation as it exists. The proposition was urged on the committee last year to enter upon the entire reconstruction of the Naval Academy, its buildings and grounds. The committee were not prepared to recommend to Congress such sweeping legislation until some investigation could be made with reference to the matter.

Mr. BERRY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. BERRY. I would like to ask if the Superintendent and officers of the Academy have not agreed on a plan which they present and recommend as more suitable and desirable than any that has been presented?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do not know whether such plan is more desirable and suitable.

Mr. BERRY. But have they not recommended some such plan?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. They are not architects.

Mr. BERRY. Of course, I understand that, but they are educated men, and understand drafting; and as I understand it, are pleased with the plan which has been submitted.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Does the gentleman think they are better capable of discharging the duty which has been devolved upon men trained in that business?

Mr. BERRY. I do not mean to say that. I say that they might be as capable of discharging it as other people might be. My question was whether or not such plans had not been prepared and met their approval.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The gentleman from Kentucky thinks that if certain officers were charged with a certain duty they would discharge it better than other officers who are not charged with it. I think that is true.

Mr. BERRY. I am glad you agree with me about that.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I agree with you entirely, and I want you to agree with me.

Mr. BERRY. I will if I can.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am trying to get your assistance and agreement. I was about to say that there have been no complaints made which the Government of the United States or anybody else is bound to respect.

Mr. BERRY. There have been plans made. I am asking for information.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am not obliged to take cognizance of that fact, because those plans have not been officially presented. In our committee we must act upon official information.

Mr. BERRY. I was asking for information. I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am told that such plans have been made.

Mr. BERRY. I understand that Admiral McNair and the officers of the Academy have agreed upon the plans presented, and that they are thoroughly satisfied with them.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. How do you know that?

Mr. BERRY. From some of the gentlemen themselves, and from another gentleman who is a very reliable authority.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Who were they?

Mr. BERRY. One was a member of the board appointed to visit that institution at the graduation last year.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Had he any authority to determine?

Mr. BERRY. I can not tell you. I wanted the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who is supposed to be full of knowledge on the subject, to tell me.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am trying to impart it to you.

Mr. BERRY. If I were on the committee, I would certainly know something about it. I want to know how far these plans have progressed, and whether they are satisfactory to those there.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. When my friend gets through telling me what he does not know, I will tell him what I do know.

Mr. BERRY. It will not take you as long to tell what you do know as it will for me to tell what I should like to know. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I certainly hope not. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I was about to state that some considerable pressure was brought upon our committee to induce us to enter upon legislation proposing an entire remodeling and rebuilding of the Naval Academy. It was an absolute and complete revolution of plans, materials, and everything. There were some gentlemen who came before us, one of whom had been an occupant of this exalted body, known as the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy. I presume some of the members of the House have served on that board and they know how much authority they are invested with. One of these gentlemen came to us with a proposition to make a very beautiful institution there.

I do not know but that it might be the finest and most desirable institution in the world, but it had no authority. A gentleman from New York, who had accompanied some of the members of the board, made some sketch plans of an entire revolutionizing of the Academy. We were not prepared, on the mere statement of some members of the Board of Visitors, to accept these voluntary plans and enter upon this enormous expenditure which it involves.

And if my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] will only remember, I think he will bear me out in the statement that last year I called the attention of the Committee of the Whole in the most earnest language that I could command to the undesirability of forcing through the House, largely under a sectional plea that the Naval Academy was the only institution of the kind below Mason and Dixon's line and that we had been very partial to West Point, an appropriation that practically committed or was intended to commit the Government to a plan that had never been authorized by any lawful body, which would involve an entire revolutionizing of the whole institution and might or might not, so far as we were advised, be the best or a desirable way of doing it.

The then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Herbert, had, exercising simply his function as Secretary of the Navy, ordered a board consisting of Commodore Matthews, then Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and one or two other naval officers who had no more power to recommend or to formulate plans that should be binding upon anybody than I or the man in the moon to go down to the Academy and make a report to him, presumably for his information.

I do not know where they struck these plans that were gotten up, but they made a report to the Secretary in which they did not indicate by name the plans of any person, but they did, as it seems to me, on a cursory examination, outline a plan that was intended to fit these designs that have been made by a gentleman named Flagg, who is an architect of some repute.

Mr. BERRY. I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Let me go ahead; I will tell it as true as gospel. [Laughter.] I asked the House to let our committee go ahead and take some orderly direction of the method by which we should determine what really ought to be done at the Naval Academy, how much ought to be done, and how it ought to be done. The Committee of the Whole was wiser than we; and in spite of our protest they thought it wise to put upon our appropriation bill, without any basis or foundation, a provision giving an appropriation of $500,000 as a part of the expenditure for doing certain things at the Academy.

One of the things was building an armory to cost $300,000, one was to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to construct a power house to cost $100,000, and another was to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to build a boathouse to cost $300,000, and various other things. That went into operation and became law, and under it the Secretary of the Navy, in the exercise of his power, as he stated to us in the hearings before the committee the other day, felt that he was bound to put these buildings somewhere, and as there was only one proposition, and the only plan of which he had ever heard was that of this board composed of Mr. Matthews and some——

Mr. BERRY. Was there any competitive bid about these plans?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No; it was simply the suggestion of one party. That is all. The entire matter has never been submitted to competitive bids.

Mr. BERRY. Then I am satisfied. I thought there was some sort of competition.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The Matthews board, having been invited by Secretary Herbert to make a report, had suggested certain plans, and in it this splendid affair. The Superintendent of the Naval Academy, Superintendent Cooper, was very much in favor of these plans, and advocated them from the first. The Secretary of the Navy proceeded, under the law, to advertise for proposals and to make contracts for the construction of these buildings in accordance with the law, so far as he should understand it. Now, in doing that he located the armory building——

Mr. BERRY. If the gentleman is talking for my benefit, I will say that since his explanation I am for the bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am talking for the benefit of all. Suppose that this area represents the area of the Academy [illustrating]. In this area here [illustrating] they located the armory, in this extreme portion of the grounds. They tore down the marine barracks to make a place for it. They tore down the boathouse, a structure of considerable value, to make a place here.

They located the boathouse over in the extreme over here, and then proceeded to locate the power house up here [illustrating]. So that if these buildings should be begun, the ground broken and the Government were committed to this whole scheme, this magnificent plan of rebuilding the entire Academy, turning the whole thing on its axis, removing nearly all the buildings there, I do not say that that would not be a good thing to do. I am not here urging to-day that the plan recommended by the Matthews board may not be an excellent one.

I do not know that it may not be the best one; but it has never been authorized. The subject has never been gone into by any authorized body, and we do not know whether this great expenditure ought to be incurred. We do not know whether it is desirable to do this thing, and the fact that some Superintendent of the Naval Academy here or some chief of a bureau there has selected papers there and is satisfied with the plans gotten up in this informal way is liable, on the statement of those who have been engaged in formulating these plans, to involve expenditures first and last of six to eight million dollars sure, and, as I believe, liable to run from ten to twelve million dollars. That being the case, the Committee on Naval Affairs, I am frank to say, did not feel justified in putting into this bill this year the million dollars that the Department recommended, which was sure to be utilized in the carrying out of this unauthorized plan.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. What is the proposition of the committee with reference to the improvement of the Naval Academy grounds?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will state. The $500,000 appropriation has been utilized in part by the Navy Department in removing some of the buildings at the Academy, which I think was of doubtful expediency. I think the removal may have been made by the Superintendent in the full belief that this plan was to be carried out. They have advertised for propositions for a boathouse, armory, and power house. I think the contract for the power house has been let.

Mr. DAYTON. The bids were more than the appropriation, and so none of them were accepted, but there has been certain work done.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I think if my colleague will permit me, I was told day before yesterday by a very worthy citizen of my own State that his bid had been accepted. It may have been for the furnishing of material. I think I can state, on reflection, that the contract had not been made, but the order to locate the buildings on the grounds has been made, and if they had gone forward they would have proceeded to build an armory here, and a boathouse there, and the logical, and practically inevitable, consequence of that would be the location between them of a cadet barracks building which has been estimated and an appropriation asked for a building to cost $3,500,000; and other buildings of a similar character as to cost and expensiveness have been asked for in this same bill.

Now, the committee did not feel authorized to go in and ask for an appropriation of millions of dollars, one building to cost $3,500,000, when we could not answer the first question that might be asked on this floor as to the plan upon which this money was to be expended, how the designs were authorized, and under what recommendations it came here. While we respect the Superintendent of the Academy and those officers of the Navy Department, we have had some experience in the way of designs and buildings constructed under some of the Departments of this Government, and we have learned that they are not infallible.

One solitary experience we had was where we built a structure for a war college at Newport some years ago and appropriated the full amount asked for by the Navy Department. The building was constructed, but it was hardly completed before we had demands made for an additional appropriation. For what? To build cross walls to hold the building together.

Mr. BERRY. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption for a question?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. BERRY. Is it contemplated to remove the remains of that school at Newport to Annapolis and combine the two?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No; that has not been mentioned at all. The committee, in looking this matter over, felt it to be their duty, before recommending additional appropriations of less expensive character, involving so much larger appropriations in the future, to report the condition of affairs at the Naval Academy to this body, and we do it in the shape of legislation which we recommend. We have no power to enforce our views, and do not desire to force them on Congress. I want to say that the committee has laboriously investigated this matter, and we have sincerely tried to see where we could get some solution of the difficulties in which we found ourselves. The committee at the outset were of the opinion that the first thing we must have was some authority of law to proceed at all. There is not a scintilla of legislation to provide for the entire rebuilding of that Academy.

We believe to a very large extent it should be rebuilt. I am in favor of as fine an institution as can be properly put there, but I do say that we have not information before us yet that warrants us in assuming that one particular design, of a very expensive character, and of a very destructive character, so far as the present structures are concerned, is the only one to be considered, and that we ought to look into this matter and find out what is the best way to proceed.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me a question?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. COX. If I understand the proposition you are discussing here, it is to make improvements in the way of building.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Yes; and enlarge the water front by building a stone wall out there and filling in.

Mr. COX. Your committee reports unanimously?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. We reported for the appointment of a joint committee of three members from each House to take this whole matter into consideration, to furnish them with means to employ the proper and necessary experts to go to the Academy and decide how far, in their judgment, the entire renovation of the institution should be carried; and, in addition to that, to call for preliminary plans from five architects of conspicuous ability and reputation, and then report to this House.

Mr. COX. And that they should take no action at all until you get the report.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. And that all action under the appropriation be suspended until we get the report.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. What is the question before the House? We should like to hear what is going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is the point of order made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD].

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairmain, out of great regard for my friend from Ohio, I will proceed to address a few more words as to the point of order. The House has had no possibility of being informed on this question except through the information that it gets here to-day, and if there is any gentleman on the committee who wants to vote without knowing anything about this question, or wants action to be taken without other members knowing anything about it, I am perfectly willing that he shall take that responsibility.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from Maine——

Mr. STALLINGS. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] will yield for a moment, I would like to put this question to the gentleman from Maine—whether the foundations of those buildings at Annapolis have not already been laid? That is my recollection.

Mr. DAYTON. No, they have not been laid.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I was about to say that the argument of the gentleman from Maine is undoubtedly, to my mind, a good one, as showing that the Committee of the Whole House should not take legislation out of the hands of the appropriate committees. But, having been on the Board of Visitors at Annapolis, I must say that for years there has been a plan adopted by the officers there, and, while I was on the board, approved by the Secretary of the Navy. Whether that was a plan under the law or not is a question that does not concern me at all.

Personally, I believe that in all these improvements, either at Annapolis or West Point, there should be a specific appropriation made for the buildings known to be most needed; and let the obligation of Congress stop with that. I do not believe that a blanket appropriation should ever be made. But the proposition in the bill seeks to create a new board, seeks to establish a new method of carrying on public improvements. That is the point I want to make. I think the Committee on Naval Affairs is perfectly justifiable in not reporting the appropriation of a single dollar until perfectly satisfied that the money will be properly expended.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Does the gentleman understand the character of the buildings that were recommended last year?

Mr. HULL. I do not.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Was this plan, which is now so much talked about—the plan of Mr. Flagg—was that plan brought up at the time you were a member of the board?

Mr. HULL. It was.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. How long ago?

Mr. HULL. Three years ago, when Captain Cooper was Superintendent. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TATE], who was a member of the board at the same time, will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Does the gentleman from Iowa remember any authorization of the plans that were exhibited at that time?

Mr. HULL. Not at all; but I do not——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. They were tentative.

Mr. HULL. They were tentative. They were plans made by the professors under the direction of the Superintendent; comprehensive plans for the improvement of the Academy; and the Secretary of the Navy at that time cordially indorsed those plans as a whole. As I recollect now, quite a large number of members of Congress, including members of the Naval Committee, were invited there to look them over.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. When?

Mr. HULL. That same summer, I believe.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I must plead "not guilty" to that.

Mr. HULL. At any rate, there was such an invitation.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I understand the gentleman to say that the officers or professors there made these plans. Does he understand that those are the plans now presented to us and explained by Mr. Flagg as his plans?

Mr. HULL. I have no information on that subject. I am simply stating that these plans have been "in the air;" that they have been submitted to different Boards of Visitors—I do not know whether they were so submitted while the gentleman from Maine was on the board or not.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Plans made by officers of the Academy?

Mr. HULL. Made under the authority of the Superintendent and with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Made by the officers?

Mr. HULL. I suppose they were made by some draftsman whom they employed.

Mr. DAYTON. Some man who came along with the suggestion of a plan?

Mr. HULL. Perhaps so. They had it all figured out, and submitted them to the Board of Visitors.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Does the gentleman recollect those plans?

Mr. HULL. No, sir. I did not regard myself as competent to pass on the plans.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will ask my friend a question with which he is entirely competent to deal. If it is true that those plans were the same that have been submitted to us, and if, under the appropriation of last year, the Secretary of the Navy should locate a boathouse here and an armory there and a power house somewhere else, does not the gentleman think it would almost, if not quite, necessitate a retroversion of that Academy in order to meet those plans?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I am not controverting the wisdom of this proposition. I am not controverting that at all. If I was chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, as my distinguished friend from Maine is, and they were making expenditures that I did not think wise, I should refuse to appropriate a dollar for it. And for that reason I think the proper way, in matters of this kind, is to make the appropriations as they are needed, for a single building at one time, that Congress should think proper, and thus, in the judgment of Congress, let the whole work go on gradually, and not commit us to the expenditure of eight or ten millions of dollars on an unknown and untried plan.

Now, as to the proposition which is under consideration and on which the point of order is pending. If I may be permitted, I think the proper way for the committee would be to refuse absolutely to make the appropriation except for a specific building. At West Point, by pursuing that policy we have had no trouble in the past. We have gone on year after year making, from time to time as occasion arose, appropriation for a specific building, which, in the judgment of the Military Committee, was necessary, and not adopting a plan for the entire remodeling and changing the whole construction. There, in every case, the Secretary of War and the Government officials were competent to carry out the appropriation in accordance with the intent of the committee.

The section under consideration in this bill provides for a committee of so many members of the House and so many members of the Senate who shall have jurisdiction over the plans, and generally have control of and report the condition of the buildings and grounds of the Naval Academy at Annapolis, so that the next Congress may take cognizance of that report. That, Mr. Chairman, is a committee or a commission not known to our laws. It never has, as I remember, in an appropriation bill, been provided that the erection of a building anywhere should be conducted in this manner.

This would be in order clearly, if the Committee on Naval Affairs had proposed this legislation in a separate bill, to be adopted after consideration on its own merits. But this is an appropriation bill, a general appropriation bill, and under our rules no legislation can be placed on the appropriation bill except under the conditions named in the rule itself.

Turn to page 32 of the bill and you find this provision:

> For the purpose of such examination and report said committee is authorized, in its discretion, to employ experts in engineering and construction, and to procure preliminary plans from five architects or firms of architects of conspicuous ability and experience, the cost of such examination, employment, and plans not to exceed the sum of the appropriation herein made for the purposes of said committee. The committee is also empowered to visit the Naval Academy; to call for and examine such persons and papers as may be required in the prosecution of its inquiry; to employ a clerk and stenographer, and to sit at any time during the recess or the sessions of Congress.

Now, I do not think that that authority can be conferred in a general appropriation bill. I believe that if there is a building to be erected there, or if the committee will make an appropriation for a building for the students for their dining hall, study room, or any other purpose, there would be no contest.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. How can we?

Mr. HULL. That has been done at the Military Academy year after year, and I say if that is done the Government architects and officers are entirely competent to carry out the plans.

Mr. DAYTON. But the gentleman must remember that $500,000 was authorized for this purpose last year in this same appropriation bill.

Now, do I understand the gentleman to hold that this provision, which provides that the plans by which the money shall be expended must be ascertained and fixed and determined by a commission appointed by Congress, is out of order, and which further declares that until this is done the appropriation shall not be expended? Do I understand the gentleman to claim that that is new legislation?

Mr. HULL. I understand that the creation of this commission is an act of new legislation.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Well, why not?

Mr. DAYTON. It is a provision to carry out properly the terms of the existing law which provides for the expenditure of this money.

Mr. HULL. Oh, that is a mere quibble, Mr. Chairman. Of course that is the language of this provision. But it is legislation for the creation of a board not now authorized by law for the expenditure of money which has been appropriated——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. We have that right under certain conditions.

Mr. HULL (continuing). And I think the committee did an unwise thing last year. I do not think they should have made a blanket appropriation like that.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. We never appropriated a dollar.

Mr. HULL. I am referring now to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I thought you were speaking of the Naval Committee.

Mr. HULL. No; that appropriation was made by the Committee of the Whole. The only question for the Chair and for the Committee of the Whole to pass on now is whether this is new legislation or not. On that proposition I have my own views. I have no doubt on that question. It changes existing law.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Well, I think it is legislation, Mr. Chairman; it is very clearly legislation. It is legislation that I hope will be adopted, and it will be the wisest legislation we have indulged in for some time.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, without regard especially to the point of order now under consideration, I rise for the purpose of saying to the members of this House and to the people of the country generally that I am in favor of this naval appropriation bill, shall vote for it, and so long as I am in Congress I will do everything in my power to maintain, improve, and increase the American Navy.

The American people take a just pride in their Navy. They have every reason to be proud of it, to be proud of its past, to be proud of it now, and to be proud of its future. The Navy is one of America's greatest institutions—a bulwark of defense, a mighty engine of offense—and should be liberally supported by the Congress of the United States for all its wants by generous appropriations.

Every dollar spent on the Navy is just so much money expended for insurance. A better investment could not be made. We must all stand by and for the Navy.

The most unthinking individual in the country realizes how important it is for the Government to have a strong, a great, and a mighty navy. We have a larger and more vulnerable seaboard than any other country in the world. We will soon, I believe, have a great merchant marine. We have great cities of immense wealth, of costly building, of commerce, and of property, the value of which is incalculable, all along our seacoasts. They must and should be all protected, and they can not be better protected, better safeguarded than by a modern, a commensurate, a powerful, and an efficient navy. In my judgment I believe that seven-tenths of the people of this country are more in favor of liberally appropriating money for the Navy than they are for the Army. I say this deliberately, and I am on the Military Affairs Committee. We do not want a large standing army in time of peace.

This naval appropriation bill is an honest and an economical one. It should pass the House unanimously. It only carries an appropriation of about $45,000,000, while the Army appropriation bill carries appropriations aggregating nearly $80,000,000, nearly double the amount of the naval bill. We want a mighty navy all the time. It is essential to our safety as a nation and to our supremacy on the high seas. A large standing army in time of peace is, however, contrary to the spirit of democracy and a menace to free and popular institutions.

In a Republic like ours, based on the consent of the governed, where every man is a part of the Government, where every man stands for the Government, and where every man is, or ought to be, a patriot, we do not need a great standing army in time of peace. We should rely on the volunteers and keep alive the martial spirit of our people.

In time of war every able-bodied man in this country is or should be a soldier of the Republic and bear arms, if necessary, for its defense, for its flag, and for its vindication. We need, however, a great navy for the protection, for the safety, and for the integrity of our great seaboard and our seacoast towns on the Atlantic Ocean, on the Pacific Ocean, and on the Gulf of Mexico. We need a great navy to protect our commerce on the high seas and to vindicate American citizenship and all that it stands for in every port and in every land in the world. I believe in the Navy. I stand for the Navy, and while I am in Congress I will always do all that I can for the Navy—for the men on deck, for the men below, and for the men behind the guns. All honor and all glory to the American sailors, to the American Navy, and to their patriotic, their heroic, and their splendid achievements.

I think I but voice the sentiments of the great majority of the people of this country when I say to you with all candor that we should have a great navy, the equal, in fact, of any in the world. Nothing would be more conducive to lasting peace, permanent security, and continued prosperity.

The recent war between Spain and this country demonstrated the power, the glory, and the effectiveness of the American Navy. Where would we have been in that combat if it had not been for our Navy? It was the Navy that lowered and humbled in the dust the proud banner of Spain in the Orient by the matchless genius and the thundering guns of Dewey. It was the Navy that dethroned the haughty power of Spain on the Western Hemisphere under the great Commander Schley. It was the Navy—our Navy, the Navy of the Republic—that forced the proud and puffed-up Spaniards, who had derided and ridiculed us for years, to hastily sue for peace when Schley's unerring guns sunk the Spanish fleet.

It was the Navy that vindicated the greatness, the glory, and the power of the United States of America and placed us in the front rank of the great powers of the world. It was the Navy that settled the controversy and won the war. Without the Navy we would have been impotent and powerless.

I am glad of this opportunity to speak for the Navy and to speak for the men in the Navy, from the lowest in the ranks to the highest in command. They all did, and they all do their duty. They are all heroes, each and every one.

Sir, I would vote for this bill if it appropriated more money than it does. There has been no fraud in the Navy, no stealing, no hypocrisy, no slander, no corruption. Its proud banner is spotless, and history will give it its full measure of praise and glory.

For all that our Navy has recently done and for all that it is to-day we owe much—more than words can tell—to the distinguished chairman of the Naval Committee [Mr. BOUTELLE], to his patriotic colleagues on that committee, especially to my friend and colleague from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] and to the recent Secretaries of the Navy, among whom should be particularly mentioned Secretary Chandler, Secretary Whitney, Secretary Tracy, Secretary Herbert, and the present efficient and distinguished Secretary, Mr. Long. The country owes them a debt of gratitude it can never pay. The great work they have done for the Navy and for the Republic can hardly be estimated and I doubt not will never be really and truly appreciated. All honor to them, I say. Their best reward, however, is in the consciousness of duty well done for duty's sake. As the years come and go let us indulge the hope that their work will be more and better understood, and their patriotic efforts duly recognized and sincerely applauded.

We are a mighty people. We have a great and a superb country. We are the great, the peerless, Republic. We have an immense seaboard. We must build up a great merchant marine; we must build and own the Nicaragua Canal, and we want a great navy to promote, to safeguard, and to protect it all now and for all time to come.

We are all proud of the heroism and the great deeds of valor and of gallantry of our immortal naval commanders. What true American is there from one end of the land to the other whose blood does not stir and tingle when he reads or thinks or hears of the heroic deeds of daring and of bravery of Paul Jones, of Wickes, of Hull, of Perry, of Lawrence, of McDonough, of Decatur, of Stewart, of Farragut, of Porter, of Foote, of Evans, of Phillips, of Clark, of Schley, and of our great admiral, the immortal Dewey?

Their gallant names, their heroic deeds, and their matchless valor brighten and illumine every page of American history. Their monuments, more enduring than marble or brass, are in the grateful hearts of their patriotic countrymen, and their illustrious fame will never die while American history lives, is read, and continues to be, as I pray it ever will, a beacon light to the oppressed of other lands and an inspiration to liberty, to freedom, and to equal rights and equal opportunities for all. No words can do them and their great deeds full justice.

But, sir, in this connection I desire to say a few words about another matter. If I had my way, I would make the Naval Academy at Annapolis and the Military Academy at West Point great national universities. I would make them great institutions of naval and military learning. I would open them freely to the youth of the land. I would make them as free to the poor man's son as they are to the rich man's son. In this regard, let me say, I agree with and concur in the policy of that great metropolitan newspaper, the New York Journal. I stand for that policy and will do all I can to carry it out. I would give all a chance, under proper rules and regulations to be prescribed by Congress. Instead of having one cadet at West Point and Annapolis from each Congressional district, I would have as many as could be accommodated by a proper enlargement of the two academies, so that anyone, no matter how poor or humble he might be, could enter and be educated, provided he could pass the necessary physical and mental examination.

I would pass a law providing that some of these students, when graduated, should spend a certain length of time in the service of the Government, and that others should go into the walks of private life, to be ready to serve the Government when called for in case of trouble or war. This is the true solution, in my judgment, of the making of a great navy and a great reserve army, and then men in almost every walk of life, educated at West Point and Annapolis, could command volunteers and ships in case of war. I would like to see the way as open and clear for the youth of our country to go to West Point and Annapolis as it is now for them to go to Princeton, to Yale, or to Harvard.

The people are thinking about this matter, and the day, in my opinion, is not far distant when Congress will have to take some decisive action in regard to it. I know that nothing will be done now, that nothing can be done now, but there must be a beginning to everything. I begin this agitation. I know that many here think my proposition is impracticable, but let me say to you in all sincerity that what you think is now inconsistent and impracticable will be a realization and a blessing in a few years. Some one must make the start. Some one must inaugurate the discussion. Some one must make the first effort to bring about reform and a departure from old practices and obsolete theories. I have tried to do that to-day, and I doubt not that these few brief remarks, uttered without preparation or premeditation, will bear fruit and ultimately consummate this great reform at West Point and Annapolis so devoutly wished for by the young men of our land. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say one word upon the question of order which is now before the Chair. As I understand it, the contention is that the provision in the bill which is now under consideration is obnoxious to the second clause of Rule XXI. That section provides that—

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, etc.

A year or more ago Congress appropriated $500,000 looking to the rebuilding or reconstruction of the buildings at Annapolis. Unquestionably, the care of and provision for the Naval Academy at Annapolis comes properly under the jurisdiction of the Naval Committee. It is the duty of that committee to provide for the building or reconstruction of such buildings as may be necessary.

Two questions were before the committee in reporting this bill. One was as to whether the Naval Committee should recommend to Congress an appropriation looking to the carrying on of the work for the reconstruction of these buildings at Annapolis, without plans and without business methods; or whether they should properly guard the interests of the Government in this matter by first formulating the necessary plans.

I take it that the conclusion of the committee not to appropriate more money for the reconstruction of buildings, which will ultimately cost from six to ten million dollars, without some general plans, was wise and in accordance with business methods.

Mr. TODD. I request order, so that we can hear the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will please maintain order for the very few moments left to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RIXEY. The Committee on Naval Affairs very wisely concluded that it would not appropriate the money to complete the reconstruction of the buildings until it was decided what plans should be adopted by the Government. I understand that certain gentlemen complain that the plan adopted of appointing a select committee to report is not the plan which has been adopted in other similar cases. That is not the question upon a point of order. The question is not whether it is the wisest plan that can be adopted, but it is whether it was in the province of the committee to recommend a commission at all.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Is the Chair ready to rule? The committee must rise in a moment.

Mr. RIXEY. I will give way for that purpose.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. As the committee is about rising——

Mr. RIXEY. I will give way to the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. With the consent of my colleague, I now move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was ready to rule.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia yields to his colleague for that purpose?

Mr. RIXEY. I do.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12122) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6670. An act setting apart a certain tract of land in Oklahoma Territory to the Stella Friends Academy and Church Association; and

H. Res. 307. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to pay certain laborers, workmen, and mechanics at United States navy-yards and naval stations 50 per cent additional for work performed in excess of eight hours per diem.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 5027. An act to correct the relative rank of Richard R. Steedman, captain, Eleventh Infantry, United States Army; and

S. 1964. An act for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Newport News, Va.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 5465. An act authorizing the renewal of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines who served during the war with Spain—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 5446. An act to grant to the Pasadena and Mount Wilson Railway Company right of way and certain lands for railroad purposes through the San Gabriel Forest Reserve—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House is in recess until 8 o'clock this evening, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. LACEY, will please take the chair.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m. by Mr. LACEY as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the rule for Friday-night sessions.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BRUCKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, yes; to hear what the gentleman has to say.

SETH DAVIS.

Mr. BRUCKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, and I ask that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RAY of New York. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know what the bill is. If it is one we have jurisdiction of, I have no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2151) for the relief of Seth Davis, Company E, Fourth Michigan Infantry.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Seth Davis, late a first lieutenant of Company E, Fourth Michigan Infantry (reorganized), and issue to said Seth Davis an honorable discharge from said service, to date April 23, 1866.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Reserving the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not see any point of order, and I do not see any objection to having it considered now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let us have a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the report on that bill, if the committee has reported it. It is to remove a charge of desertion.

Mr. RAY of New York. Would not the gentleman be content to let the report be read?

Mr. BRUCKER. I will put all the evidence and the record from the War Department in the RECORD.

I will state for the information of the House that there is no written report from the Committee on Military Affairs, but I obtained permission of the chairman of the committee to take this bill and bring it up in this way, if the House would give consent.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Is there a report made by the committee?

Mr. BRUCKER. There is not. I will state that very frankly.

Mr. STALLINGS. Has it ever been considered by the committee?

Mr. BRUCKER. It has not. It has only been considered by the subcommittee.

Mr. RIDGELY. Can the gentleman state the facts?

Mr. BRUCKER. I can state the facts very briefly as they appear from the record furnished by the War Department.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Let that be done, then.

Mr. BRUCKER. It shows that Mr. Davis served four years—from 1862 to 1866. He enlisted as a private, being next promoted to second lieutenant, and then to first lieutenant of his company. He was with his command in Texas after the close of the war, having served during the war. He was taken sick, and received leave of absence to go home to Detroit. That was his home and the place where he enlisted. His leave of absence was for forty days. Thinking that his regiment was to be transferred to Detroit and there mustered out, he did not return to the regiment from Detroit to Texas, but remained in Detroit; and when the boys came home he ascertained for the first time that the company had been mustered out in Texas, and for that reason he is recorded as a deserter.

I have the record of the War Department, which will bear out my statement, and I will print it in the RECORD.

The record is as follows:

STATE OF MICHIGAN, County of Saginaw, ss:

Seth Davis, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is a resident of Saginaw, Mich.; that he was enrolled into Company A, of Michigan Provost Guards, in October, 1863, and served therein until the fall of 1864, when he was discharged for promotion to second lieutenant of Company H, Fourth Regiment Michigan Infantry Volunteers, reorganized; that he was again promoted in February, 1865, to the office of first lieutenant of Company E, Fourth Regiment Michigan Infantry Volunteers, in which capacity he served until January 22, 1866.

That during his service in Texas he was sick for a long time, and came near to death; that soon after recovering from said sickness he procured leave of absence, to wit, at San Antonio, Tex., January 22, 1866, for thirty days. At New Orleans he got the time extended ten days; that it was then generally understood among the officers that the regiment would, in all probability, be home before his leave of absence would expire, and the regiment was at that time simply waiting there for orders to go home; that he went home on said leave of absence, expecting to meet the regiment at Detroit, Mich., and be mustered out with the rest of the regiment; that he was advised by Major-General Wright, commanding the Department of the Gulf at the time his leave of absence was extended (the thirty days having about half expired at that time), that the regiment would soon return to Michigan to be mustered out, and that deponent better not return to the regiment until the same reached Detroit.

Said extension of time for ten days was obtained especially to save the necessity of returning to Texas to rejoin the regiment; that deponent acted upon this advice, fully intending and expecting to rejoin the regiment at Detroit; that there was no incentive and no intention so to do; that the regiment was not mustered out as soon as expected, and when it was mustered out it was not at Detroit, but at Houston, Tex. Deponent did go to Detroit, but the comrades came home as private citizens, and there was no chance to rejoin the regiment. The war was over. There was nothing for him to do in service except to draw his pay, which amounted to over $100 per month; that this application is to procure an honorable discharge from the said service, to date from April 23, 1866.

SETH DAVIS.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 2d day of February, 1899.

D. W. LE VALLEY,
Notary Public, Saginaw, Mich.

Case of Seth Davis, late of the Fourth Michigan Infantry.

It is shown by the records that Seth Davis was enrolled November 24, 1863, and mustered into service December 15, 1863, as a private in Captain Robinson's first company (subsequently Company A), Provost Guards, Michigan Infantry, to serve three years. He served in this organization until October 5, 1864, when mustered into service as second lieutenant, Fourth Michigan Infantry, serving in the latter organization as second lieutenant of Companies H and E until February 14, 1866, from which date until May 20, 1866, the date of the muster out of the regiment, he is reported as having been absent without leave.

He was "dishonorably discharged the service of the United States" by direction of the President, in Special Orders, No. 185, dated April 23, 1866, from this department, upon the report of the regimental commander and recommendations of superior officers, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE FOURTH REGIMENT MICHIGAN INFANTRY,
San Antonio, Tex., March 28, 1866.

COLONEL: I have the honor to bring to your notice the following case and would respectfully ask for a decision in the same:

Seth Davis, a first lieutenant of this regiment, received a leave of absence for twenty days on the 15th day of January, 1866, per Special Orders, No. 113, dated Headquarters Department of Texas, December 23, 1865, and upon the recommendation of the department commander was granted an extension of ten days, per Special Orders, Headquarters Military Division of the Gulf, No. 16.

His leave expired on the 14th day of February, 1866, and since that time he has not reported to his regiment or forwarded certificates, and from remarks made by him previous to his departure it is undoubtedly his intention to remain absent. He has been reported absent without leave since February 27, 1866, and I would respectfully ask that authority be given me to drop him from the regimental record as a deserter or that he be dishonorably dismissed the service of the United States. Inclosed please find copy of charges against him.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. W. HALL,
Colonel, Commanding Regiment.

Col. GEO. S. HARTSUFF,
Assistant Adjutant-General, Military Division of the Gulf.

STATE OF MICHIGAN, County of Lapeer, ss:

In matter of the claim of Seth Davis, late first lieutenant of Company E, Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, personally appeared before me the undersigned, duly authorized to administer oaths in and for said county, George H. Henderson, of Lapeer, Mich., who, being duly sworn, said:

I, the affiant, became acquainted with Seth Davis, late a lieutenant of Company E, Fourth Regiment Michigan Infantry, in the fall of 1864; that during his service in Texas he was sick for a long time and came near to death; that soon after recovery from said sickness he was procured leave of absence, to wit, at San Antonio, Tex., on January 22, 1866, for thirty days.

It was then generally understood among the officers that the regiment would in all probability be home before his leave of absence would expire, and the regiment was at times waiting there for orders to go home; that he went home on said leave of absence, expecting to meet the regiment at Detroit, Mich., and be mustered out with the rest of the regiment. The regiment was not mustered out as soon as expected, and when it was mustered out of service it was at Houston, Tex., May 26, 1866. I make the above statement in my own handwriting.

GEORGE H. HENDERSON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 26th day of January, 1899, and I certify that the affiant is well known to me, and that I have no interest, direct or indirect, in the prosecution of this claim.

[Inclosure.]

Charges and specifications against First Lieut. Seth Davis, Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry.

Charge first. Conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman.

Specification first. In this, that the said Seth Davis, a first lieutenant of the Fourth Regiment Michigan Infantry, having obtained a leave of absence, did, when asked by First Sergt. Charles L. Jenny, Fourth Michigan Infantry, to bring him a message from his brother when he returned, say: "By Jesus Christ, I am not coming back at the expiration of my leave; neither shall I resign, as there is no necessity for it if a man works his card right."

All this at the camp of the Fourth Michigan Infantry at San Antonio, Tex., on or about the 10th day of January, 1866.

Specification second. In this that the said Seth Davis, a first lieutenant of the Fourth Regiment Michigan Infantry, having obtained a leave of absence did fail to report at the expiration of said leave either in person or by letter, and has yet failed to report.

This between the 14th day of February and 26th day of March, 1866, at San Antonio, Tex.

Charge second. Desertion.

Specification first. In this that the said Seth Davis, a first lieutenant of the Fourth Regiment Michigan Infantry, having obtained a leave of absence did fail to report at the expiration of said leave either in person or by letter.

This on or about the 14th day of February, 1866, at San Antonio, Tex.

Specification second. In this that the said Seth Davis, a first lieutenant of the Fourth Michigan Infantry, having obtained a leave of absence did fail to report at the expiration of said leave and has remained absent without leave for the period of forty-two days (and is yet absent).

This between the 14th day of February and 28th day of March, 1866.

M. J. VREELAND,
Lieutenant-Colonel Fourth Michigan Infantry.

Witnesses: John W. Spear, captain; William F. Bradley, lieutenant and adjutant; David H. Wood, first lieutenant; Charles L. Jenny, first sergeant, Company H.

In November, 1867, Mr. Davis applied for an honorable discharge from service, declaring under oath, that he had never received a discharge from the Fourth Michigan Infantry, for the following reasons:

"Had been sick for months and left to die, at one time, at Indianola, Tex.; afterwards obtained leave of absence to return home, about February, 1866, and before he returned to the regiment he got word that regiment would be back before he could get back to them, and so he got extension of leave of absence from Major-General Wright, at New Orleans. The regiment was discharged about April, 1866."

Under date of December 3, 1867, the application for an honorable discharge was denied, there being no authority vested in the War Department to revoke, modify, or set aside a duly executed order of dismissal, or to honorably discharge an officer who has been dismissed thereby.

It is proper to add that no record has been found that this officer was under medical treatment subsequent to July, 1865, when he was treated at Indianola, Tex., for remittent fever.

Respectfully submitted.

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Colonel, United States Army, Chief Record and Pension Office.

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. BRUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by adding at the end of the bill the words "Provided, That no pay or other emoluments shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BRUCKER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar under the rule.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, with Mr. CONNOLLY in the chair, for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar under the rule.

CHARLES THOMPSON.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10132) to remove the charge of desertion from the naval record of Charles Thompson.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion standing on the rolls of the U. S. S. Wissahickon against the name of Charles Thompson, of date June 21, 1865, and to issue and transmit to him a discharge as of that date.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the report read.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. DAYTON), as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, having fully considered the bill (H. R. 10132) for the relief of Charles Thompson, report and recommend that said bill do pass.

This bill was formulated by the Secretary of the Navy himself, forwarded to this committee, and introduced by the chairman of the subcommittee on private bills of this committee for the purpose of carrying out the expressed wishes of the Department.

This fact, as also those upon which relief is asked, are fully set forth in the annexed letter, made a part hereof.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 9, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith, for the consideration of the committee, a draft of a bill for the removal of the charge of desertion standing on the rolls of the U. S. S. Wissahickon against the name of Charles Thompson, of date June 21, 1865, and, in view of the fact that Thompson has served in the Navy for a period of nearly thirty-six years, before, during, and since the war of the rebellion, to recommend the same to the favorable consideration of the committee.

If this case had been presented while the act of Congress "to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion," approved August 14, 1888, was in force, the charge of desertion could have been removed under the provisions thereof.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

Hon. CHARLES A. BOUTELLE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there is no merit whatever in this case from the reading of the report. There is nothing going to show that he has not been a deserter. The report goes on to say that if he had applied under the act of 1888, which extended forgiveness for all deserters, he could have been relieved; but he did not do it, and no reason is stated in the report why the charge should be removed.

Mr. RAY of New York. The man never was a deserter within the meaning of the law.

Mr. TALBERT. Never was mustered in?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; but it was a technical matter. Congress long ago passed a law relieving him and all soldiers similarly situated if they applied. Now, this man, through his ignorance, did not apply; so he lost the benefit of that act. The charge of desertion would have been removed and he would have been cleared of the charge if he had been as well informed as to the law as my friend from South Carolina or myself.

Now, why should not a special act be passed to help this man out? This was not a case of actual desertion, but merely technical. I would fight, equally with the gentleman from South Carolina, against the removal of a charge of desertion standing against a man who, after entering the military service, had deserted in order to shirk military duty. I despise a man of that character, and I despise a bill which proposes to relieve such a man. But this is not such a case. The desertion in this case was merely technical.

Mr. JETT. There are a great many cases not reached by the statute that the gentleman has referred to. It is not broad enough.

Mr. RAY of New York. I am aware of that; but this is a case which the statute did reach. Congress, in its wisdom, saw fit to pass the law relieving of this charge all who made application and presented a proper case within a specified time. But this man did not apply, because he did not know of the existence of the law. The case is one of substantial merit.

Mr. TALBERT. Does the bill contain the usual proviso that the beneficiary shall receive no pay or emolument by reason of the passage of the act? If not, I move that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There seems to be no such provision in the bill.

Mr. TALBERT. Then I move that the usual provision, which I have just cited, be added to the bill.

The amendment of Mr. TALBERT was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all bills for the removal of the charge of desertion that may be reached to-night on the Calendar be passed over.

Mr. RAY of New York. I suggest to the gentleman that he add to his request the proviso, unless the member who introduced the bill is present.

Mr. TALBERT. I will agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. TALBERT. I ask unanimous consent that all bills for the removal of charges of desertion which may be reached to-night be passed over unless the member who introduced the bill is present.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now I suggest that we go on regularly; and if any gentleman here has a desertion case he can call it up.

Mr. TALBERT. Would it not be well that by unanimous consent the roll be called, and each member present, as his name is reached, be permitted to designate a bill?

Mr. RAY of New York. If we proceed in regular order, we can clean up all these bills in a short time.

MRS. JENETTE E. ARNOLD.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 10478) granting increase of pension to Mrs. Jenette E. Arnold.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase to the sum of $25 per month the pension of Mrs. Jenette E. Arnold, widow of Solomon Arnold, late of Captain Pope's company of Georgia Volunteers, war of 1812, the same to be in lieu of the pension now drawn by her under certificate No. 10682.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Change the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Jennett E. Arnold."

In line 4 strike out the word "twenty-five" and substitute therefor the word "twenty," so as to fix the rating at $20 per month.

In line 5 strike out "Mrs.," and change the spelling of the claimant's Christian name so as to read "Jennett."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I submit that unless the bill is explained by some member, the report ought to be read; or if it is very long, let enough be read to give members information upon which they may vote intelligently.

Mr. STALLINGS. This is a very short report, and I suggest that it be read.

Mr. TALBERT. I do not make this proposition for the purpose of killing time or anything of that sort.

The report (by Mr. STALLINGS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10478) granting an increase of pension to Jennett E. Arnold, have considered the same and report:

The claimant is the widow of Solomon Arnold, who is shown by the records to have served as a private in Captain Pope's company, Georgia Volunteers, from October 8, 1814, to March 11, 1815, in the war of 1812. Mrs. Arnold is now a pensioner at $12 a month on account of the service of her husband, who died July 19, 1871.

It is shown by the testimony of two credible witnesses that the claimant is now about 88 years of age, infirm and helpless, and without income aside from her pension. She lives with her son-in-law, who is himself in feeble health and straitened financial circumstances. It is further shown that her condition is such as to require the services of a nurse, and that her present pension does not provide her with the ordinary necessities and requirements of life.

Mrs. Arnold resides at Newell, Randolph County, Ala.

There are several precedents for the allowance of an increase of pension to the aged, helpless, and needy widows of soldiers of the war of 1812, and in the light of the facts related above, the passage of the bill is recommended, amended, however, as follows:

Change the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Jennett E. Arnold."

In line 4 strike out the word "twenty-five" and substitute therefor the word "twenty," so as to fix the rating at $20 per month.

In line 5 strike out "Mrs." and change the spelling of the claimant's Christian name so as to read "Jennett."

The question being taken, the amendments reported by the committee were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably.

MRS. ANNIE M. CLEMENS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 2550) granting a pension to Mrs. Annie M. Clemens.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Mrs. Annie M. Clemens, widow of George Clemens, late of Company H, Tenth United States Cavalry, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out the word "Mrs." where it occurs in the title and the body of the bill; also strike out the word "twelve," in line 7, and substitute therefor the word "eight," so as to fix the rate of pension at $8 per month.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. STALLINGS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that request. I drew this report, and I know that the case is right.

Mr. TALBERT. I think the report had better be read; I should like to know something about the case.

The report (by Mr. STALLINGS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2550) granting a pension to Annie M. Clemens, have considered the same and report:

A similar bill was before your committee at the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, and the favorable report made thereon (House Report No. 2486) fully setting forth the facts is adopted by your committee as their report, and the bill is returned with the recommendation that it do pass, amended, however, as follows:

Strike out the word "Mrs." where it occurs in the title and the body of the bill; also strike out the word "twelve" in line 7 and substitute therefor the word "eight," so as to fix the rate of pension at $8 per month.

The claimant's post-office address is No. 2655 Morgan street, St. Louis, Mo.

[House Report No. 2486, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3932) granting a pension to Mrs. Annie M. Clemens, have considered the same and report:

The claimant is the widow of George Clemens, late a private of Company H, Tenth United States Cavalry. He was discharged from the service September 16, 1870, because of blindness originating in the line of duty, and at the time of his death, which occurred January 20, 1891, he was receiving a pension of $72 per month for total blindness.

The widow's application has been rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that epithelioma, the cause of the soldier's death, was not due to the disease of eyes nor otherwise shown to be due to service. An appeal was taken to the Secretary of the Interior, but that official declined to set aside the rejection, it being held that the opinion of the medical referee upon the medical questions involved should be sustained.

The testimony of Dr. H. H. Mudd, a prominent physician of St. Louis, Mo. is as follows:

"That he attended the soldier for epithelioma of orbit and nose in the year 1890 in the months of September, October, November, and December. At the time he commenced observations there was a tumor involving the minor canthus of right eye. The bone was involved so the nose, the frontal sinus, and the orbit right side communicated and were part of diseased mass. The globe of the eye was involved also. He (soldier) had suffered for many, years with neuralgia, pain in, and more or less persistent soreness of the eye.

"The eyes presented evidence of old chronic inflammation and may have accounted for the development of the epithelioma. There is no more positive evidence of the origin of the disease of which he died. It is impossible to show direct origin of such a growth."

The claimant is in feeble health and stands in much need of the pension.

Your committee believe that the doubts in this case may very properly and justly be resolved in the claimant's favor, and the passage of the bill is therefore recommended.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably.

JOHN BIGLEY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 9344) to pension John Bigley, a soldier of the Mexican war.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, directed to place on the pension roll the name of John Bigley, a soldier of the Mexican war, now residing in Camden County, Mo., at the rate of $25 per month, subject to the limitations of the pension laws.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Change the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to John Begley."

Change the spelling of claimant's surname to "Begley."

Strike out all after the word "Begley," in line 4, and substitute therefor the words "late a private of Captain Newman's company, First Tennessee Cavalry, Mexican war, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month, the same to be in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I will make a brief statement, if that will be satisfactory to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. This man is 83 years old, totally dependent, without any means of support except his pension. He also has a wife 63 years old, who is feeble, and there are many precedents for raising the allowance from $12 a month, which they are entitled to under the general law, up to $20.

Mr. TALBERT. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that that is perfectly satisfactory, and I think this House ought to know that.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

LIEUT. JOHN E. GULLETT.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 8329) to increase the pension of Lieut. John E. Gullett.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of John E. Gullett, of Wilcox County, Ala., a lieutenant in the Creek Indian war of 1836, from $8 to $15 per month.

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Pensions, was read:

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to John E. Gullett."

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to have the report read, or some statement made of the case.

Mr. STALLINGS. I will make a brief statement that I think will be perfectly satisfactory to the gentleman from South Carolina. This man is 83 or 84 years of age. He served as a lieutenant in one of the Indian wars—that of 1836, I think. He has no means of support, besides his pension, except between seventy-five and one hundred dollars rent which he receives on a little place. I know the man well myself.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JANE V. DAVIDSON.

The next business was the bill (S. 1831) granting an increase of pension to Jane V. Davidson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane V. Davidson, widow of Edward C. Davidson, late first lieutenant of Captain Caldwell's company, Third Regiment United States Dragoons, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the report in every case be read or that some member make a statement.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I will make a statement in regard to this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] asks unanimous consent that in every case the report be read or that a member explain the necessity for a bill.

Mr. TALBERT. I do not want to get up every time and ask for the reading of the report, but I suggest that the report ought to be read or that somebody make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to pension the widow of a soldier of the Mexican war. The testimony before the committee shows that she is 66 years of age and physically unable to do anything, and without any means of support. The bill simply increases her pension from $8 to $12 per month.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

W. P. SNOWDEN.

The next business was the bill (S. 168) granting an increase of pension to W. P. Snowden.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of W. P. Snowden, late private in Company C, First Missouri Mounted Volunteers, Mexican war, and grant him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. STRODE of Nebraska) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 168) granting a pension to W. P. Snowden, have considered the same and respectfully report as follows:

The bill is accompanied by Senate Report No. 1195, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, and the following facts are taken therefrom:

"The records of the War Department show that this man served in the war with Mexico from June 7, 1846, to June 21, 1847. He was enrolled as a sergeant in Company B, Fifth Iowa Cavalry, September 1, 1861, and after the expiration of his first term of service reenlisted as a veteran volunteer January 1, 1864. He was promoted to veterinary surgeon. Was mustered out with field and staff August 11, 1865.

"January 20, 1884, he filed a claim under the general law for chronic diarrhea and results. This claim was rejected April 29, 1884, on the ground of no disability.

"March 30, 1887, he filed a claim as a Mexican war survivor and was pensioned under the act of January 29, 1887, at $8 per month. August 22, 1890, he applied under the act of June 27, 1890, and was pensioned at $12 for lumbago, disease of left leg, and debility. November 18, 1892, he made application again under the general law and alleged also atrophy of muscles of left leg. In rejecting this claim the following language is used:

"'Reject alleged affection or atrophy of muscles of left leg on the ground that the same was incurred in the Mexican war, not rebellion service, as shown by claimant's statements and the evidence on file.'

"Diarrhea and disease of rectum again rejected on ground of no disability. An issue of $2 per month was made June 1, 1896, for chronic diarrhea and resulting disease of rectum from date of first application, January 26, 1884, to January 28, 1887, date of commencement of pension under act of January 29, 1887.

"He filed and established a claim for restoration to the general law rolls July 2, 1896, and was permitted to elect whether he would take the same rate under old or new laws. He is still drawing under the act of June 27, 1890.

"His examinations report as follows: December 2, 1891, rated four-eighteenths for lumbago, eight-eighteenths for digestive organs, four-eighteenths for atrophy of thigh; July 13, 1892, rated six-eighteenths for age; June 3, 1894, no rates are given. Description of disease of rectum and diarrhea: May 6, 1896, six-eighteenths for chronic diarrhea, four-eighteenths for rectal disease, and four-eighteenths for atrophy left leg and lumbago; December 23, 1896, ten-eighteenths for rheumatism, fourteen-eighteenths for chronic diarrhea and rectum, six-eighteenths atrophy left leg, eight-eighteenths digestive organs, eight-eighteenths debility.

"The claimant is 73 years of age and evidently greatly disabled, the most of his disability being due to service. It is strange that his disease of left leg, which is admitted by the Pension Office as due to service in Mexican war, should not entitle him to more pension. It seems reasonable that this disability should be added to others of service origin, and he should be rated accordingly."

The passage of the bill is respectfully recommended.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN N. CORGAN.

The next business was the bill (S. 730) granting an increase of pension to John N. Corgan, of McPherson, Kans.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John N. Corgan, late of Company G, Fourth United States Infantry, and grant him a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. The report in this case is quite long, and I think I can satisfy the members of the committee in regard to the equity of this bill. This is to increase the pension of John N. Corgan, of Company G, Fourth United States Infantry. He is a pensioner under the general pension law, having been granted a pension first of $8 a month, then raised to $15, then to $18, then to $24, and finally to $30, which he is now receiving. I will read one of the reports of the examining surgeons, which, I think, will satisfy the members of the House in reference to the case.

Examining Surgeon Henry Bell, in his report to the honorable Commissioner of Pensions, under date of September 6, 1876, states:

I find the pensioner has had both feet frozen badly. His right foot was frozen so badly that all the toes of that foot were amputated. The left foot's toes are so badly contracted under his foot that it is necessary for him to wear a pad at the sole in order for him to get along at all. The cicatrices of both feet are very tender. He has to have some one around all the time to do for him, for he can hardly walk, and consequently can do no work where it is necessary to be on the feet. His habits are first class; disability permanent. I think he should be classed under grade first.

The board of examining surgeons at Ellsworth, Kans., make a report to the honorable Commissioner of Pensions, under date of April 20, 1887, showing a marked increase in his disability.

There are several other reports of examining surgeons in that line. He is without any means of support whatever, and therefore the committee felt justified in recommending the increase of pension.

Mr. TALBERT. How did his feet come to be frozen?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Those disabilities were received in the service.

Mr. TALBERT. Clearly traceable to service origin?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Yes.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN S. DRAPER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 10716) to pension John S. Draper.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to place the name of John S. Draper, late a private in the war with Mexico, and subsequently a sergeant in Company E, Third United States Infantry, upon the pension roll, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The committee recommended amending the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to John S. Draper."

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, here is a report on that case.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. A short statement will be sufficient.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I know this man myself, and have known him for a great many years. The records of the War Department show that he was enlisted January 11, 1848, at Nashville, Tenn., for the war with Mexico, and discharged July 16, 1848, by expiration of service, at Newport Barracks, Ky., a recruit, general service, United States Army. Again enlisted November 28, 1849, at Pittsburg, Pa., and was assigned to Company E, Third United States Infantry; discharged November 28, 1854, by expiration of service, at Fort Fillmore, N. Mex., a sergeant.

Mr. Draper filed a claim at the Pension Bureau under the Mexican war service pension act of January 29, 1887, but the same was rejected on the ground that claimant was not in Mexico, on the coasts or frontier thereof, or en route thereto during the war with that nation.

When he got to Nashville his troops were going to Mexico, but he was not sent there, but sent to Newport Barracks. He went into the Regular Army and served for a number of years and behaved most gallantly on the frontier.

Mr. TALBERT. Has he ever applied at the Pension Department?

Mr. SLAYDEN. He is not eligible for a pension because he did not actually go to Mexico. He went to Nashville and from there was transferred.

Mr. TALBERT. He has no pensionable status and yet ought to be pensioned?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; I think so.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Perhaps I can make it a little clearer. The Mexican act grants pensions to those who served in the Mexican war a certain number of days or who were a certain number of days going to and from Mexico. This man enlisted to go to Mexico, but he was ordered by his superior officers to a different post, so that all this bill does practically is to give him the amount to which he is entitled the same as others who enlisted for the Mexican war.

Mr. TALBERT. I will ask the chairman of the committee, was not a rule adopted by which applicants must first apply to the Pension Bureau?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I want to say that this man has applied.

Mr. TALBERT. I understood the gentleman [Mr. SLAYDEN] to say that he had not applied.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. He has applied to the Pension Bureau, but that Department properly rejected his claim, because technically he did not come within the law. He did not serve either in the war or going and coming a certain number of days.

Mr. RAY of New York. It is only a technicality.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Yes; a technicality.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN M'VICAR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 4575) granting an increase of pension to John McVicar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John McVicar, late a private of Company K, One hundred and sixty-ninth Regiment, New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is the case of an old soldier who did service, who has no one on which to depend, and he has no property. He is totally blind, probably of service origin.

Mr. TALBERT. Probably?

Mr. RAY of New York. He can not prove it absolutely. He is pensioned at $12 a month, and because of his poverty and blindness we increase it to $30 a month. The Senate has passed upon the bill, and we concur.

Mr. TALBERT. You say he has no taxable property?

Mr. RAY of New York. He has no taxable property.

Mr. TALBERT. Has his wife any taxable property?

Mr. RAY of New York. No; there is none in the family. He is old and dependent, and did good service; he is a good man, a good citizen, of good character; and we do not report any bill, I want to say to the gentleman, unless the man is of good character, and unless it is to relieve absolute necessity.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I have always commended the chairman of the committee for his strict criticism and investigation of these claims. I believe he has scrutinized every bill, and generally, as I have said, when bills come in here they are meritorious; but I must submit that sometimes his good nature may be imposed upon. He may be deceived along with other members. Now, I asked the gentleman if this man has any taxable property. He says, "None." I asked him if his wife had any taxable property and he says "None."

Well, I have no doubt that is correct, so far as the gentleman's information goes; and I do not know that this man or his wife has any taxable property. But we did pass a claim on last Friday night in which I asked identically the same question, and the gentleman answered honestly, I have no doubt, from all the information he had at that time. But I must submit he must have been very badly deceived, because I understand that that party has taxable property.

Mr. RAY of New York. What claim do you refer to?

Mr. TALBERT. I refer to the claim of General Palmer, of Illinois. We gave him $50 a month. I asked that it be reduced to $30 a month. The committee refused to do that. It was then stated that he was 82 years old, and blind. I asked the question if he had any taxable property, and the gentleman said "not a dollar in the world."

Mr. RAY of New York. I said "unless we had been outrageously lied to." That language is in the RECORD.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, since that time I have taken it upon myself to make particular inquiry, and I have been informed—and I think reliably, too—that this man has a fine plantation in Illinois. In Macoupin County, I think it is, of some three or four hundred acres. I have been informed that it is in the best land in Illinois, and I have been also informed that land of that character goes from $40 to $75 per acre.

Now, I think my informant is reliable; and I have also been informed that in Springfield, in the town in which he lived, some time ago he sold a brick house, for which he got $10,000. And in addition to that, I am informed that his wife pays taxes upon considerable property. Now, these being the facts, if I had had that information I would have been here yet before I would have submitted to his getting $50 a month, because I do not believe he ought to have it. If there was any way in which to get it back now I would take it from him; but the bill has gone to conference, and that is the reason I asked the question in regard to this man.

Mr. RAY of New York. The evidence before the committee in writing and affidavits shows absolutely that General Palmer has no property.

Mr. TALBERT. I am not criticising my friend at all. I have exonerated you, and stated that I believed you stated the matter honestly; that you had got that information; but I believe that you have been deceived.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, I do not know that we were deceived. This property referred to, the only property, is owned by the wife of General Palmer, and it is very small in value. There is no such thing as a plantation and——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is it stated that that property owned by the wife of General Palmer is of small value?

Mr. RAY of New York. That is what I am informed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am informed by credible parties that it draws a revenue of $1,500 a year.

Mr. RAY of New York. This information in reference to this property has come to me since that. I heard the statement that General Palmer had property. By the way, you will permit me here to say that after we had passed the bill at $50 a month the Senate refused to accept that proposition and insisted that it should be retained at $100. They disagreed to our amendment and asked for a conference.

Then I heard these reports as to property, and took some pains to make careful inquiry; and I was then told that the only property in the family was in the name of the wife, and that it was small in value; and this came from gentlemen who know. I have been interceded with by members of this House even to-day—prominent members—saying, "Why not let it go at a hundred?" and I told them we could not do it, and that there is property in the family to some extent, owned by the wife. They then assured me that it was of small value; but, at any rate, we would not consent that the pension should go above $50 a month, for we think that it is all that justice demands. Now, this case is one that comes to us——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the gentleman will permit me at this point, I think if the gentleman's inquiries were carried far enough he will find the property—in the joint name of General Palmer's wife and her sister—draws a revenue of $3,000 a year, making the share of the wife $1,500 of annual revenue.

Mr. RAY of New York. I am not, of course, prepared to deny that, for I do not know. But I will say that we did take pains to investigate.

Now, in this case we have made careful inquiry. There is a gentleman here to-night in whose district this man resides; and I think the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] must know something about this case. We have letters and affidavits in support of the bill. It is a Senate bill; and Senator GALLINGER knows the man and knows the facts of the case. From all these different sources we are assured that this man is in necessitous circumstances. I think we have gone as far in this case as we ought to go.

Gentlemen of the House—all who have had bills before us—know that I have written them many letters asking them to furnish evidence of the financial condition of the claimant before we would report the bill favorably, and they know that when they have come to the committee room and made their oral statements, I have declined to receive such statements, which might be forgotten, and which, if repeated on the floor, I could not back up by any documentary evidence; and I have asked them to reduce their statements to writing and sign them, which they have always done. And where they personally had not the information desired, I have asked them to send home and get the proof.

No gentlemen of this House will deny this statement, although some of them have at times complained that it was a rather arbitrary proceeding on the part of the committee to require them to furnish evidence in this way. But we have done it, and I think it has expedited legislation. I believe this method of proceeding is in the interest of the old soldiers and in the interest of the country. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TALBERT. Again I want to say that I do not criticise the gentleman; I rather commend him; and I am not in opposition to the present claimant. I am willing that this bill should pass just as it is, without a word of objection. I was perfectly willing that General Palmer's bill should pass at $30; but I do not think he ought to have had more. That statement I have made heretofore on this floor, and I now repeat it; but we have passed the pension at that rate, and the case is now out of our reach.

I have only called the attention of the committee to these facts in answer to some unjust criticisms upon myself, such as the statement that I stand here every Friday night asking the reading of reports in order to kill time. I deny it. My object is not to kill time; but I believe these reports ought to be read and ought to be scrutinized and investigated so that we may get all the information we can instead of going along in the dark and passing pension claims because gentlemen cry out "Vote!" "Vote!" It is not my object to kill time, but to get light by fair inquiry and investigation. Gentlemen see now that they went too fast in passing the claim of General Palmer; but that bill has been passed, and I do not see any way in the world to correct our action.

I submit again that these reports ought to be read in every case so that we may act upon proper information.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I merely desire to say as a member of this committee that the course which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] has pursued on this floor has been pursued by me in that committee. Ever since I have been a member of it I have repeatedly asked the question when these bills for increase of pension came before us whether the applicant was in needy circumstances. I have fought in the committee as hard as the gentleman from South Carolina has fought on this floor to secure in every case proper evidence on this point; and so far as I know, not a bill has gone through that committee granting an increase of pension to any man or woman who was not in necessitous circumstances. [Applause.]

I remember very well when the case of General Palmer came up. I have always had the highest respect and admiration for him. The evidence filed with our committee—and members of the committee will bear out the statement of our chairman—the evidence which came over to us from the Senate in support of the bill was that General Palmer was in needy circumstances, although his wife had a little property.

Time and again these applications for increase of pension, from $24 to $30, from $30 to $40, from $40 to $50, from $50 to $72, have come before our committee; and, as a Democrat, I assure my political associates on this side of the House that not one of those cases has gone through the committee where it has appeared that the claimant was the possessor of any considerable property.

I do not desire to stand here as the defender of the chairman of the committee, but I believe in the old adage, "Give even the devil his due;" and I believe we should give the chairman of this committee his due. [Laughter.] He has stood firmly in the committee, asking in every case of this kind, "Is it true that this person is in needy circumstances?"

And our grand old friend from the Green Mountain State [Mr. SULLOWAY], who has ever been the friend of the soldier in that committee, while liberal in the treatment of these cases, has always stood in the committee in favor of finding out whether the claimant was in necessitous circumstances, so that the needy old soldier might receive the benefit of our action, and that we might not vote to still further enrich some wealthy wife or widow. I submit that the members of this committee are entitled to as much respect as any other members on the floor of this House, because we have been so careful in reporting our bills. I am in favor of this measure. That is all I have to say. [Applause.]

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear the statement just made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS]. I believe that this committee has pursued faithfully the course he has described. I want to say again that I am not criticising the committee. But I believe that in the case referred to they were deceived, and I want to prevent the recurrence of any such thing in the future. That is what I am aiming at. I want the committee to look carefully into these cases, and require full and satisfactory information. I will ask any member of this committee whether 400 acres of land in the best part of the State of Illinois is an inconsiderable piece of property?

Mr. DRIGGS. No, sir; I do not intend to say that for a moment; but I do say that in many cases we are absolutely dependent upon the honor and honesty of the gentlemen who send us their statements. If in any case we are deceived, it certainly is not the fault of the chairman or of any member of the committee. We have endeavored in all these cases to do our best.

Mr. TALBERT. I believe you have done your best; and I am willing to say to you now, "Go, and sin no more." [Laughter.]

The question being taken, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably.

JOHN C. EMERY.

The next business was the bill (S. 2101) granting a pension to John C. Emery.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John C. Emery, late assistant surgeon of the Thirteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $20 per month.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

In line 7, after "Infantry," insert "and pay him a pension."
In line 8 strike out "twenty" and insert "twelve."

Mr. RAY of New York. This is a Senate bill. We cut the amount down from $20 to $12. The man is old and he is poor, and we give him $12 a month on account of his services, his old age, and his poverty.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

BEERI SERVISS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 10738) granting an increase of pension to Beeri Serviss.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Beeri Serviss, late a private in Company K, Ninety-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $72 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."
In line 6, after the word "pension," insert the words "at the rate of forty-five."
In line 7 strike out the words "of seventy-two."

Mr. RAY of New York. This bill increases this soldier's pension from $30 to $45 per month. He was a good soldier and performed long and honorable service. He lost his leg in the Army. He is now old, broken down, and poor. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], who came before the committee and made a statement, and we also had abundant written affidavits and proof.

Under the general law a soldier who has a leg amputated so near the body that he can not wear or use an artificial limb is given $45 a month. This man's leg was not amputated so close that he could not wear an artificial limb, but on account of the diseased condition of the stump, which is constantly growing worse, he can not wear an artificial leg. So what there is of the stump is an absolute incumbrance. On that account, and on account of his old age and poverty, we give him $45 a month.

Mr. TALBERT. I will ask the chairman of the committee why it is that this soldier, who is in that awful condition, could not go before the Pension Bureau and get his increase under the law.

Mr. RAY of New York. I have stated the reason. The law is absolute and express that where the leg is amputated so near the body that he can not wear or use an artificial limb he shall have $45 a month, so that every soldier who lost a limb which was amputated so close to the body that he can not wear an artificial limb gets $45 a month, even if the stump is perfectly sound and healthy and he is sound and healthy in every other respect.

Now, this old soldier is worse off than that man. He has been to the Pension Bureau, and within the limits of the law they give him $36 a month, but can not, under the law, consider the diseased condition of the limb, and therefore can not give him $45 a month. So we put him on the same basis as the man he really stands equal with.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ROBERT HUNT.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 11794) granting a pension to Robert Hunt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Robert Hunt, late a private in Company C, Sixty-seventh Illinois Infantry, and Company D, Seventeenth Illinois Cavalry, and pay him a pension of $50 a month.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend the following amendments:

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."
In line 7 strike out the words "of fifty" and insert the words "at the rate of twenty-four."
Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Robert Hunt."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, since we reported this bill this claimant, on account of disease contracted in the service, has died. We can not do him any good, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie upon the table.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do lie upon the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FRANCIS SCOTT.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 8214) to increase the pension of Francis Scott, late a private of Company B, Twenty-third Regiment of Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Francis Scott, late a private in Company B, Twenty-third Regiment of Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, now on the pension roll at the rate of $36 per month, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to receive the same pension as a soldier now receives, or which shall be allowed hereafter by law to one who, while in the line of his duty as a soldier of the United States of America, has lost one arm at the shoulder joint or one leg at the hip joint.

The Committee on Pensions recommended the following amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:
"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Francis Scott, late private, Company B, Twenty-third Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $45 per month in lieu of that he now receives."
Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Francis Scott."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the facts concerning this case are succinctly set forth in the report. This soldier served faithfully in Company B, Twenty-third Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and was shot in battle at Currins Crow Bayou, Louisiana, November 3, 1863, through the upper part of the arm and shoulder, necessitating resection so near the shoulder joint as to render the arm and hand not only absolutely useless, but an incumbrance. Had amputation been resorted to this soldier would get $45 per month. As it was not he gets $36, but the actual disability is the same as that for which $45 is given under the general law. He is old and very poor, and hence as he has no remedy at the Pension Bureau special legislation is eminently proper.

Mr. TALBERT. This case is similar to the one we have just passed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLES W. TILTON.

The next business was the bill (S. 4701) granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Tilton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles W. Tilton, late of Company K, Fourth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. GIBSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4701) granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Tilton, have examined the same and all the evidence relating to the same and respectfully report:

This act proposes to increase, from $17 to $30 per month, the pension of Charles W. Tilton, of Tilton, N. H., who served as second lieutenant Company K, Fourth New Hampshire Infantry, from July 22, 1861, to January 16, 1862, when his resignation, tendered on account of rheumatism, was accepted. He was enrolled in Company C, Ninth New Hampshire Infantry, July 17, 1862, and mustered out December 5, 1862, as first lieutenant, on tender of resignation, which was tendered "for the good of the service." The facts as to the allowance of his pension, increase, etc., are correctly stated in the Senate report.

The certificates of recent examinations do not show that claimant is totally disabled for the performance of any manual labor by reason of pensionable disabilities or of disabilities due to his military service, which condition must be shown to entitle the soldier to $30 per month. He has such disabilities, however, and as the soldier is shown to be in necessitous circumstances the increase is fully justified.

The Senate bill is therefore reported back with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. RAY of New York. I want to add to that that this soldier is blind in one eye and nearly blind in the other.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLOTTE B. COZZENS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6913) to increase the pension of Mrs. Charlotte B. Cozzens.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the pension of Mrs. Charlotte B. Cozzens, widow of First Lieut. Henry H. Cozzens, of the Twenty-first Battery of New York Volunteer Artillery, be, and is hereby, increased from $17 per month to $50 per month.

The following amendments recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:
"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charlotte B. Cozzens, widow of Henry H.

Cozzens, first lieutenant, Twenty-first Battery, New York Volunteer Artillery, and pay her a pension of $25 per month in lieu of that she now receives."

Amend the title so it will read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Charlotte B. Cozzens."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is the widow of an old soldier who served faithfully and long. He died in the service. Four sons went into the service. One was captured and died at Andersonville, and another was wounded in the service and died as the result of those wounds. She is old and poor. She did more for the country than some of the generals who led armies. Now, in her old age and necessitous condition, we give her this pension.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MIANDA A. SANFORD.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 10860) granting a pension to Mianda A. Sanford.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mianda A. Sanford, widow of Ryland M. Harvey, late of Company K, One hundred and sixty-first Regiment New York Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was read:

In line 8 strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twelve."

Mr. RAY of New York. This is a case of a remarried widow. This woman's first husband was a soldier during the war. After he had served over a year he died in the service, of disease there contracted. A pension of $12 per month was granted the widow. After drawing it a few years she found a man she liked, who promised to take care of her, and she married him. She lived with him some fifteen or twenty years, when he died. She is old and poor. We restore the pension. She did everything she could to relieve the Government from the payment of a pension to her, and if some good man would go now and marry her she would not ask for a pension.

Mr. TALBERT. I think she is to be commended, because she saved the Government about fifteen years' payment of the pension while she was married.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

NELLIE M. GUILD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 4374) granting a pension to Nellie M. Guild.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nellie M. Guild, widow of Charles F. Guild, late pay inspector, United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the report read in this case.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I was going to make a statement in regard to this case, instead of having read the long report. This widow was denied a pension at the Bureau upon the technical ground that her husband died from exhaustion as the result of a surgical operation performed upon him in taking care of wounds received in the service. They held at the Bureau that, although the wounds were received in the service and he died of exhaustion succeeding a surgical operation, she was not entitled to a pension. The Senate say, and we say, that if it is not the direct it is the indirect result of his army service, made necessary by it, and she is entitled to the pension that she would otherwise draw.

Mr. TALBERT. What pension is she drawing now?

Mr. RAY of New York. She is drawing none. She is aged, poor, and needs it.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

SERVICE-PENSION BILL.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have printed in the RECORD the service-pension bill introduced by myself on April 10, 1897, together with the written argument submitted in support of the same.

[In the House of Representatives of the United States, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session.]

To the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

In the matter of H. R. 2779, a copy of which is hereto attached.

I have the honor to herewith submit my views and state in part my reasons for believing that said bill should be enacted into law. I respectfully ask your consideration of the following showing:

On April 8, 1897, during the last session of the State legislature of Nebraska, the house unanimously passed a resolution, a copy of which is hereto attached and made a part hereof. Said resolution is in words and figures following:

"Whereas, now that more than thirty years have passed since the close of the war of the rebellion; and

"Whereas a great many of the soldiers and sailors of the war are entitled to pensions but unable to obtain them; and

"Whereas those who do obtain pensions are obliged to subject themselves to examinations and many needless inquiries; and

"Whereas a service pension is just and equitable and would save the Government from the expense of examining boards: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we urge our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use all possible efforts to pass a service-pension bill; and, further,

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the house be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

"The resolution was agreed to by unanimous consent."

The fact that one of the States of the Union having so large a proportion of the survivors of the late war has spoken by one branch of its legislature for Congressional action for a service pension challenges attention. It, of course, is understood that a resolution of one branch of the legislature of the State which a member of Congress has the honor to in part represent requires action, and that the same should receive careful and painstaking consideration by the committee and Congress itself.

Fortunately for me, I am in perfect accord with the sentiment expressed by the legislature of my State, and in response to the resolution have prepared and introduced the pending measure.

It provides that every soldier, sailor, or marine, whether an officer or enlisted man, who was regularly enlisted and honorably discharged from the service of the United States, may receive a pension of $16 per month. No difference is made between officer and private. That difference is essential for the purposes of discipline and conduct of war, but there should be neither discrimination or gradation when tendering the thank offering of a grateful people.

The amount is fixed at $16 per month, which was the monthly pay of a private soldier in time of service.

The act provides that it shall in no manner interfere with any pension now received by a pensioner except to raise those receiving less than $16 to that amount. Neither does it interfere with any right of increase or rerating.

There is a very general feeling among ex-soldiers that in addition to present legislation, which is based upon the theories of pensioning for injuries received during service and inability to earn a living by manual labor, they are entitled to compensation for the opportunities lost by offering the best years of their life for the preservation of the nation. Such a measure would give relief to a large class who are unable to comply with the technical requirements of present laws and who, having an equitable case, are unable to establish it by reason of the lapse of time and death of officers and comrades.

It would be but simple justice to enact a law recognizing this additional item in the great debt of gratitude which has never as yet been audited and allowed to the defenders of our property and people. During an epoch in American history, when large fortunes were amassed by those who remained safely at home, these men, from motives of patriotism, surrendered their business prospects and ambitions and submitted their lives to the hazard of battle for the sake of the common welfare, and they feel that they deserve recognition for their services, as well as payment on account of poverty, wounds, and injuries, at the hands of the Government for which the sacrifices were made.

The bill provides that the only evidence required shall be the rolls and an honorable discharge, and the Department shall formulate rules for the identification of the applicants, and as an emergency exists, provision is made to increase the clerical force so that there may be a speedy adjudication of the rights of the applicants for this pension, finally resulting in a great saving in that department of the Government.

There is a further provision affecting the rights of widows and orphans.

At this place the practical question arises, from what source will the money be derived to pay these increased pensions? And it seems to me to be the part of wisdom instead of making an additional demand upon our revenues under present conditions to follow the precedent established in the early part of our civil war—to issue demand notes, which are in effect noninterest-bearing obligations of the United States having the legal-tender function which constitutes money, and behind it as a guaranty the wealth of this nation—over two and a half billion acres of land, with all the cities, villages, and property of our country, and all the genius, energy, rustle, and capacity of 75,000,000 people—said notes to be redeemable at any time after five years from the date of issue at the option of the Government; and it is provided that they shall be receivable at their nominal value in full payment for all taxes, internal-revenue duties, excises, duties on imports, amounts due on sale of public land, debts and demands of every kind due to the United States of America.

This is an application of the law of set-off, that has existed in the common law of England time out of mind, and is the "law of the land" because it is not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States or with any law passed by Congress. There is a way to redeem legal-tender notes other than by exchanging gold or silver coin for them, and that is by set-off, by standing ready to receive the notes in payment of all taxes, internal-revenue duties, excises, duties on imports, debts and demands of every kind due to the United States of America.

Set-off signifies the subtraction or taking away of one demand from another opposite or cross demand, so as to extinguish the smaller demand and reduce the greater by the amount of the less; or, if the opposite demands are equal, to extinguish both. It was also formerly sometimes called "stoppage," because the amount sought to be set-off was stopped or deducted from the cross demand. (Waterman on Set-off, Recoupment, and Counter Claims, section 1.)

There is no act of Congress regulating set-off in suits brought by the Government. There are, however, various acts, such as the third and fourth sections of the act of March 3, 1797 (c), and others which imply that set-off may be allowed. (Waterman on Set-off, Recoupment, and Counter Claim, section 34; First Kent's Commentaries, ninth edition, page 325, note, and cases cited.)

My district is full of sleek, well-fed, contented Alderneys, Jerseys, and Holstein cows that give down pails of rich milk, which, after setting in the cooling tank, sends up many degrees of cream ready for the power churn. Now, while this has been going on, the "mortgage lifters," as our people call them, the Plymouth Rocks, Langshans, and Buff Cochins, have been making their contribution of fresh-laid eggs.

At the noon hour father and the boys come in from the field, stop at the tank and wash off the dust, sit down to the table under the trees, ask a simple blessing, and while they eat their hearty meal talk about the national, State, and their own affairs, and finally conclude that mother and the girls will go to town with the butter and eggs. So one of the boys takes the salt box and "catches up" the road team, another boy pulls out of its shed the "runabout," with its canopy top and curtains, for all is done for the comfort of the Western woman possible, as she always does her part with good cheer—no nagging or complaining. The team is hitched up, the jars of butter are wrapped in wet blankets, the eggs are packed in oats, and all is ready.

If you like a horse, you will have noticed that the team has kindly eyes, thin ears, wide nostrils, short back, flat legs, and feet that never knew a shoe. You can see in their form the strain of Hambletonian or Justin Morgan. There is a chirrup and they are away for town, clipping it off at 10 miles an hour over the black, smooth prairie roads of Nebraska.

At the town the merchant hurries out, greets them kindly, unloads the butter and eggs, ties the team—for I have noticed that the successful Western merchant is always a gentleman—names the going price for butter and eggs, weighs and counts, and gives the proper credit in his daybook; then the lady trades for what she wants and the balance is either paid in money or stands to her credit. This is not barter. It is a business transaction arising on a contract, that of payment for the butter and eggs, and the value of the goods which were purchased are set off against the merchant's liability.

It is barter pure and simple when men swap horses at the roadside. The same principle that obtained in the butter and egg transaction applies in our relations with the Government; there are always debts due to it and they may be satisfied by paying money or turning in a set-off.

To illustrate: On February 14, 1896, the Government receipts were as follows, viz:

Customs	$230,020.79
Internal revenue	816,787.64
Miscellaneous	15,927.51
Total receipts	1,092,735.94

The pension money provided in this act could be used by way of set-off to pay in part some of these debts and demands due the United States, and could be redeemed and paid in that way; under the option of the Government, after five years from the date of its issue, it may redeem the notes in gold or silver coin, and being issued every three months, no such amount could be presented at any one time as to deprive the Government of ample funds to meet other obligations.

The United States Supreme Court decided in Bank vs. Supervisors, 7 Wallace, page 26, "The dollar note is an engagement to pay a dollar, and the dollar intended is the coined dollar of the United States; a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold or silver authenticated as such by the stamp of the Government."

Because of that decision it would seem to be the part of a conservative Representative to make a time limit of at least five years before the Government could be required to redeem in coin, in order that provision could be made by law, for silver to enjoy the same coinage privileges as gold at the "standard value of July 14, 1870," so that it might be employed in part to pay off the great bonded indebtedness as well as other obligations of the Government.

To my mind it would not be prudent to provide at this time for any issue of paper money redeemable in coin on demand until we have the coinage of silver and gold, and at the ratio that obtained at the time said decision was made, thereby coming within the letter and spirit of the decision quoted above.

I indulge in the hope that within the next five years the good people of this land will have thought it out, and through their representatives caused it to be so written on the statute books of our Government.

It is further provided that it shall be in denominations of three and four dollar bills. The object of the provision at the time of preparing the bill was to make a peculiarity in the notes to call the attention of the holder to the kind of money, but subsequent reflection has convinced me that the same is not so important as first thought, and no objection would be made to changing the denominations.

Another provision of the act is for the information of the general public as to how much money has been issued.

A practical question constantly arises as to the amount to be issued to meet the requirements of this bill.

On July 21, 1897, I received a letter from the Hon. H. Clay Evans, a copy of which is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS, OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER,
Washington, July 21, 1897.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your request for information as to the probable increase in the number of pensioners, and increase of appropriations resulting from the passage of bill (H. R. 2779) granting a service pension of $16 per month, and the time when theoretically there will be no more pensioners of the civil war, I have the honor to state that any estimates made along the lines indicated are necessarily uncertain and can only approximate the actual results. (Based upon report of this Bureau for fiscal year 1896, to bring all pensioners below $16 up to that amount it would require $67,576,980 additional annual appropriation.)

The estimate made by the War Department shows that on June 30, 1897, there will be 1,095,628 survivors of the war of the rebellion (excluding deserters). There are now 735,176 invalid pensioners on the rolls, including those who are pensioned for causes arising since the war of the rebellion. The increase in the number of pensioners, including widows, would probably approximate a half million under the provisions of the bill in question. Of the 949,000 pensioners on the rolls, about 113,000 receive $16 per month or more. The number of persons who are now pensioned for causes arising since the close of the war of the rebellion can not be ascertained, and it is equally impracticable to state the amount of increase in the appropriations necessary to pay the pensions. It is safe to say, however, that the annual appropriation would be more than twice what it is now.

In reply to the third question I will state that in an estimate made by the War Department in April, 1896, it is believed that after 1945 there will be no survivors of the war of the rebellion. The time when there will be no more widow pensioners of the said war is too uncertain to permit an approximation.

Very respectfully, H. CLAY EVANS,
Commissioner.

Hon. W. L. STARK,
House of Representatives.

[The estimate made by the honorable commissioner was on the basis of a $16 rating, which, if deemed too great, could be reduced.]

Since that time I have made diligent effort to compute the amount, but as I have no access to such reliable data as a committee could have, by taking testimony and making computations upon the same, I leave that matter with you, calling your attention to the fact that the regular insurance expectancy for an average age of 60 years is fourteen years; for an average age of 65 years is eleven years. The last survivor of the Revolutionary war was Daniel F. Blakeman, who died April 5, 1869, at Freedom, Cattaraugus County, N. Y., aged 105 years.

Of course, it must always be taken into consideration that the amount would decrease very rapidly, from the fact that so many of the veterans are constantly passing away.

I suppose the burden is upon me to show if possible a historical precedent for the proposed legislation. It gives me great pleasure to be able to point with pride to Congressional action by our own country.

On August 26, 1776, the next month after the adoption of the Declaration of Independence, the old Congress passed resolutions promising pensions to soldiers and seamen who might be disabled in the war. Thus, at what were practically the first real military operations of this Government, was recognized the fact that the granting of pensions is an act of justice, gratitude, and humanity to those men who have sacrificed themselves and their opportunities in the service of their country.

Originally pensions were granted and paid by the State, but in September, 1789, Congress enacted a law and provided that the military pensions, which had been granted and paid by the States, should be continued and paid by the United States. This provision was continued by the act of June 16, 1790.

The act of March 18, 1818, provided that every officer, noncommissioned officer, musician, marine, private soldier, etc., who served in the war of the Revolution for a period of nine months or longer, who, by "reason of his reduced circumstances in life, was or should be in need of assistance of his country for support," should receive a pension from the United States.

Pensions are a stated stipend for services already rendered. The act of 1818 was intended only to provide for indigent or unfortunate people, and of this act our present law of June 27, 1890, is, in its practical workings, a copy as to the rights of soldiers' widows. In 1828 our fathers, realizing more fully the services rendered by those who bore the heat and burden of battle, passed the act granting a pension of full pay for life to all survivors of the Revolutionary war. The act is as follows:

An act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the army of the Revolution.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That each of the surviving officers of the army of the Revolution in the Continental Line who was entitled to half pay by the resolve of October 21, 1780, be authorized to receive, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount of his full pay in said line, according to his rank in the line, to begin on the 3d day of March, 1826, and to continue during his natural life: Provided, That under this act no officer shall be entitled to receive a larger sum than the full pay of a captain in said line.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever any of said officers has received money of the United States, as a pensioner, since the 3d day of March, 1826, aforesaid, the sum so received shall be deducted from what said officer would otherwise be entitled to under the first section of this act; and every pension to which said officer is now entitled shall cease after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every surviving noncommissioned officer, musician, or private in said army who enlisted therein for and during the war and continued in service until its termination, and thereby became entitled to receive a reward of $80, under a resolve of Congress passed May 15, 1778, shall be entitled to receive his full monthly pay in said service, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to begin on the 3d day of March, 1826, and to continue during his natural life: Provided, That no noncommissioned officer, musician, or private in said army who is now on the pension list of the United States shall be entitled to the benefits of this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the pay allowed by this act shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be paid to the officer or soldier entitled thereto, or their authorized attorney, at such places and days as said Secretary may direct; and that no foreign officer shall be entitled to said pay, nor shall any officer or soldier receive the same until he furnish to said Secretary satisfactory evidence that he is entitled to the same, in conformity to the provisions of this act; and the pay allowed by this act shall not, in any way, be transferable or liable to attachment, levy, or seizure, by any legal process whatever, but shall inure wholly to the personal benefit of the officer or soldier entitled to the same by this act.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That so much of said pay as accrued by the provisions of this act before the 3d day of March, 1828, shall be paid to the officers and soldiers entitled to the same as soon as may be in the manner and under the provisions before mentioned; and the pay which shall accrue after said day shall be paid semiannually in like manner and under the same provision.

Approved May 15, 1828.

The resolution on the part of the Nebraska legislature means that the time has come when this nation should adopt the policy of the act of 1828, to grant a reasonable pension, and that speedily, to the surviving veterans of the civil war.

The fathers saw the manifest injustice of the act of 1818 and took a step in advance. The Nebraska legislature notes that a great many of the soldiers and sailors of the war are entitled to pensions but are unable to obtain them, and so they ask that we take the same step as was taken for the continental soldiers.

A pension is not a gratuity, but a thank offering for services rendered. The act of 1818 endured upon the statute book for ten years.

The act of June 27, 1890, recites that all persons who served ninety days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now, or who may hereafter be, suffering from a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support, shall upon making due proof of the fact, according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the pension roll and be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month, and not less than $6 per month, proportionate to the degree of inability to earn a support.

This provision has been upon the statute book for nearly eight (now nine) years, and there ought to be an advance to the same high ground as heretofore taken by the Congress of the United States.

Respectfully submitted.

W. L. STARK.

[H. R. 2779, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session.]

In the House of Representatives, April 10, 1897.—Mr. STARK introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions and ordered to be printed.

A bill granting a service pension to soldiers, sailors, marines, and their widows and orphans, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every soldier, sailor, or marine, whether an officer or an enlisted man, who enlisted and was sworn into the military, naval, or marine service of the United States in the war for the suppression of the rebellion, and who was honorably discharged therefrom, shall, from and after the passage of this act, receive a service pension of $16 per month: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall in no manner interfere with any pension now being received by a pensioner, except to raise the same to the sum of $16 per month where a less sum is now being received; nor shall it in any manner interfere with the right to an increase, rerating of a pension, or other right now enjoyed under the pension laws in force.

SEC. 2. That the Army, Navy, and Marine Service rolls and an honorable discharge shall be the only evidence required to entitle any soldier, sailor, or marine to the pension granted by this act; and the Commissioner of Pensions is hereby directed to formulate such rules for the identification of such soldiers, sailors, or marines as may be necessary; and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior are hereby authorized and directed to increase their clerical force necessary to the end that in one year from the passage of this act every soldier, sailor, or marine entitled to a pension under the provisions of this act shall be in receipt of the same; and the money necessary to pay such additional clerical force is hereby appropriated out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That in the event of the death of any soldier, sailor, or marine who is drawing or who has drawn a pension under the provisions of this act or under the provisions of any other law or laws of the United States, no matter what the cause of death may be, the widow of such soldier, sailor, or marine, while she remains such widow, shall be entitled to a widow's pension of $16 per month; and any minor child or children of any dead soldier, sailor, or marine, who, if living, would be entitled to a pension under the provisions of this act or any other law or laws now enforced, shall be allowed the sum of $5 per month each until each child or children shall have attained the age of 16 years.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be issued quarterly full legal-tender paper money of the United States of America, which shall be receivable at its nominal value in full payment for all taxes, internal-revenue duties, excises, duties on imports, amounts due on sale of public lands, debts and demands of every kind due to the United States of America, and be redeemable at any time after five years from the date of its issue, at the option of the Government, in sufficient quantity to pay the amounts due under the provisions of this act and in denominations of three and four dollar bills in equal amounts; and all pension payments under the provisions of this act shall be made in these bills to pensioners, and said money shall be reissued whenever and as often as it may become the property of the United States of America, until redeemed under the provisions of this act; and all penalties for counterfeiting and all provisions of law for the renewal of any mutilated or worn-out United States of America paper money shall apply to the pension money hereby created.

SEC. 5. That in all official statements and publications of the Treasury Department of the United States of America showing the amounts of gold and silver coins and certificates, United States notes, and national-bank notes in circulation the various amounts issued under this act shall be designated as "Pension money."

Mr. BOTKIN. Mr. Chairman, the survivors of our heroic Army and Navy, whose valor on land and sea a third of a century ago won imperishable fame and saved to posterity the greatest and best government ever established on earth, are growing old. The wounds received on the field of battle and the diseases and infirmities inherited from exposures in camp and on the march have rendered countless thousands of them incapable of earning a living by toil. Multitudes of these veterans, through no fault of their own, are to-day in poverty. They are dying at the rate of thirty or forty thousand per annum. We shall have them with us but a little time.

While they linger they deserve the best this Government can give. An honorable member of this House from one of the Southern States, a gentleman who served four years in the Confederate army, said to me recently that "the proposition to pension the men who once sought to destroy this Union is preposterous, but a government that fails to grant liberal pensions to its defenders has no right to live." This sentiment, coming as it does from an extreme Southern man who belongs to that party which has hitherto been supposed to be against a liberal pension policy, will find an echo in thousands of loyal hearts throughout the North.

I now desire to call attention to a rule or practice of the honorable chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee, which I think works an injustice to thousands of the most needy and deserving old soldiers. Early in the second session of this Congress the chairman sent out circular letters to the members requesting each to send one or two names of the most needy and deserving soldiers for whom he had introduced private pension bills. From that time until the present it has been the practice, I think, to grant each member his turn at the House pension mill.

Doubtless a few members have had less than their share of bills reported by the committee, while others have had more than their share, but the evident purpose has been to distribute these favors somewhat equally among the members of Congress. The injustice of this practice will be seen in a moment upon reflection that there are members who represent ten times, perhaps fifty times, as many old soldiers as other members represent. Again, the old soldiers in some States are in much greater financial distress than they are in others.

It is generally understood that Kansas contains more old soldiers in proportion to its population than any other State in the Union. There are States having as many Congressmen as Kansas that have not one-tenth as many ex-soldiers. If pensions are to be distributed among Congressmen as personal compliments, or to assist them in making records for campaign purposes, the prevailing practice is all right. But if the policy of this Government is to grant pensions to old soldiers according to their needs and deserts, then the man who represents 10,000 old soldiers should have ten times as many bills reported favorably by our committee as that other Congressman who represents but 1,000 soldiers, assuming that the physical and financial conditions of these soldiers are the same.

It will be remembered that Kansas has been chiefly settled since the war. Thousands of men returning from the Army, finding their former places occupied by others and having acquired from army life a sort of roving and adventurous disposition, went West to grow up with the country. Kansas, with her broad and fertile acres and with her glorious record in the cause of freedom, held out special attractions to these men.

As a result, we have as above stated the largest percentage of old soldiers in our population. Most of them are farmers and have performed heroic service in developing that grand agricultural State. But owing to successive crop failures in recent years, the exceedingly low prices for agricultural products, and the general depression in values, commonly called "hard times," multitudes of Western farmers, including thousands of old soldiers, have lost their all. These veterans are above 50 years of age, and, as a rule, when a man of that age loses his property and his home he is never able to recoup himself.

Thousands of these men, broken in health and in fortune, discouraged and sore, with no income but a pittance of six, eight, or twelve dollars per month pension, justly feel that this "wealthiest Government on earth" they offered their lives to protect and perpetuate should now help them in their extreme necessities. I have been impelled to this reflection by the recent action of the Invalid Pensions Committee, to which I have the honor to belong, in reporting favorably a bill to increase a soldier's pension from $36 per month to $45 per month.

This soldier lived in a State quite a distance east of Kansas, a State whose people have not suffered in recent years as others have. This soldier's disability arises from the fact that a section of the bone above the elbow in one arm is entirely gone, as a result of a wound received in battle, rendering the arm entirely useless. I did not vote against a favorable report upon this case for the reason that I believe he deserves the increase. Besides, the Representative who introduced the bill urged its favorable report on the ground that he lacked one of having his full share of bills favorably reported.

But, Mr. Chairman, in comparison with thousands of other cases appealing to this Congress for relief, that man did not deserve an increase. I myself have introduced about fifty bills granting pensions and increase of pensions to soldiers and soldiers' widows. I believe that in every case the physical disabilities fully equal the loss of an arm, and in many of these cases they equal the loss of both arms.

Some of these old veterans, being totally incapacitated for labor of any sort and being a burden upon their families, have taken refuge in Soldiers' Homes, leaving their families to shift for themselves. Others of them are being assisted by their neighbors, and possibly others by the county in which they live. Not one of them would have thought of asking for an increase of pension by act of Congress or otherwise if he had been receiving $36 a month. I insist that these Congressional favors should be distributed according to the number and needs of the old soldiers and soldiers' widows, and not as so many compliments to be equally apportioned among the members of this House.

Mr. Chairman, there are strong indications that the old cry, "Purge the pension rolls," is to be renewed. All advocates of liberal pensions should carefully note the source of this demand. It does not come from "rebel brigadiers," of whom we have heard so much in past years. This periodical demand is being made by some of the leading Administration papers of this country. These papers are the organs of that party that has hitherto assumed a monopoly of love and friendship for the old soldiers.

Last Sunday's Washington Post contained an editorial on "Coast defenses and pensions," in which it quotes extensively from a recent editorial in the Chicago Tribune. The latter paper pleads for large expenditures of money for coast defenses and military establishments and operations, and proposes that the veterans who fought the battles of the Union in 1861 to 1865, and their widows and orphans, shall pay the bills. It says:

> If the public does not want to stand the extra taxation, let it order its demagogues to cut down, revise, and reform the wasteful pension law, which is squandering the people's money.

As the Republican party is in control of this Congress, and therefore has the sole power to "cut down, revise, and reform the wasteful pension law," it follows that Republican members are the "demagogues" the Tribune had in mind. This most serious charge brought by the great Chicago daily against its political friends I shall not at this time attempt to refute.

Again the Tribune says:

> There is an abundance of money to be saved by a just and searching revision of the pension rolls without doing any wrong or injustice to a single deserving pensioner. There is enough money being squandered annually on undeserved pensions to put and keep all our seaports in a state of ample defense and complete protection.
>
> The Regular Army could at the same time be recruited up to the new 100,000 maximum and paid an increased wage for colonial garrison work simply out of the present wastage that is going on to please demagogues and to enrich claim agents. Let this ruinous leakage be cut off and turned into national defenses, and the next war alarm will not find us as unprepared as the last one did.

To this the Post adds these significant words:

There can be no reasonable doubt that, under the act of 1890, there has been an unjustifiable expansion of the pension roll. There is as little reason to doubt that a similar wrong has been committed by Congress in passing special pension bills in cases that ought to have been rejected.

The charge that money is being squandered for pensions under any existing law, or that under the law of 1890 "there has been an unjustifiable expansion of the pension roll," or that Congress has been profligate in passing special pension bills will have no weight with men who believe in just pensions and who are acquainted with the policy of the present Administration as it is seen both in the Pension Bureau and in Congress.

The conduct of the Bureau by the present Commissioner of Pensions needs no elucidation. All old soldiers and their friends are thoroughly informed upon that subject. They know that if it was proper to charge the illiberal pension policy of the last Administration to President Cleveland and his Secretary of the Interior, Hoke Smith, it is equally proper to charge the still more illiberal policy of the present Administration to President McKinley and his Secretary of the Interior, Cornelius N. Bliss.

It is perfectly apparent to all that the President has the power to heed the righteous demand of the Grand Army of the Republic for the removal of the Commissioner of Pensions or the correction of the pension policy of the Administration. That he has done neither is positive evidence that he approves the present policy of the Pension Bureau and prefers the friendship of the men who demand such a policy to the friendship of the old soldiers of this nation.

To show that in Congress and its committees, as well as in the Pension Bureau, the present Administration is and has been from the beginning disposed to heed the demands of a subsidized press, owned and controlled by the great syndicate interests of the country, for retrenchment in pension expenditures, I only need to mention a few facts:

First. The Speaker of the House refused to appoint the committees during the extra session, thus permitting four and a half months to pass in comparative idleness without a single act for the relief of war veterans.

Second. The chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee did not call the committee together for work in the second session until about the middle of January, 1898, thus wasting more than a month of valuable time.

Third. He did not call the committee together this winter until after the middle of January, thus wasting another month.

Fourth. During this term we have been in actual session about fourteen months. The rules require us to hold a pension session every Friday night. But we have held just nineteen such sessions, including to-night, in the interest of war veterans and their widows and orphans. The records show that in almost every case the motion to adjourn over Friday night was made by a Republican leader and was supported by a solid Republican vote, many gentlemen doubtless voting against their convictions and feelings out of loyalty to their party leaders.

As a result of this do-nothing policy in the House and in its committee, only a few hundred special pension bills have been passed out of the many thousands of meritorious ones introduced.

The claim is set up that, notwithstanding our tariff policy, our heavy war tax, and our bond issue, the expenditures of the Government are far in excess of its receipts, and therefore we must retrench. This is all sadly true; but in opposition to the Chicago Tribune and the apparent policy of the present Administration I solemnly aver that this Government would better provide liberally for the necessities of those whose sacrifice and valor a third of a century ago rescued it from threatened destruction than to ignore the righteous claims of these veterans and squander the people's money in the establishment and support of a powerful standing army for purposes of territorial conquest, and for the suppression and oppression of 10,000,000 of people on the other side of the globe who are struggling, as our forefathers did, for freedom and independence.

I now desire, Mr. Chairman, to present as a part of my remarks a few excerpts from an open letter and also from a signed statement written by an honorable gentleman of Vermont whose relations, political and otherwise, entitle him to speak upon this subject. Mr. Deavitt, the gentleman referred to, is president of the Capital Savings Bank and Trust Company, of Montpelier, a prominent lawyer, an old soldier, and a life-long Republican. He is vouched for by prominent officials of his State as a gentleman of high character. Following is the letter:

MONTPELIER, VT., September 8, 1897.

DEAR SIR: My answer to inquiries of anxious veterans to know what effect the change of Administration has had on pensions is a disappointment to those who had a right to expect in the new both a friendly and a do-something administration.

If there has been any improvement in the granting of pensions the first six months of President McKinley's Administration over the maladministration of President Cleveland, it is too slight to mention.

The great increase of applications for pensions by Union veterans who manifested a lively interest in the election of Comrade McKinley to his high office, with fond hopes of his immediate correction of pension abuses, has renewed activity in the Bureau of Pensions and in the pension boards of examining surgeons, while the pensions granted have been like angels' visits—few and far between.

In the domination of his desire to break the solid South politically, President McKinley, in his inaugural address, departed from the time-honored custom of Republican Presidents to make appreciative mention of the service of Union soldiers in the war of the rebellion and suggestion as to pensions, and made no mention of either Union soldiers or pensions, winning at once the approval of pension-hating newspapers of the South for thus silently and negatively approving the anti-pension policy of President Cleveland, a policy never before known in the American Government.

A policy when viewed in the light of the liberal pension laws enacted by both the great political parties, unrepealed on the statutes of the United States, is tyrannical, with suffering, sorrow, and death in its results, so wicked that God took Cleveland and scattered him; and when he left the President's Mansion at the end of his term of office he had no home or party to return to, his wife and children going one way and he another, with the people proclaiming "good riddance."

President McKinley has nowhere uttered one word in rebuke of that policy.

Yours, very truly,

T. J. DEAVITT.

Hon. J. M. THURSTON,
United States Senate.

It is said that Mr. Deavitt has prosecuted more pension claims than any other attorney in New England, and he is a recognized authority on pension laws. He declares that it is not pleasant for an attorney to criticise the court before whom he has practiced on friendly personal relations with all the officials of the Bureau of Pensions for more than twenty-five years, but he deems it his duty to make the following statement, which he published a few weeks ago:

THE MALADMINISTRATION OF PENSIONS.

There seems appropriateness in the Department of Vermont of the Grand Army of the Republic planning to hold its next encampment meeting in Canada, since the Union soldiers have been betrayed by the President of the United States.

The New York Independent contains an article from Mr. Kniffin, chief of division, Bureau of Pensions, that says "more claims might be adjudicated but for the custom of Congressmen calling for the status of claims filed by their constituents. Such calls reached 200,000 last year. During the session of Congress the time of three-fourths of the examiners is occupied in replying to calls of this character. It is safe to say," continues Mr. Kniffin, "that nearly double the number of claims might be disposed of but for this useless expenditure of time."

The cause for such a remarkable interference by Congressmen with the work of the Bureau of Pensions, not stated by Mr. Kniffin, is either the inability of the officials of that Bureau to do its work, or a willful neglect of duty to withhold from aged, respected, and patriotic American citizens the pensions the law gives them. There would be no necessity for Congressmen inquiring after pension claims but for the well-nigh criminal neglect of the Bureau of Pensions to adjudicate such claims and to answer courteous inquiries from claimants and their attorneys.

It is not unusual for the Bureau of Pensions to refuse for a year or more to answer any inquiry from an applicant or his attorney relating to his claim, and the only way available to obtain information is through a friendly Congressman, who meekly submits to the requirements of the Bureau of Pensions to sign a statement that the applicant resides in his Congressional district and that the inquiry did not come from an attorney.

When E. J. Phelps, a Vermont lawyer, was minister to England, he told our British cousins that defeated suitors in America could do one of two things—take an appeal, or go to the tavern and damn the court that beat them. The latter course is about the only one left a defeated applicant for an invalid pension. If he takes the so-called appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, the medical referee of the Bureau of Pensions, who first passed on his right to a pension and who usurps the authority given by law to the examining boards to rate pensions, is the presiding judge in the appellate court, where the Secretary of the Interior acts only as clerk in writing the dismissal of the appeals.

Prior to March 4, 1893, when Grover Cleveland became President of the United States the second time, Congress had appropriated, on a conservative estimate, with a fair execution of the pension laws, $165,000,000 for the payment of pensions for the year ending June 30, 1894. The President's opposition to pensions, displayed in his first term in office with eager energy in vetoing pension bills, now appeared in his regular messages to Congress and in his determination to select men in accord with himself to execute the pension laws; so he appointed Hoke Smith Secretary of the Interior, and William Lochran Commissioner of Pensions.

The anti-pension policy was promptly inaugurated for the first time in America. The 600,000 applications for pensions then waiting action, 200,000 of which were ready for certificates to issue, were rejected or neglected, and the clerical force of the Bureau of Pensions set to reviewing the granted pensions of former administrations, cutting down and cutting off pensions. It was soon announced from that Bureau that the high-water mark in the payment of pensions had been reached and was decreasing $1,500,000 a month, and at the end of the first year there remained more than $25,000,000 that Congress had appropriated for the payment of pensions unexpended.

The withholding of these millions that went to the extremities of the nation, the rural sections, to fields of labor and shops of toil, where a dollar went a great way in supplying the necessaries of life, caused distress among the people by taking away a stipend of support. It filled the Soldiers' Homes and the county poorhouses with soldiers and paupers as they had never been filled before. This anti-pension policy was condemned by veterans, by Republicans, by Democrats, by Congress that enacted the pension laws that were being ignored, and by the people as much as it could be condemned in a Presidential election where other questions were involved.

The advocates of Major McKinley's election denounced the existing anti-pension policy and declared that he, an old soldier himself, was friendly to a fair execution of the pension laws enacted by both of the great political parties. The veterans, the majority of whom had voted for every successful candidate for President since the war, voted with alacrity for Major McKinley, who has been a sore disappointment to Grand Army of the Republic men in continuing the anti-pension policy with increased pressure on the needy veterans and their widows. He appointed a Wall street banker who was opposed to pensions Secretary of the Interior.

He appointed H. Clay Evans, a Southern politician with no special knowledge of the pension laws, Commissioner of Pensions. He removed the Democratic physicians and surgeons on the examining boards of pensions and filled their places with Republicans, a political maneuver of the peanut order, unworthy a statesman; for there is no difference between a Democratic surgeon and a Republican surgeon in a matter of business like examining an applicant for a pension under private and confidential instructions from the Bureau of Pensions.

With more than 500,000 applicants who had "waited long" and were "waiting still" when President McKinley came into power, with new applications pouring into the Bureau of Pensions at the rate of 40,000 a month from veterans who had withheld their applications from the unfriendly Administration of President Cleveland, the new Commissioner of Pensions discharged 180 clerks from the Bureau of Pensions and disbarred, for trivial causes, more than 800 attorneys from practice before that Bureau, some of whom are men of high standing in the community in which they live.

With the appropriation for the payment of pensions as low as the lowest of President Cleveland's Administration, at the end of the first year of President McKinley's Administration there was more than $3,000,000 of the appropriations unexpended. To the numerous appeals from comrades for aid in their struggles with disease and poverty, and for the pensions the law gives them, his only answer was he had referred them to the consideration of the Bureau of Pensions.

Since his election President McKinley has kept silent on the pension question when there was a demand for him to speak, for "he that is not for me is against me." He departed from the time-honored custom of Republican Presidents since the great rebellion to make appreciative mention in their messages to Congress of the services of the nearly 3,000,000 of men, living and dead, who served in those four years of bloody war for the preservation of the Union of the States, and mentioned them not. Have these brave men outlived their usefulness and overstayed their welcome in the land they fought to save?

* * * * * * *

The Union soldiers of 1861-1865, who have sustained the Government in all its conflicts in peace as well as war, and with their sons, their fathers, their uncles, and their brothers voted for every President of the United States since the civil war, made a mistake in voting for Major McKinley in 1896 that they can correct only in not voting for him in 1900.

* * * * * * *

These two [Republican and Democratic] great political parties in their platforms and in the laws enacted by Congress granting pensions have been equally friendly to the soldiers. The Democratic party has been betrayed by President Cleveland and the Republican party by President McKinley.

If the Union soldiers, who have been called thieves and frauds and hounded like criminals by the two last Administrations, will be united they can elect the next President of the United States, and it is their duty to do it.

T. J. DEAVITT.

MONTPELIER, VT.

JAMES E. SEARL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7657) for the relief of James E. Searl.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of James E. Searl, late of Company F, One hundred and eighty-sixth New York Volunteers, and that he be granted a pension of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension he now receives.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Line 6, strike out "that he be granted" and insert "pay him."

Line 7, strike out "of thirty" and insert "at the rate of twenty-four."

Amend the title so it will read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to James E. Searl."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this old soldier lives at Copenhagen, N. Y., in the district of my colleague [Mr. CHICKERING], who introduced the bill. My colleague knows him very well. The man is totally helpless and poor. He is a worthy man, a good citizen. It is true that all these disabilities did not come from army service, but he had a good long record as a soldier, is an honorable, upright man; and we increase his pension from $12 to $24.

Mr. TALBERT. Suppose these disabilities could be traced to army service, the pension would run up a good deal?

Mr. RAY of New York. It would be $72 a month under the law.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

RICHARD ATKINSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9455) granting a pension to Richard Atkinson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Richard Atkinson, late a private, Company F, Ninety-eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8, strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this man was shot through the back during the war. The ball touched the backbone. They have given him a pension at the Bureau of $8 a month, and while he is in a substantially helpless condition, caused by paralysis, the Bureau say they can not say with any certainty that this wound to the backbone caused the paralysis; that it might come from something else. The committee thinks that when a man is shot through the backbone by a musket ball and subsequently has paralysis it is very liable to be the result of the original wound when nothing else is shown. We do not give him $72 a month, but seek to divide it, and give him $20. He is old and poor and a good citizen.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

GEORGE W. REISINGER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8578) granting a pension to George W. Reisinger.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George W. Reisinger, late lieutenant-colonel of the One hundred and sixty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Infantry, and adjutant of the Two hundred and first Regiment Pennsylvania Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

At the end of line 10 add the following: "in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Amend the title so it will read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to George W. Reisinger."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this bill increases from $12 to $30 a month the pension of George Reisinger. He was a lieutenant-colonel in the Army. He rendered good service. He is 67 years of age, and in view of this man having served long and faithfully, that he is old and poor, has a wife to support, is totally disabled from disabilities in all probability incurred in the service of his country, your committee recommend an increase of his pension from $12 to $30 a month.

Mr. TALBERT. What is his financial condition generally?

Mr. RAY of New York. He has nothing.

Mr. TALBERT. Has his wife anything? Possibly she has a plantation in Illinois!

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who introduced the bill, assured me that they did not have anything. He knows the whole family, and they are poor and in necessitous circumstances. I do not think he would make a misstatement.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MARY E. TAYLOR.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 2358) granting a pension to Mary E. Taylor.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary E. Taylor, dependent and permanently helpless daughter of John Taylor, late a private in Company F, Fifteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension of $14 per month.

The following amendment was recommended by the committee:

In line 9, strike out "of fourteen" and insert "at the rate of twelve."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is a case of the helpless child of an old soldier. The fact is that he had no property; he was very poor, and the child has been permanently helpless from infancy. The only reason it could not get a pension under the law is that the father died just after the child became 16 years of age, instead of before—and the child was not to blame for that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ANNA M. WEHE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 1677) for the benefit of Anna M. Wehe, mother of William Wehe, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of Anna M. Wehe, mother of William Wehe, Company B, Eleventh Ohio Infantry Volunteers, who lost his life by drowning, on the pension roll at the rate of $12 per month.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 3, after "hereby," insert "authorized and."

In line 4, after "place," insert "on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 4, after "Wehe," insert "dependent."

In line 6 strike out "who lost his life by drowning, on the pension roll" and insert "and pay her a pension."

Amend the title so it will read: "A bill granting a pension to Anna M. Wehe."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is the case of the widow of an old soldier who served faithfully and incurred disease in the service which weakened him and ran him down so he could hardly move. He was on his way home, and when getting off from a steamboat, on account of sickness and weakness he fell overboard and could not do anything to save himself. He was drowned, and the Pension Bureau held that that death did not occur in the service. That is true; it did not; but indirectly it was caused by sickness, and because weak from disease incurred in service he fell overboard and could not do anything to save himself.

Mr. TALBERT. What is the condition of his mother?

Mr. RAY of New York. Poor and in necessitous circumstances.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

NOAH PILLSBURY.

The next business was the bill (S. 1031) to grant a pension to Noah Pillsbury.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Noah Pillsbury, late private of Company E, Twenty-fifth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month from this date without any deduction.

The following committee amendment was read:

Lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "from this date without any deduction."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I will say that this is the case of a poor old soldier. He has a hernia, and they claim that it existed before he went into the service. If it did, it did not amount to anything. He did not know it. The doctor might have known it, but they accepted him, and he served long and faithfully. This bill gives him a pension of $12 a month. We believe that the Government having accepted him, and he having performed services, he is entitled to a pension. He was good enough to serve his country, and in his old age and necessitous circumstances is good enough to receive a pension.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I desire again to renew my request that those who are here may be called upon and take up such bills as they wish. A good many do not come here. I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk call the roll, and let those who are here call up such bills as they wish, and afterwards we can go back and take up the Calendar in its regular order.

Mr. RAY of New York. If the gentleman will allow us, we will pass all of the bills.

Mr. TALBERT. I have no interest in this particularly.

Mr. RAY of New York. Let us go right on, and we will pass them all.

SOLOMON KLINE.

The next business was the bill (S. 4233) granting an increase of pension to Solomon Kline.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Solomon Kline, late of Company I, Forty-sixth Indiana Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the pension which he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the amount be made $30 instead of $50.

Mr. RAY of New York. The man is drawing $30 now. He was shot through the body in both thighs. Now he is old and poor and has a family and can not do a thing, and he requires almost constant aid and attendance.

Mr. TALBERT. We have passed a number of bills in the same condition and we have given them only $30. I do not see why you should make a discrimination in this case.

Mr. RAY of New York. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. Where disabilities are not of service origin, we give from $20 to $24, and sometimes $30 when totally blind and they have a family to support. But we give more where the disabilities were incurred in the service, in actual battle.

Mr. TALBERT. If the disability was incurred in the service, he ought to have been pensioned by the Bureau.

Mr. RAY of New York. I admit that they ought to have increased the pension. We give him more on account of his old age.

Mr. TALBERT. It seems to me that he could have got all that he deserved at the Pension Bureau. I move to make it $40 instead of $50, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RAY of New York. Why should you do that?

Mr. TALBERT. Because I think he does not deserve any more than $30, but I am willing to compromise the matter and make it $40.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, this man went into the service and served long and faithfully, and he received these gunshot wounds. They have grown worse and worse until he is disabled, and his poverty has increased because he could not earn anything. Now, this old, battle-scarred, helpless veteran with a family comes here, and won't you give him $50 a month?

Mr. COX. Oh, yes; give him $50.

Mr. GIBSON. He can not move without crutches.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. Division.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will not the gentleman withdraw his demand for a division?

Mr. TALBERT. No; I decline to do it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then I ask that the committee accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. TALBERT. No, Mr. Chairman; I do not want to take it in that way. I made a motion, and I want it voted upon. I do not want it put by unanimous consent. If they want to vote it down, let them vote it down.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JESSIE GOLDIE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 9959) granting a pension to Jessie Goldie.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jessie Goldie, mother of Garlis McKay, late of Company L, Third New York Infantry Volunteers, at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Line 7, strike out "Infantry."
Line 7, after "Volunteers," insert "Cavalry, and pay her a pension."
Line 6, after "Goldie," insert "dependent."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition to give $12 a month to the old and absolutely dependent mother of a soldier who is dead. The proof in the case did not satisfy the Pension Bureau that the death of the soldier was of service origin. The committee believed that it was. But whether that be so or not, this old woman has exhausted her remedy under the law. Her husband is dead; and since the death of her only son she has no one to depend on. So we give her a pension of $12 a month.

The question being taken, the amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably.

LEWIS E. HUMPTON.

The next business was the bill (S. 2965) granting an increase of pension to Lewis E. Humpton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lewis E. Humpton, late private, Company A, Ninety-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is the case of a soldier who rendered long and honorable service. He is now old and poor. He was a working man, a carpenter, and after his service in the Army, and while receiving a pension of $12 a month, he met with an accident a few years ago by falling from a scaffold, breaking both his legs very badly, so that they had to be amputated. That is his present disabled condition; and for that reason we have reported in favor of increasing his pension.

Mr. TALBERT. I wish to ask the gentleman whether his committee proposes to establish as a precedent the granting of pensions on accounts of accidents that happen while the person is engaged in his ordinary avocation?

Mr. RAY of New York. No, sir; we do not.

Mr. TALBERT. Have you not done so in this case?

Mr. RAY of New York. This increase of pension is not granted for that reason alone. Let me state why we make this report. This man was a good soldier. He was pensioned at $12 a month, and that was as far as the Pension Bureau could go under the law, as the Bureau does not grant pensions exceeding $12 a month where the disability has not been incurred in the service.

Now, this man, on account of such disability, was drawing a pension of $12 a month. Since receiving that pension, and while striving by his own industry to earn a living for himself, his wife, and his children, he meets with this accident by falling from a scaffold, in consequence of which he loses both his legs. Now he must go to the poorhouse unless we increase his pension. We say a grateful people will not sanction such a thing, and we will increase the pension to $20 a month, so as to enable him to keep out of the poorhouse.

Mr. TALBERT. Then you propose to establish the precedent of pensioning people who incur disabilities in pursuing their private avocations. I ask the gentleman whether the committee propose to do that.

Mr. RAY of New York. No; we do not put the case that way, because that is not a correct way of putting it. We propose to to increase this pension because this man was a good soldier; because he incurred disability to some extent in the service of his country; and now, he having since met with misfortune and being old and in necessitous circumstances, we propose to allow him a greater rate of pension because of the exceptional character of the case.

The question being put, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably.

REBECCA PAULDING MEADE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 3298) granting a pension to Rebecca Paulding Meade, widow of Rear-Admiral Richard W. Meade, late of the United States Navy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Rebecca Paulding Meade, widow of Rear-Admiral Richard W. Meade, late of the United States Navy, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $100 a month.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

After the words "pension roll" insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Strike out "$100" and insert "$50."

Mr. RAY of New York. This lady is getting old. She states that her husband left a small amount of life insurance. She has three daughters unmarried, who are struggling as hard as they can to get a living. She resides in the city of Philadelphia. A pension of $30 a month does not enable her in her old age——

Mr. TALBERT. She gets now $30 a month?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; and this pension does not enable her to live well. We have refused in such cases to increase the pension beyond $50 a month. But we do not want to drive the widow of such an officer as her husband was into the country to live at a farmhouse where she might get board for four or five dollars a week.

Mr. TALBERT. Several weeks ago did not the gentleman from New York call a quorum upon a pension case similar to this—the case of a widow lady who is now, if I recollect correctly, in some charitable institution in this city?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. TALBERT. And now the gentleman is proposing to increase the pension of this lady from $30 to $50. I would like him to explain the inconsistency.

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not see any inconsistency, and I think the gentleman from South Carolina will not see any if he will listen to my statement.

In the case to which he has referred I called a quorum only because it then lacked eight minutes of half past 10 o'clock, and the chairman of the committee, who reported that bill, was not here. Therefore I wanted to hold the matter up until he could be here to attend to his own business. I did not think it fair that the bill should go through at $50, or any more than the committee had reported, without his presence.

But we have adopted a rule that where the husband died of disease contracted in the service, we would in a meritorious case grant the widow as high a pension as $50. This is such a case. Where the husband has not died of disability contracted in the service we grant only $30. The gentleman will remember that on the very night to which he has referred I moved to increase the pension of Mrs. Tyler from $20 to $30, so that our action might be consistent. That amendment subsequently prevailed.

Now, the difference is, this man died of disease contracted in the service. In your case he did not die of disease contracted in the service.

Mr. TALBERT. Well, now here comes another compromise. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by making it "forty" instead of "fifty."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the word "fifty" be stricken out of the committee amendment and the word "forty" be inserted.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The other committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SAMUEL B. KOONTZ.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 4249) to place on the pension roll the name of Samuel B. Koontz.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel B. Koontz, as of rank of second lieutenant.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

From line 6 strike out "as of rank of second lieutenant" and insert "and pay him a pension at the rate of $15 per month."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Samuel B. Koontz."

Mr. RAY of New York. This is the case of a poor, decrepit, broken-down old man who lives up in West Virginia. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DORR]. The applicant is a worthy man and a good citizen. He was made a first lieutenant before he left the service, but at the time he incurred the disability he was not a lieutenant, so he can not get more than $12, the rate for a private. We increase it to $15 per month. He is getting the rate of a private, and we give him the pension he would be entitled to if he had had the rank of first lieutenant at the time of his disability.

Mr. TALBERT. You are not pensioning him for increased disability, but just for promotion.

Mr. RAY of New York. No; we are giving him the rate because he is now old and poor, and broken down and decrepit. He was promoted while he was in the service.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN LYNCH.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 11363) to increase the pension of John Lynch.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the pension of John Linch, late Company B, Tenth Regiment, be increased from $12 per month to $30 per month.

The following amendments recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Lynch, late private, Company B, Tenth Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to John Lynch."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, that is my case.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. COX. There is no question about this case being a meritorious one.

Mr. TALBERT. I do not like this halloing "Vote, vote, vote" here, so much like a fog horn. Let us have light on these questions. I am unwilling to go on in this way.

Mr. COX. I did not know anything about the fog-horn business at all. I know this old man, and I ask that the report be read.

Mr. RAY of New York. Let me make a statement. This man served over three years in the Army. He has a good service record. He is now drawing $12 per month and we propose to increase his pension to $24, because, with that three years' service, he is now old, poor, and in necessitous circumstances.

Mr. COX. He can scarcely feed himself.

Mr. RAY of New York. We give him this to keep him out of the poorhouse. He is a constituent of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. And he votes the Democratic ticket.

Mr. TALBERT. Has he a family?

Mr. RAY of New York. He has no one to whom he can look to help him except the Republican party.

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS] if he has examined this case.

Mr. DRIGGS. Yes; I examined it when it came up. I am perfectly satisfied that it is just and proper. He is one of the men who went into the Union Army from one of the border States.

Mr. TALBERT. Has he a wife?

Mr. DRIGGS. He has a wife.

Mr. TALBERT. Did you find out whether he has any property or not?

Mr. COX. They have one old horse, and that is all.

Mr. TALBERT. And I suppose he is mortgaged?

Mr. COX. I suppose he is.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

WASHINGTON SWEATT.

The next business was the bill (S. 4975) granting an increase of pension to Washington Sweatt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Washington Sweatt, late of Company K, Sixth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $45 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RAY of New York. This case is precisely like one other that we had here. On account of the diseased condition of the stump, this poor man can not wear an artificial limb. He suffers great pain, and is worse off than a great many other soldiers who draw $45; and because he can not wear the artificial limb, and because he is old and poor, we put him on the same basis that the law puts those upon who draw $45 a month.

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to ask the gentleman, in view of what has transpired here at other Friday night sessions, to explain what he means by saying that the man is poor. If a man has a fine plantation of four or five hundred acres in Illinois, you are not willing to admit that that amounts to anything. Now, I should like to have the gentleman state what he means by "poor."

Mr. RAY of New York. If a man had a farm that was worth $500, I would not say that he was poor or in necessitous circumstances. If I knew that he had a wife and she was well off and able to take care of him and herself, and she lived with him and was a good wife to him, I would not say they were poor or in necessitous circumstances.

Mr. TALBERT. Except for this technicality he could get a good deal more than $45, then, as I understand.

Mr. RAY of New York. He might get more, but he would certainly be entitled to $45 a month as a matter of law for that one disability.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ZENAS T. HAINES.

The next business was the bill (S. 3005) granting a pension to Zenas T. Haines.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Zenas T. Haines, late corporal of Company D, Forty-fourth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Militia, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 a month.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this is a Senate bill introduced by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and reported by the Senator from New Hampshire, chairman of the Pensions Committee of the Senate.

The soldier enlisted September 12, 1862, in the Forty-fourth Massachusetts Regiment, and served until mustered out in 1863. He has exhausted his remedy at the Pension Department, and properly comes to Congress. He is 67 years of age and poor. It is clearly established and conceded that he is totally disabled from the performance of manual labor, but it is claimed that his disabilities are the result of disease contracted some twenty years before his enlistment. He was examined, pronounced sound, and admitted into the Army, where he served nearly a year.

The medical evidence establishes to our satisfaction that his present condition is quite largely due to his Army service, and that the bill ought to pass.

His first examination was by the board of surgeons at Auburn, Me., October 24, 1883. The board reports:

Applicant has well-marked locomotor ataxia. His walk is particularly significant, and his history quite a typical one. * * * He is entirely unable to perform any manual labor.

The bill proposes to pension him at the rate of $12 per month.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

EMMA V. GILE.

The next business was the bill (S. 2652) granting an increase of pension to Emma V. Gile.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emma V. Gile, widow of the late George W. Gile, colonel Eighty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Infantry, and brevet brigadier-general volunteers, and colonel, United States Army, retired, at the rate of $30 per month, to be paid to her from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the pension which she is now receiving.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this widow is 60 years of age. She is poor and has a daughter dependent upon her who is not capable fully of taking care of herself. She is getting $8 a month. The disabilities of which the soldier died were not incurred in the service, and so we refuse to go above $30 a month. It is a Senate bill, and there is a great deal of evidence which I have attached to the report here showing the gallant record of her husband and the need she has of this increase.

Mr. TALBERT. You give her $20?

Mr. RAY of New York. Thirty. She was the wife of the soldier during the war.

Mr. TALBERT. Here is another case of increasing a pension on account of disabilities that can not be traced to service origin. I do not think it is right to make that increase, and I move to amend by making it $25 instead of $30.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-five."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARTHA M. DE VOU.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7636) granting a pension to Martha M. De Vou.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $30 per month, the name of Martha M. De Vou, of the city of Philadelphia, Pa., formerly the widow of Joseph L. Mahan, deceased, brevet captain of the Sixth Regiment Maryland Volunteer Infantry.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out "at the rate of $30 per month" and insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 6 strike out "of the city of Philadelphia, Pa."

At the end of line 8 add the following: "and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, this is a case of a remarried widow. She was granted a pension under the law. She got married again. She did everything she could to help the Government, but her second husband died, and now she is old and poor and asks to be restored to the pension roll.

Mr. TALBERT. What do you give her?

Mr. RAY of New York. What she had before—$20 a month.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

LEWIS KYLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 4248) granting an increase of pension to Lewis Kyle.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lewis Kyle, late of Company H, Fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8, strike out "twenty-four" and insert "eighteen."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is a case where most of the disability was incurred since the applicant came out of the service. He is old, poor, and broken down, and he has lost by accident one of his heels, so that he can not use his foot, and he can use his feet and legs but little.

Mr. TALBERT. Did he lose it dancing?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, no; he lost it by an accident while hard at work trying to earn a living.

Mr. TALBERT. What do you give him?

Mr. RAY of New York. This is a Senate bill. They give him $24, and we cut it down from $24 to $18.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable report.

SARAH GRESHAM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 409) granting an increase of pension to Sarah Gresham.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah Gresham, widow of Benjamin Q. A. Gresham, late colonel Third Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment recommended by the committee is as follows:

In line 8 strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it is quite evident to every member that we can not get through this list. There are 88 claims here yet, and we can not get through with them to-night. I now ask unanimous consent that the members present be allowed to call up one claim, in alphabetical order, and after we get through with that we can take up the list as it appears on the Calendar.

Mr. RAY of New York. I think myself that at the time we have gotten rid of those the committee will have to rise and report the bills to the House in order to pass them.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. RAY of New York. I hope that will be done, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that members present may be allowed to call up bills, and that those bills be considered as they are called up. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. To call them in the order they are on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is to call the bills up in the order they appear on the Calendar, and if the members are present that they be considered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. Then I desire, under that arrangement, to call up the bill H. R. 1255.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. You will have to call the bill up in its order.

THOMAS CRINIGAN.

The next business considered was the bill (H. R. 12026) to increase the pension of Thomas Crinigan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Thomas Crinigan, late a private in Company C, Fourteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension of $50 per month, in lieu of that which he is now receiving.

Mr. WARNER. The Committee on Invalid Pensions made it $40.

Mr. GIBSON. Twenty-four dollars is what the report says.

Mr. WARNER. He is already drawing $30. This is reducing it from $50 to $40. Let us have the report read.

Mr. RAY of New York. If he is drawing $30 a month, where did he get it, by some special act?

Mr. WARNER. No; at the Pension Bureau.

Mr. RAY of New York. The papers sent up from the Pension Office show he is getting $17. This case was carefully considered, and the committee proposed to increase the pension from $17 to $24 in the case of Thomas Crinigin.

Mr. WARNER. Probably I was mistaken in the case.

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; you are.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 8 strike out the words "of fifty" and insert "at the rate of twenty-four."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN W. BRISBOIS.

The next business taken from the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8997) for the relief of John W. Brisbois.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to John W. Brisbois, late private of Company A, Third Iowa Volunteer Infantry, the pension due him under certificate No. 111715, irrespective of any pension heretofore paid to him.

The amendments recommended by the committee are as follows:

In line 4 strike out "pay to" and insert "place on the pension roll the name of."

Strike out all after "Infantry," in line 5, and insert the following: "and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month; and same shall be paid him under the rules of the Pension Office as to mode and times of payment without any deduction or rebate on account of former alleged overpayments or erroneous payments of pension."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to John W. Brisbois."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

NELLY B. CROSBY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 10480) granting a pension to Nellie B. Crosby.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Nelly V. Crosby, helpless child of Henry Crosby, late of Company G, Nineteenth Maine Infantry, and pay her, through her legally constituted guardian, a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 4, after "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Line 5, after "Crosby," insert "permanently dependent and."

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I came up here for the purpose of speaking in favor of this bill. A better bill was never reported from our committee than this one under consideration.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM W. PATTERSON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 11097) granting an increase of pension to William W. Patterson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William W. Patterson, late of Company K, Seventy-ninth Regiment Illinois Infantry, and of First United States Engineers, a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 4, strike out "pay to" and insert "place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of."

Line 6, after "Engineers," insert "and pay him;" and also, same line, strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-four."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SAMUEL E. LISCOM.

The next business was the bill (S. 1110) granting an increase of pension to Samuel E. Liscom.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel E. Liscom, late of Company A, Fourteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 8, strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "twenty-four."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLES N. SMILEY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 12077) granting an increase of pension to Charles N. Smiley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles N. Smiley, late a captain of the regiment of United States Colored Infantry, at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of the pension now received.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 6, strike out "of the" and insert "Company B, Eighty-first;" and also strike out the word "of" at the end of the line.

Line 7, after "Infantry," insert "and pay him a pension."

Line 8, strike out "now received" and insert "he now receives."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I understood a moment ago that unanimous consent was had that bills should be read by Calendar number, and if the bill was not represented by some member present it was to be passed. It is evident, if we undertake to put all the bills on their passage, we can not get through.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BELKNAP). The Chair will say to the gentleman that these bills we have just been considering have each one been represented by a member on the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Every bill has been read in succession, in the order on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a coincidence, but it is a fact, however, that they have been represented by members present.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that each member be allowed to call up one bill.

There was no objection.

ANNA M. ROWE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 11296) granting a pension to Anna M. Rowe.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Anna M. Rowe, permanently helpless and dependent daughter of Jerome Rowe, late captain Company A, Thirty-second New York Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The following committee amendment was read:

In line 9 strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twelve."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, the next bill being a Senate bill, I ask that it be taken up. We must treat the Senate with proper courtesy.

Mr. BOTKIN. I ask that the Senate bills be treated in the same way as the House bills.

SARAH HAMILTON.

The next business was the bill (S. 3466) granting a pension to Sarah Hamilton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Sarah Hamilton, widow of Joseph Hamilton, late captain Company F, Second North Carolina Mounted Infantry, at the rate of $12 per month from the passage of this act.

The amendments recommended by the committee are as follows:

Line 4, after "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Line 6, after "Infantry," insert "and pay her a pension."

Line 7, strike out "from the passage of this act."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JONATHAN SCOTT.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 4880) granting a pension to Jonathan Scott.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $72 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jonathan Scott, of Oswego, Kans., late of Company M, Sixth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry.

The following committee amendments were read:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out "at the rate of $72 per month."

In line 7 strike out "Sixth" and insert "Fifth."

In line 8, after "Cavalry," insert "and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month."

In line 7 strike out "of Oswego, Kans."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I think we are going a little too fast here now.

Mr. RIDGELY. I will say to the gentleman that this old soldier is confined to his bed, helpless and blind. His wife, who was his wife while he was in the Army, is almost helpless and his only nurse. They are living in a rented home. At one time he was allowed a pension as high as $72, and the question was raised by the Department whether he could prove that his injuries were of service origin. He attempted to make the proof, and failed to convince the Department. However, the proof submitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions has convinced it of the fact, and they say in the report:

Soon after the close of the war the claimant made application for pension, and on March 9, 1873, he was placed upon the roll at $6 per month from August 12, 1865. On January 1, 1878, his pension was increased to $8 per month, thence to $24. On March 3, 1883, was increased for disease of eyes to $50, and on July 1, 1885, for the same, and resulting in total blindness his pension was increased to $72 per month. He was dropped from the pension roll August 13, 1895, for the sole reason that the disability for which the pension was granted existed prior to his enlistment.

The testimony on file in the Pension Office clearly shows the contrary. The claimant is now past 72 years of age, totally blind, afflicted with a complication of diseases, and is as helpless as a child. He is without any means of support, with an aged wife depending upon him, and must depend upon public charity unless relief speedily comes. Now, in his distressed and pitiable condition, due to his long and faithful service, he turns to that Government for which he sacrificed so much and appeals to Congress to protect him and his wife from the poorhouse.

Therefore, the question of disability, in the belief of the committee, originated during the war, and instead of restoring it to $72 they merely give him $50, which will be necessary to take care of him in his old age and in his necessity.

Mr. TALBERT. Is he totally blind?

Mr. RIDGELY. Totally blind; and has no children and no help but his wife, who is almost helpless herself.

Mr. TALBERT. Why did you not put in a little for his wife?

Mr. RIDGELY. They ought to.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM J. HOLWAY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 3186) granting an increase of pension to William J. Holway.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, and pay him a pension of $50 a month, William J. Holway, late private in Company G, Sixty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, the same to be in lieu of the pension he now receives.

The following committee amendments were read:

Lines 4 and 5, strike out "and pay him a pension of $50 a month" and insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of."

Line 7, strike out "the same to be" and insert "and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

TENNESSEE N. BUCKLES.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension roll the name of Tennessee N. Buckles, late of Company I, Sixth Kansas Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $15 per month.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 4, strike out "restore to" and insert "place on;" and in same line, after the word "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 6, strike out "fifteen" and insert "twelve."

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to know something about this case.

Mr. RAY of New York. After being placed on the pension roll this man was stricken off on the ground that he had served voluntarily in the Confederate army. We examined the evidence thoroughly, and we found that he never did.

The question being taken, the amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably.

JAMES M. HERRINGTON.

The next business was the bill (S. 1928) granting an increase of pension to First-class Pilot James M. Herrington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of First-class Pilot Capt. James M. Herrington, who was permanently disabled by gunshot wounds while serving in the Mississippi Squadron, United States Navy, in the late war, to $30 per month.

The question being taken, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARY E. HATCH.

The next business was the bill (S. 4744) granting a pension to Mary E. Hatch.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary E. Hatch, dependent stepmother of Byron B. Hatch, late of Company K, Fifth Regiment Vermont Infantry Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The question being taken, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably.

GEORGE W. PETERS.

The next business was the bill (S. 1758) increasing the pension of George W. Peters.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George W. Peters, late captain of Company A, Twelfth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8, strike out "twenty" and insert "seventeen."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably.

JOHN BROWN.

The next business was the bill (S. 1697) granting an increase of pension to John Brown.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Brown, late a private in Company A, Fifty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The question being taken, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably.

MARY B. WOTRING.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 8895) to grant a pension to Mary B. Wotring.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place the name of Mary B. Wotring, widow of Dr. Jonathan Wotring, assistant surgeon, Eighty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry in the civil war, on the pension roll at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 4, after "place," insert "on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In lines 6 and 7 strike out "in the civil war, on the pension roll" and insert "and pay her a pension."

In line 7 strike out "twelve" and insert "eight."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Mary B. Wotring."

Mr. McDOWELL. Why has not the committee allowed $12 a month in this case?

Mr. RAY of New York. Under the evidence and the law there was no ground on which we could possibly do so. In its circumstances this was an $8 case. We have fixed the pension at $8, because that was consistent with our action in other cases and according to law.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably.

GEORGE W. NEVINS.

The next business was the bill (S. 1968) granting an increase of pension to George W. Nevins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George W. Nevins, late of Company C, Second Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. I understand that in this case the bill proposes to grant a pension of $50.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I represent this bill to-night, at the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK]. The question in the case is one of proof. The committee were of the opinion that the Pension Office ought to have granted this man a pension of $72 a month. We resolved the doubt by agreeing to raise the pension from $30 to $50. If I had been acting on this case as Commissioner of Pensions, I should certainly have allowed $72 a month.

Mr. TALBERT. I move to amend by striking our "fifty" and inserting "forty."

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will not move to cut down the pension which we propose to allow this old soldier. He is now 72 years of age, and is entirely helpless. The case is as clear a one as I ever saw.

Mr. DRIGGS. This is certainly a very just bill, and I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will not insist on his amendment.

Mr. RAY of New York. This is the case of an old soldier who suffered with fever, and who, besides, was shot through the chest and also shot through both sides.

Mr. TALBERT. I insist on my amendment. This man is in no more deserving position than others whose pensions have been to-night cut down to $40. In justice to those other cases, I think we should not make this pension $50.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The man is absolutely helpless, as the proof on file shows.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. TALBERT, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably.

WILLIAM J. FORD.

The next business was the bill (S. 317) granting a pension to William J. Ford.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William J. Ford, late of Capt. E. G. B. McNutt's provisional company of Monroe County (Mo.) Volunteer Militia, at a rate of pension proportionate to the degree of disability found to exist from gunshot wound of left elbow.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably.

MARY A. THOMAS.

The next business was the bill (S. 566) granting a pension to Mary A. Thomas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary A. Thomas, widow of Henry A. Thomas, late private in Company G, Fortieth Massachusetts Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

The question being taken, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably.

Mr. FARIS. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that there are nine more Senate bills on this page of the Calendar, and if the course now being pursued should continue the arrangement which was understood to be made here in good faith will be rendered nugatory so far as nearly every member present is concerned.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman allow me to state to the gentleman from Indiana that Calendar No. 1263, while it is a Senate bill, is also my bill.

Mr. FARIS. Very well; that is perfectly within the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Indiana that he is informed that each one of these Senate bills is represented by a member of the House present this evening.

Mr. FARIS. Then I suggest that when one of these bills is called, the gentleman who represents it on this floor shall rise and let me know, so that we will understand that his bill is passed.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Calendar No. 1260 is represented by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS].

Mr. FARIS. That is all right.

Mr. MARSH. Now I ask unanimous consent to take up No. 1263.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let us take them up in their order.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I object to the request of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MARSH. I withdraw my request.

CHARLES WILLIAMS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 8959) to increase the pension of Charles Williams, late captain Company A, Eighty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Charles Williams, late captain Company A, Eighty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, invalid certificate No. 475590, additional act, June 27, 1890, to the rate of $100 per month.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

In line 4 strike out "increase the pension" and insert "place the name."

Strike out all after "Infantry," line 6, and insert the following: "on the pension roll, and pay him a pension at the rate of $25 per month."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Charles Williams."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARY LONGLEY HENDRICKS.

The next business was the bill (S. 4984) granting a pension to Mary Longley Hendricks.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Longley Hendricks, widow of John H. Hendricks, late commissary sergeant, Company G, Fifty-fifth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DRIGGS. The next is Calendar No. 1261.

A MEMBER. I think the gentleman from New York has had one or two bills this evening.

Mr. DRIGGS. No; I have not. I represented the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] on the other bill. I waive my right on this bill to my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], to call up Calendar No. 1264. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is here representing a sick member of the House, and I am exceedingly desirous to help him out.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My colleague [Mr. CATCHINGS] is sick, but wrote to me and asked me to come here to represent him on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill will be read. What is the number?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The number is Senate 1704.

MRS. HELEN A. DE RUSSY.

The bill (S. 1704) to increase the pension of Mrs. Helen A. De Russy was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Helen A. De Russy, of Washington, D. C., widow of Col. Réne E. De Russy, Corps of Engineers, and brevet brigadier-general, United States Army, and pay her a pension of $50 per month, the same to be in lieu of the pension now drawn by her.

Mr. TALBERT. I move to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think if my friend will listen to my statement he will not insist on that. I did not introduce this bill, never had a pension bill here in my life, but I understand practically all about the case. Colonel De Russy served fifty years in the United States Army. He died from disease contracted in the service, because he died in the service. He entered the Army in 1812 and died in the Army in 1865, after having served with honor through two wars. His widow has absolutely nothing except her present pension of $30 a month. She is now 65 years of age and dependent on a son-in-law who lives in California, who is in the last stages of consumption.

Mr. TALBERT. I insist on my amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARY A. KENNEDY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 12033) granting a pension to Mary A. Kennedy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary A. Kennedy, mother of Peter Kennedy, who enlisted October 31, 1863, and was assigned to Company F of the Fifty-second New York Infantry, and mustered out of service July 1, 1865, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments, which were read:

In line 6, after "Kennedy," insert "dependent."

In lines 6, 7, and 8 strike out all after "Kennedy," line 6, down to the word "company," line 8.

In line 8 strike out "of the."

In lines 9 and 10 strike out "and mustered out of service July 1, 1865."

In line 10, after "pension," insert "at the rate."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

GEORGIA H. BERRY.

The next business was the bill (S. 4414) granting a pension to Georgia H. Berry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Georgia H. Berry, widow of Col. William W. Berry, of the Fifth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SARAH A. KIZER.

Mr. RAY of New York. I move that the committee rise and report the bills to the House.

Mr. WEAVER. One moment. I have not had a pension bill this session.

Mr. RAY of New York. If we are ever going to pass these bills, we must do it now.

Mr. WEAVER. My bill is the next bill, and I ask that it be read.

The bill (H. R. 10933) granting a pension to Sarah A. Kizer was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Sarah A. Kizer, blind and dependent daughter of David L. Kizer, deceased, late sergeant, Company K, Thirty-first Regiment Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension of $50 per month.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

In line 4, after "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 8, after "pension," strike out "of fifty" and insert "at the rate of twelve."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Mr. Chairman, I have a bill here, and I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. RAY of New York. I move that the committee rise and report the various bills to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will ask the gentleman from New York if he will not also couple with that the request that if we get through with the passage of these bills in time we may return and consider others?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, certainly.

Mr. STURTEVANT. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNLOW] has been here all evening. Let him have one bill.

Mr. RAY of New York. I insist on my motion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think under the arrangement the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNLOW] can get his bill through later.

The motion of Mr. RAY of New York was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. LACEY having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BELKNAP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry pension bills, and had directed him to report the same back to the House, some with and some without amendments; that the bills reported without amendments do pass, and that the bills with amendments do pass as amended; also, that the committee had had under consideration one bill and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it lie upon the table.

[House joint resolution No. 3. By McBee, Hanlon, Wright, and Johnesse.]

A joint resolution in favor of the passage of the free-homestead act.

Whereas legislation is now, and for some years has been, pending before Congress providing for what is commonly known as free homesteads to settlers on the public domain; and

Whereas it has been the policy of the National Government, ever since the passage of the original free-homestead bill in 1862, to provide for the disposition of our public domain to homestead settlers without charge other than the entry and land office fees; and

Whereas the failure of Congress to speedily pass such legislation will result in the loss of homes to a great number of struggling and worthy settlers on the ceded portions of the Nez Perce and Coeur d'Alene Indian reservations in the State of Idaho, who have in good faith established homes thereon, by reason of their inability to make the required payments; and will cause them to lose, in addition to their labor and means expended, their future right of homestead; and

Whereas our Government has heretofore provided, through the beneficent land laws of the United States, free homes to its citizens, and no sufficient reason appears for a departure from its time-honored custom herein in the case of the settlers of Idaho upon said Indian reservations: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Idaho (the senate concurring therein), First. That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to vote for the passage of free-homestead legislation when the opportunity shall offer, and also to use every effort to secure the earliest possible consideration and passage of such legislation in the Congress of the United States.

A joint memorial to Congress for the improvement of the Columbia and Snake rivers and their tributaries from the said State of Idaho to the Pacific Ocean.

Whereas the Columbia and Snake rivers and their numerous and important tributaries have, within the State of Idaho, a drainage basin of nearly 100,000 square miles, being a greater area than is embraced in all the New England States combined, the resources of this magnificent inland empire being greatly diversified, the climate being equable, the soil being prolific, bidding fair to be thickly populated and the seat of many thriving cities in the near future; and

Whereas the products of this region of the State of Idaho, as well as the adjoining region of the State of Washington, are yearly increasing in bulk and value, and new markets and cheap rates of transportation are demanded by water; and

Whereas large sums of money have heretofore been wisely expended by the Federal Government to remove obstructions to navigation of the Columbia River, so that transportation by means of said river is now complete from the sea to a point near The Dalles, Oreg., affording a healthy competition for all trade entering along said river at these points; and

Whereas there still remains unnavigable a great extent of said Columbia and Snake rivers and their tributaries, of the most vital interest to the welfare of the people of Idaho; and

Whereas the practicability of rendering navigable said streams and their tributaries within the State of Idaho having been reported upon favorably by the Government engineers, and such improvements being necessary to the welfare of the State; be it

Resolved, That we respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States to make liberal appropriations for the improvements needed to establish complete and safe navigation from and to the State of Idaho and the Pacific Ocean, believing thereby the Government would confer a lasting and decided benefit upon the people of the Northwest.

Mr. SHOUP presented a petition of the legislature of Idaho, praying that the President of the United States open up to settlement a portion of the Priest River Forest Reserve, in Kootenai County, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[House joint memorial No. 7. By McBee. Priest River Forest Reserve.]

Memorializing the President of the United States to throw open to settlement a portion of the Priest River Forest Reserve, in Kootenai County, Idaho.

Hon. WILLIAM MCKINLEY,
President of the United States of America:

Whereas under and by virtue of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," the President of the United States did, by proclamation, on the 22d day of February, 1897, set apart and reserve from settlement a tract of land in Kootenai County, Idaho, including the following boundaries: Beginning at the southeast corner of township 57 north, range 4 west, Boise meridian; thence north on the township line between ranges 3 and 4 to the northeast corner of township 59, range 4 west, Boise meridian; thence west on the north line of said township to the northwest corner thereof; thence south on the west line of said township to the center of the east line of township 59, range 5 west, Boise meridian; thence on the center line of said township to the State line between the States of Idaho and Washington; thence south on the said State line to a point where the north line of township 56, range 6 west, Boise meridian, intersects said State line; thence east on said north line of townships 56, range 6; 56, range 5; and 56, range 4, to the place of beginning, comprising five full townships, one half township, and three small fractional townships on the west line thereof, making a total of about 120,000 acres of land; and

Whereas the land within this vast reservation is well adapted for successful cultivation, being well watered and drained by large streams, the soil being fertile and easily reduced to a tillable condition, and containing great areas of rich meadow lands, and the conditions generally being attractive to the husbandman; and

Whereas about 8,000 acres were located and entered in good faith under the homestead laws of the United States prior to the aforesaid proclamation; and

Whereas, if the boundaries of the said reservation remain unmodified and the lands are withheld from public settlement, it will result in great injury to the said settlers and great and irreparable loss to the State of Idaho and the county of Kootenai:

Wherefore your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully request that that part of said forest reserve in the county of Kootenai, State of Idaho, embraced in the above-mentioned description be taken from said forest reserve and thrown open to settlement under the homestead laws.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6930) for relief of and to correct record of Jacob Couvert, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MANTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5514) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant the right of way through the Indian Territory to the Denison, Bonham and New Orleans Railway Company for the purpose of constructing a railway, and for other purposes," approved March 28, 1898, and to vest in the Denison, Bonham and Gulf Railway Company all the rights, privileges, and franchises therein granted to said first named company, reported it without amendment.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Printing, reported an amendment proposing to appropriate $750,000 toward the construction of a building for the use of the Government Printing Office upon the land acquired by the United States in square numbered 624, in the city of Washington, D. C., under the provisions of the sundry civil appropriation act approved July 1, 1898, etc., intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and moved that it be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6551) withdrawing from entry and sale and granting unto the State of Wisconsin certain lands therein described, reported it without amendment.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, reported amendments proposing to appropriate $40,000 for completing revetment work at New Madrid, Mo.; to increase the appropriation for improving the Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City, Iowa, from $200,000 to $300,000; and also proposing to appropriate $10,000 for improvement of the river at Boonville, Mo., and providing further that of said amount of $300,000, the sum of $90,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary in the discretion of the Secretary of War, shall be expended upon the first reach of the river or in renewing and repairing the plant of the Missouri River Commission, etc., intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and moved that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5462) to authorize certain persons who have intermarried with Cherokees to sue for their interest in certain moneys of the tribe from which they were excluded, reported it without amendment.

ARKANSAS NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 5513) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," and extending the time for constructing and operating the said railway for two years from the 5th day of April, 1899, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GAINESVILLE, M'ALESTER AND ST. LOUIS RAILWAY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11084) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory," to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It is merely to give an extension of time to a bridge company. It will take but two minutes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. As I understand it, this is a right-of-way bill for a railroad, and immediately after the routine morning business I desire to call up a general bill on the subject.

Mr. MILLS. It is simply the extension of time for the completion of the road through the Indian Territory. It is a unanimous report from the committee, I understand. It is only a little road 20 miles long.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall not object, although it is entirely useless.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LODGE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 5526) to provide for the publication and distribution of maps of the United States to the public, private, and parochial schools in each Congressional district of the United States where recommended by the Representative or Delegate; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PRITCHARD introduced a bill (S. 5527) to provide for a public building at Winston, N. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 5528) granting a pension to Eliza L. Reese; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5529) to authorize the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated and to provide for the payment of the claim of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, of Athens, Limestone County, Ala., for the use and occupation of said church building for Government purposes by the United States military authorities during the late war, and all claims for damages resulting from the appropriation to Government use of any of the furnishings or materials pertaining to said building, and for damage to said building; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 5530) to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 5531) to reimburse civil or other hospitals for expenses incurred in connection with soldiers or sailors discharged while in their care; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate a sum not to exceed $200,000 for the manufacture of smokeless powder by the Government in its own factory, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate a sum not exceeding $50,000 to enable the Secretary of War to purchase the patent No. 539733, dated May 21, 1895, of Gregory Gerdom for a gas check for breech-loading guns, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr FORAKER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 to enable the Secretary of the Interior to purchase from Albert Douglas, administrator of the estate of Samuel Kendrick, deceased, late of Ohio, certain original records and indexes of lands, surveys, maps, and papers pertaining to lands and locations within the Virginia military districts of Kentucky and Ohio, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment authorizing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to examine cases, and, if satisfactory, to thereupon issue a certificate to any soldier, sailor, his widow, or minor children, or to their assignee, certifying to the right in such soldier, sailor, his widow, or minor children, or his assignee, to make such additional homestead entry and have patent issued to him on the location of said certified claim, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,000 for conducting the necessary operations of a commission to examine and locate a proper site for the establishment of a naval coaling and repair station in California, south of San Francisco, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CANALS CONNECTING ALBEMARLE AND LONG ISLAND SOUNDS.

Mr. PENROSE. I offer a concurrent resolution, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and report, at the opening session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, the sum or sums of money necessary to acquire by condemnation and purchase, either singly or collectively, the several canals hereafter enumerated, forming the connecting links along the Atlantic coast between Albemarle and Long Island sounds, which are now operated by private corporations charging tolls on interstate commerce, to wit:

The Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal,
The Chesapeake and Delaware Canal,
The Delaware and Raritan Canal, with their accessories, locks, dams, reservoirs, bridges, buildings, plant, equipments, and franchises with a view to their utilization and enlargement for commercial, naval, and strategic waterways, free of toll to the people of the United States.

Resolved, That for this purpose the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and instructed to appoint as commissioner for this service any retired officer of the United States Corps of Engineers who may be available, at a rate of compensation to be fixed by the President, and that such commissioner shall be empowered to select and appoint such engineers, clerks, and other assistants and upon such terms as may be necessary to enable him to comply with the conditions of this resolution, the expenses for such commission to be provided for from any unexpended balance appropriated to the sundry civil service of the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to inquire whether this is a simple resolution of inquiry?

Mr. PENROSE. It is a resolution which I have offered to be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM. For the purpose of investigating the question whether the Government should buy all these canals?

Mr. PENROSE. To refer the matter to the War Department.

Mr. CULLOM. It is a large contract, but I am willing to let the resolution be referred to the committee.

Mr. PENROSE. I only want it referred to the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. That seems to me to be a very important resolution, but I do not object to its being referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORT ON "THE COLONIAL SYSTEMS OF THE WORLD."

Mr. FAIRBANKS submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 10,500 copies of the report entitled "The Colonial Systems of the World," prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, 5,000 copies for the use of members of the House of Representatives, 3,000 copies for the use of members of the Senate, and 2,500 copies for the use of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

ALEXANDER M'KEE.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6317) to remove the charge of desertion against Alexander McKee.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to remove the charge of desertion existing against Alexander McKee, late a private in Company B, Fifty-ninth Indiana Volunteers, on the records of the War Department, and to grant him an honorable discharge. But no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPITAL TRACTION COMPANY.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 8656) authorizing and requiring certain extensions to be made to the lines of the Capital Traction Company in the District of Columbia.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to have the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill as soon as possible. Will the bill lead to debate?

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not think it will.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not think that the bill ought to be considered under the existing circumstances. The Senate is not full. It is a matter relating, I understand, to railroads in the District of Columbia, and one concerning which there is considerable interest felt. I do not think it ought to be taken up under these circumstances, and I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

PREFERENCE RIGHT OF ENTRY.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 4225) to give a preference right of entry to persons procuring a cancellation of fraudulent or double allotments to Indians.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "to," to strike out "an Indian" and insert "any person;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who, at his own expense, procures a cancellation by the Secretary of the Interior of a double or fraudulent allotment made to any person, as provided for by the act of Congress of 1895, shall have the same preference right of entry for said tract of land covered by such double or fraudulent allotment as is given to a person procuring the cancellation of a fraudulent homestead right.

Mr. ALLISON. That seems to be a very important amendment. It relates to giving a prior right to any one who will pursue another to the point of setting aside an entry.

Mr. ALLEN. No; hardly that.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think there ought to be a premium of that sort given to people who are endeavoring to cancel homestead entries.

Mr. ALLEN. Under the law as it now stands a preference right of entry can be given to a person who pursues a fraudulent or double entry. That is held out as a premium to some extent. There are a great many fraudulent entries, and if a person at his own expense procures a cancellation of the fraudulent entry, it simply awards him a preference right to make the entry himself, if he be eligible to do so.

This amendment was made by the committee. It is not my amendment. I confined the bill to an Indian. But under our statutes as they now exist persons have an opportunity very frequently to enter upon Indian reservations and take up lands under certain conditions. If they find there that a fraudulent entry has been made, just as fraudulent entries of homesteads are made, and if they, at their own expense, procure a cancellation of that fraudulent entry, this proposed act would give them a preference right to that land.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that it opens a door to litigation and contention, if it is to be spread over every entry of public lands.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit to the Senator from Iowa that this amendment might be formally adopted, and if the bill would finally go into conference it would no doubt be there examined.

Mr. ALLISON. It is reported from the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. ALLEN. It is reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON. It extends the public-land laws in a way not heretofore provided for.

Mr. ALLEN. It gives the person who now has a right to contest a fraudulent entry a right to contest a fraudulent entry of Indian lands. That fraudulent entry may be by an Indian or it may be by a white person.

Mr. ALLISON. It is confined to Indian lands?

Mr. ALLEN. It is confined to Indian lands. Instead of saying that the preference right shall be given to an Indian, it gives the preference right to all persons who may contest and succeed.

Mr. ALLISON. It applies, then, only to Indian lands.

Mr. ALLEN. That is all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIGHTS OF WAY THROUGH INDIAN RESERVATIONS, ETC.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11868) to provide for the acquiring of rights of way by railroad companies through Indian reservations, Indian lands, and Indian allotments, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 6, after the word "intent," to insert "and ability;" and in line 7, after the word "road," to insert:

And in case objection to the granting of such right of way shall be made, said Secretary shall afford the parties so objecting a full opportunity to be heard: Provided further, That when a right of way has been heretofore or shall be hereafter granted no parallel right of way within 10 miles on either side shall be granted by the Secretary of the Interior unless in his opinion the public interest will be promoted thereby.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no right of way shall be granted under this act until the Secretary of the Interior is satisfied that the company applying has made said application in good faith and with intent and ability to construct said road, and in case objection to the granting of such right of way shall be made, said Secretary shall afford the parties so objecting a full opportunity to be heard: Provided further, That when a right of way has been heretofore or shall be hereafter granted no parallel right of way within 10 miles on either side shall be granted by the Secretary of the Interior unless in his opinion the public interest will be promoted thereby.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that at the end of section 2 the following clause be added as an amendment:

Provided, That this section shall apply to all rights of way heretofore granted to railroads in the Indian Territory where no provisions defining the width of the rights of way are set out in the act granting the same.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, in section 3, page 3, line 8, after the word "nation," to strike out "or individual Indian, as the case may be;" in line 11, after the word "determined;" to insert "and paid;" and in line 12, after the word "prescribe," to strike out the proviso in the following words:

Provided, That the compensation herein provided for must be paid for the benefit of the allottee or person in possession before construction is commenced through such allotment or possessory rights, and the other compensation shall be paid at such time for the whole line, or such part thereof as the Secretary may provide.

So as to read:

That the line of route of said road may be surveyed and located through and across any of said lands at any time, upon permission therefor being obtained from the Secretary of the Interior; but before the grant of such right of way shall become effective a map of the survey of the line or route of said road must be filed with and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and the company must make payment to the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of the tribe or nation of full compensation for such right of way, including all damage to improvements and adjacent lands, which compensation shall be determined and paid under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in such manner as he may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, to insert the following at the end of section 3:

Before any such railroad shall be constructed through any land, claim, or improvement, held by individual occupants or allottees in pursuance of any treaties or laws of the United States, compensation shall be made to such occupant or allottee for all property to be taken, or damage done, by reason of the construction of such railroad. In case of failure to make amicable settlement with any such occupant or allottee, such compensation shall be determined by the appraisement of three disinterested referees, to be appointed by the President of the United States, who, before entering upon the duties of their appointment, shall take and subscribe before competent authority an oath that they will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appointment, which oath, duly certified, shall be returned with their award to the Secretary of the Interior.

If the referees can not agree, then any two of them are authorized to make the award. Either party being dissatisfied with the finding of the referees shall have the right within sixty days after the making of the award and notice of the same, to appeal, in case the land in question is in the Indian Territory, by original petition to the United States court in the Indian Territory sitting at the place nearest and most convenient to the property sought to be condemned: and if said land is situated in any State or Territory other than the Indian Territory, then to the United States district court for such State or Territory, where the case shall be tried de novo and the judgment for damages rendered by the court shall be final and conclusive. When proceedings are commenced in court as aforesaid, the railroad company shall pay double the amount of the award made by the referees into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of the railway. Each of the referees shall receive for his compensation the sum of $4 per day while engaged in the hearing of any case submitted to them under this act. Witnesses shall receive the fees usually allowed by courts within the district where such land is located. Costs, including compensation of the referees, shall be made part of the award or judgment, and be paid by such railroad company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 5, line 8, after the word "That," to strike out "should" and insert "if;" in the same line, after the word "company," to insert "shall;" in line 9, after the word "operation," to strike out "any portion of" and insert "one-tenth of its entire line in one year, or to complete;" and in line 15, after the word "extend," to insert "for a period not exceeding two years;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That if any such company shall fail to construct and put in operation one-tenth of its entire line in one year, or to complete its road within three years after the approval of its map of location by the Secretary of the Interior, the right of way hereby granted shall be deemed forfeited and abandoned ipso facto as to that portion of the road not then constructed and in operation: Provided, That the Secretary may, when he deems proper, extend, for a period not exceeding two years, the time for the completion of any road for which right of way has been granted and a part of which shall have been built.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 6, line 8, after the word "time," to strike out "and the grants herein are made upon condition that the companies shall transport mails whenever required to do so by the Post-Office Department;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That where a railroad is constructed under the provisions of this act through the Indian Territory there shall be paid by the railroad company to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the particular nation or tribe through whose lands the road may be located, such an annual charge as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, not less than $15 for each mile of road, the same to be paid so long as said land shall be owned and occupied by such nation or tribe, which payment shall be in addition to the compensation otherwise required herein. And within the Indian Territory upon any railroad constructed under the provisions of this act the rates and charges for passenger and freight service, if not otherwise prescribed by law, may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior from time to time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. PETTIGREW, Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas were appointed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. QUAY. If Senators will kindly yield to me, I wish to call up the Post-Office appropriation bill, and then I will give way for a little while that bills which will provoke no debate may be considered.

I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11683) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM HENRY WOODWARD.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. QUAY. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3297) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William Henry Woodward.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "discharge," to insert "as of date December 4, 1865;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion standing against the military record of William Henry Woodward, as private in Battery L, Fourth Regiment United States Artillery, and grant to said William Henry Woodward an honorable discharge as of date December 4, 1865: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

FRANCIS SCOTT.

Mr. SPOONER. Late yesterday afternoon the Senate passed the bill (S. 1649) granting an increase of pension to Francis Scott. Last night the House of Representatives passed a similar bill. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed this bill, and request that the bill, with the accompanying papers, be returned to the Senate by the House of Representatives.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request will be made for the return of the bill.

RESERVOIRS FOR IRRIGATION PURPOSES.

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith the response of the Secretary of Agriculture to the resolution of the Senate of February 8, 1899, calling for information in his possession regarding the practical usefulness of reservoirs to agriculture in the irrigated region of the United States, especially as affecting the distribution of water to crops, the area and value of reclaimed land, and the stability and profitableness of farming where irrigation is practiced.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. HALE. I move that the naval personnel bill be reprinted with the Senate amendments duly numbered. There is a great call for it.

The motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF PATENTS WHEN INVENTORS BECOME INSANE.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield to me for the purpose of having a House bill passed. It will take no time, and it is very necessary that it should be passed, so that a little amendment which has been proposed by the Committee on Patents can be considered by the House.

Mr. QUAY. If the bill provokes no discussion, I have no objection.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7346) to amend section 4896 of the Revised Statutes.

I will state now what is the amendment of the law proposed. Under the patent law as it exists, if a person having made a new invention dies, his executor or administrator can apply for the patent and obtain it. But there is no such provision in case an inventor becomes insane, and this is simply to allow the same practice in case he is insane as is the present law in case he dies.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Patents with amendments, page 1, line 10, after the word "guardian," to insert "conservator, or representative;" and page 2, line 19, after the word "guardian," to insert "conservator, or representative;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4896 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by inserting after the words "in his lifetime" the following words: "and when any person having made any new invention or discovery for which a patent might have been granted becomes insane before a patent is granted, the right of applying for and obtaining the patent shall devolve upon his legally appointed guardian, conservator, or representative in trust for his estate, in as full manner and on the same terms and conditions as the same might have been claimed or enjoyed by him while sane;" and by inserting at the end of said section the following words: "The foregoing section, as to insane persons, is to cover all applications now on file in the Patent Office or which may be hereafter made," so that the said section as amended will read as follows:

"SEC. 4896. When any person, having made any new invention or discovery for which a patent might have been granted dies before a patent is granted, the right of applying for and obtaining the patent shall devolve on his executor or administrator, in trust for the heirs at law of the deceased, in case he shall have died intestate; or if he shall have left a will disposing of the same, then in trust for his devisees in as full manner and on the same terms and conditions as the same might have been claimed or enjoyed by him in his lifetime; and when any person having made any new invention or discovery for which a patent might have been granted becomes insane before a patent is granted, the right of applying for and obtaining the patent shall devolve on his legally appointed guardian, conservator, or representative in trust for his estate, in as full manner and on the same terms and conditions as the same might have been claimed or enjoyed by him while sane; and when the application is made by such legal representatives, the oath or affirmation required to be made shall be so varied in form that it can be made by them.

"The foregoing section, as to insane persons, is to cover all applications now on file in the Patent Office or which may be hereafter made."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SAMUEL J. BRENT.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. QUAY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9768) for the relief of Samuel J. Brent, executor of the will of Frances Brent and administrator de bonis non of the estate of Reverend J. Brent.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It instructs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue duplicates in name of Samuel J. Brent, administrator de bonis non of the estate of Reverend J. Brent, in lieu of United States 4 per cent registered bonds issued under the acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, No. 36028, 36241, for $500 each, and No. 66628, for $1,000, inscribed in name of Reverend J. Brent; also, to issue a duplicate in name of Samuel J. Brent, executor of Frances Brent, in lieu of United States 4 per cent registered bond issued under the acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, No. 99034, for $1,000, inscribed in name of Frances Brent, said bonds, it is alleged, having been lost or destroyed. But Samuel J. Brent, as administrator and as executor, shall first execute and file in the Treasury bonds in the penal sum double to the amounts, respectively, of the lost or destroyed bonds, and the interest which would accrue thereon until the principal thereof becomes due or payable, with sufficient sureties to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any claim because of said lost or destroyed bonds.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY C. RAWSON.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield to me to call up House bill 6127, a brief bill which will take no time.

Mr. QUAY. What is the character of the bill?

Mr. BURROWS. It is simply to remove a charge of desertion.

Mr. QUAY. That can go over until Monday. I think I must object to the introduction of any other business.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania stop right here? I am sorry.

Mr. PERKINS. I think the Senator forgets his promise made to me a few moments since. I will ask him to yield to me.

Mr. QUAY. I will yield to the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], and then I must ask the Senate to proceed with the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6127) for the relief of Henry C. Rawson.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend the military record of Henry C. Rawson, late first lieutenant Company B, Tenth United States Colored Heavy Artillery, by setting aside Special Order No. 278, Department of the Gulf, dated November 7, 1863, so far as it applies to him, and granting to him an honorable discharge as of date November 7, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SURVEY OF RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5368) to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause public lands to be surveyed in certain cases.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am authorized by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11971) to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause public lands to be surveyed in certain cases, to report it without amendment. It is almost identical with the bill which was introduced in the Senate and was heretofore reported from the Committee on Public Lands. I ask that the House bill be put upon its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that when any railroad company claiming a grant of land under any act of Congress, desiring to secure the survey of any unsurveyed lands within the limits of its grant, shall file an application therefor in writing with the surveyor-general of the State in which the lands sought to be surveyed are situated, and deposit in a proper United States depository to the credit of the United States a sum sufficient to pay for such survey and for the examination thereof pursuant to law and the rules and regulations of the Department of the Interior under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, it shall thereupon be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or the Director of the Geological Survey, as the case may be, to cause said lands to be surveyed. For any deposits made by any railroad company hereunder certificates shall be issued, which may be used by such railroad company, its successors or assigns, to the same extent as cash is now allowed in payment of entries of public lands under existing law and regulations for any public lands of the United States in the States where the surveys were made, or for any survey or office fees due the United States from such railroad company on account of surveys of lands within its grant. The Secretary of the Interior shall provide such rules and regulations as may be necessary for carrying out the foregoing provisions.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I move that the bill (S. 5368) to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause public lands to be surveyed in certain cases be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

TELEPHONE LINE IN LIGHT-HOUSE SERVICE.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator from Pennsylvania kindly yields that I may ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 9513) to construct a telephone from Table Bluff to Salmon Creek, in Humboldt County, Cal. It is a very short bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to construct a telephone line from the United States light-house at Table Bluff, Cal., to connect with the general telephone system at Salmon Creek, in Humboldt County, Cal., at a cost not to exceed $1,500.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MICHAEL F. BARRY.

Mr. FRYE. I report back favorably from the Committee on Commerce without amendment the joint resolution (H. Res. 303) granting a life-saving medal to Michael F. Barry, of New York City, and I ask for its present consideration. It will take only a second.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to bestow upon Michael F. Barry, of the city of New York, borough of Brooklyn, a life-saving medal in recognition of his heroic services in rescuing from drowning, at the peril of his life, several people under the most trying difficulties on several occasions between the years 1887 and 1897.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POTTAWATOMIE AND KICKAPOO INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. QUAY. I yield to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8480) providing for the sale of the surplus lands on the Pottawatomie and Kickapoo Indian reservations in Kansas, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11683) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, returning to the bill, on page 13, I desire to suggest from the Post-Office Department an amendment in lines 23 and 23, and I will send the letter of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, with the amendment marked, to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, in the appropriations for "Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General," in line 22, after the word "contract," it is proposed to strike out "hereafter executed" and insert "based on a bid received during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided further, That no payment for carrying the mail on a star route under a contract based on a bid received during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, shall be made unless there shall be on file in the Post-Office Department evidence satisfactory to the Postmaster-General that the contractor resides on or contiguous to the route and personally superintends the performance of the service.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, the committee amendments are now completed, and the bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I offer an amendment to the bill, to come in after the clause in relation to pneumatic tubes.

Mr. QUAY. The provision for pneumatic tubes is on page 14, in the clause from line 7 to line 9, inclusive.

Mr. CULLOM. Then at the end of line 9, on page 14, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, at the end of line 9, it is proposed to insert:

For transportation of mail by pneumatic tube, or other similar devices, by purchase or otherwise, $500,000; and the provision of the act approved June 13, 1898, making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, relating to the extension of the pneumatic-tube service, as follows: "And no additional contracts shall be made unless hereafter authorized by law," is hereby repealed.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply desire to say that the amendment which I have offered is an amendment reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as the heading of the amendment shows.

I have been myself in doubt whether to offer the amendment in the shape that it came from the committee or for some other specific sum for some particular place; but the judgment of some friends was that it should be offered as I have offered it. I offer it hoping that some amendment may be adopted enlarging the amount to be used for pneumatic tubes and providing that they may be used in other cities than where they are now located. We have now a pneumatic-tube service in New York, in Philadelphia, and in Boston. The people of other sections of the country, especially those in the city of Chicago, in my own State, have been long anxious to secure the benefit of the pneumatic-tube service, if it be a benefit, which seems to be demonstrated by their use in the cities to which I have referred.

The people of Chicago are very solicitous to have this service, and the business people of that city write more letters, perhaps, than any other equal number of people anywhere in the country. They have petitioned that this amount be enlarged so that the people of Chicago may have the opportunity very soon of getting the use of pneumatic tubes in that city.

The language of the amendment does not locate the distribution or use of the money in any particular city, but it would be left, if the amount be appropriated, naturally to the disposition of the Postmaster-General as to where it shall be used.

I hope that the Senator from Pennsylvania in charge of the bill will allow the amendment to be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I sympathize largely in the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] conveyed in the amendment he proposes, which comes, as he says, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; but the decision of the Committee on Appropriations was adverse to the proposition, and therefore I do not feel authorized to accept his amendment.

The pneumatic-tube service has been in operation for some time in the cities of Philadelphia, Boston, and New York, and has proved of great service to the public in those places.

In the city of Philadelphia, especially during the recent storm, the pneumatic tubes were almost the only method of conveying the mails in that city. I have here an extract from the New York Sun, which I ask to have read, showing the condition of affairs also in that city.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

GOOD FOR THE MAIL TUBES—THEY SAVED THE LOCAL SERVICE, BEING INDEPENDENT OF SNOWDRIFTS.

The storm did not cause half the delay in the local mail service that many smaller storms have caused, and Assistant Postmaster Morgan declared yesterday that it was the pneumatic mail tubes that saved the service. The tubes run from the main post-office to the Produce Exchange, from the main office to the Grand Central Palace, and from the main office to the general post-office in Brooklyn. The Forty-second street line has a number of branch lines that connect with branch stations between the general post-office and the Grand Central Palace. The tubes being underground, of course, unusual conditions on the surface do not affect them, and since the changes that have been made in their management and operation they have done remarkably good service.

It has always been New York's experience in a storm that tied up the street traffic to have the mail service tied up, too. The big wagons could not get around in the storm to collect the mail from the stations, and things simply had to wait until the conditions were improved. This has caused untold inconvenience and trouble, and in some cases loss to business people. The assistant postmaster said yesterday, when he was asked about the condition of the city service:

"There has been little or no delay in our city delivery, and this has been largely due to the effectiveness of the pneumatic-tube service. The mail-wagon service was seriously hampered and for long distances was rendered practically useless by the snow. But the tubes did their work on time, and most of the downtown and uptown mail went through them. They were especially serviceable in delivering the mails to what is called the Wall street section of the city. Brooklyn and the upper section of Manhattan borough also profited from the fact that the snow could not block the tubes. They certainly have proved to be an especially valuable adjunct to the postal service in weather like this and have enabled us to deliver large quantities of mail which under the old mail-wagon system would have stalled in the main office here."

The assistant postmaster explained that the tubes carried nearly all the first-class letter mail between the stations they connected, and that in the delivery of special delivery letters, particularly, there was scarcely any noticeable delay. It took the messengers who carried these letters after they reached the offices a little longer to get around, of course, but that was all. Some of the post-office folks and some of the employees of the Dispatch Company, which owns the tubes, declared that all during the storm the post-office beat the telegraph companies when they came into competition and that letters, when they bore the 10-cent special delivery stamps, reached their destination ahead of telegraph messages sent at the same time.

The delay in the mail service was confined entirely to the out-of-town service and the service in that part of the city where the tubes do not reach. But the service in those parts of the city was better than usual, too, for the effective work of the tubes made it possible for the postal authorities to withdraw some of the wagons used on the tube route and send them to the unsupplied districts to help out. A reason for extending the system.

Mr. QUAY. This pneumatic-tube service is as yet purely experimental. The experiment has been successful, to my mind, but it is not complete, and the investigation upon this and kindred subjects is progressing in the hands of the commission, of which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] is chairman, and from which we have as yet received no report.

The object of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, as I understand it, practically is to establish a plant in the city of Chicago. The city of Chicago is certainly entitled to this pneumatic-tube service if any city in the United States is entitled to it. If it is to be continued, I also desire to increase the appropriation $200,000 for the metropolis of Philadelphia, so as to establish a better service there.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to say at that point——

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator will permit me, I prefer to conclude what I have to say now.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well.

Mr. QUAY. If this improvement is to be continued and the experiment adopted as a part of our postal system, then the appropriation proposed by the Senator from Illinois is too small; if it is to be dropped, the amount is too large; but in any event I am absolutely precluded by the action of the Committee on Appropriations from accepting the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. If it should be the sense of the Senate that the amendment should be inserted in the bill, then I will ask to have the amount increased as I have indicated and molded so that it shall be applied specifically not only to the city of Chicago, but also to the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, this matter of pneumatic tubes is an important one, I agree, and there is a commission investigating the subject of the further extension of the system.

Last year the Senate made provision in the Post-Office appropriation bill that no further contracts should be made unless specifically authorized by law. Therefore the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois is in fact general legislation upon this bill, and under the rule should be excluded from the bill.

As the appropriation for the pneumatic-tube system now stands in the bill, it is in accordance with the estimates of the Department, and is to carry out existing contracts.

I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to say that the amendment I have offered is exactly the amendment reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. ALLISON. That does not make it in order.

Mr. LODGE. Before the point of order is ruled upon, I should like to say a word on the amendment as affecting the city of Boston.

The city of Boston was one of the first places where the pneumatic-tube system was tried. At the time it was introduced all the northern railroads coming into the city were concentrated in a single station and the pneumatic-tube system was established between the central post-office and the Northern Union Station. The company undertook the transmission of all mail—that is, they took the wagon service in addition to the pneumatic-tube work—and they have made an entire success of it.

Since then the southern roads have also been concentrated in a single station at the other end of the city. So that all the mails are transmitted between those two points from the northern station to the central post-office and from the central post-office to the southern station, but there is no appropriation for extending the service from the central office to the Southern Union Station. It will be an immense saving in the transmission of mails to be able to transmit, I think, from station to station, and it is absolutely needed to complete the work which is now already done there.

Mr. President, the amount asked for Boston was $45,000 to complete the existing system. It was withheld from us on the ground that other cities were asking for the service and that the Department could not give it to all. If there is any place where the system can be thoroughly tried, where the experiment has already been a success, it is in Boston, owing to the concentration of the railroads in those two great stations at either end of the city.

I felt very strongly that the additional appropriation ought to be made for Boston. I can not myself say why it should not be made for other large cities like Chicago and Philadelphia, but I do think the extension ought to be given to this system, which has already proved its value, as has been shown by some of the extracts which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] has read. I had hoped very much the committee would have been willing to give us the comparatively small amount which we require for the city of Boston, and which would have completed the work of the experiment there. I hope, therefore, that a vote may be taken on this amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, with reference to the point of order, I wish to say a word. Is it the point of order that this is an increased appropriation, or is it that it changes existing law? If the Senator from Iowa will kindly tell me, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. ALLISON. It is legislation because it repeals a law; and certainly that is general legislation. Secondly, there is a prohibition as against these appropriations until they are authorized by law. Therefore, it is general legislation if we ever had any general legislation in this Chamber.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I do not understand that the Senator bases his objection merely upon the fact that the proposition is to increase the appropriation from $225,000 to $500,000, the increase being recommended by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. That, I understand, is not the Senator's point.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not make that point now.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator make it at all? If he does, I wish to have all the points of order at once, so that we may discuss them all at once.

Mr. ALLISON. That may be considered pending.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then, I will speak first to that. The proposition to increase the amount from $225,000 to $500,000 is clearly and unquestionably in order, because it is recommended by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. So much for that.

Mr. President, that this is general legislation changing an existing law is not correct according to any fair construction of the rule of the Senate in connection with the last appropriation. One year ago a provision was made that no further pneumatic-tube contracts should be made except by authority of Congress.

Now, Congress can at this session, with an appropriation before it, provide any method of expending that appropriation which it sees fit to adopt, and the Senate can, in its discretion, make any provision of law which it chooses to place upon this bill governing the particular expenditure that is to be made. That is done every year. An appropriation made one year is to be expended in a particular way with specific conditions and limitations applied to the expenditure of that money. In this case, it is in order to move an amendment to this clause as it came from the House of Representatives that the $325,000 shall be expended in a particular way in making contracts of one sort or another. It is in order to move that in making the contracts certain specific conditions and limitations shall be applied to those contracts.

Further, Mr. President, it being in order, as it clearly is, to increase this amount from $325,000 to $500,000, if there is an existing obstacle in an appropriation bill of last year which says that in pursuance of that appropriation no additional contract shall be made it is in order in the appropriation this year to provide for removing that obstacle.

Mr. President, I wish to say that the Senate, on any claim that it is forbidden by the rules of the Senate, can not afford to give up the right to provide how a particular appropriation bill shall be guarded and limited. They may annex amendments which will limit the expenditure, as compared with the existing authority in the Department, or they may enlarge the powers of the Department under existing law, and I think it is almost the first time I have ever heard it asserted in the Senate that the provision of the rule that existing law shall not be altered on an appropriation bill because it is general legislation should be applied to specific authority which is to govern a special appropriation in the bill.

I do not think I ever heard it contended before that under an appropriation of half a million dollars, which it is in order to move, the Senate can not remove a limitation, made by a previous law, upon the method of expending that money. We can have the money we appropriate, which we have the right to appropriate, the amount of which we have the right to enlarge under existing law, appropriated according to the existing law, or we can change existing law so as to control the appropriation. It seems to me that the Senator from Iowa invokes a rule that does not apply to this case.

Mr. ALLISON. I simply desire to quote the law.

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in extending such pneumatic service beyond the service for which contracts already are entered into.

That is why this appropriation is here. It is in pursuance of a contract, and we do not propose to violate our contract. Then the statute adds:

And no additional contracts shall be made unless hereafter authorized by law.

The amendment which is now at the desk proposes to repeal existing law.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then does the Senator from Iowa gravely contend here that that clause having been put in the appropriation bill last year we never can upon an appropriation bill authorize the expenditure of money to make additional pneumatic-tube contracts; that we must provide for additional pneumatic-tube service by a special law, and can not do it upon an appropriation bill? You can not do it at all, according to the Senator's proposition. We can not do it even with the sanction of a committee of this body. So a little clause, slipped into the appropriation bill last year, that no further pneumatic-tube contracts shall be made without the authority of Congress not only requires the action of Congress, but requires that that action shall be taken outside of an appropriation bill.

Mr. President, if the Committee on Appropriations are willing to be governed by this rule, I for one would be willing to be governed by it; and then off would go from this bill, upon the suggestion of any Senator, every possible limitation or extension of the objects for which a particular appropriation is made that is not in accordance with existing law. I ask the Senator from Iowa, in all seriousness, whether he holds that the provision he has read, put into the appropriation bill last year, is such an iron statute that it can not ever again be changed upon an appropriation bill if one Senator chooses to object to having the change made?

Mr. ALLISON. That a law is found upon an appropriation act makes it no less a statute law. This item was not slipped in, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire. It was fully debated in this Chamber. It must be understood that this is not an appropriation of $500,000. It authorizes, by its terms, a contract for $500,000 per annum from the time that this appropriation is inserted, if it is inserted, extending within the purview of the Post-Office Department for four years; and when private parties have expended the money in creating these tubes, which can not be used and are not used for any other purpose than for the transmission of small first-class mail matter, it will place upon us the obligation hereafter to do what we are doing now—appropriating per annum $325,000, because the Postmaster-General made this contract for a period of four years.

It seems to me absolutely clear that the proper committee of this body should present to us a proposed law which should be carefully guarded. To provide for the erection of tubes in New York City, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Chicago, St. Louis, and Cincinnati, covering all the great cities of this Union, would involve an expenditure possibly of twenty-five or fifty million dollars, and we would be bound forever afterwards to appropriate an annual sum extending into the millions. That is the trouble with opening up the question of these tubes, looking after the cost of this plant as respects its value to the Post-Office Department, because it is not used anywhere else or for any other purpose.

Mr. President, I submit that this is a question which should address itself to the judgment and common sense of the Senate, as to whether, without the fullest examination and the fullest consideration, we will enlarge this great method of dealing with first-class mail matter to the extent of involving millions of dollars. I desire to see the commission, of which the Senator from Colorado is chairman and the Senator from New Hampshire a most valued member, after examining this question, report what shall be done, the restraints and restrictions that shall be thrown around this great enterprise, if we enter upon it, and the cost not only of the construction, but the cost to the Government annually for the use of these tubes. It is for that purpose, and not that I am hostile to any proper examination or use of these tubes, that I make the point of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Iowa will excuse me, but having made the point of order he is proceeding to argue the merits of the expenditure. Will not the Senator withdraw the point of order and let the discussion upon the merits proceed? It seems to me he ought to do that, because otherwise——

Mr. ALLISON. If any Senator wishes to discuss the merits briefly—I did not discuss the merits, but simply made a statement—I am perfectly willing to withdraw the point of order temporarily. So that the Senator from New Hampshire may give his views, I withdraw the point of order temporarily.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa has stated substantially the whole argument that he has to make. He condenses a great deal into a few words when he undertakes to do so. He has stated, upon the point of order, substantially the whole argument he has to make against this appropriation.

I was seeking to ascertain whether the amendment was so in order that it could be discussed, and I want the Senator not to go off from the question which I asked him to a general debate against the merits of the increase. I desire to have him answer the question which I put to him, whether he holds, as a consequence of the clause in the appropriation act last year, there never can be an increased appropriation, under which additional pneumatic-tube contracts can be made, put upon an appropriation bill in this body if one Senator objects?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the Senator's question. The rule I invoke is the rule against general legislation on appropriation bills; and whether the legislation that is to be changed is found in an appropriation act or otherwise does not affect the rule. Therefore I have a right to invoke the rule, although the legislation may have been put upon an appropriation bill of a prior year.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I understand the Senator to say that we can never enlarge this appropriation for pneumatic-tube service and authorize additional contracts to be made for pneumatic-tube service upon an appropriation bill if one Senator objects. That I want to place upon record as the position of the Senator from Iowa; and I say that no such construction has ever been given to the rule. The Senator said I spoke of the prohibition of last year as having been slipped into the bill. I meant no criticism upon the fact that it was put there. It was put there, however, by a committee of conference.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator will find in the Post-Office appropriation bill of last year as reported by the Committee on Appropriations this very provision:

And no additional contracts shall be made unless hereafter authorized by law.

It was placed there by the Committee on Appropriations and reported to the Senate as an amendment, and it was adopted here by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from South Dakota is right; and when he says it was put there by unanimous consent, he means that it was finally adopted without any question being raised. The Senator from South Dakota was very hostile to this pneumatic-tube service, and he succeeded in getting this provision—how would the Senator from Iowa like me to express it; I was going again to say slipped in—he succeeded in getting it inserted. The word inserted——

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to interrupt him? It was the unanimous report of the Committee on Appropriations, and was presented here with the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. It was inserted in the bill—there is no doubt about that—by the committee, and the committee had their own way.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CHANDLER. In a moment. But if the Senator from Iowa had told the Senate that putting this little provision in the appropriation bill made a law that never could be changed without a special bill and that further contracts could never be authorized upon a future appropriation bill, he would have found issue taken with him immediately.

Mr. President, that is the whole point we are now arguing. We are not arguing the merits of the case. The Senators from Illinois and other Senators who come from the States having large cities which need this service will argue the merits of the case. But we are arguing the question of order, and I should like to say, if I be permitted to say so without somebody criticising my language, that the claim that a limitation of this kind, put in as it was last year upon an appropriation act, is forever irremovable upon an appropriation bill if any one Senator objects to it is absurd. I have never heard any claim of any such extension of the rule in this body. It was never supposed that a limitation of this kind put on an appropriation bill could not be removed in another appropriation bill in connection with an enlarged amount of appropriation.

Mr. WOLCOTT obtained the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. WOLCOTT. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to know whether the investigation of the utility of this system was specially committed to the Postal Commission?

Mr. WOLCOTT. It was, and it is now being investigated. The point of order, I understand, has been withdrawn?

Mr. ALLISON. Only temporarily.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I mean that it has been withdrawn temporarily.

Mr. ALLISON. It will be renewed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That makes it proper for me to say a word.

Mr. President, I do not understand the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] to intimate here that there was subterfuge when the amendment was carried in the appropriation act of last year which provided that no additional contracts should be made unless thereafter authorized by law. Nor do I understand him to suggest that the language is vague or uncertain, or that it does other than absolutely govern the rule as to the admissibility of an amendment or an increased appropriation until the law shall be changed by bill, as only the law can be changed.

But there is a word to say about this appropriation which I think the Senate ought to have before it votes upon the question. While the appropriation sounds small, yet it may appear to some Senators upon explanation as a rather important amendment. It will cost something more than $25,000,000 a year to furnish pneumatic-tube service to the principal cities of the United States. New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and Boston have it now. There is no reason, if the pneumatic-tube service is to be generally adopted, why it should not extend to Chicago, St. Louis, New Orleans, Atlanta, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Cincinnati, and the other great cities of the country; but, Mr. President, when we come to adopt it we have to reach a plan whereby we can measure the sum we pay for it.

Now, in the city of Boston the service is rendered with the greatest possible economy. We appropriate but $18,000, but it competes with the wagon service, and the Boston people therefore said, "We will take the wagon service off your hands;" and of the $18,000, the small pittance, that we give to Boston for the service, $9,000 goes to the wagon service, and the Government saves that much. In Philadelphia the service is comparatively small. It was the first city to adopt the system, and its demands are of the most modest character. But look at the difference in the city of New York and see the absolute suicide, from a public expenditure point of view, of our proceeding without further investigation.

The pneumatic tubes in New York are used exclusively for mail service, and they carry mail in pouches 6, 7, or 8 inches by 21 inches. No other package can be carried in the pneumatic service. It does not serve the general public, but serves only mail matter. It goes to but three of the substations in the city of New York out of twenty-five or thirty. It goes from the Produce Exchange and the general post-office in New York to the substation near the Forty-second Street station, and it goes to the Forty-second Street ferry. I think I have accurately described it. It goes about to those stations and not otherwise.

It carries as between those stations only some 85 per cent of the first-class mail matter. The testimony before the commission—and we are in the midst of taking it—shows that it carries practically none of the second-class mail matter, and absolutely none of the third and fourth classes of mail matter. It saves, as between the general post-office and the delivery at the Forty-second street railway station—it has to go by pneumatic tube first to the substation opposite the station, and it takes from ten to fifteen minutes to get it over to the station—from fifteen to thirty minutes in the carriage of these letters, and it carries, as I say, nothing else.

Not only does it not save in the wagon service, but we pay these people $148,000 a year for this service in the city of New York. We pay for the wagon service in the city of New York $225,000 a year; and while the pneumatic tubes have been in service not only has the wagon service not decreased, but the cost to the Government of the wagon service has increased, and up to this time the Government is out the amount of its wagon service plus the amount it pays for pneumatic service.

Not a Senator here represents a State that has not in it a city which is entitled to that service if the city of New York is entitled to it. We ought to know—this Government has to know sooner or later—how it ought to be adopted; whether the Government ought to own it; whether the Government should insist that the company which operates it shall do so in connection with commercial service, using the postal service as an adjunct, or whether or not it shall be based upon the cost of the plant, the cost of equipment, and the cost of operation.

Mr. President, there never has been the slightest testimony of which we have yet been able to get hold showing definitely what the installation of the plant in New York cost. It was intimated in another Chamber that the whole plant had cost under $200,000. It does no commercial business, and we pay them $148,500 a year for service between the New York post-office and the station at the Forty-second Street ferry and the substation, and we pay them, in addition, $14,500 to get to Brooklyn. Out of this appropriation there will be another enormous sum to go to them.

Mr. President, the pneumatic-tube service has come to stay. There is no doubt of that. It is going, eventually, into every great city of this country. But if the Government does not start in on a proper, economical, wise, and careful basis and determine how it ought to be constructed, we are going to be involved in the precedent of enormous payments here, perhaps based upon calculations absolutely irrespective of the cost of the plant, to an extent that will lead us to endless trouble in future installations of the service or in future attempts we may make to check it. The proposition, it is true, came from the Post-Office Committee, but it came from a very divided committee, and the right was reserved by some of us to present the facts to the Senate.

Mr. President, very meritorious pressure is brought to bear on this bill by the city of Chicago. It would be excellent to have the system there. It is going there. It will surely go there in a little while. But look at it. In the city of Chicago, for instance—and I take as my authority the present postmaster of the city of Chicago—in the first place, it is not settled that the post-office is going to be where it is at present. In the second place, Chicago has not yet its system of union stations or depots, and the result is that there are six or eight enormous railroad stations in and about the city of Chicago at a distance, some of them, of two or three miles from each other.

Now, if you are going to have pneumatic-tube service in the city of Chicago, for instance, you do not want it alone for your local service, but you must have it for your through mails. If mail comes in on the Illinois Central Railroad, for instance, the station of which is at Twelfth street, on the lake shore, and you want to send it out by the Chicago and Northwestern to go to St. Paul, the station of which is on Wells street, on the North Side, a mile and a half or more away, you must have the pneumatic-tube service for that purpose. So if mail comes to the Chicago and Northwestern station that is going out by the Wabash, you must have the pneumatic-tube service connecting that station with the Wabash station; and you must, under ground, make an intricate network of pneumatic tubes, which will not only go from the central station or general post-office in the city of Chicago to the different railway stations, but from one post-office station to another.

If it is an enormous expense, it is a perfectly justifiable expense. No intelligent man who studies our great postal system, with its marvelous growth and its wonderful ability and desire to serve the public, will hesitate for a moment to say that the pneumatic-tube service has come to stay. But it ought to come to this country intelligently. It ought to come so that we can arrange in some official and proper way the basis upon which the compensation shall be made. It is for these reasons that, for my part, I trust the point of order will be sustained; and if not, that the appropriation may be limited, at least for another year, to where it is at this time.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the point of order, but simply to give notice that if the point of order is sustained there are some other amendments that have been put in as to star routes with respect to which we ought to have a ruling. I do not see how it is possible that on an appropriation bill we can make a law which we can not repeal on another appropriation bill if the Post-Office Committee has recommended it.

But I desire to follow the suggestion made by the Senator from Colorado a day or two ago, when he said that if we could not trust the Post-Office Department on matters of this kind he did not know whom we could trust. It has been stated by its chairman that the commission created to investigate the matter still has it under consideration; but others have investigated it—the Postmaster-General himself—and while the commission has been engaged with other matters, he has given the matter considerable attention and has testified before the Appropriations Committee. What the Senator from Colorado stated is true. The pneumatic tube has come to stay, but it meets a condition like that which encountered the railroad that was built from New York to Philadelphia. The stage drivers held a convention and decided that the railroad meant not only ruination to the drivers' business, but that it was dangerous to life to carry passengers by steam power.

Everyone who has examined the question says that this is a most marvelous change for the better in handling the mails. I have given it some little time and attention. I went to New York expressly to see the operation of it. The first-class mail is dropped into the office and within a few minutes it is on its way to its place of destination. Every eighteen seconds in that office, as fast as they can fill the pouches, they are shot through the pneumatic tubes to the places of delivery.

I desire to read, for the benefit of Senators, what the Second Assistant Postmaster-General says about it. Mr. Shallenberger, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, was on the stand. He testified that because of the fact that last year Congress decided to make no more appropriations the Department determined that it would not be proper for them to make recommendations for appropriations; and I desire to call the Chair's attention to the fact that in this amendment increasing the appropriation are also provisions expressly repealing that law. Senator CULLOM asked him this question:

What is your own official or personal judgment on the question of the extensive use of pneumatic tubes?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. My judgment is that the use of pneumatic tubes is something we can not well dispense with in view of the existing conditions of the postal service. As to a general extension, I should say that that would have to be governed by the ability to appropriate for it, and also by the ability of the cities that are interested to show the necessity; also that reasonable provision was made for it. We would not extend widely or largely, but we would deem it very important that the Department should have a fund at its disposal—

I desire to say that is all this provides for. It does not fix the city where it shall be expended—so as to utilize the tenders of service that may be made to us from time to time by companies organizing for the extension of the tube service in connection with commercial lines as well as along post-office lines.

Senator CULLOM. As the matter stands now you are carrying out the contracts for this service in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes, and Brooklyn.

Senator CULLOM. In Chicago they have been making more or less complaint about the matter for several years, and they have been held off. Chicago is the second city in the United States, and probably more mail goes through it and to it than any other. What I should like to know is, if you are satisfied that the system is a good one, whether it ought not to be applied to Chicago.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think it should. I think there are sections of Chicago in which the experience that we have reached up to this time would avail us in making a better contract for the Government than perhaps any other city in which we have yet undertaken to establish the service.

Senator CULLOM said again, in examining the Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

For several years you have been spending money and using these tubes. In your judgment, do you know enough about it to justify you in saying that it ought to be extended, for instance, to Chicago?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe it should be extended, and judiciously extended—extended after a very careful investigation and a comparative test of the merit of several propositions.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this amendment does not fix any amount for any city, but it does provide for the general extension of the system under the direction of the Postmaster-General, and it is a matter in his discretion. He is not going to overpay. It may be that in the case of the first tube established in New York, being a pioneer enterprise, a novelty, they demanded and have received more than a fair compensation. But, as the Senator from Colorado says, it has come to stay. The Postmaster-General is not bound to accept any tender of service. He is not bound to make any contracts. We ought not to assume that the Postmaster-General is going to pay more than the service is worth.

I beg Senators to observe further what the Post-Office Department says about it, and I want to call attention now to the point where the real delay is. I beg Senators, especially west and south of Chicago, to note the importance to them of having this service in the great city of Chicago. Mr. Shallenberger says:

But that mail which is now being transported over the country at the rate of 60 miles an hour between stations should, the moment it reaches the confines of a large city, come down to 7 miles an hour on wagons, or less than 7 miles per hour through crowded streets, is something which I do not think the genius of our institutions is quite willing to admit.

In other words, we are expending large amounts of money for fast mail service. In some of the cities, like Chicago, the moment that fast mail reaches the limits of the city it has to come down in its time. The proposition now is to give to the city of Chicago the same service and the same opportunities that they have in Philadelphia, in Boston, and in New York. Mr. Shallenberger proceeds:

I believe that the trend of progress in this country is such as to require that when we are speeding up our fast mail trains all over the country from 40 to 60 miles an hour we shall have some method devised which will take up that mail at the outlying stations and expedite it into the city office and to the outlying stations at something like a reasonable speed.

Mr. President, it may be, as is charged by the Senator from Colorado, that in the first or the pioneer plant we pay too much for this service. That is a matter which he as chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads can investigate and report upon at any time. It may be that in the city of Boston we are getting our service too cheap; it may be that we are paying too much in Philadelphia; but I know we are not paying enough for it in Chicago. I know that that city would accommodate more people and more of the States certainly than any two of the cities that now have that benefit.

I think it is only fair that you should give this appropriation not to the city of Chicago, but that you should carry out the suggestion of the Postmaster-General and give him a fund so that if the service is tendered to him he can make proper use of it. He does not have to pay at the same rate in Chicago that he pays in New York.

Mr. President, I most sincerely hope that we shall get simply fair play. I suppose more mail goes through the great city of Chicago than any other city in the United States. We propose simply by this amendment to give the Postmaster-General a fund.

There is a proposition to extend the plant already established in Boston. Boston needs an extension. The same is true of Philadelphia. The same is true of New York, as I am informed. So these four large cities would have simply this opportunity. Suppose that to-morrow a tender should be made to the United States to carry the mail by pneumatic tubes from depot to depot, or from depot to post-office, in one-eighth of the time at one-half the cost. The Postmaster-General is absolutely powerless to accept it. The stage driver and the wagon seem to be in the way.

I stood and watched this great machine, and it is simply one of the marvels of the generation. It is one of the marvels of the century. You drop a letter in one part of the great city and receive a stamped answer to it within five or ten minutes, the distance being 4 or 5 miles. To stop this appropriation now means to stop this improvement, and to refuse to give the Postmaster-General a chance to accept a tender of service in the great city of Chicago refuses to that great city of the West what you have already given to three cities of the East.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, the amendment proposes to appropriate $500,000 for the rental of pneumatic tubes for the purpose of more rapidly carrying the mails in the cities of this country. These pneumatic tubes go into the post-offices in the great cities. In New York the Government furnishes the power to operate them. It is proposed to rent from private parties the use of pneumatic tubes for transporting the mail. The offices of the tube companies are to be in the post-offices or other public buildings of the country, and the power is to be furnished by the Government.

The argument made by the Senator from Illinois that this is a good service and that it is essential to the proper conduct of the mail business of the country is the strongest argument which can be made against the system which he proposes. If we should have pneumatic tubes to transport the mails in the cities of the country, the Government of the United States should put in the tubes and own and operate them. The system now proposed will have the effect to build up in this country another great corporation with hundreds of millions of dollars of capital stock, and upon which the Government of the United States will be called to pay dividends, and it will collect the money to do it by taxation out of the people of the United States.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. I think the Senator is pretty nearly right about the suggestion he makes. I stood for a year after beginning the investigation of the matter entirely upon his side, and thought that the Government ought to build and own these tubes. After an investigation I have changed my mind about it, and I think I am right. I want the Senator to know why. I think I talked to him about it. The proposition is made in several cities to have these pneumatic tubes built for commercial purposes and to sell a part of their service to the Government, exactly as a railroad company——

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not yield to the Senator from Illinois for the purpose of explaining his position or making a speech. I would rather that he would wait and reply to me, if he wishes to do that.

Mr. MASON. All right.

Mr. PETTIGREW. We appropriate $150,000 for New York to-day, for instance. That is 3 per cent on $5,000,000. Yet the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads says that the total expenditure for the plant is only $200,000. We are paying 3 per cent on $5,000,000 for the use of it, besides furnishing the power and the room in which is located the pneumatic tube. If this is true of New York, with their inefficient and short service, what will be the case when the service is extended to every city in the Union? We shall be paying 3 per cent interest on hundreds of millions of dollars of stock which represents no investment whatever.

Therefore, Mr. President, I oppose this proposition, not on the ground that it is not a good thing, for I do not know whether it is an efficient means of transporting the mails or not, but I oppose it because I am opposed to the building up of great corporations whose capital stock represents no investment and upon which the people of this country, against their will and without being consulted, are compelled to pay interest. Convince me more and more of the efficiency and necessity of this service, and then I am more and more unalterably opposed to this method of acquiring it.

Why do not the people who own this patent—it is a patent—propose to the Government to sell to us the right to put in pneumatic tubes? Why do they not come here and say, "We will sell to you the right to put in pneumatic tubes and you can operate them yourselves?" There is not a city in the Union where these tubes are used for any other purpose except for transporting the mails. I will tell you why, Mr. President. Because it is so profitable to organize corporations and invest $200,000 and get 3 per cent on $5,000,000 that a dozen of the cities of this country have come here with a lobby composed of men who have organized corporations to do this same thing in the other cities.

They appeared from Chicago. They came here and came before the Committee on Appropriations, urging that we make this appropriation so that they could put in the service there and rent it to the Government. When I asked one of them if he was connected with a company to put in the plant, he said he was not, and within fifteen minutes thereafter the man who invented the pneumatic tube testified before our committee that this gentleman was one of a company organized for the purpose of putting in the plant.

Mr. CULLOM. I think it is due to that gentleman for me to say that he is not, and has not been, a member of any company for any such purpose. I refer to Dr. Kerr, of Chicago.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is perfectly evident from the statement—I have made the statement, and the testimony is printed and is accessible to any Senator—Dr. Kerr said that he was not a member of any such company, and yet the man who invented the tube and who has the rights to sell stood up before our committee and said that Dr. Kerr was a member; and Dr. Kerr sat there and did not contradict it. You can draw your own inference.

Mr. CULLOM. I myself have talked with Dr. Kerr once or twice since then. I did not notice at the time the remark of the man to whom the Senator refers, otherwise I myself would have made further inquiry; but Dr. Kerr has told me since that he was not a member of any company at all in connection with this business.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Oh, well, Mr. President, that may be possible. As an individual he with others may have negotiated with the owners of the patent, and the very moment we make the appropriation he can organize his company and thereby be in a position to evade the apparent falsehood which he told. That is undoubtedly his status.

Now, what else? Gentlemen appeared from other cities, and while I did not ask the others the same question, it was perfectly apparent that the same situation existed as to them. Of course, you will find plenty of men ready to lobby and urge the adoption of this course if they can, as in New York, by investing $200,000, and get out of the Treasury of the United States 3 per cent interest on $5,000,000. This is what I object to.

Show me that the pneumatic-tube service is essential and necessary. Then bring in a proposition to buy the right to put it in. Let the Government make the investment and handle its plant.

It is suggested by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] that they are going to operate commercially with these tubes; that if we will pay the interest on the plant they will transport goods for other people. That has not been done yet. There is no plant for that purpose in existence in the world; and the proposition that they are going to do it is not sufficient reason for me to change my mind upon the subject.

The plants in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia are built exclusively for transporting the mails, and they transport the first-class mail matter and nothing else, practically. The tubes are so small, being 8 inches, and the cartridges 21 inches in length, that they can carry but a limited quantity of mail matter. Nothing is sent through the tubes but the first-class mail matter, and the time saved, I have been informed by gentlemen who examined and investigated the operations of these tubes in New York, was but twelve minutes between the post-office and the Forty-second Street station.

But I do not care, Mr. President, to argue for one moment the question of the desirability of putting in this service. I simply protest against the method of putting it in. I protest against building up in this country, as we have done in many other instances, another corporation with inflated and watered stock upon which the people of the country are to pay interest. The telegraph system of this country ought to be owned by the Government. It is bonded and stocked for $130,000,000. It can be reproduced for $25,000,000. The people of the United States are paying interest on $105,000,000 of something that does not exist—watered stock. It is by these methods, by this way of doing business, that you have accumulated the wealth of the people of the United States in the hands of 235,000 men. No country ever attained its freedom or ever maintained free institutions when the property of that country had become accumulated in the hands of a small per cent of its population.

It is this broad question, this great question that confronts us, and it is this question that we can solve and solve right, or we, too, will lose our liberties. It seems to me it is an alarming question; and yet the proposition is to go on piecemeal and build up another one of these great corporations and take out of the pockets of the people the interest with which to pay for it.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I desire to say a word. I do so because I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations, but it so happened that I was not present, having been snow-bound in New York when the committee took action upon the bill.

I desire to say that for some years this pneumatic-tube appropriation has been made from year to year for the three cities which have been referred to, and I was content to remain silent and not to ask for an appropriation for Chicago, because for the first two or three years it seemed to me that the system ought to be tested as to its feasibility, so as to show whether it should be used for the transportation of the mails in and through the cities. As Chicago was not put in the bill in the first instance by some neglect or other, I was willing to let it go along and let us test the question whether it was really useful and economical or not; but it seemed to me this year that the question of the experimental use of it had come to a point where it was demonstrated that it was useful. As my colleague has read in his testimony before the Appropriations Committee, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General said it was beyond question a useful system; that it had come to stay; that it was established in all the great cities of Europe, and he thought it ought to be continued and extended in this country. So, having that sort of evidence before us, I felt that I could not longer consistently sit silent and not ask that it be furnished to the great city of Chicago, the mails of which are perhaps larger than in almost any other city in the Union.

Now, so far as the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] are concerned, I myself would be glad if the Government could control the system, so that if there are great profits in putting in the pneumatic tubes for use by the different cities the Government should get the benefit of it and we would not be exposed to the danger of paying out large sums of money, the interest amounting, as the Senator says, to two or three million dollars where only two or three hundred thousand dollars have been expended. I should like to avoid that; but if we are to go on in the way we have been going from year to year, I simply want Chicago to have a chance to get the benefit of the rapid transportation of mails as well as other cities.

Mr. ALLEN. What percentage of population would these pneumatic tubes accommodate?

Mr. CULLOM. I can not answer, as the tubes are in the other cities, but, I apprehend, a pretty large portion. In New York, for instance, the tubes, I understand, are put in well down in the southern part of the city, and they run pretty well up toward the north end of the city, and in that way the mails are brought nearer to the people in a pretty large section of the city.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, let me ask why it would not be the part of wisdom to purchase this patent?

Mr. CULLOM. I think possibly it would.

Mr. ALLEN. And then the Government itself could construct the pneumatic tubes.

Mr. CULLOM. If that could be done, I should be glad to have it done; but what I do not want is that this service shall go on from year to year with three cities of the Union getting the advantage of it, while Chicago and other great cities in the West and other portions of the country are not getting the advantage of it.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator knows, of course, that we are paying every year much more rent for mail cars than the construction of the cars costs.

Mr. CULLOM. I would not like to go into a discussion of the mail-car business. We have had that heretofore.

Mr. ALLEN. The same principle is involved in both cases.

Mr. CULLOM. I know the argument that is made, and there may be much virtue in it; but let us run one question at a time.

Mr. ALLEN. But, if the Senator will permit me, here is a repetition of the absolute wastefulness of the mail-car service. Here we propose to make a contract with a private party to put in and operate these tubes at an enormous price, for possibly a much larger sum than they can be constructed for. We have for years been paying for railway mail service more than the cars in which the mail is carried are worth or could be constructed for. Would it not be the part of folly now to pursue that policy as respects the pneumatic-tube service? Would it not be better to let the thing pass over now for the present session of Congress and authorize the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads or the Postmaster-General to see what can be done as respects the purchase of these patents, so that the whole thing will be in the hands of the Government?

Mr. CULLOM. I think it would be well enough to make that investigation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1575) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce."

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside, in the absence of objection.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President——

Mr. MASON. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow me——

Mr. QUAY. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. I wish to put in the RECORD a letter of the Postmaster-General. I do not care to read all of it. I also want to make a statement in reply to the Senator who replied to me. I will take but five minutes.

Mr. QUAY. I am very anxious to expedite the passage of the bill.

Mr. MASON. Very well. Then I will simply ask to put in the letters for the benefit of Senators, although they ought to read the report of the Acting Assistant Postmaster-General and the Assistant Postmaster-General. This is a short letter of only ten lines, from Charles Emory Smith, the Postmaster-General, in which he says:

I recommend that your committee give favorable consideration to the suggestion that the existing law prohibiting the making of new contracts for pneumatic-tube service be repealed, and that a suitable appropriation be made for the extension of the service during the next fiscal year.

Signed by the Postmaster-General.

The letters referred to are as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith and to invite your attention to a copy of a letter addressed to me by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in regard to the pneumatic-tube mail service.

I recommend that your committee give favorable consideration to the suggestion that the existing law prohibiting the making of new contracts for pneumatic-tube service be repealed, and that a suitable appropriation be made for the extension of the service during the next fiscal year.

Yours, respectfully,

CH. EMORY SMITH, Postmaster-General.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, January 30, 1899.

SIR: In view of the representations made to the Department during the past year as to the advantages to be derived from an extension of the pneumatic-tube mail service, I invite your attention to the present status of the law on that subject.

Congress in making the appropriation for the current year for the tube service inserted the provision in the bill that no additional contract should be made unless thereafter authorized by law. Therefore, this office in submitting its last annual report referred to the provision of law just quoted, and in view of it recommended the appropriation for next year the same as that for the current year, as it had no authority to make further expenditures until Congress should take further action authorizing new contracts. Neither did the Department feel authorized to entertain any formal proposition for an extension of the service when the matter was informally presented.

There is no doubt that much good to the service would be derived from a judicious extension of the pneumatic-tube service in congested centers of population. For instance, in Boston the present tube connects the main post-office with the Northern Union Station, and has been operated in a manner most satisfactory to the postmaster at Boston and to this office. Since that tube was established the new Southern Union Station has been completed in Boston, and the Department has been asked to connect that station with the main office, so as to complete the line of tubes that would connect the two stations and enable through mail to be transferred from station to station without being distributed in the post-office or delayed in the wagon transfer, as well as improve the handling of local mail. This is one point where we feel that a reasonable sum could be expended for additional tube service with much advantage in the manner of expediting mail.

Another instance might be cited in the case of Philadelphia, where it has been informally suggested to the Department that an extended system of tubes was being contemplated for the purpose of handling general commercial business, and it has been clearly shown that the transportation of the mails could be combined with this in a manner that would greatly advance the mails between the main post-office and certain important branch post-offices in that city, thus not only connecting those branch post-offices with the main office, but also giving those branch offices the benefit of the tube service now existing between the main post-office and the two principal railroad stations. By combining the mail service with commercial business it is evident that the cost would be apportioned between the two so that the burden of maintaining the entire cost of the tube would not rest upon the Department.

It has also been suggested to the Department that some of the more important branch post-offices in New York could be connected with the main post-office in such manner as to expedite the handling of mails there; but as above stated, this office, in view of the existing law, has not felt justified in inviting formal propositions in writing or attempting to outline the details of such system.

In submitting my annual report for the last fiscal year I incorporated reports from the postmasters in the cities where the tube service was in operation, showing the benefits to the postal service by the introduction of pneumatic tubes, so far as had been demonstrated at that time. Since then the New York post-office has given more attention to the development of the tube service, resulting in the handling of much more mail matter by that means.

We have also devised and introduced a special interior-locked carrier, whereby registered matter can be handled without going into the hands of the tube employees, and also making it possible for through mail to be carried between two points without being opened or handled at intermediate points, as, for instance, mail may be sent from the Brooklyn post-office, via the New York post-office, to the Grand Central Depot without the interior carrier being opened or the mail being examined in the New York office.

The existing conditions seem to indicate clearly the advisability of repealing the provision of the law which prohibits the making of new contracts, and the desirability of having an additional appropriation made to be used in the discretion of the Postmaster-General for extending the pneumatic-tube service where the advantages to the postal service are clearly apparent. The Post Office bill, as reported by the House committee to the House, did provide for the repeal of the law referred to, and for making a slight additional appropriation for the extension of the service, but this went out on a point of order in Committee of the Whole.

As the Post-Office bill is now pending before the Senate Committee on Appropriations, it might be possible to have action taken in this matter if it were promptly brought to the attention of the committee.

Yours, respectfully,

W. S. SHALLENBERGER,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. CHARLES EMORY SMITH,
Postmaster-General.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 17, 1899.

DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry I have the honor to forward herewith copy of the correspondence transmitted by this Department to Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate, on January 30, 1899, which fully covers the present position of the Department in relation to the extension of the pneumatic-tube service.

Very respectfully,

PERRY S. HEATH,
Acting Postmaster-General.

Hon. WILLIAM E. MASON,
United States Senate.

Mr. MASON. I also want to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment which I have offered in regard to the use of pneumatic tubes. It provides for the transportation of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar device, by purchase or otherwise, and it does exactly what was suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. It gives the Postmaster-General an opportunity either to decline a tender for rent or to accept a tender of sale.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will strike out of his amendment the words "or otherwise," it would meet exactly the objection which I make.

Mr. MASON. That leaves something to the discretion of the Postmaster-General, and if we can not trust the Post-Office Department to get the best contract possible for the Government, I do not know whom we can trust.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that the objection I make is to renting the tubes.

Mr. MASON. In other words, you do not want the Postmaster-General to have any discretion——

Mr. ALLEN. To buy them or have nothing to do with them.

Mr. MASON. I understand the Senator. I want also to say that the Senator from Colorado was mistaken as to the statement of the New York system. But I do not care to take any further time.

Mr. QUAY. I am anxious to get the bill into conference as soon as possible, and if passed at all it should be passed to-day. I therefore feel compelled to move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to withhold the motion not to exceed five minutes. I should like, on behalf of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to make a statement.

Mr. QUAY. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I believe there is a point of order pending.

Mr. FAULKNER. That has been withdrawn.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Then I renew the point of order.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senator from Pennsylvania——

Mr. QUAY. My understanding is that the motion to lay upon the table is withdrawn solely for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Montana to make an explanation, and it will be renewed immediately when he takes his seat.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to make a very brief statement as a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, the committee from which the amendment was favorably reported.

The committee has not inspected the pneumatic-tube service, but the united and apparently uncontradicted testimony of merchants, commercial bodies, bankers, brokers, associations, societies, lodges, all manner of organizations in the large cities where these tubes have been in use, favored the extension of the system. The Post-Office Department, without reservation or evasion, recommended the extension of the system. The testimony of a large number of persons, communicated to the committee in the form of resolutions, letters, and petitions, together with the testimony of the Post-Office Department upon the practical workings of the system, seemed to make it manifest to the committee that this was a transition similar to that which occurred when transportation was transferred from the ox team to the railroad car, from the stagecoach to the train of palace cars crossing the continent, from the old to the new, from the imperfect to the approximately perfect system of transferring the mails from one part of a thickly populated section to another.

In view of the manifest demand for extension in the cities where the service was in progress of completion, and the demand from other cities where the service was equally necessary, it seemed but proper that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads should recommend that a reasonable increase be allowed. It was not intended to commit the Government to any policy with reference to the future, but it was intended by the committee, in so far as its voice was expressed in reference to the amendment, to give the system such a thorough test as would in the least possible time enable the Government to determine the exact basis upon which the system would be elaborated throughout the entire country.

According to my own view of the case the amendment ought to be adopted. If this is a system such as the merchants of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston assert, then we are derelict in our duty in administering the postal service to the extent that we delay one hour in giving all thickly populated cities of the country the benefit of the service.

It is suggested by the Senator from South Dakota that only twelve minutes are gained in time between the transfer of mail from the post-office to the Central Station at Forty-second street in New York. Let me suggest to the Senator that there is not a delivery wagon in the city of New York that can be driven from the post-office to Forty-second street during the busy hours of the afternoon inside of one hour's time.

Mr. CULLOM. It requires nearly two hours.

Mr. CARTER. It requires on an average more than an hour, but I state the minimum time, and I deem it very conservative.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to say in that connection that what I said was procured from one of the committee now investigating this subject, a member of the House of Representatives. Senators must remember that it takes some time to locate these little cartridges and fire them through the tubes.

Mr. CARTER. The point of the proposition is involved in this consideration: The cartridges leave the station at regular intervals of about eighteen seconds, I believe. Consequently it so happens that the entire discharge of mail at the Forty-second Street station for any train will be brought in from the last cartridge which left the central post-office not over fifteen minutes before. The discharge of mail from the post-office is continuous in the direction of the distributing stations.

The experiment, we thought, had not proceeded far enough to give to the country and to give to other cities a fair conception of the great benefits this system might ultimately be expected to confer, because they have reached but few stations. The stations, in so far as experience teaches us anything, have wonderfully improved the service, and have likewise increased the postal revenues at the respective points from which the mail is received and discharged.

Mr. QUAY. I renew the motion to lay the amendment upon the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to lay the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] on the table. The question is on that motion.

Mr. MASON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MITCHELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MONEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE]; but I am told, if present, the Senator from Oregon would vote "nay;" so I will vote "nay."

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN]. Inasmuch as I understand he and I agree about this matter, I vote "nay."

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. In his absence I will have to withhold my vote. If at liberty, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). Upon this specific question I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BACON. I am paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], and unless some Senator present can tell me how the Senator from Rhode Island would vote I will have to withhold my vote. [A pause.] In the absence of any information I will have to withhold my vote. If at liberty, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON] on all party questions; but according to our understanding the pair does not cover a proposition of this kind. Therefore I take the liberty of voting, and vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I have voted in the negative, but I find the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], with whom I have a general pair, is absent from the Chamber, and so I desire to withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 23; as follows:

So Mr. CULLOM'S amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have an amendment to offer, reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read, and then returned to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following:

The Postmaster-General may cause to be paid to clerks in charge of substations the compensation for the issue of postal money orders which is fixed by existing laws for post-offices of the fourth class; money orders may be drawn by the Superintendent of the Money-Order System without the exaction of an additional fee for the purpose of correcting errors made by issuing or paying postmasters; and the Postmaster-General shall prescribe the conditions, the fees, and the forms for the issue of money orders.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Senator from Colorado to propose to modify that amendment so as to provide for the discretion of the Postmaster-General only as to forms for money orders.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that the amendment offered does cover three separate provisions. The first, and most important, is as to the form of the money order now in use, concerning which the Department asks for these changes. It covers also a minor matter, which I propose, under the impression that the Senator from Iowa and other Senators having a special interest in the appropriations in this bill will not object to, which is, that where a duplicate order is issued by the Post-Office Department to correct a mistake, as, for instance, where a postal money order is issued in Chicago to some one in Delaware and it comes to Washington, D. C., the wrong destination being named, under existing law the person taking a duplicate order has to pay for the lost order, or where there is a mistake in the order the purchaser of the money order is obliged to pay 3 cents additional, or whatever the sum may be for procuring a new order.

I was anxious also that that should be covered, but if it will facilitate the passage of the rest of the amendment I do not at all object to leaving out so much of the amendment as ends in the middle of line 4, which I understand will meet the objections of the Senator from Iowa. This amendment was reported by the Post-Office Committee, but with the consent of the other members of the committee the amendment may be so modified.

Mr. QUAY. Where does the Senator propose to insert the amendment?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will state the proper place for the amendment in a moment. I will strike out from the amendment proposed by the Post-Office Committee all up to the word "money," in the middle of the fourth line of the amendment, and then strike out the words in the eighth line of the amendment "the conditions, the fees, and;" so that the amendment will read as follows:

Money orders may be drawn by the Superintendent of the Money-Order System without the exaction of an additional fee for the purpose of correcting errors made by issuing or paying postmasters; and the Postmaster-General shall prescribe the forms for the issue of money orders.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator from Colorado propose that amendment to come in at the end of line 14 on page 21?

Mr. WOLCOTT. At the end of line 14 on page 21. I understand that to be acceptable to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. If it is acceptable to the Senator in charge of the bill, I have no objection.

Mr. QUAY. The amendment is accepted by the committee, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to offer one or two other very slight amendments. I first offer an amendment to come in at the end of section 4, after the amendment just adopted on page 21, which was reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as follows:

The franking privilege, as the same is regulated by law, shall extend to the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. QUAY. That amendment is also accepted by the committee, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It becomes my duty also to present a further amendment, reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in the following language:

For clerk hire at third and fourth class post-offices, $1,250,000. The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to make a reasonable allowance from said sum of $1,250,000 for clerk hire at third and fourth class post-offices whenever in his judgment the public service demands clerical assistance in addition to the whole time of the postmaster.

This was very carefully considered by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and deemed a wise amendment; but I understand that the Committee on Appropriations have to an extent and partially adopted certain of the suggestions made in the amendment. I would ask the chairman of the committee if he will please inform us what has been done in that respect?

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment be read from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after the amendment last adopted, the following:

For clerk hire at third and fourth class post-offices, $1,250,000. The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to make a reasonable allowance from said sum of $1,250,000 for clerk hire at third and fourth class post-offices whenever in his judgment the public service demands clerical assistance in addition to the whole time of the postmaster.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 10, line 3, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] will observe—perhaps it was done during his absence—we provided for clerk hire at third and fourth class post-offices without changing the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. QUAY. Seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Without increasing the amount. On that statement, Mr. President, I will withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Colorado is withdrawn.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have the Senator from Pennsylvania or the Senator from Iowa inform us whether the words "for separating mails at third and fourth class post-offices," which are stricken out in this provision, carry out the general purpose of the amendment of the committee; whether anything is now paid for separating the mails at such offices?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. How, then, does the clause reported by the Committee on Appropriations provide clerk hire for the third and fourth class post-offices not now allowed by law?

Mr. ALLISON. The Post-Office Department hold that in the phraseology "separating mails" they can only employ clerk hire at that class of offices, whereas if the words "separating mails" are struck out, and the words "clerk hire" inserted instead, it will enable them to employ clerks at other places than where there happens to be only a separation of the mails.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not heard the amendment. If the Secretary will read lines 3 and 4 as amended, then I shall understand it.

The Secretary read as follows:

For clerk hire at third and fourth class offices, $750,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is satisfactory. I was not aware that that change had been made in the bill.

On page 19, line 12, after the word "actually," I move to strike out "traveling" and insert the words "employed away from home."

Mr. QUAY. I see no objection to that amendment, Mr. President. What does the Senator from Iowa think of it?

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that it proposes a very radical change in the law.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think it does not change the spirit of the existing law, and I think the Senator from Iowa will agree with me if he will listen to me for a moment.

The allowance as it stands in the bill is a subsistence allowance for inspectors in the field while actually traveling on business of the Department.

I see there is a difference of opinion between the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the chairman of the subcommittee on this matter, and I should like the attention of both of them.

As long as the word "traveling" is used the accounting officers sometimes refuse to allow subsistence to inspectors in the field and away from home, on the ground that they are not traveling. As an illustration, suppose an inspector was to be ordered from New York City to Philadelphia and should stay there a week. Certainly if the Senator from Iowa or I was the Auditor for the Post-Office Department we would construe him as traveling during the week while he was in Philadelphia, because he would be away from home. That construction has not always been put upon the law, and the Post-Office officials, as well as the accounting officers, I think, have taken it upon themselves to hold that an inspector should not have his per diem allowance, although he might be in the field and away from his home employed on duty for the Department, because he was not actually traveling during that period.

I hold that the amendment I propose makes the clause read exactly as it should read, a per diem allowance for subsistence to inspectors in the field; not while actually traveling, but while actually employed away from home on business of the Department. They must subsist. They can not subsist at home, and therefore they are entitled to an allowance, whether they spend one day in a place or two days in a place or ten days in a place.

Mr. ALLISON. Or a year.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not say that, Mr. President, because no inspector would be likely to be ordered away from home and employed a year; but I do say that that narrow construction ought not to be placed upon this provision, and that employment away from home is what the statute means, and what ought to be expressed in the law.

Mr. QUAY. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that we take the amendment into conference and examine it.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to make just a single suggestion.

Mr. CHANDLER. I beg the Senator that he will not undertake to resist the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself, since we happen to be for once united.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly not. I am very glad the Senator from Pennsylvania is united with the Senator from New Hampshire in this matter, and I regret that I also can not unite with him.

The difficulty with the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire is that if an inspector resides, for example, in Iowa, and is ordered permanently to the city of Chicago, where there are a half dozen or a dozen inspectors constantly, he will be allowed not only to draw salary, but he will be allowed, under the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, to draw in addition $4 a day for his subsistence. The contemplation of the statute as it now stands is that when an inspector is traveling on business of the Department, if he stays a day or two days or a week, or even longer, away from home, he is allowed the necessary per diem.

If the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire is adopted, all the inspectors who reside in cities like the city of Washington, or in any other city, will at once move to Laurel, or to some adjacent village, and they will be drawing not only their salary, but also their per diem wherever they may be. So we shall have no resident inspectors anywhere else except in the country or at some village places. I therefore think the amendment proposed by the Senator is rather a wide departure from the existing regulations and the existing law.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not see how the proposed change can do any harm unless the provision should be abused at the Post-Office Department. My complaint now is that injustice is done to inspectors, because the head of the Department may say, although they are away from home a week or two weeks in a particular place, that they are not traveling, and therefore withhold from them their subsistence. I should be willing to have the clause which I propose limited in some way, if the Senator from Iowa thinks it ought to be limited.

I certainly hope that the suggestion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] will be agreed to, and that the conferees on this bill, if there shall be conferees, may look into the question involved in the amendment and see whether or not it is obnoxious to the objection made by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to state that this is a very radical change from existing law, and that even without abuse it will largely add to the expenses of the Department.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the case put by the Senator is rather an extreme one—of absence a year from home or of an inspector employed in Washington living at Laurel. But take the case I put. Suppose a New York inspector is ordered to Philadelphia and stays there a week, should he or should he not have an allowance?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly he should have an allowance. But suppose the Postmaster-General—the inspector residing at Laurel, for illustration—should order that inspector to go to Philadelphia and stay six months, as many inspectors do stay in the large cities and live in them, because they are employed there, he would receive additional compensation because of the character of his duties. If in addition they receive $4 a day for their subsistence, living away from the original place of appointment, of course it largely increases their compensation. If the Senator from Pennsylvania having in charge the bill desires that the amendment shall go into conference for the purpose of further examination, I certainly shall not interfere with him in that regard, but I happen to know that if it is adopted by the two Houses it will very largely increase the expenditures of the Post-Office Department and the compensation of the inspectors.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa another question, if he will pardon me. In the case I supposed, where a New York inspector is ordered to Philadelphia for one week, and wants the allowance, can the accounting officers hold, by a fair construction of the law, that during that week he is traveling on business of the Department?

Mr. ALLISON. There is no doubt of it as I understand it; but if he was there for three months, or even a month, I think it would be doubtful.

Mr. CHANDLER. It would not be traveling. I appreciate the force of the argument made by the Senator from Iowa that the right should be in some way limited, and—addressing myself now to the Senator from Pennsylvania—I hope that some clause or word can be found to take the place of the word "traveling," so that in the case I supposed the inspector may get his allowance without any such abuses growing up in the Post-Office Department as the Senator from Iowa says there is danger of.

Mr. QUAY. That was my suggestion. Unless the Senator from Iowa insists upon his objection, I will accept the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely wish to point out to the Senate and the committee that under the provision as now proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire a man can reside in Maine and be in the service in New Orleans, being constantly employed there, or in Chicago or San Francisco or St. Paul, and receive not only his salary, but his subsistence allowance of $4 a day which is allowed to all these inspectors. I think that ought to be guarded, and I desired to call attention to it. I shall not ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the question.

Mr. CHANDLER. While guarding against that abuse, can the law be made so unmistakable that where an inspector is not actually traveling, but is employed by the Government away from home for a reasonable period, he may have his allowance? That is all I want.

Mr. QUAY. The amendment can be modified so as to protect the Government before the legislation is finally disposed of, and I take the responsibility of accepting the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TURLEY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to recur to page 13 of the bill, line 11, being an amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, beginning with the word "Provided," and running through that page and including the first two lines on page 14.

This is an amendment of the committee to restrict the bidding on star routes to bidders living on or contiguous to those routes, or to such persons as will pledge themselves to remove to and live upon the routes. This is done, I wish to say in fairness, upon the recommendation and suggestion of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and he recommends it because he says that many complaints have come from members of Congress and others that the present system results in great hardship to local bidders, who can not compete with the speculative bidders, which is probably true to a great extent.

Now, as a matter of fact, I am not considering this matter with reference to how the particular individual who carries the mail may be affected by the amendment, but I am considering the service itself. The effect of this amendment will be to limit and almost to destroy competition for star-route transportation. As it is to-day, we all know that there are firms of bidders who make it their business to bid for star routes in different parts of the country, as they are advertised, and then to sublet in a great measure those contracts. Where they are not able to sublet themselves without a loss—and generally they make a profit or they would not remain in the business—they undertake to carry the mail themselves. Nevertheless, the result is that it is done at a very reduced cost to the postal service. The cost of this service last year was about five and one-quarter million dollars, that was for all the star routes of the United States.

Now, it would be very desirable, in my opinion, to have the mail carried by people who live upon or contiguous to the routes; but those people do not see fit to bid. As has been stated, they do not bid because they are aware of the fact that they will be underbid. Yet, as a matter of fact, it is these same bidders who afterwards subcontract to carry the mails, in very great measure.

The Second Assistant Postmaster-General does not pretend that this is a measure of economy, but, on the contrary, that it will largely increase the expenditures of the United States mail service in this particular. Not only that, but he shows by his report, to which I invite attention, that there will be difficulty in getting the routes bid on at all, and I now direct the attention of the Senate to a paragraph on page 7 of the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, which reads as follows:

> It is conceded that if speculative bidders were excluded the cost of the service to the Government would be increased. Some data on this subject were prepared at the request of a Congressional committee last winter. An examination was made of the proposals received for all the star routes in the State of Texas, which were then being relet. The number of routes was 1,081. For about one-half of these no bid was received from a person living on or contiguous to the route. As to the remaining one-half, if all speculative bids from nonresidents had been rejected and the contracts awarded to local bidders, the cost would have been increased 28 per cent.
> A similar examination was made as to the service in California—496 routes. No bids from persons living near the routes were received for about one-fifth of these. As to the remaining four-fifths, if the speculative bids had been rejected and the lowest local bids accepted, the cost would have been increased 29 per cent.

Here is an instance where the test was made to see what would happen, and the result was that in one State, Texas, there were no bids whatever for half the routes, and on the other half the increased cost was 28 per cent. In California no bids were received for one-fifth of the routes, and as to the other four-fifths, the increased cost was 29 per cent.

Now, I have taken the trouble to go over the section that is included in the general letting for my country—the States that are embraced within the Southern letting. The States are North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Kentucky. The cost of transportation last year upon those routes was $934,811, and if you apply the percentage of increase as shown by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in his report, the increased cost would be $233,500 in those States on a total of $934,000.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is the Senator from Mississippi through with his quotation? Does he wish to make further remarks?

Mr. MONEY. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I simply desire to state that, while the facts as presented in the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General may show that the speculators who bid on these routes may save the Government money, it is at the expense of the service. We get all sorts of old broken-down mules and dilapidated carts and every kind of apparatus; and they do not come half the time on some of the routes. It is an abuse and an abomination.

Mr. STEWART. That is what it is. It is a disgrace to the Government.

Mr. MONEY. I have to say, as to that matter, that we have nothing whatever to do with it, nor will the change proposed by the Appropriations Committee affect that in the slightest particular. As a matter of fact, when you let the star routes the Government does not prescribe the method or the mode of conveyance, and the man, when he has secured the contract, can take the star-route mail on his back, or on his mule, or in his cart, or in a four-horse coach—in any way he chooses. The team can be good, bad, or indifferent. The Government only concerns itself that he shall deliver the mail upon certain schedule time, starting and arriving at certain hours, and it does not go any further than that.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is the Senator from Mississippi cognizant of a single instance in which the contractor who bids off these routes, the speculator, does not sublet to somebody in the neighborhood and make money by the operation?

Mr. MONEY. I do not know what they have made. I presume they have made money or they would quit the business. I do not suppose any set of men would be continually contracting unless they made money out of it, but I do not care whether they make money or not. I am speaking for the United States.

Mr. STEWART. I want to speak for the United States when the Senator from Mississippi gets through.

Mr. MONEY. It is quite true, as stated by the Senator from South Carolina, that somebody in the neighborhood carries the mail. I want to know, then, why they do not bid low enough in the first instance to get the contract?

Mr. STEWART. I will tell the Senator.

Mr. MONEY. If the field is limited to those gentlemen, you will find the condition just as shown by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General—half the bids not bid on at all, and those that are bid on 28 per cent higher. I predict that if this amendment shall remain upon the bill the increased cost in ten years for star-route transportation upon these same lines will be almost double. It will be about $10,000,000. As it is, there is no interference anywhere with the bidding. Everybody is invited to bid. The Government goes to the expense of publishing its proposals for bids, and they are circulated everywhere in the land. Any person who wants one can write to the Department and get it.

There is hardly a member of Congress who does not ask for the books, and they are sent all the time. Any bidder who wants to bid on a fifty-dollar route can get one of these books, which shows for what the mail is now being carried and what he is likely to have to propose to succeed in getting the contract. He has all this notice. He is fully armed in that respect; and here is the Second Assistant Postmaster-General who in his report shows that they will not bid. So when you restrict the sphere of competition you inevitably put the cost that much higher. That would be conclusive as a matter of argument, if there were no facts; but the facts prove it. The report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General itself shows it.

About the only argument he gives, as I understand it, is that it will result in improved equipment:

> Furthermore, I believe that a considerably larger sum for star transportation would be well expended if it resulted in improved equipment, as many of the horses and vehicles now used in carrying the mails present such a dilapidated and disreputable appearance as to be a strong argument in condemnation of the present system.

The Second Assistant Postmaster-General has no means of ascertaining whether it is the contractor or the subcontractor who is using the conveyances, and he does not know, and neither does anybody else know, whether they will be improved. That is left by law entirely to the man who carries the mail, whether it be by contractor or subcontractor. He can provide what he chooses, and there is no way provided by law or by regulation of the Department to in any manner supervise and provide for any better material than we now have used all over on these routes. I know myself from personal experience that the mails are frequently carried in one of these road carts. You will see a negro boy or man with a mule and a road cart going down the road carrying the mail. That is about as cheap a mode as can be devised. But the mail is carried. It is carried upon schedule time.

When one of the contractors fails to comply with his contract, I know the Department has been pretty rigid with him, not only in deducting the pay for that day's transportation, but also in fining him for failure. The contractors are held to a pretty rigid account. I should like to see this service improved, but unless somebody can show that there is to be improved service, then there ought not to be incurred an increased expense; and that that is to follow inevitably is shown by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General himself. It can not be controverted.

Mr. President, I have had a good deal to do with this star-route business. I was the man who first introduced a resolution for an investigation into the rascalities of the star-route service. I was made chairman of the committee. I have no sort of sympathy with these speculative bidders or middlemen. Our business is not to take care of them or anybody else. It is to see that the United States provides for the people the most efficient service possible at the smallest cost to the people. All this money that you propose to spend now upon a lot of fellows who want to have something to fill out their other means of living, their vocation, whatever it may be, is a tax upon the people. The postage stamp has long since ceased to be regarded as compensation for the service rendered, because the inequalities are too great.

The carrying of the mail is a distinct function of the Government. It is as much the duty of the Government to carry the mail as to hold court or to sustain the Army and the Navy. It has no more right to expect that that service or that function shall pay its own way than that the other branches of the Government shall pay their way. While we are taxing the people they should have all they can get for their money; and for that reason I think it an unwise proposition so to restrict the field of competition that inevitably the expense will be increased from 28 to 29 per cent, as shown by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and at the same time have no assurance that better service will be provided.

I felt it my duty, Mr. President, to say this much, without having any particular concern about it whatever, except that I know—and we have here what the Second Assistant Postmaster-General himself says about it—there is nothing in the way of argument to justify the increased expense which will come as a consequence of this amendment.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I am opposed to levying unnecessary taxes upon the people to carry the mail, but I am also opposed to levying those taxes upon the people for the purpose of giving several hundred thousand dollars each year to a lot of speculators who by some means get inside information. I traveled for about four or five months over Utah and Nevada a couple of years ago, and I found the mail being carried by poor men on the line for a mere pittance.

What first attracted my attention to it was that we met a man with a horse and cart. His horse had given out. He had nothing to feed him. We gave him some oats. He said he would lose a day in getting in. I asked him if he was not afraid he would be reported. He said no, the postmaster knew what sort of a time he had, and he would not report him. I said, "We are getting our mails very irregularly." He said, "We are doing the best we can." I said, "How do you happen to be in that fix?" He said, "Mr. So and So had the contract, and he said I must carry it for such an amount"—a sum which was entirely inadequate. "Why do you do it?" I asked. He said, "I live in this valley; I have a horse and some provisions here, and I had no other way of getting any money at all to pay my taxes. I have lived here and I have been in the habit of doing it for years." I said, "Are you losing money at it?" He said, "I am not making any. If, of course, they would report me I could not do it. If the postmaster reported me it could not be done."

Then I went to inquiring about the State. I found there was not a single case in Nevada where the contractor was carrying the mail. All the time it was carried by a subcontractor. I asked local people why they did not do it. They said they had put in their bids for years, but it was utterly impossible to get the contracts; that no matter where they would put in the bid it would always be underbid. I called attention to this matter last year and offered an amendment. It was suggested that it would cost more; that there would be unreasonable bids. I then suggested in argument that power should be given to the Department to refuse any bid until they got a reasonable bid. They know what the mail is being carried for now. That feature is provided for in this amendment. If the Department do not get a reasonable bid they will not accept it. Three or four hundred thousand dollars is made here by these sharks. If it was distributed among these poor people under the supervision of the Department we would have better service. You can tell a mail carrier on these star routes as far as you can see him anywhere on the plains. He has a poor old horse, the man going afoot, walking along, and here you have your rich speculators getting three or four hundred thousand dollars a year.

I offered a resolution last session asking the Department to give a full statement of the matter—how many contracts certain men had and how much money they received. The Department said they would not have time to make the report at that session, but if we would ask for a few samples they would give them. So I asked in my resolution for 12 samples; and we found that among the 12 each had from 50 to 500 mail contracts. There is a sort of understanding between them. They parcel out the territory. One man has this territory, another that. They divide up the spoils. A certain man has a certain State, and he gets it all the time. Do you tell me they are honest bids? Of course they are not honest. If the administration will do its duty and not let contracts at unreasonable rates, the service can be improved, and it ought to be.

The postmaster should feel at liberty to report the contractors if they do not come in on time. At several places where I inquired at the post-office why they did not report the contractor when the mails were delayed, they told me it would break the contractor. "He has done the best he could. His horses gave out. He can not afford to carry oats or barley to feed them. They have to be turned out on the grass. We would not get the mail at all if we broke him up in his business. Poor fellow, he can not afford it." That is the condition all over this country. You will find it a miserable service.

You vote large sums of money to railroads, large sums of money everywhere, while it costs only $5,000,000 for the star-route service everywhere; and of that five million speculators get four or five hundred thousand dollars. It does not go to the real parties. The amendment provides that if people do not put in reasonable bids the Postmaster-General shall withhold the contracts until he gets reasonable bids. He can control it if you have an honest administration of the office, and no doubt you would have if they had the means of detecting fraud. So long as you have a system whereby the contractors divide out the country and rob the poor fellows who carry the mail, you will get it done cheaply, but you will get it done miserably. It is a reproach to the Government all through the country to have a dishonest system. The star-route system is regarded as a thieving system in the whole interior of the West.

The Department should have full power to refuse to let a contract except at a reasonable rate. I do not believe in farming it out to a lot of sharks in this town to make hundreds of thousands of dollars each year. It is outrageous; it is one of the worst abuses in this Government; and I congratulate the committee on having brought in an amendment which I hope and believe will cure the evil.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, some of the provisions of the proposed amendment seem to me to be unreasonable. The provision that the bidder shall reside on or contiguous to the route on which the service is to be performed, it seems to me, narrows the discretion of the Post-Office Department entirely too much. That the amendment will cure an evil which ought to be cured I have no doubt. I think there is no greater outrage than this practice of having a few contractors bid for great numbers of star routes with the intention of subletting them and not carrying the mail themselves. The system ought to be broken up.

There is no mail route anywhere in the country on which there is not some poor, impecunious fellow, who has no sort of business sense, who does not understand what work is worth, and one of these shrewd, unscrupulous, sharp speculators will induce a man of that sort to take a subcontract. In my State particularly, colored men with no business experience and no business judgment are wheedled into taking subcontracts. These people, in the first instance, have bid, perhaps, to do the service for less than it is worth, and in many instances they induce these poor people to take it for less than they themselves have bid, and sometimes to undertake to do the work for one-half of what it is worth.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] I think places the amount at entirely too small a figure. On routes which have come under my observation they have induced this class of poor people—bad managers—to take subcontracts in many instances for one-half of what they get from the Government. They make an enormous profit, and if there is any way to break it up it ought to be done.

Mr. STEWART. A man does not have to reside on the route in order to bid; but if he gets the contract, he must go there and attend to it himself.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think the language should be altered to some extent, and that there should be a wider field for bidders in that respect; but if there could be a provision put in which would prevent subletting and providing that the people who bid off the routes shall do the work, it would break it up. I do not know just what is the best course to be taken. This amendment, if it goes into the bill, can be considered in conference, and whatever changes are necessary to be made to it to accomplish the purpose can be made by the conference committee.

So far as I am concerned, I would very much prefer that this amendment should be adopted as it is rather than not have some such provision; but I wanted to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the fact that the provision seems to me to be too rigid, and there should be some change made, if not here, at least in conference.

Mr. QUAY. In what manner would the Senator from Arkansas suggest the liberalization of that provision? I do not exactly see at present, on the spur of the moment, in what way the language could be changed so as to accomplish the object.

Mr. MONEY. The suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas would, I think, end the whole matter; that is, in preventing any subcontracting. That would destroy the whole system of speculative bidding without any doubt.

Mr. STEWART. The amendment already in the bill does it. It disposes of subcontracting.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not think it does.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, certainly it does. Let me read it:

Provided further, That no payment for carrying the mail on a star route, under a contract hereafter executed, shall be made unless there shall be on file in the Post-Office Department evidence satisfactory to the Postmaster-General that the contractor resides on or contiguous to the route and personally superintends the performance of the service.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. He can do that by an agent, not by himself. If the intention is to break up subletting, the best way to do it is to strike out, in line 16, the words "reside on or contiguous to said route and" and make it read "that in the event of the service being awarded to him he will not sublet the same, but will give his personal supervision to the performance of the service;" and then repeal the provision of law which now enables a subcontractor to get his money directly from the Post-Office Department. When these subcontracts are made there is such a transfer under the present law that the money is paid by the Department to the subcontractor and he gets his part of it. He has no claim on the contractor, who is not bound to pay him a share of it, and the contractor takes his part of it as clear profit and without any expense.

Mr. STEWART. I think that suggestion might be an improvement.

Mr. QUAY. I think the Senator from Nevada is correct, and probably the amendment is a little too rigid in that provision; but I suggest to him that it can be molded to suit him in conference, and as the discussion has proceeded for some time I move to table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. MONEY. I have no objection in the world to its going into conference. I want to call the attention of the Senate, however, to a fact, and to repeat it, if they will indulge me. While I have no sympathy whatever with these men—I have more sympathy for the poor man who wants to get a job of carrying the mail, as described in the graphic and pathetic language of the Senator from Nevada—yet I do not consider that the Post-Office Department is an eleemosynary institution that is to provide anybody with a living or anything of that sort. However, my sympathy is with that class of people very decidedly. But I want to repeat what I said. I am willing for it to go into conference. I have made no motion about reconsidering, except that I simply wanted to go back to be heard upon this proposition. Whatever restrictions are placed on competition in bidding, it is evident to every mind that it will also increase the cost of the transportation. The best evidence of that fact is furnished in the instance which I read here, as quoted in the annual report of the Second Assistant himself.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Mississippi answer me on one point? He can only guess at it, I imagine, but I have found this situation in our part of the country. One of these speculators will bid all the routes in the entire State this year. Of course, he sublets every one of them. The next year the local bidders get the very information which the Senator states is accessible to them and put in their bids a little below that at which the speculator got it the year before. But somehow the speculator knows it and he goes and underbids them. How does he get the information.

Mr. MONEY. I do not think that question is very properly addressed to me, as I am not a part of the executive branch of the Government. I do not believe, though, in the intimation, as I believe has been charged by somebody, of fraud in the Department. I do not think that is so. I can not imagine it can be true, for the reason that under the regulation of the Department all bids cease at 12 o'clock and none are opened until 12 o'clock, and the very moment that the opening begins not another bid is received. We all know that to be the rule of the Department. How the contents of sealed bids can be communicated to anybody else in time to do him any good I can not imagine, as no bids are received after the opening has begun. However, there is no doubt but that somehow or other these men do get a great many of these contracts. They do not get them for a whole State. They will bid for a whole State, but they will get probably two or three thousand out of fifteen or twenty thousand. They put a net over the whole country and they get what they can.

It also happens very frequently that a subcontractor is paid more than the contractor receives upon his bid. Nevertheless, they do make a profit—how much I do not know. I do not believe anybody does. It is a very good business, for it is evident they do not lose anything. If it can be corrected, I would be very glad to see it done, so that there may be a local bidder who can have the opportunity to carry the mail.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, I hope the amendment suggested by the Senator from Arkansas will be offered and that it will prevail, so that an effective effort may be made to break up the business of subletting the mails.

I have listened to what the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] has said, and he has described a condition which exists also in my own State. I have traveled all over Florida and I have often met upon the roads vehicles of all descriptions carrying the United States mail, which ought to be creditable to this great country, but it is generally carried by broken-down horses and in dilapidated wagons, and it does not do the country any credit.

We have an inefficient service. It is performed by people whose only recommendation frequently is that they will work cheaply, and they are ground down in their prices by these middlemen, who in some way or other manage to secure contracts and control the entire business to the exclusion of local bidders.

I think the system should be changed. I am in favor of requiring a contractor to carry the mail himself, or at least to superintend the work. He should discharge the duty that he contracts with the Government to perform. If that is done, the speculators will be excluded and the people living in the neighborhood where the mails are to be carried and delivered will perform the service and get a living price for their work.

I am glad the committee have taken this matter up, and I hope that some reform will result from their labors. It may cost a little more at first; it may bring additional expense upon the Government, but the result will be to secure better service. The result will be to deprive speculators of their unearned profits, and the money that is paid by the Government will go to the men who really earn it.

Mr. QUAY. On behalf of the committee, I desire to offer an additional amendment, to come in on page 21, if the Secretary will turn to it.

Mr. PASCO. Was the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not aware that any amendment was proposed.

Mr. QUAY. No amendment was proposed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I did not propose an amendment. I simply made a suggestion to go to the committee of conference.

Mr. QUAY. On page 21, line 8, where provision is made for the expenses of the Postal Commission, I move to amend by inserting after the word "time" the words:

And an additional sum of $7,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. Let the amendment be stated from the desk.

Mr. QUAY. It is an additional appropriation of $7,000 for the expenses of the Postal Commission.

Mr. BUTLER. Have the commission found their labors broader than they thought they were?

Mr. QUAY. This seems to be necessary in order that they may complete their labors to the extent desired by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not the case that they have been given so much work that they can not do any of it intelligently?

Mr. QUAY. They desire, I have no doubt, to do the work thoroughly and faithfully.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from North Carolina will allow me a moment, I think I can explain it.

Mr. BUTLER. I would be very glad to hear the explanation.

Mr. ALLISON. The commission has expended of the original $20,000, I think, about $8,000, leaving $12,000 yet unexpended. The original authority to the commission authorizes the employment of experts, and they ought to be employed, and will be employed, in the line intimated the other day by the Senator from South Carolina. Now, if that is to be done (and it ought to be done, as it is the intention and purpose of the commission to make a thorough investigation), this additional sum will be required. I hope there will be no objection to it. I will state that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] and the members of the commission on the House side desire it.

Mr. BUTLER. I notice that the bill provides for continuing this commission for two more Congresses.

Mr. ALLISON. I have not observed that the bill does that. It ought not to do so.

Mr. BUTLER. One more Congress, I mean. It runs over the next two sessions of Congress. Does the commission think that it will take the time of the next two sessions of Congress before we can get a report from the commission?

Mr. ALLISON. I hope not. I think the commission hopes to have its report ready during an early period in the next session, but we thought we could have a report——

Mr. BUTLER. In December of this year?

Mr. ALLISON. In December of this year. We hoped to have a report at the present session, but found it impossible. The examination took a pretty wide range.

Mr. QUAY. The language of the bill, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me to interrupt him, is that the "commission shall make report as soon as practicable after the beginning of the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress."

Mr. ALLISON. I think that ought to be satisfactory.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will notice that in another section the life of the commission is continued over the next two sessions of Congress. My attention was drawn to that. It is on page 20, line 19.

Mr. ALLISON. That is not the purpose of the commission.

Mr. BUTLER. The bill reads that the commission "is hereby continued during the Fifty-sixth Congress." That covers both sessions.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I would suggest to the Senator to move to change that provision by inserting "until the end of the regular session of the Fifty-sixth Congress beginning the first Monday of next December." The commission certainly ought to have a little time to discuss and debate their report. It will be a very comprehensive one, I am sure, and I will suggest to the Senator that it will necessarily cover more than the railway mail question, now that we have the pneumatic-tube matter under consideration, upon which a great deal of testimony has been taken and more will be taken.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator think—he is the chairman, I believe, of the commission——

Mr. ALLISON. I am not the chairman. I am a very humble member of the commission. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] is the chairman.

Mr. BUTLER. Here are two distinguished members of the commission present. Does the Senator think that the report can be ready by the 1st of January, 1900?

Mr. ALLISON. I hope so, but suppose it can not be. The matter of a report, a matter of great moment, comprehensive in its nature and character, and involving a great deal of testimony, should not be tied down to a particular day, and especially the 1st day of January. We will not be here on that day, probably.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, say, then, "a year from the passage of the bill;" and certainly a year is sufficient.

Mr. ALLISON. I believe that is a very good suggestion, but I think we have reasonably well provided for it by saying "as soon as practicable after the beginning of the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress." I think that is a direction to the commission that will be observed.

Mr. BUTLER. It provides for simply a partial report, if the commission should see fit. Of course the commission will take notice of the intention of Congress by the wording of the act. While we all want as complete a report as possible, and no Senator would be disposed to hurry the commission either, to the inconvenience of the members or to the detriment of the work, yet of course the commission takes notice of the intention of Congress by the wording of the act, and it is a matter of having an understanding.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator that there will be no difficulty about it.

Mr. BUTLER. Then will it be agreeable for me to offer an amendment saying that "one year after the passage of this act," or "one year from the 1st of February," or any time that would be reasonable, we shall get this report?

Mr. ALLISON. Say "on or before the 4th of March, 1900." That would be a very good time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That would be too late. We would have another appropriation bill before that time.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, no. It will be a long session, and there will be no trouble about it. I am sorry that the Senator from Colorado, who is the chairman of the commission, is not present. I think the Senator and the Senate can trust the commission under the phraseology now in the bill, which says, "as soon as practicable after the first day of the first session."

Mr. BUTLER. No one has more confidence in the commission than I have, and it gives me pleasure to state that but a year ago this question that the commission is investigating was debated fully in the Senate. It was debated with a great deal of earnestness and interest, and, if I may be pardoned for saying it, inasmuch as other Senators took part in it besides myself, considerable information was dug up and presented to the Senate with a great deal of care and labor and with some force and effect. There has been a great deal of investigation done for years past. Last year was not the first time this question was discussed, and discussed intelligently, discussed with arguments and facts that were not, I think, met or answered satisfactorily by anybody.

We were told a year ago that Congress wanted to make some reduction; that this matter ought to be reformed and that we must investigate it first; that "we are not satisfied until we investigate it." I suppose every Senator thought that we would have a report before we were asked to vote on another appropriation bill. Here we are to-day with no report, not even a partial report, not even a preliminary report. It seems that the commission has not even investigated one branch of the dozens of important questions they are loaded down with. Now, shall we proceed along for another year, and pass this bill with no understanding that when we come to vote upon the appropriation bill a year from now we are to have a report from this commission?

I submit, Mr. President, that the Senate owes it to itself not to trifle with the country.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from North Carolina seems to have a very indefinite comprehension of what the commission proposes. Does he suppose that any member of the commission is undertaking to trifle with the country? I respectfully dissent from that sort of phraseology. If the Senator wants to secure a report, let him offer an amendment here fixing a time as soon as practicable after the opening of the next session of Congress, and not later than any day he may fix.

Mr. BUTLER. That suggestion is agreeable to me, and I will offer such an amendment. I am glad the Senator has made the suggestion. But still I am sorry that he has construed my remarks as a reflection upon him or the commission.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly not.

Mr. BUTLER. Or that they called forth any feeling.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not construe anything the Senator says as a reflection.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not charge the commission with trifling with the country, but I put in a plea that we should not pursue a course that would lead the country to suppose that we were trifling with them or any just ground for suspicion of that kind. I made no such charge. A careful reading of my remarks, I think, will carry out the statement I now make.

Mr. ALLISON. I take no exception to the Senator's remarks. I move to add:

And not later than March 1, 1900.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment already pending, the one offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; let that be disposed of first.

Mr. QUAY. That had better be disposed of.

Mr. ALLISON. I will then move to amend as I have indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 8, page 21, insert:

And an additional sum of $7,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. Now, the amendment of the Senator from Iowa comes in the third line.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no objection to that amendment?

Mr. CHANDLER. No.

Mr. QUAY. There is no objection to it.

Mr. BUTLER. No.

Mr. QUAY. After the word "Congress," in the third line, insert:

Not later than the 1st day of March, A. D. 1900.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Congress," line 3, page 21, insert "not later than the 1st day of March, 1900."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa, if he does not object to stating to the Senate, whether or not the commission has completed any branch of its investigations; and, if so, what branch? Which one of the many subjects that the commission was to investigate has it pursued up to the present time?

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I take the liberty of saying that the commission has finished no one branch of inquiry. I have hitherto stated to the Senate that the commission only organized one day last summer, and time passed so rapidly that the summer was over before any branch of the inquiry was concluded. Then, in November we began again, and during the winter we have taken testimony and made investigation——

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CHANDLER. Always.

Mr. HOAR. I merely desired to inquire whether any branch of the inquiry had been begun; and if so, what?

Mr. CHANDLER. I was about to state, when prodded by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the main subject of investigation has been the railway mail pay. But incidentally these other questions came up for discussion. I agreed with the Senator from North Carolina that the commission was being loaded by the Appropriations Committee and by Congress, but it was the privilege of the Appropriations Committee to propose an enlarged investigation and it was the privilege of Congress to order the commission to cover the whole field of Post-Office expenditures. We also went on to investigate the pneumatic-tube service. We investigated the subject of canceling machines; we investigated the subject of fourth-class matter, and incidentally testimony was taken upon some other subjects.

Now, Mr. President, all I want to maintain is that the commission has acted with due diligence, and as rapidly and as vigorously as could have been expected, considering all the circumstances. I do not understand the Senator from North Carolina as criticising the commission, and yet it looks very much as if he were doing so when he rigidly insists upon putting a limitation upon the time within which the commission is to submit the result of its inquiries.

I think, Mr. President, that all these amendments which have been put on ought to be left off and the clause continuing the commission left to stand as it came from the House of Representatives. If you can not trust the members of the Postal Commission, I am very willing to say I do not think there are any eight members of the House and Senate who can be trusted.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from North Carolina will allow me a few moments, I desire to say, in one word, on behalf of the report made by the Committee on Appropriations last year respecting this investigation, that if we never had knowledge before, we have knowledge now that there are other subjects relating to the postal service that do need investigation and examination, of which the pneumatic-tube system is one.

I will also say that one of the great controversies respecting the expenditures of the postal service has been that relating to second-class mail matter, it being contended, upon the one hand, that the publishers of the country are being benefited by the low rates of postage on second-class mail matter, and that those who pay 2 cents for an ounce of letter mail are being robbed for the benefit of the publishers.

Mr. President, in dealing with appropriations amounting to $100,000,000, as these appropriations do, annually, and expenditures of a like amount, it is worth while not only to inquire as to the cost of the Railway Mail Service, but respecting the other expenditures by and large, especially great items of expenditure and new proposals of expenditure, in order that we may see whether we can reduce the expenditure properly and still have an efficient mail service.

It is my own view, which was concurred in generally, I believe, by the Committee on Appropriations, that it was not wise to appoint a commission which would deal only with one of the great controverted questions respecting the method of dealing with the mail matter of the country. Therefore we believed that it was wise, instead of confining this investigation to a single subject—which the debate here has shown to be a subject wherein it is necessary—to make an investigation in order to dissipate some of the information or misinformation we had at that time, and endeavor to get the information which would be necessary and proper to make a proper disposition of the Railway Mail Service, including also the disposition of the second-class mail matter, which we were told here over and over again was costing the Government $30,000,000 in addition to what it received as postage upon second-class mail matter. That may be a little thing which should be cast aside without examination or reflection, but it seemed to me that it was necessary to consider that question as well as the other question which the Senator from New Hampshire now says ought to have been included only in the investigation made by the commission.

Mr. BUTLER. Why does the Senator say that misinformation was given to the Senate a year ago? I should like to know what he means by the statement "in order to dissipate the misinformation given to the Senate."

Mr. ALLISON. I mean no reflection on the Senator from North Carolina, because he does not give us misinformation on any subject.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] will allow me, I think the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] alludes to the testimony taken before the Committee on Appropriations of the railroad attorneys of this country, which was printed and came before us, which undoubtedly was a whole volume of misinformation. No doubt that is what the Senator from Iowa alludes to.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the opinion of the Senator from South Dakota, and we now have his view on the subject also.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I am satisfied the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] is correct since the Senator from Iowa has exonerated the Senator from South Dakota and me from furnishing misinformation, because the only other information that has been presented was the misinformation to which the Senator from South Dakota referred.

The question of second-class mail matter, which the Senator from Iowa says is a subject which has not been investigated, and therefore needed investigation, has already been fully investigated by two standing committees of Congress. The question of second-class mail matter has been investigated by the House Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and it had been investigated by the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The House of Representatives had passed a bill prepared by its committee, after a full investigation, dealing with that question. That bill came here to the Senate; it was investigated thoroughly by the Senate committee; witnesses were called from many different States, and a mass of testimony was taken. The Senate committee reported to this body that bill with an exhaustive majority and minority report.

There has been no question connected with the mail service which has been investigated more thoroughly within the last five years than the question of second-class mail matter. So, if there was any question connected with the mail service that did not need investigating by the Postal Commission, it was that question which had already been investigated by both Houses.

It may be, as the Senator from Iowa says, that he did not know anything about the question on account of the heavy duties he has to perform as chairman of the omnium gatherum committee which has assumed to superintend all of us and all other committees. I admit that I do not see how it would be possible for him to have any special information outside of the routine work of his monopolistic committee, and he is a wonderful man who can grasp all the subjects which go through the Committee on Appropriations, as the Senator from Iowa does, without doing anything outside.

But aside from the Senator and those who are burdened down as the Senator has been with the laborious work of the Appropriations Committee, the Post-Office Committees of both Houses, and those who have taken an interest in the subject for the last three or four years have been considering and investigating officially the question of second-class mail matter, you have the testimony now taken in the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and you have the testimony taken over on the House side. I dare say the Postal Commission, as intelligent as it is, as able as it is, as diligently and as thoroughly as it will do its work, will not be able to secure any better, more accurate, or more intelligent and comprehensive testimony on the subject of second-class mail matter than has already been collected and printed by the standing committees of both branches of Congress.

Mr. President, there was no valid excuse under high heaven for again going into this second-class mail matter investigation. I will not say that it was purposely done to load down the Postal Commission, so that it could not within any reasonable time do the work which it was really created to do, but that has been the result. I do not believe the commission can do better work investigating the alleged abuses of second-class mail matter than the two permanent committees have done. I know the report on the House side was exhaustive, for I have read it. I was a member of the committee which investigated the subject on this side, and I know something of the amount of testimony taken by it.

You have the information here, and anybody who wants to see it can have it, and could have had it at any time during the last two or three years. It is useless, and worse than useless, to have this Postal Commission instructed to wade all through that mass of investigation again. Congress has had the testimony on that question before it, and Congress reached its decision intelligently.

The question of railway mail pay is the one that this investigation was intended to cover. That is a big question, but the commission could have covered that question and given us a report by this time. As it is, we have no report now on any question.

But we are called upon to pass another appropriation bill, and one that carries a larger appropriation by nearly $3,000,000 for railway mail pay alone than the bill passed last year.

Mr. President, I understand that the Chair will desire a little time before 4 o'clock to lay certain matters before the Senate, and, as it is only ten minutes till that hour, I will yield now for that purpose and continue my remarks on Monday.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, the Post-Office appropriation bill may go over now until Monday. I desire to give notice that I shall call it up for consideration at the close of the morning business on that day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] will then be entitled to the floor.

PASADENA AND MOUNT WILSON RAILWAY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 11618) to grant to the Pasadena and Mount Wilson Railway Company right of way and certain lands for railway purposes through the San Gabriel Forest Reserve; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill, the title of which has just been read, is an exact copy of a bill which was passed by the Senate yesterday.

Mr. COCKRELL. To what does it relate?

Mr. CULLOM. It is a little local bill giving a right of way in California, which the senior Senator from that State [Mr. WHITE] desires to have passed, and after he had been called home he asked my colleague to attend to the matter for him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read at length for information.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course the bill ought to be read, but I desire to say that we passed an exactly similar bill in the Senate yesterday.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that. I remember the bill very distinctly.

Mr. CULLOM. I am very anxious to have this bill passed today so that it may become a law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate yesterday passed the bill (S. 5446) to grant to the Pasadena and Mount Wilson Railway Company right of way and certain lands for railroad purposes through the San Gabriel Forest Reserve.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. CULLOM. I now move that the House of Representatives be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to make a report covering the changes proposed by that committee in the river and harbor bill as it came from the House of Representatives. The report of the items required by the Senate is now in the hands of the printer and will be here by Monday. I ask that this report may be received now, and sent to the printer immediately, so that it can be added to that report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE SIMPKINS

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in accordance with notice given a few days ago, I desire to call up the House resolutions relating to the death of the late JOHN SIMPKINS, Representative from the State of Massachusetts, and ask that those resolutions may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 23, 1899.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. JOHN SIMPKINS, late a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask to have them read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. JOHN SIMPKINS, late a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended, in order that fitting tribute be paid to his memory.

Resolved, That the Secretary be instructed to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect the Senate, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, do adjourn.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, mankind has always been ingenious in finding phrases which should serve to explain and give consolation for sorrows they could not understand and which seemed too hard to bear. It was this bitter need of humanity which has given us the familiar proverb, coming down across the years from ancient times, that those whom the gods love die young. It was for this reason that—

> The Thracians wisely gave > Tears to the birthcouch, triumph to the grave.

All such phrases were alike the pitiful and pathetic efforts of humanity to deceive itself about its own keenest sorrows and to find concealment and some healing balm for the deepest and sharpest wounds. The real truth differs widely from the soothing words. The death of the very young is always the hardest to bear, and the loss of those who stand upon the threshold of a bright career is to our finite intelligence the hardest of all losses to understand.

These thoughts are inseparable in my mind from the resolution now before the Senate. We are about to commemorate the death of one who was united with us here in public service and pay to him the honors which the Congress always gives to those members who die with the harness on their backs. In this case the man for whom we sorrow and whose memory we honor was young and with a bright future opening before him. JOHN SIMPKINS was born in New Bedford, Mass., in the year 1862, when the country was in the midst of its great struggle for life, and he belonged therefore to the generation to whom the civil war, and all that led up to it, was but history. He was educated first in the public schools of Yarmouth, on Cape Cod, where he ever after made his home. Thence he went to St. Mark's School at Southboro, and from there to Harvard College, where he graduated in 1885. He took an eager interest in all phases of college life, and an especial part in athletic sports, as he was a man of remarkable physical strength. He came out of college popular, well known to all his contemporaries, and master of a handsome fortune.

The story of the men who have raised themselves from nothing, of the poor boys who have struggled up to the highest ranks of fame and fortune, is always the theme of deserved praise, and that the tale has been so often lived and told in the United States is one of the great glories of a land which gives larger opportunities for such careers than any other country in the world. But it is not on this account well to forget that praise and honor also belong to the man who is born to the wealth, the position, the education, and the opportunities which all desire and so many toil for in vain and who is not content to sit idly down and merely enjoy what fortune has given him. To a young man thus endowed by the accident of birth the world looks very pleasant when first he goes forth to meet it, and the temptations to idleness, to amusement, to self-indulgence are very strong and very alluring. The path of easy and luxurious living opens fair before him and is a very easy one to tread. Too many of those thus happily placed yield to the temptation, too many forget that their good fortune makes greater their responsibilities, that their debt to their country is heavier than that of other men because their country has given them more. Some with a sense of duty are too feeble to carry their good intentions into action and turn weakly from the "stern daughter of the voice of God," because, like the young man in the gospel, they have "great possessions."

To the man who resists the temptations and allurements of a life of ease, who feels and acts up to his responsibilities, who does not seek to occupy himself in adding more dollars to the heap which he possesses, but who goes forth to serve the public with a generous ambition and honest aim, "to scorn delights and lead laborious days," great praise and honor are due. Such a man was JOHN SIMPKINS. He began at the beginning. He threw himself into the life of that purest of democracies, the New England town, took his share in the town meetings, and played his part in town affairs. Thence he went to the State senate, where he served efficiently and well. He was active and earnest in all the many fields where disinterested work is sorely needed and where there is no pay to be had. He was one of the founders of a club within his own political party which soon grew to great strength and power and became a vigorous element for good in the politics of the State. A strict and consistent party man, he labored for what was highest and best, both in general politics and within the ranks of his own party. His influence was always thrown for what was most worthy in men and measures or in public action alike within his party and beyond its borders.

In due time he was sent to Congress. He labored here with unflagging industry in the interests of his country, his State, and his district. No national interest was too large, no matter concerning his constituents too small, to command his best thought and his earnest attention. He did not undertake to make long set speeches, but he entered into the work of the House and showed himself on more than one occasion a vigorous and promising debater, well prepared on the subject in hand, and abundantly able to defend himself and his position against attack. He was emphatically a growing man, and his painstaking industry and clear, good sense were opening to him an ever wider career of public usefulness. Thus engaged, and with a life full of achievement and of promise, toward the close of his second term he died suddenly, and without any apparent reason, in the fullness of his strength.

To him with his simple and direct nature, his sound sense and abundant humor, the extravagant words of perfunctory eulogy would be as unfitting as they would have been distasteful to the living man. He loved truth and had no sympathy for unrealities or for the utterance of vain things. We can afford to speak of him as he was. He devoted himself early to the public service and brought to that service high character, earnestness of purpose, education, industry, ability, and disinterestedness. He worked hard and well. He had strong convictions, but was never narrow; he was firm without being intolerant. He was open-handed and generous always, not with the generosity which gives because it is easy, but with the thoughtful kindness which springs from a good and tender heart. His benefactions were many, and were as liberal as they were carefully hidden. He was one of those who really do "good by stealth, and blush to find it fame." With simple, unpretending manners, he was thoroughly democratic in all his ways, and where he was best known there was he loved best, among his neighbors on Cape Cod, where he had always lived. To his personal friends his death was a real and lasting sorrow. To the public which he served it was a serious loss, for he was the kind of a man who can ill be spared, even in these crowded, hurrying days. He was a very honest and loyal gentleman, a faithful public servant, a brave and patriotic man. He has left a memory fragrant with many gentle deeds, and lived a manly, useful life, which his State holds in grateful remembrance.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, it would have seemed a deprivation to me if I had not the opportunity somewhere to say a word about my friend JOHN SIMPKINS. There are many things I could tell of his official career, for my membership on the Finance Committee of the Senate brought me often into contact with him, especially while the tariff bills were being framed. He was most alert for the welfare of the constituency which sent him here, and he was constantly pressing their interests, always with force and with intelligence. But others here have spoken and will speak of his usefulness and abilities as a member of Congress. I want to say a word of the personal qualities of the man.

It had been my good fortune to know him for many years, long before he entered public life, and to have seen much of him after he came to Washington. He was unaffected, direct, and genuine. He hated sham and pretense, and he always looked you in the eye as he talked with you. He had much humor and a most genial nature. With fine abilities, he was modest and almost shy. A truer friend never lived, nor a more manly character. All men who knew him well were greatly attracted toward him, and perhaps the quality they felt most was his unvarying consideration for others and his kindness of heart.

The world keeps full enough, as far as numbers are concerned, and in the conduct of the business and affairs of life there is always somebody to take the vacant place. But a lost friend is not so easily replaced. We gather ourselves together and life goes on about as usual, but there is something gone that never comes back. He left us, however, that which neither time nor his death can take from us—the remembrance of an honorable, true-hearted, straightforward man, who brought good alone to those who knew him, and who has left behind him only pleasant and happy memories.

Only a few days before he died we stood together on the heights near Arlington overlooking the Potomac. It was a glorious morning in early spring; the city lay at our feet bathed in mist, and the swelling hills and the broad river stretched far away until they mingled with the horizon. He spoke of the wonderful beauty of the landscape and of the pleasure it gave him. When I was next in his presence, it was as a mourner at the touching burial service of that beautiful religion which he cherished, and great banks and masses of flowers covered all that was left of him. And as my thoughts turned back to that vision of hill and river, closed to him forever, I realized that perhaps his eyes had already opened where no horizon limited his gaze, in pure ether, and, illumined with the "white radiance of eternity," he looked with unclouded vision upon some fairer scene.

Fame, as men count it, is shadowy and illusive and fickle. Our friend leaves behind him that sort and quality of fame which has always seemed to me most to be desired and the finest. He will be cherished in deep affection until the last of those who knew him here shall go to join him. His identity, his individuality will then be gradually forgotten by men, and what he did will be merged in the general sum of the achievements of his generation. His constituency will be always the gainer because of his faithful service, and the world will for all time be a kindlier world and more wholesome and better because even for the few years of his young manhood JOHN SIMPKINS lived in it.

[Mr. ALLISON addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, the distinguished son of Massachusetts whose memory we are here at this hour to honor seems to have been singularly favored by fortune from his advent into the world, and all his surroundings and advantages were of a character to make life happy and attractive.

He belonged to a family that for many generations had been revered and honored and trusted; his father had successfully managed large business transactions, and left an ample estate to be inherited by his children; personally he was robust and vigorous, and in his early days excelled in manly sports and athletic exercises; he was trained in the public schools of his home town, was afterwards prepared for college, and graduated at Harvard in 1885, with a respectable rank in his class, beloved and admired by his classmates.

Thus he stood at the threshold of active life with the advantages of good birth, a generous patrimony, a sound constitution, a liberal education, and popular manners. Many so situated would have felt that there was no inducement to enter upon an active career, and, instead of struggling for success in the great field of human activity, would have wrapped up their talents in the napkin of ease and personal comfort and enjoyment. But JOHN SIMPKINS had higher and nobler purposes in view. He devoted himself to the public service and to a life of usefulness with a resolve to win fame and position. He discharged the duties of citizenship among the people of his town and county in a faithful and conscientious manner. His splendid home at Sandy Side, near Yarmouth, was the scene of a generous hospitality. He gave freely of his abundance to those in poverty and distress and in a manner so unostentatious that those who were benefited by his bounty were often unaware of the source from which it flowed.

Five years after receiving his college diploma he became a State senator, and was reelected the following year. A year later, in 1892, he served as a Presidential elector for Harrison and Reid, and in this campaign became one of the recognized leaders of his party in his State.

In 1894 he announced himself as a candidate for the nomination of Representative in Congress from his district. His competitor had the advantage of being a resident of a large city, and during a service of three terms had gained many friends and had a strong following. Mr. SIMPKINS entered into the canvass with great resolution and energy. It was almost a house-to-house contest, and a great deal of interest was aroused. The result was in his favor, and he served his constituency so acceptably that he was reelected for a second term. But little more than half of this had passed when the hand of disease was laid upon him. No serious apprehension troubled his friends, for his healthful appearance and strong constitution promised a speedy recovery, but the symptoms grew worse. Medical skill was unable to arrest the progress of his malady, and when life was at its brightest and the future appeared most promising he was called away from earthly scenes and his spirit returned to God who gave it.

I shall not enter into the details of his public life here in Washington. The Senators from his own State are better prepared to do this than I am. But in the brief examination I have made of his Congressional work I have been impressed with his desire to be useful to his own people. His home was on the seacoast. Many of his constituents were sailors and fishermen, and in his committee assignments—on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and Merchant Marine and Fisheries—he was so placed that he could look after their welfare. He especially interested himself in the pilotage laws and legislation to ameliorate the condition of seamen, and was always ready to speak and act when an opportunity was afforded to do anything in their behalf.

Mr. SIMPKINS died in his thirty-sixth year, leaving as a legacy to his relatives and friends a memory fragrant with good deeds and noble acts. Those who were intimate with him bear testimony to his kind disposition, his sweet and gentle nature, and his open-handed generosity, which brightened many a fireside and cheered many a despondent heart. From a human standpoint it would appear that his departure came too soon; but who can foretell what the future would have developed had his life been continued? It was a trite saying more than two thousand years ago that a man's life could not be judged before his death whether as a whole it would turn out well or badly.

I said in the early part of my remarks that he was singularly favored by fortune and he passed away in the full meridian of success and prosperity, after an honorable life, an untarnished record, in the enjoyment of an undiminished popularity. If the future had in store for him trouble and failure and disappointment, such as often falls to the lot of even the most deserving, he was not called away too soon, and in passing judgment upon his life we may well pronounce it a happy one.

He performed his life's work faithfully and well and has gone to his rest leaving his memory to be preserved and cherished by the people of his native State. The regret and sorrow caused by the departure of so good a man is not for him, but for the loved ones in the family circle, the friends who enjoyed his society, the poor and suffering who profited by his benevolence, and the constituency whom he served faithfully, industriously, and conscientiously.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, during the thirty-three years which have elapsed since I first came to enter into busy life at the nation's capital, men in public life have come and gone as fleetingly as meteors across the sky or as the snowflakes of the past week, until at last almost no one is to be seen in active participation in public affairs—I now see here present only the Senator from Iowa, Mr. ALLISON, and the Senator from Illinois, Mr. CULLOM—who with me witnessed in Washington the jubilant and glorious closing days of the great civil war, followed by that tragic event, the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, which so grotesquely signalized the dawn of lasting peace in a reunited country to which that war, through a great price of blood and treasure, had brought the new blessing of universal liberty to all within its borders.

While recalling to mental vision those who have thus passed across the stage before me, pleasing, though quickly transient, in my memory arise the face and form of the subject of this afternoon's memorial exercises in the Senate.

On the 5th day of May, 1897, as the guests of a mutual friend, we sat together during a long conversation which revealed him to me as a true gentleman, a man of high culture, who sought to be guided by lofty principles of action in private and public life; who was, in his views of humanity, imbued with a keen sense of gentle humor, and who possessed a soul full of kind thoughts and sweet wishes for the persons and things he loved.

Thereafter I thought of him as a personal friend and as a public official whose career of bright promise would be adorned with benefits and blessings which he would help to bring to the country he desired faithfully to serve. Alas, these expectations were not to be realized. God, in His inscrutable providence, arrested his life on earth, with little warning, and transferred him from the activities of this world to the unknown duties of a higher sphere, leaving to his relatives and friends only the tender memories which they will forever cherish of his cheerful greetings, his attractive personality, and his helpful labors for their happiness and for the welfare of his State and country.

The events of Mr. SIMPKINS's life have already been briefly narrated by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and they should be carefully contemplated as an incentive to similar careers on the part of the young men of America who may be in like manner blessed from birth with the advantages of full education and ample worldly fortune.

He was born in New Bedford, Mass., June 27, 1862. Soon after his graduation at Harvard University, at the age of 23, he began to take an interest in political affairs. In 1890 he became a member of the Massachusetts State senate. Continuing in the active service of the Republican party in honorable ways, he was elected from the Thirteenth district of Massachusetts to the Fifty-fourth Congress, at the age of 33, and, being reelected to the Fifty-fifth Congress, he died in Washington on the 26th day of March, 1898.

In presenting the life of Mr. SIMPKINS—so short, so industrious, so useful—as one worthy of imitation by other young men of America, it is well to consider the needs of the public for the services of such men in the legislative and executive branches of the State governments and the National Government.

It is not necessary to underrate the usefulness in public affairs of those who are called the self-made men, those who, without early advantages, giving to them college educations and ample means of livelihood while engaging in politics, have yet by native force of character, by rigid self-denial, and by untiring industry forced themselves to the front and have properly become the leaders of men and of nations. The presence of such men will never be lacking and their influence will never fail powerfully to affect the movements of governments and of mankind.

But supplementing the work and influence of the self-made men of America, there is always needed, and now more than ever, the participation in public affairs of the young men of education and fortune, always presupposing that they enter political life not alone with a view to making names and fame for themselves, but with a determination and zeal born of study and reflection usefully to lend helping hands to secure for their State and country such pure and intelligent government as will benefit the people whom that government exists to serve.

In politics in these our present days the poor man who enters public life always finds himself with increased needs for money, and he is frequently surrounded with great temptations illegitimately to increase his income; and too often is such a man lacking in that fearless independence which is so essential to usefulness in public station. From such conditions as these men of ample fortune are exempt. They usually have also the learning which will help to teach them what, in the light of the past experiences of the nations, is on the whole the right way for the State or the country, and they can have no excuse whatever for yielding to inducements of any sort which may be presented to them to depart from the open, clear, and direct paths of public duty.

Irrespective, however, of the consideration of this question of the advantages in public life which belong to men of independent fortune compared with those possessed by men of limited means, the young men of this country, whether poor or rich, should be encouraged to enter early into participation in political affairs. Far be it from me to oppose the continued activity and influence in public affairs of the wise old men of any country. Their counsel certainly should be sought and duly considered to the end of their days. Yet it is not alone for fear that physical infirmities may prevent the usefulness in battle of the old sailors and soldiers of the Republic that the ages of 62 and 64 are fixed as the imperative retiring periods in the Army and Navy. There must also enter into that decision the idea that with advancing age comes a weakening of mental faculties which makes it expedient that the power shall be transferred to younger hands. Is there not also in mind the truth that with age comes too great an unwillingness to change views, to adapt them to changing circumstances, to realize what human progress demands, and to act accordingly?

But such views as these, if they have helped to cause the retirement at certain ages of military officers of the Government, have never yet resulted in compelling the retirement of civilians from service in the State or National Government at any particular age except in the cases of the judges of the courts. The people are left free to keep in their civil service men of any age. The true method, then, is to supplement the labors, the counsels, and the influence of the sages and veterans in politics by the more general advance into the public service of the young men of the nation.

They should not linger too long behind their fathers. When the question was whether the wrongs of the Cuban people should cease, the sympathies and the influence of the young men of America brought on the war with Spain. They also gave success to that war, and by volunteering with alacrity and overwhelming force by sea and land they gave to this country a speedy victory over the Spanish arms.

The old century closes with great questions for decision by the American people, with important action to be taken to determine the destiny of the country in the new century which begins. The responsibility devolves upon the young men of the new America. Their name is legion. Let them think and act intelligently, conscientiously, and fearlessly, realizing that the future prosperity and honor and glory of their nation depend upon them more than upon those of us who belong to the retiring generations of the nineteenth century. Young men, the power, the duty, and the opportunity are yours.

We, the older, perhaps not the wiser, men, after all are only waiting—

Only waiting till the shadows
Are a little longer grown;
Only waiting till the glimmer
Of the day's last beam is flown,
Till the light of earth has faded
From the hearts once full of day,
Till the stars of heaven are breaking
Through the twilight soft and gray.

Only waiting till the Reapers
Have the last sheaf gathered home.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I rise to add my tribute to the memory of JOHN SIMPKINS, late Congressman from Massachusetts. I met him for the first time during the closing days of the last Congress. He had been at Harvard University with my brother, and they had been associated in athletic pursuits there. This fact and the fact that I also was a graduate of that university gave ground for a ready acquaintance, which developed into personal friendship. We happened to be thrown much together, and

I learned to esteem his personal worth and his sterling public qualities.

In social intercourse he was genial and generous. He was one of those men whose companionship was always welcomed by his friends. He was straightforward, brave, and honorable. Having trained and excelled in athletic contests, he had great physical strength and vigor. As a graduate of Harvard University he possessed a fine education and all the splendid advantages of mental training derived at that great university. His early and continued participation in public affairs had given him that practical experience and comprehension without which the mere scholar is inferior in good sense to the man without education. His qualities were sterling and rugged, giving assurance of his continued, lasting success in his public career.

In fact, Mr. President, he was an admirable type of American citizenship. He came of honorable ancestors in the great State which he in part represented. His great-grandfather was a minister, his grandfather the publisher of the first newspaper in his county, his father a successful business man. At an early age he took an active part in public affairs. He had been a member of the Massachusetts Republican State committee, a Presidential elector, and a State senator. With this political training he came to Congress, and was serving his second term at the time of his death.

His friends predicted for him a long and brilliant public career. He doubtless looked forward to such a career himself. But, Mr. President, to-day, instead of eulogy for deeds performed and successes achieved through many years crowned with honor, we have only to express our deep regret, our genuine personal sorrow, for his untimely death and the cutting short of a career of such promise.

Seldom have I been shocked by the death of anyone as I was by the death of Mr. SIMPKINS. We had spent the evening together but a few days before. He was apparently the most stalwart and vigorous of our little party. He seemed in high spirits, bright, active, and hopeful for the future. A few days later, without having known that he had been sick, I learned that he was dead.

Mr. President, the great constituency which he represented has lost a vigorous, capable, and patriotic champion. His family has suffered a bereavement for which time alone can give consolation. His friends and colleagues take this occasion to suspend the important deliberations imposed upon us at this time to pay their tribute of respect and sincere sorrow. Those who knew him will cherish the memory of his genial, honorable, and vigorous character.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, his colleagues in the other House and my colleague have adequately portrayed the delightful personal quality of Mr. SIMPKINS and his valuable and faithful, though modest, public service. Representatives and Senators from other States have responded with tributes not less affectionate and just. I do not think it is needful that I should repeat what they have said, or should undertake to add anything to it myself. I wish only to put on record my sense of personal loss and my admiration and affection for this noble, sincere, and simple-hearted gentleman.

Few men ever came into either House of Congress who won so quickly the cordial regard of every man with whom they came into contact. There was a sweetness, a gentleness, a deference, yet a manliness and strength which made instantly their impression on the most casual acquaintance with Mr. SIMPKINS. The character of the man shone through his countenance as through a window. It spoke in the glance of the eye, in the smile, in the carriage of the person, in the grasp of the hand. Without anything of adulation or extravagance, you were at once aware that you were in the presence of a friendly and hearty nature, pervaded by a sincere good will toward all humanity. He was a man who liked to say pleasant things, but who liked better to do pleasant deeds. His dwelling was the scene of a cordial and refined hospitality, full of good books, tasteful household ornaments, and everything that makes home delightful and dear. No man who has ever partaken of that refined hospitality, who has seen Mr. SIMPKINS in the presence of his neighbors and friends, will ever forget the occasion.

It has been the good fortune of the Massachusetts delegation of late years that they have been a band of brethren and friends, increasing the influence of the old Commonwealth by cordial cooperation in everything that has made for her interest or for the interest of the country as her people conceive it. But of our whole company no man has been more absolutely beloved than Mr. SIMPKINS, and no man has been borne to his grave with a deeper sense of personal loss in the heart of every one of us than he.

I move, as a token of honor to his memory, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions, which includes the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) adjourned until Monday, February 20, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 18, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JOHN BREEN.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1542) for the relief of John Breen, lately postmaster at Gladwyne, Pa.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to give credit to John Breen, lately postmaster at Gladwyne, Pa., in the sum of $1,100, for money orders fraudulently obtained from said office on the 13th day of August, 1893, and to which the signature of said John Breen was forged, and said money orders were fraudulently issued and payment thereof obtained through no fault of the said John Breen.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the report read.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to hear some explanation, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. MINOR), as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1542) for the relief of John Breen, late postmaster at Gladwyne, Pa., having carefully considered the same, recommend that it do pass.

The facts are set forth in the following letters from the Post-Office Department:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 16, 1899.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt (by reference) of your letter of the 20th instant addressed to the Postmaster-General, in which you ask for a statement of the facts in the case of John Breen, late postmaster at Gladwyne, Pa., for whose benefit H. R. 3106 (of which you inclose a copy) has been introduced.

In reply I have to inform you that when a change was made in the form of the money order postmasters were instructed to return to the Department all unused blank money-order forms of the old issue remaining in their hands on June 30, 1894. No forms of the old issue having been received from the post-office at Gladwyne, Pa., a communication was sent to the postmaster at that office calling his attention to the fact that no old forms had been received therefrom, and inquiring whether he had on hand on July 1, 1894, any blank money orders of the old issue. To which, under date of November 15, 1894, I. B. Cornman, postmaster at Gladwyne, Pa., replied: "I never had any of the old forms of money orders and advices. When I took charge of the office, John Breen, former postmaster, told me the money-order business had been suspended, and the blank money orders and advices were given to an agent who called at the office and took a receipt from him." This was the first information the Department had concerning this matter, although Mr. Breen claimed that the forms were taken from him about August 15, 1893.

On November 21, 1894, this office addressed a letter to the postmaster at Gladwyne, quoting the statement made by him in his letter of November 15, and requesting that he would see the late postmaster and request the latter to show the receipt to which he referred and furnish this office with a copy thereof. To this letter the postmaster at Gladwyne, on November 22, replied that he had seen J. Breen, who now "tells me he did not get any receipt. He told me before that he took a receipt. He says the agent produced a paper giving him authority." November 27, 1894, Mr. John Breen addressed a letter to this office, from which I quote as follows: "In writing this note to you in reference to money-order blanks which were taken from this office about August 15, 1893, by an authorized agent of the Post-Office Department. The blank was only taken at that time so that no more could be issued from this post-office—Gladwyne, Pa. But the books and stamp and dater were not taken, but were left here with the understanding that in the near future no doubt would be returned again to Gladwyne post-office. I would state to you that the last money-order issued from this office by me was on August 11, 1893, for $1.50 at Philadelphia, Pa."

When the money-order account of John Breen, late postmaster at Gladwyne, Pa., was adjusted by the Auditor for the Post-Office Department it was ascertained that he had not accounted for money-order forms numbered consecutively from 40 to 50, inclusive, although these forms had apparently been issued at his office and had been paid at various offices in Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, having been drawn for $100 each and dated August 14, 1893. Thereupon it appears that demand was made upon Mr. John Breen for the payment of a balance due by him on money-order account, including the amount of the money orders in question.

From other papers in this case it appears that Mr. John Breen alleges that August 13, 1893, a person of good address called at the post-office in the absence of Mr. Breen and exhibited to Mrs. Breen what purported to be an appointment as inspector or other officer in the postal service and stated that the Post-Office Department had determined to discontinue the small money-order offices and that he was directed to receive the money-order blanks from the Gladwyne post-office; that thereupon Mrs. Breen, being satisfied from the authority exhibited to her and the statements made that the visitor was a postal official, delivered over to him the eleven money-order blanks remaining in the office. No investigation by a post-office inspector was made at the time of this occurrence, because the circumstances were not reported to the Department by Mr. Breen, and the Department had no knowledge of the transaction, which Mr. Breen supposed to be entirely regular.

Very respectfully,

F. H. JONES,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. CHARLES N. BRUMM,
Chairman Committee on Claims, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 18, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that at my request the Attorney-General has ordered the United States attorney for the eastern district of Pennsylvania to continue the case of the United States vs. John Breen and his sureties.

Very respectfully,

WM. L. WILSON, Postmaster-General.

Hon. I. P. WANGER,
House of Representatives.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1896.

DEAR SIR: Responding to your letter of December 11, requesting me to furnish for the use of your committee so much of the report of the inspector as the Department can supply in the matter of the claim of John Breen (H. R. 3106) without prejudice to the interest of the United States, I have the honor to say that in accordance with the promise of my letter of May 16, 1896, to Mr. WANGER, I wrote him on May 28, 1896, a letter of which the inclosed is a copy.

I have examined the inspector's report filed in the office of the auditor, and do not find that it contains any further information than what is stated in my letter as to the facts connected with the claim of Mr. Breen. When I wrote my letter of May 16, I was under the impression that there was on file in the Department some evidence or report giving more definite information with reference to this claim than the subsequent examination of the papers disclosed.

Very respectfully,

WM. L. WILSON, Postmaster-General.

Hon. CHARLES N. BRUMM,
Chairman Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 28, 1896.

DEAR SIR: I have caused search to be made in this Department for further papers relating to the claim of John Breen, late postmaster at Gladwyne, Pa., for repayment by the Government of the amount of certain money orders alleged to have been fraudulently obtained from the post-office at Gladwyne on the 13th of August, 1895, by an individual representing himself as an agent of the Post-Office Department, without being able to find anything bearing particularly upon that case.

It does appear from the reports in this Department that some time in the year 1893 and the beginning of 1894 an individual afterwards identified as Leroy Harris, a former clerk in the New York post-office, had visited various post-offices of the country, and, in the manner alleged by Mr. Breen in his case, had secured money-order blanks from postmasters.

After a long chase by the inspectors of the Department Harris was arrested and transferred to the northern district of Illinois for trial, where he was indicted for passing forged money orders at Aurora, Ottawa, and La Salle, Ill. He was tried and convicted upon each of these three indictments, and on the 21st of March, 1894, was sentenced by Judge Bunn, of the United States court, to confinement in the penitentiary at Joliet, Ill., at hard labor, for five years.

I return herewith copy of letter of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, of date February 25, 1896, relating to the case of Gladwyne.

Very respectfully,

WM. L. WILSON, Postmaster-General.

Hon. IRVING WANGER,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to inquire how it is that a man whose name was forged has been compelled to pay. Under the law the man who paid a forged post-office order or other instrument would be the man to come here for relief.

Mr. WANGER. He has not been compelled to pay, as yet.

Mr. BAILEY. He could not be compelled to pay.

Mr. WANGER. A suit has been pending in the district court in Philadelphia, and has been since 1895, and that trial has been postponed on the recommendation of the Postmaster-General; but finally they have been directed that the case shall proceed to trial.

Mr. BAILEY. It is impossible to obtain a judgment against a man upon an instrument to which his name was forged, unless it might be on the ground that he was guilty of gross negligence in putting the implements of forgery within the reach of other people.

Mr. WANGER. The parties are subjected to the annoyance and expense of a trial, and the testimony is in the Department here. All the United States is required to do is to introduce a bond in evidence and a statement of settlement of the money-order account.

Mr. BAILEY. And all the defendant has to do is to prove that his name was forged to these instruments; and I should think he would want to do that, anyway.

Mr. WANGER. He has to call for the production of the instruments themselves, and he has proved this to the satisfaction of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BAILEY. Has he proved it to the satisfaction of the United States district attorney in charge of the case? If he has, the attorney, I should think, would dismiss the suit.

Mr. WANGER. He has not, but the ground, as I understand it, and on which the United States bases its claim, is that notwithstanding his name was forged he allowed the money-order blanks to go into the possession of another person, who made the fraudulent use of them.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not suppose that even under the circumstances stated in the report negligence of such a character as that would bind him.

Mr. WANGER. I do not think that it would, still there is the annoyance of a trial.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand; but a man who puts it into the power of other people to defraud is fortunate if he is only annoyed with a trial. Now, I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the Post-Office Department has also been satisfied that this man ought to be relieved. I do not understand that the Department makes a direct recommendation to that effect.

Mr. WANGER. The Department has never made a direct recommendation, but the late Postmaster-General Wilson told me about May 16, the time he asked the Attorney-General to continue the trial, that he would so recommend, and repeated that statement at different times; but unfortunately he never dictated his letter at the time of my being at the Department. He would speak of it and then it would pass out of his mind.

Mr. BAILEY. The difficulty in my mind is this: I can not understand how a lawyer representing the Government could expect to recover on the state of facts that are set out in the report. If all that is said is true, and they have said all which relates to the case, it would seem to me that any reputable lawyer would dismiss it at once, because nobody would expect to recover a judgment against a man upon a forged instrument, provided he could demonstrate to the satisfaction of the jury that his name had been forged. Of course I do not mean to intimate that the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows anything outside of the papers, but there must be something in this case beyond what has been developed or else the attorney for the Government would dismiss it.

Mr. WANGER. With one exception; there is a regulation of the Post-Office Department that any postmaster who allows money-order blanks to go out of his possession without receiving the money is liable.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, well, they are suing him for that and not for the forgery.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me a question? Were these orders that had been signed in advance by the postmaster?

Mr. WANGER. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I shall have to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7094. An act providing an additional circuit judge in the Third judicial circuit.

GEORGE A. DICKEL & CO.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3425) for the relief of George A. Dickel & Co., at Nashville, Tenn.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to reimburse George A. Dickel & Co., wholesale liquor dealers and distillers, of Nashville, Tenn., for $1,227.38 expended by that firm for revenue stamps on the 2d day of April, 1897, to be affixed to serial packages 1 to 11 and 23 to 36, containing distilled spirits produced by Cashion & Brown, distillery 577, Fifth district of Tennessee, and sold to the said George A. Dickel & Co., in bond, which serial packages of distilled spirits were destroyed by fire on the night of the same day the stamps were purchased and before they were affixed; that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the said George A. Dickel & Co., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the said sum of $1,227.38 as restitution and reimbursement, and cancel the stamps so redeemed.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 10, page 1, strike out "Cushion" and insert the word "Cashion."

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to know whether the Treasury Department has made any recommendation in this case.

Mr. GAINES. It has recommended payment.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to hear read the recommendation of the Department.

Mr. GAINES. I ask the Clerk to read the letter from the Treasury Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 20, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your reference of H. R. bill No. 3425, "For the relief of George A. Dickel & Co.," Nashville, Tenn., which you submit for a report.

In reply, I have to state that the bill was referred to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and herewith I transmit copy of his report, which meets my approval.

The papers referred with the bill are herewith returned.

Respectfully, yours,

O. L. SPAULDING, Acting Secretary.

Hon. CHARLES N. BRUMM,
Chairman Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I can shorten the consideration of this matter in a few words, and then the Clerk can proceed. On page 2 of the report of the committee you will find a unanimous report filed in this case, and a letter of Acting Commissioner Wilson, dated January 19, 1899, touching upon this claim, and which is referred to in the letter of Secretary Spaulding, just read. I will state, that the House may more clearly understand the contents of the Commissioner's letter, these facts:

Dickel & Co., the claimants, wholesale whisky dealers in Nashville, Tenn., April 2, 1897, purchased revenue stamps amounting to $1,227.38, to be affixed on certain packages of distilled spirits. On the same day, that is, April 2, 1897, these stamps were purchased the packages were burned in the warehouse of Cashion & Brown, and without any fault, negligence, or knowledge of the claimants.

Dickel & Co. purchased the whisky from Cashion & Brown, where it was stored in the latter's warehouse, some 40 miles from Nashville. Cashion & Brown have a claim pending now before the Department, growing out of the loss of their property in this fire. Dickel & Co. can not use these stamps on any other packages than those for which they were originally intended, and, as I have stated, they were burned up, so they are simply out the $1,227.38 represented by these useless stamps, and they now ask that this amount be refunded to them.

The claimants are without fault and had nothing to do with the fire in which the whisky was consumed, and Mr. Schwab states as much in his affidavit, which I have here. On that point I desire to read, in corroboration of what I have stated, the following letter of the Commissioner:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1899.

SIR: I transmit herewith a bill (H. R. 3425) for the relief of George A. Dickel & Co., at Nashville, Tenn., referred to this office by the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives, on the 17th instant, for examination and report. The bill provides for the payment to the said George A. Dickel & Co. the sum of $1,227.38, being the amount paid by that firm April 2, 1897, to the collector of the district as tax due on certain packages of distilled spirits purchased by that firm while stored in distillery warehouse of Cashion & Brown, distillers, in the Fifth district of Tennessee, which warehouse and contents were destroyed by fire April 6, 1897, before the stamps denoting payment of said tax had been affixed to said packages. I also transmit certain papers relating to this matter, heretofore referred to this office; also copies of office letters addressed to the Department under date of March 29, 1898, and May 24, 1898, in reference to the bill for the relief of these parties under consideration.

As stated in letter of March 29, 1898, a claim for the abatement of tax on the spirits alleged to have been destroyed by this fire, which claim is found to include the spirits on which the tax had been paid by Messrs. Dickel & Co., was filed by the distillers under section 3221, Revised Statutes, and disallowed by the Secretary of the Treasury March 14, 1898, the proof submitted as to the actual and accidental destruction of the spirits not being satisfactory.

The claim, however, was reopened for additional evidence June 6, 1898, and while the evidence since obtained goes to show that the fire was not an accidental one, nothing has developed in the case tending in any way to implicate Messrs. Dickel & Co. or any member of that firm in the destruction of the warehouse.

In view of the facts stated, and after careful inquiries made respecting the character and standing of this firm, I am fully satisfied that the destruction of this warehouse was without fault or negligence on their part, and that they are equitably entitled to the relief asked for. The only relief, however, is by Congressional action, and I would recommend that with the above statement of facts the matter be returned to Congress for such action as it may see fit to take.

Respectfully, yours,

G. W. WILSON,
Acting Commissioner.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

It will be noticed in paragraph 3 of this letter the Commissioner says "the claim"—that is, the claim of Cashion & Brown, and not the claim of Dickel & Co.—"was reopened for additional evidence June 6, 1898, and while the evidence since obtained goes to show that the fire was not an accidental one, nothing has developed in the case tending in any way to implicate Messrs. Dickel & Co. or any member of that firm in the destruction of the warehouse."

The fourth paragraph states, "In view of the facts stated and after careful inquiries made respecting the character and standing of this firm, I am fully satisfied that the destruction of this warehouse was without fault or negligence on their part"—that is, Mr. Speaker, on the part of Dickel & Co.—"and that they"—that is, Dickel & Co.—"are equitably entitled to the relief asked for. The only relief, however, is by Congressional action, and I would recommend that with the above statement of facts the matter be returned to Congress for such action as it may see fit to take."

Thus it will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that the claimants' whisky was destroyed without their fault, rendering useless the stamps, and the claimants are out the value of the stamps, to wit, $1,227.83, and we simply ask that they be reimbursed to that amount.

Mr. PAYNE. That is not a very strong recommendation. Is there any provision in the bill that payment shall not be made except upon surrender of these stamps?

Mr. GAINES. I have the stamps in my possession, and will see that they are surrendered.

Mr. PAYNE. I suggest that there be inserted in the bill a proviso that this money shall not be paid until the stamps have been surrendered.

Mr. GAINES. I will personally see to it that the stamps are surrendered before any part of this money is paid.

Mr. PAYNE. Let a provision to that effect be inserted in the bill.

Mr. GAINES. I accept the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection to the bill if an amendment be inserted providing that the stamps be surrendered.

Mr. GAINES. As soon as the bill is open to amendment, I will move this proviso:

Provided, That the stamps herein named shall first be returned.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill with the amendment proposed? The Chair hears none.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. GAINES. I now move to amend by inserting this proviso:

Provided, That the stamps herein named shall first be returned to the Treasury Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GAINES, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRINTING OF MANUAL OF FISH CULTURE.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That there be printed 3,000 copies of the Manual of Fish Culture (with revisions), as contained in the Report of the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for 1897, of which 500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 for the use of the Fish Commission.

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. McLAIN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 5376) authorizing the terms of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi to be held hereafter at Biloxi.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the terms of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi, now required by law to be held at Mississippi City, shall hereafter be held at Biloxi.

SEC. 2. That all processes heretofore or hereafter issued returnable at Mississippi City shall be returnable and proceeded with at Biloxi; and all bonds taken for appearances at Mississippi City are hereby made returnable and require the appearance of parties at Biloxi; and all causes, civil or criminal, heretofore triable at Mississippi City shall be triable and finally determinable at Biloxi.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect immediately upon its passage.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McLAIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FRANCISCO V. DE COSTER.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate bill 2035.

The bill (S. 2035) for the remuster of Francisco V. De Coster as captain of Companies A and D, Mississippi Marine Brigade Cavalry Volunteers, was read.

Mr. DOCKERY. Reserving the right to object, let us have the report read.

The report was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. LOUD. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear some explanation of the bill.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, the beneficiary named in this bill served as a captain without having received a commission. He was ordered to act as such during a vacancy in that position. The captain was killed in action, leaving but one officer entitled to command, Lieutenant Kirk. On the 8th day of July, 1863, General Ellet, commanding the brigade, appointed De Coster to the rank of captain, assigned him to the duties of a captain, and recommended that a commission be issued to him——

Mr. PAYNE. Did he get pay as a lieutenant during the time that he so served?

Mr. HEATWOLE. No; he was paid simply as an orderly sergeant.

Mr. LOUD. Well, Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House to the fact that if the House agrees to pass a bill of this character it would simply be establishing a precedent—a dangerous precedent—that would probably affect a hundred thousand men who served during the civil war in various capacities and were brevetted or promoted or made to perform the duties of some other position than that which they occupied and for which they were paid.

Now, if you put this man on this plane, or if you pay him because he, as a sergeant, had discharged the duties of a commissioned officer, under the orders of a brigade commander, then you establish a precedent for paying every other person in the Army or in the civil service of the Government for the duties of any position he may temporarily occupy.

Mr. COX. Oh, that is a mistake.

Mr. LOUD. Well, now, if that is a mistake will you kindly point out where it is a mistake?

Mr. COX. Why, this man was promoted, so far as the orders were concerned, to a captaincy, and assumed and discharged the duties.

Mr. LOUD. I have not disputed that fact.

Mr. COX (continuing). He performed all of the duties required of a captain, was involved in certain expenditures necessarily pertaining to his rank, and under the circumstances the committee, in considering the matter, unanimously voted in favor of putting him in that position and paying him according to the rank he held.

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a case right in point—a case with reference to which I am entirely familiar. On one occasion during the war I was promoted to the honorable position of a corporal——

Mr. COX. A very high position for you. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. Very high, indeed. I served as such for a period of four or five weeks. I was occupying the position of what was known as lance corporal; but as to the extra pay, I got none.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Were you entitled to more pay as a corporal?

Mr. LOUD. Why, certainly, I would have been entitled to more pay as a corporal. But it was a softer job. [Laughter.]

It is, Mr. Speaker, precisely the same condition that confronts us here in the employees of the House of Representatives. A person gets a position as a folder, and the work is hard and he does not want to do it. He manages to get a detail as a messenger, and then comes and asks Congress to appropriate $1,200 a year for his salary in the softer position. Now, if the House desires to do it in this case, they must do it in all cases where the same circumstances are presented. I tell you that there are fully a hundred thousand similar cases.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Will the gentleman permit me a single statement? Mr. De Coster performed the duties of a commanding officer of this company, having been detailed to that duty by General Ellet, the commanding officer of the brigade——

Mr. LOUD (interrupting). Of course there never was a case where a man was promoted or brevetted that he had not his brevet rank or promotion from somebody.

Mr. HEATWOLE (continuing). But just permit me a moment. He performed all the duties of the office, made requisitions which were honored by the Department as an officer occupying that rank——

Mr. LOUD. I have no doubt in the world but that he performed the duties which were connected with the office. I am not disputing that.

Mr. HEATWOLE. But at the same time he was necessarily at the expense of a captain, and was assured by General Ellet that the commission would be issued to him, and his pay would accrue in that connection. But the commission was not issued.

Mr. LOUD. Well, suppose he did tell him that. Suppose that General Ellet, or anybody else, made such a promise to him, are you to assume that that is binding upon the Government?

Mr. HEATWOLE. Not at all; but there is an affidavit from General Ellet reciting the facts in the case.

Mr. LOUD. I am entirely willing to accept it as a statement of fact; but it makes no difference as to the principle involved.

I am not going to object to this case, but I am willing to swear that I would never present one myself of a similar character. If this House chooses to make this a precedent, I have done all that I could, simply to state my belief as to what would be the result.

Mr. HEATWOLE. This is an exceptional case, where relief ought to be afforded.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, well, of course all cases are exceptional in some regards.

Mr. COX. Well, let us get along with the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I object.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I ask for the regular order, Mr. Speaker, and move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time the committee rose last evening the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] was addressing the Chair on the point of order. The Chair does not see the gentleman from Virginia here now.

Mr. MUDD. I should like to be heard for a moment on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that the question now before the House is the point of order submitted by myself. Everything else than the point of order has been discussed, but I assume that after the almost prayerful appeals that have been made to the House in the last two or three days in favor of the sanctity of the obligations of the rules of this House that we will be able to hold ourselves down to the consideration of just what rule is now under discussion. Two gentlemen who have discussed the question seem to think that if they can show that a previous authorization has been made for the work that will relieve this House from the obnoxiousness of the paragraph in the bill against which the point of order was interposed. The point of order, Mr. Chairman, was made under the last portion of clause 2 of Rule XXI, which says:

> Nor shall any appropriation changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

I am not contending that any appropriation is made here which is not in order, so that you may show all the previous authorization in the world, for the general purposes of the language objected to, and you still do not relieve it from the prohibition of the rule, because it contains a provision for new legislation. This legislation might relate to work that had been authorized, it might relate to objects and works now in progress, and yet under the section of the rule to which I refer, which stands separate and independent of other sections, relating entirely to new legislation, the point of order still, in my judgment, should be sustained.

Now, as bearing upon that, I want to call attention to one point, and then I will leave the matter to be ruled upon.

In order to determine whether or not legislation changes existing law, it is not out of place sometimes to recur to just what is the existing law. The portion of the bill which I claim to be obnoxious to the rule proposes practically to repeal the provision in the last naval appropriation bill carrying appropriations for the Naval Academy. In the last portion of it it says that all of these works are hereby suspended and made inoperative and dependent upon future legislation. In other words, it is the same as if all that we did at the last session was absolutely repealed by this provision, because everybody knows that it is not in the power of even the Naval Committee to tie up the hands of future Congresses, and when you say this work shall be suspended and tied up unless future legislation shall declare otherwise, you have done what in effect is equivalent to saying that you repeal that law.

Now, let me say just a word as to a question of fact before I go further. I take it, sir, that this committee will not assume that the Secretary of the Navy has not performed any part of his duty. There is a general elementary provision of law which assumes that public officers do their duty until the contrary is shown, and I do not know of any reason, either of fact or of law, under which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] or anyone else has a right to assume that the Secretary of the Navy has not done all that the law authorized and required him to do.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. We have a right to know that he has done all that the law required him to do.

Mr. MUDD. Well, you are about the only person in the United States who does not know that he has done it, and it seems to me that you are unwilling to know it.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. If the gentleman talks loud enough, I probably will be informed.

Mr. MUDD. I think it would take more than that to get information to you. I know that it is very difficult to do that.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Thank you. I am inclined to think you are right on that.

Mr. MUDD. Yes; and I think the House will agree with me in that view. Now, Mr. Chairman, not only is the Secretary of the Navy impliedly authorized to prepare and devise plans when he is given authority to contract and construct, because I apprehend it will not be contended that when you are authorized to go into construction of buildings that you have not the right to get plans, but in the act passed at the last session there is specific authority given him to provide plans, and I desire to call the attention of the committee to it.

Under the section of the bill of the last session referring to the Naval Academy, I find the following language:

> The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to contract for the construction, at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., of a building suitable for use as an armory, etc.

Reciting the various acts the Secretary is authorized to do, and for which appropriations are made, "for grading, electric-light wiring, removing old buildings, and preparing plans," etc.

Now, sir, unless the gentleman from Maine proposes to enter into a verbal criticism and a philological disquisition as to the meaning of the word "prepare," and contend that it does not give sufficient authority, I say there has been explicit authority given to the Secretary of the Navy to do all that need be done, explicit authority to provide such plans as he may find necessary and proper.

Now, a word as to what the gentleman from Maine has with such vociferous iteration said of this Visiting Board having no plan. The fact is, the Secretary of the Navy, as he was amply empowered to do, instead of procuring entirely new plans, simply adopted the plans that were formulated by the Matthews board, whose work was put in operation under authority of the Board of Visitors of the Academy during the administration of Secretary Herbert, approved by him, and approved by the present Secretary; and they constitute, in my judgment, such plans for the building up of this Academy and for the rearrangement of the buildings and construction of new buildings as can not be surpassed by anybody.

The Secretary of the Navy has thus prepared and provided plans under specific authority. He may not have adopted plans that may suit the fancy of the gentleman from Maine, but he has adopted such plans as were made by a board of officers who have made that Academy in a large respect their life study. The plans have been approved by Secretary Herbert and by Secretary Long, who constitute fairly accredited authorities of the United States. They may not have met the approval of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. They did not meet the approval of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MUDD. Oh, I understand that the committee has permitted the editorial here that you put in your report out of courtesy to the gentleman from Maine. Now, sir, the simple question is this: Is this portion of the bill to which I have made objection new legislation? It has been decided that an act construing former acts is new legislation in the purview of the rule. It has been decided that an act upon a subject-matter upon which there was not at the time any particular legislation was a "provision changing existing law," on the ground that it changed the general status and the body of the law as it existed theretofore. But this language goes much further than either of these, in that it is in the very teeth of the specific language which the House with practical unanimity put into the bill last session. Those authorized to prepare plans then prepared them. The committee of Congressmen whom it is proposed to send down there next summer are either going to adopt this plan or they will not. If they are going to adopt the same plan, it is absurd and senseless to make the expenditure of money to send them there. If they are going to change the plans, then, sir, in a still larger sense than I have stated thus far, I think it is true that this language constitutes a provision which changes existing law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with these observations, I submit the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I understand perfectly well that this is a question for the Chair to decide, and that it is a question of parliamentary rules. I want, in connection with this ruling, for a moment to call attention to the fact that what is attempted here now in regard to this bill is merely the employment of a technicality to prevent the Congress of the United States, if possible, by regular methods exercising its power and judgment over an important public work that it is proposed to enter upon at the Naval Academy. There is no denial that we are partially committed to-day to the reconstruction of an institution of this country to cost many millions of dollars.

The point of order is raised here simply to prevent what? Not to prevent the carrying out of these plans absolutely, because Congress may determine, possibly, upon the adoption of something similar to these plans or identical with them; but this point of order is raised here to prevent the House of Representatives from exercising its judgment as to its action, and in this peculiar, informal, and unauthorized way be committed to a great public work, involving vast consequences, not only in expenditures, but to the future convenience of this institution. Here is a proposal to practically, within the next few years, dig up everything there is of the Naval Academy. No provision is made for carrying on the work of the institution elsewhere; and these cadets, in whom we are all interested, are kept there, amid the dangers, whatever they may be, of carrying on their studies in the vicinity of a general upheaval of the soil of the whole locality.

Now, that may be necessary, it may be inevitable; but it strikes me as a remarkable thing that a representative of the locality where this institution is situated should come here and attempt to invoke a rule which was put into our code for the purpose of securing and conserving the interests of the American people, to prevent us from doing even by inadvertence a wrong, and it is invoked here to-day to prevent the Congress of the United States taking cognizance of the manner in which a great public work shall be carried forward, so as to prevent waste, so as to prevent the possibility of great error of design, to prevent possibly not only an expenditure of many millions, when eventually we may discover that we have made a great mistake. It is invoked solely for that purpose.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, representing all sections of this country, utterly impartial, having devoted their attention to this subject with the utmost carefulness, have come to this House and told them that in its judgment great public expenditures are to be entered upon that if allowed to proceed for any considerable time in the future will absolutely commit the Government to the carrying out of a gigantic plan which never, up to this time, has been carefully considered by any persons authorized to act for the Government and never has been accepted by any department of the Government in any authorized way.

It strikes me that it is a remarkable proposition that the gentleman should come here and, by interposing a technical point of order, object to having the House consider this proposition; because the Committee on Naval Affairs are by no means insisting that this proposition which we have reported shall be carried out. It is the best we could devise, and, in the discharge of what we conceive to be our duty, we have brought it here and ask this body to consider what we have recommended as the best solution, and to exercise its judgment, and amend, modify, or improve it; but at any rate to remove from the shoulders and consciences of this committee the responsibility for irregularly and unauthorizedly committing this Government to a great work of this kind.

One illustration. While I was at the Naval Academy a few days ago my attention was called to the fact to which I have just alluded, that under this procedure we are to remove practically all the buildings there; that they have all got to be dug up, taken away, and replaced by new structures. The suggestion was made to me, what condition are we going to be in while this is going forward? In connection with the others, a suggestion was made that where the Academy is now located there is a serious lack in the depth of water in the harbor; hardly a tugboat can get up there now. It has been a complaint for years, and this officer with whom I was speaking said to me, "If you are going to rebuild the institution entirely, why not go down to some point" which he named, not far away, where, as he stated, there was ample water.

Mr. MUDD. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Not just now; I wish to proceed.

Mr. MUDD. The gentleman declines to be interrupted?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Oh, well, I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MUDD. You are arguing now that this is not a suitable place for the Naval Academy.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am addressing myself to the judgment of this committee and to the Chair, and they will give such weight to what I say as it is entitled to. This question was, "Why not go and rebuild this institution where the situation is very much more favorable and desirable, and let it go on where it is now located, so far as the work of the Academy is concerned, until this work of digging up the earth and disturbing the whole surroundings has been completed, and then transfer your Academy a mile and a half, or 2 miles, whatever may be the distance, to this location, so infinitely better, and where you can provide for every facility of the Academy without this enormous expenditure of extending the front by a sea wall and filling?"

I call the attention of the House to this feature of the subject because I want the committee to understand the situation we occupy here to-day. We are considering the future interest of the Naval Academy as much as the interest of the Government of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words in reply to what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. It seems to me that those who oppose this section in the bill are justified in addressing the Chair in relation to our position, although the Chair, no doubt, has made up his mind as to what the proper ruling is. I would like to say that it is not proposed by those who are opposed to this section to attack it indirectly, as the gentleman has said, but we are opposed to this section because we believe that if it is adopted it will absolutely prevent the construction of these buildings at Annapolis; and we are in favor of allowing the old law to stand, because we realize that it will perfect the construction of these buildings. Yesterday in his remarks the chairman of the Naval Committee made this assertion: "Every dollar heretofore appropriated may yet be utilized."

Now, what does he mean by "may?" As I understand it, that is a contingent possibility. "May be utilized." It is no absolute fact that it will be utilized. But in the bill passed by this House last year the Secretary of the Navy "is authorized." That is the language. Now, that is an absolute fact. It is a mandatory condition in the bill that authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to construct these buildings. I believe, without taking up any more time of the committee, which I do not desire to do needlessly, that the contention made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] is sound. I would like, Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent to insert in my remarks a newa item in the Brooklyn Daily Eagle of last night in reference to the new Naval Academy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to insert as a part of his remarks the item which he describes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the article:

[From the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, February 17, 1899.]

NEW NAVAL ACADEMY IS NOW UNDER WAY—SEA WALL WILL RECLAIM LAND FOR THE ERECTION OF MODERN BUILDINGS—BROOKLYN MAN LOWEST BIDDER—P. J. CARLIN WILL CONSTRUCT THE SEA WALL AT ONCE AND MAY GET OTHER WORK.

Work upon the new buildings of the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis will begin at once, probably this week. Antiquated structures will be demolished and replaced by elaborate halls of granite, in which the future admirals and commodores will be afforded the most modern appliances and the most comfortable abode during their preparatory course. In keeping with the national growth, the result, in a large measure, of the achievements of the Navy during the recent war, will come a corresponding increase in the Naval Academy. It is preparing to expand, and in place of the collection of makeshift buildings where the cadets have been housed and trained during past years will rise the most elaborate array of modern structures, the construction of which will probably fall into the hands of a Brooklyn man.

Yesterday bids were opened for the construction of the new armory and the boathouse. P. J. Carlin, of 25 Court street, Brooklyn, was the lowest bidder on both of these buildings. He is already under contract to erect the sea wall, and is in Annapolis to-day for the purpose of beginning the work. This sea wall is the first of a series of radical changes and big improvements which are to follow at the Academy. Its building will reclaim a good tract of land from the bay and will make room for the armory and boathouse. The wall will be erected on a pile foundation, upon which big blocks of cement made on shore are to be placed. For the construction of this wall Congress has appropriated $150,000 to be paid out this year.

This contract was awarded to Mr. Carlin about a month ago, and at the same time a bid was put in by the same firm for the erection of the new power house. This amounted to $125,000; and although it was not the lowest bid, the Secretary of the Treasury has advised its acceptance, and it will probably be heard from in a few days.

In the meantime bills were put in for the boathouse and armory. These were opened at the Navy Department in Washington yesterday, and five bidders appeared on each project and eight bidders for constructing both buildings. The original appropriation was $300,000 for each building, but the Navy Department put an additional 25 per cent to this amount, so that granite instead of sandstone could be used. This increase, of course, was subject to the approval of Congress. The bid put in by Mr. Carlin, which was the lowest, amounted to $750,000 for both buildings, or on the boathouse $370,000 and on the armory $380,000. Mr. Carlin offers to build one structure within eighteen months or both in two years. Other bidders on the combined project were John Gill & Son and D. W. Thomas, of Baltimore, $820,323; Grace & Hyde, of New York, $855,000; William H. Ellis, of Cincinnati, $835,000; the Structural Iron Company, of Baltimore, $976,000, and Woodbury & Leighton, of Boston, $840,000.

Secretary Long is now in Boston, and it is thought that he will decide on the award as soon as he returns to Washington. These two buildings are, however, only a minor feature of the extensive improvements to be made. If all bids put in by Mr. Carlin are awarded, he will have contracts at the Academy for over a million and a quarter dollars.

No bids have been asked for the erection of the cadets' quarters, which will be the largest of the new buildings. The armory, which will be located about 200 feet from the cadets' quarters and for the construction of which the bids were opened yesterday, will be 450 feet long and 100 feet wide in the clear. It will be connected with the cadet quarters by a colonnade, so as to afford easy and direct access from one building to another. The main floor of the armory is on a level with the parade ground and therefore about 18 feet below the main floor of the cadets' quarters. The colonnade connecting the two, like the cadet quarters, will stand on a terrace. The plans show that on passing from that building to the armory you would enter the latter at the level of the gallery, which is carried all the way around the interior, serving as a place for the display of models, for spectators at drill, and for the annual ball, which is always held in the armory. In addition to the main drill hall, gallery for models, and the like, the armory will contain a number of recitation rooms, a workshop, and several offices. The armory will be lighted by large circular-headed windows on the sides and by a great arched opening at either end.

The boathouse corresponds in size and general appearance to the armory, and occupies in the plans a corresponding position to the north of the cadets' quarters, with which it is also connected by a colonnade of the same length as the one which leads to the armory on the south. The western end of the boathouse is open toward the basin. Marine ways extend from the basin into the boathouse, so that vessels can be readily run in and housed. It will contain accommodation for 12 cutters, 12 sailing launches, 12 steam launches, 4 small torpedo boats, and 2 large ones. It will contain also six recitation rooms for seamanship, a model room, a sail loft, workroom, blacksmith shop, paint shop, and storeroom.

In the whole improvement to be made at the Academy over $6,000,000 will be expended. Congress has not provided for this amount, but it is thought there will be no difficulty. The new Naval Academy was laid out after plans presented by Ernest Flagg, a New York architect.

Mr. DRIGGS. This clearly establishes the contention of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD], that plans were adopted and contracts awarded by the Secretary of the Navy in accord with existing law for the construction of these buildings; therefore the amendment of the chairman of naval committee clearly conflicts with the second clause of Rule XXI, viz:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

Mr. Chairman, another important question is involved, which is, Shall the affairs of the Government be conducted on business principles or in accordance with the whims of some committee? We probably all believe in the first method. This, then, being admitted as true, it is not just or fair to the eight reputable, responsible business men (who at considerable expense and much trouble submitted bids for this work) to permit this amendment to remain in the bill. I therefore trust, sir, that in your wisdom you may see fit to declare the same out of order.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, is it understood that the point of order which I made applies to all the language that I have named, or only one paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Maryland made a point of order of all that section, beginning at line 17 on page 31, to and including line 17 on page 33.

Mr. MUDD. That was my intention, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that the Chair is ready to rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If so, I will stop, and make my remarks some other time. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. During the discussion of the point of order much has been said of the merits of the proposition. However meritorious or advisable or absolutely necessary any legislation may be or appear to be, it is not the province of the Chair to take that into consideration. And that fact, it seems to the present occupant of the chair, has been emphasized during the earlier days of this week. It is the province of the Chair simply to apply the rules which the House has heretofore adopted to the proposition now before the Chair.

Under the second section of Rule XXI, which need not be reread, because all members of the committee are very familiar with it, the House is prohibited from putting on a general appropriation bill any provision changing existing law or to make any appropriation except for the continuance of objects already in progress. It seems to the Chair, and those who have discussed the proposition, including members of the Naval Committee, have admitted, that this is a legislative proposition. It seems to the Chair perfectly clear that this is a provision materially changing existing law; and so understanding, the Chair is constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Naval Affairs in considering this matter found themselves confronted, of course, at the outset by the difficulty that the House last year, despite the warning and appeals of our committee, incorporated legislation in the naval appropriation bill. This created the difficulty in which we find ourselves to-day; and we had to elect the method which we would pursue in bringing this condition of things to the attention of the House. We naturally had some apprehension in regard to the clause of the rule to which the Chair has adverted; and the committee has, of course, no criticism whatever to make upon the ruling of the Chair.

But we incorporated this provision in the bill with the knowledge that it ought to come before this House, and with the belief that no one would try to prevent it coming before the House for action. Objection having been raised here technically on the part of the Representative from Maryland [Mr. MUDD], it prevented the House from considering this matter under the ordinary procedure. I merely give notice that in the discharge of what I conceive to be my duty as representing the unanimous judgment of the committee over which I have the honor to preside, I shall resort to another of the regular methods provided by the rules of the House to obtain for this body an opportunity simply to express its judgment on this great matter. I shall therefore appeal to the Committee on Rules and ask them to give us a special rule for this special purpose, and in all other ways, with the support of my committee in absolute unanimity, I shall endeavor to prevent the further committing of the Government in the direction of this unauthorized procedure by seeking in every way to prevent future appropriation along this line until Congress shall have some opportunity to authorize the methods by which the design shall be carried out and the money expended. I ask that the Clerk read the bill.

Mr. MUDD. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 16, on page 31, insert:

"For completion of buildings and other works authorized under the act making appropriation for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, under such plans as may be adopted by the Secretary of the Navy, not to exceed in cost $1,220,000, $720,000."

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have the Clerk read a letter of the Secretary of the Navy to the chairmen of the Committees on Naval Affairs of the House and Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letter as a portion of the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 23, 1899.

SIR: Referring to the matter of the buildings about to be erected at Annapolis for the Naval Academy, I beg to say that, in accordance with the suggestion of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, the architect was directed to make the plans and specifications for buildings to be constructed of granite, as this material is specially desirable in view of the permanency of the buildings and their dignity and importance. The architect, Mr. Flagg, reports to me:

"I have planned all three of these buildings as economically as I could consistently with good workmanship and stability. But they are necessarily so large that they can not be built of granite for the amount appropriated. Judging from the power house, I should say the armory and boathouse will each cost $400,000. I should be sorry to see the work delayed, but if I may venture a suggestion, inasmuch as the difficulty has arisen, would it not be best to ask Congress now to appropriate enough to build all three buildings, making the money so appropriated immediately available. This means an additional appropriation, say, of $220,000."

The three buildings to which he refers, and which are the only ones thus far authorized—although they are a part of the general plan which will take some time to complete—are the power house, the armory, and the boathouse. The appropriation for the power house was $100,000. The Bureau of Navigation report to me that the lowest bid for the construction of this power house was $114,000, to which should be added $4,750, in case enameled brick are used to face the walls of the engine room and the coal hoisting tower built in connection with the power house; also that the next lowest bid, which is recommended as the most advantageous, was $116,900, to which should be added, as above, $5,662.

Under these circumstances, if the buildings are to be made of granite, which the Department recommends, the Department approves the suggestion of Mr. Flagg that there be an additional appropriation for these three buildings of $220,000, and that the money be made immediately available.

I expect Mr. Flagg will be here during the present week, and I will take the liberty of asking him to call and confer with you and your committee.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG.

Hon. C. A. BOUTELLE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MUDD. I now ask the Clerk to read a brief paragraph, which I have marked, from a paper that I send to the desk, which is an extract from a letter sent by the Secretary of the Navy to this House at the last session.

The Clerk read as follows:

The following important buildings have been surveyed and found to be unsafe: (1) The armory, which was abandoned until supported by the erection of heavy timber props along the western wall; (2) the boathouse, which was declared unsafe for many of its original purposes and unworthy of repair.

Mr. MUDD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy but very little time on this subject. At the last session of Congress we appropriated $500,000 for the reconstruction of the two buildings which the Secretary of the Navy says are about to tumble down, and one other, a power house, which I apprehend there is no need of argument to show that the Naval Academy ought to have. In addition to this, we authorized the Secretary of the Navy to contract for buildings to cost $1,000,000. While we appropriated only one-half million dollars, we in fact authorized the expenditure of $1,000,000—that is to say, we authorized contracts to that amount.

Bids for these three buildings were given out with the understanding that they should be constructed of brick. After a little time, however, the Secretary of the Navy came to the conclusion that if we were going to build up this Naval Academy it was proper that we should build it up in the best and most enduring manner; so he concluded to put out the bids for the construction of the buildings of granite. If they are to be thus constructed, in accordance with the recommendation of the letter read at the desk and as he asked Congress to give him authority to do, he will need an additional sum of $220,000.

In effect my amendment simply gives him $220,000 additional, because, while the amendment purports to appropriate $720,000, $500,000 of that sum is to cover buildings for which bids have been already put out and for which the Secretary may be said to have already contracted; and the $220,000 additional is to enable him to construct the buildings of granite instead of brick.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Navy, I repeat, has said in a communication sent heretofore to the House——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have a few minutes more.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. MUDD. The Secretary of the Navy, as I was about to say, who, I apprehend, feels the same interest that we do in this great institution of the Government—certainly as much interest as any of us on the floor of the House could possibly feel—has stated, in the communication that I had read from the desk a few moments ago, that the chief buildings which are necessary to be reconstructed, and in reference to which the recommendation for their reconstruction has been made, are about to fall down.

They are, in other words, in a dilapidated and possibly in a dangerous condition. I have been there myself and speak upon the testimony of my own eyesight when I say that the armory building to-day, unless it has been already torn down, as I hope it has been torn down, is in a dangerous condition and is propped up by timbers to prevent it from falling down on the heads of the students who are compelled to be in the building. I know that to be a fact. I have seen this condition of affairs in the armory, and I presume that the members of the Naval Committee who have investigated the matter have also seen it and know the facts I state to be accurate.

Now, sir, the question presented to us is, Will we retard the beginning of this great work, which is so necessary, for a period of about eighteen months more, instead of beginning it now, because the Committee on Naval Affairs seems to think the best policy that we can pursue is a policy of delay in prosecuting—even in beginning—a work that should have been done twenty years ago?

The gentleman from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, has submitted his views to the House, and contends that if we want to go to work to build up the Academy, the best way to do it is by still further pursuing this general policy of delay which is recommended by the committee. He contends that the best way to build up the Academy is practically to tear it down. He contends that if you want to go to work to build up an institution of this character, you must do nothing and suspend all the operations that have heretofore been commenced. He has faith in the "manana" policy of Spain. He believes that the best way to do a thing is to delay it and then to provide some means to prevent the possibility of its being done at any time.

That seems to be the policy of the committee. They want to postpone operations, to create a junketing committee or commission to go to Annapolis to get light for members of Congress and the Navy Department for the performance of their respective duties. I concede, of course, that the interests of the nation are borne in mind by these gentlemen, and I do not doubt that this committee is honest and conscientious in its efforts. But I beg to differ with them. I think it best to commit this entire work to the control of the Secretary of the Navy, with the assistance of such agencies as he may desire, to enable him to make proper prosecution of it. I do not believe it is good policy or good form to commit the execution of such works in any part to committees of Congress. I do not think we ought to legislate for public buildings in the manner proposed in this bill, or constitute ourselves a body of architects to pass upon the merits of plans and propositions which must necessarily be determined by the officials in charge of the work.

Mr. BERRY. I would like to interrupt the gentleman for an inquiry. I would like to ask him how were the plans arrived at by the Secretary of the Navy? I understand that plans have been prepared and presented and have met the approval of the officials, or some of them.

Mr. MUDD. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] has repeated the assertion, which he previously made, that there has been no general plan. Four or five years ago there was a plain, exhaustive, comprehensive, general plan devised by a committee of prominent naval officials, and it met the approval of the officers of the Academy and the Department, and I think of all others to whom it was referred; a commodious plan, which was calculated and was expected and believed to meet the requirements of the situation and furnish all that was required and all that was desired at the Academy.

In the bill of last year we authorized the Secretary of the Navy to prepare the plans for the work he was therein authorized to do. He adopted plans that the commission—known as the Matthews board—desired, which had received the approval of Secretary Herbert, and it is in accordance with those plans that it is now proposed to construct the buildings heretofore authorized and for which further appropriation is now asked of Congress in the amendment which I have offered. And, sir, in support of my contention that there are plans, and adequate plans, for the buildings we seek to place there now, if the gentleman from Maine would read to the House the papers I hold in my hand, which he has seen, or if I could have time to read them, they would show that these buildings are to be placed on the exact spots which are recommended by the Matthews board, which gave a thorough and full investigation to the subject and provided an elaborate and harmonious system for the rearrangement and construction of the Academy. So there is a carefully prepared and well-devised plan of work.

The buildings are not to be constructed without a plan, but in pursuance of the general plan, and the excellent plan in my judgment, which will make them as a whole, in architectural finish and appearance, and in convenience of location and attractiveness, a suitable framework of one of the grandest institutions of the kind in the world, as this Naval Academy ought to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MUDD. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that I may have a few minutes more.

Several MEMBERS. "Regular order!"

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I hope the objection will be withdrawn. The gentleman is so very entertaining——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MUDD. I thank the gentleman from Maine for his courtesy.

Now, here is the situation: If we want to build a naval academy, let us go to work and build it. The Secretary of the Navy of the United States again and again has reported that the buildings at present at Annapolis are not fit for the purposes to which they are to be applied. He says that they are not safe. I think myself that these young men who constitute the flower of the Navy of the United States, the men to whom we are to look in future for our naval victories, are entitled to better treatment than they have been receiving in the miserable old rookeries in which they are now confined.

I do not believe that we ought to allow their young lives to be placed in jeopardy in buildings about to fall down over their heads because the gentleman from Maine thinks that there ought to be a report from some Congressional committee appointed to examine, prepare, and suggest plans for the reconstruction of the buildings. We are spending millions of dollars for battle ships—it is right and proper that we should do so—but I think the construction and building up of a good naval academy is of as much service to this country as, for instance, at least one battle ship.

The money necessary to build one battle ship would do nearly all the work that is contemplated now and for the future. We are paying salaries of Cuban soldiers, we are making a donation of $20,000,000 to Spain in return for that which we are said to have acquired in the Philippines, we are concerning ourselves much over projects for sanitation in Havana, and yet down here in the nursery of our own Navy we are pursuing a policy of parsimony and niggardly economy, endangering the lives of those who are to make up the greatness of that Navy in the days to come, in order that there should be delay in the preparation of plans by a junketing committee of Congressmen.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Naval Affairs was confronted with an anomalous situation when it reached the estimates for new buildings at Annapolis. It was facing a condition and not a theory. The House had appropriated $500,000 for the construction of three buildings and a quay wall there last year. In the discussion that ensued the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCINTIRE], I believe, referred to a plan recommended by what was known as the Matthews board.

Being entirely at sea with regard to the situation, the Committee on Naval Affairs asked the Secretary of the Navy and the commandant at Annapolis to come before the committee and give them information. It was discovered that the contract for the building of the quay wall had already been given out. This necessitated the filling in of about 7 acres of water front. The contracts for the three buildings had not been given out, because no bids had been received that would come within the amount of money appropriated.

Then the Secretary was asked if the quay wall was being constructed in accordance with any plans. He said that it was being constructed in accordance with the plans recommended by the Matthews board. It seems that the Matthews board had sent in to the Secretary a plan, so far as I could see, without recommendation, drawn by Mr. Flagg, an architect from New York.

Upon endeavoring to ascertain the authority for the Matthews board, we learned that it had been appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, not in accordance with any act of Congress, but because the Board of Visitors to Annapolis had recommended that the Secretary should appoint a board to report a plan for the reconstruction of the buildings at Annapolis. The Matthews board had sent the plan of Mr. Flagg.

No money had ever been paid for it, no money was asked for it, but the Secretary was intending to build the three buildings and the quay wall authorized by the House, in accordance with this general plan. He undoubtedly believed that it was his duty to see that the reconstruction of the Academy should be begun in accordance with some general plan, or the money would be wasted. The Committee on Naval Affairs discussed the situation for two weeks at least, and finally came to the conclusion that the best plan would be to get up some plan authorized by Congress. They therefore drew up this provision in the bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, the authorization of the $500,000 in the last Congress gave the Secretary the power to remove buildings at Annapolis, and several buildings there have been torn down. The commandant began by destroying the marine barracks, and we have been compelled to put in a provision for a temporary structure for the marines on the other side of the river. Other buildings have been torn down, and the Academy is certainly in the dilapidated condition which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] describes.

Of course, under the plan submitted by the Naval Committee—and I do not advocate that plan—the construction of buildings would be delayed for two years at least. I saw in the Washington Post a week ago a statement that the authorities at Annapolis had found it necessary to construct temporary quarters there for 127 cadets. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, in view of the delay required under the bill, that it would be better for the House to continue the construction of the buildings already authorized rather than delay the work for two years. The work has already been authorized and begun. The Secretary of the Navy has the matter in charge and is working after a general plan. I am not entirely satisfied in my own mind with either measure, but prefer the one that will give direct and practical results.

It seems to me unfortunate that last year the House did not act with more care and give the Secretary of the Navy authority to accept any plan he saw fit; but he has acted wisely in working from a plan because it would be better to construct the buildings in compliance therewith than to construct them haphazard and have a hodgepodge of architecture under the guise of a reconstructed naval academy.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the situation. I simply wanted to detail it so that the members of the House can understand it and vote intelligently upon the proposition. Let the work go on under the supervision of the Secretary of the Navy, and I am satisfied that we will have an academy that will be creditable to the Department and to the nation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the discussion regarding these proposed buildings at the Naval Academy. I understand that the purpose both of the mover of the amendment and of the chairman of the committee is to perfect these buildings. The delay asked for by the committee is for the purpose of obtaining comprehensive plans, plans that will present a harmonious whole, but that involves, according to the suggestion of the committee, a delay possibly of a year in the commencement of construction.

The mover of the amendment, the gentleman from Maryland, insists that the work should go on in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, and that a sufficient sum should be appropriated now in order to perfect these buildings according to the plans of the architect and to construct them of the best material that may be obtained. Now, it seems to me the object of both these gentlemen can be accomplished, and can be accomplished by present action. So far as the plans are concerned, it seems to me that we can much better leave the plans for these buildings to the Secretary of the Navy, aided as he is by competent engineer officers of the Navy, aided as he is by Mr. Flagg, known to be one of the most competent architects of the country.

We can safely trust this work to them; and we are more likely to have satisfactory results than if this question is left to a committee composed of members of the Senate and House of Representatives. We have the judgment of trained men, men trained in the Navy, trained in its requirements, men trained in engineering, men trained in architecture; and it seems to me we can safely trust the plans to them. It seems evident, however, that we have not appropriated sufficient money for such buildings as ought to be constructed there, and it seems that this money ought to be provided now.

The Naval Academy will play a very important and prominent part in the educational system of this Government, and in the Government itself. The Navy of our country never yet has failed us in any emergency. The Navy at the commencement of the war made no mistakes and no blunders such as have marked the administration of our War Department. What is the reason of this? The difference is not in the men, for the officers of the Navy come from the same class as the officers of the Army. They come from the same source, the great body of the people. The difference must be in training. The naval officer, the man who graduates at Annapolis, becomes immediately a citizen of the world. He travels all over the world in the ships of the United States Government; becomes familiar with all races and all peoples. He is required in the practice of his profession to acquire some knowledge of international law, and, finally, both in the subordinate and superior commands of ships themselves, he has more or less to exercise government—government over almost everything that pertains to civilization. Machinery, electricity, sanitation, discipline, all come under his observation and within the range of his experience.

How is it with the Army officer? Just as soon as he graduates at West Point he is sent to some frontier post. His range of experience hardly ever goes beyond the company or the battalion with which he is connected. His training from the time he leaves the Military Academy tends toward provincialism, while the training of the naval officer makes him a citizen of the world. Then, when the emergency comes, we have in the Navy trained men—not inexperienced men. There are no blunders, no mistakes. We dare not trust a ship worth $5,000,000 to untrained men, though we will intrust a regiment of a thousand precious lives to untrained men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that my time be extended ten minutes.

Mr. DAYTON. I have no objection to a reasonable extension of the gentleman's time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Five minutes will do.

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWLANDS. These men, then, these trained men, these men who learn the science of government, these men who acquire a knowledge of international law, are the men through whom this country is to have its contact, in the larger extension of its energies that has taken place, with the outside world, and it is of the highest importance that this school above all other schools should be enlarged, increased, and perfected.

For my own part, I believe that the men who are to govern these new acquisitions just acquired, whether permanently or temporarily, should be turned over to the Navy rather than to the Army, simply because they have had the training that fits them for government. They acquire in traveling about the world race tolerance and a knowledge of the peculiarities and weaknesses of other races. This was exhibited in a marked degree in Cuba in the late war. You will all recollect the famous battle between the marines, the naval forces at Guantanamo, and the Spaniards, a battle lasting for several days, a continuous battle day and night. You remember there that the officers of our naval forces spoke in terms of commendation of the great services that were rendered to them by the Cuban allies. Now, why did they get good service out of them, and why did our Army not get good service out of them at Santiago?

Simply because our naval officers in traveling about the world had obtained some knowledge of other races, the peculiarities of the Latin race, their pride, their high sense of courtesy, their punctiliousness, and thus they were enabled to utilize and make efficient the very men that were regarded so contemptuously by our Army officers, who had not acquired race tolerance, but who, on the other hand, by reason of their provincial training in this country, had contracted a degree of race prejudice. From our Navy, therefore, should come not only the men who are to command our ships, but the men who are to administer our affairs in these new acquisitions, and the Naval Academy becomes important as the training school of those who in time should assume the duties corresponding to those belonging to the colonial system of England.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Does not the gentleman from Nevada deem it very important that in entering upon a work like that which is proposed here the proceedings should be regularly authorized and well considered?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Does the gentleman entertain the opinion that there has been taken that consideration and been provided that lawful authorization which is certainly desirable in a proposition that is to revolutionize and entirely reconstruct a great institution of the country, involving an expenditure of many millions of dollars?

Now, I want to appeal to the well-known candor of my friend from Nevada, and ask him if he really believes that it is the proper method for us to legislate and put one or two million dollars, or any other sum, into this appropriation bill, to be expended by the Secretary of the Navy in repairing the Naval Academy on some plan, or any plan that he may see fit, that may be thrust upon him by more or less prejudiced or more or less ill-informed advisers? Does he think that the Congress of the United States would be justified on a basis of orderly procedure in putting block appropriations into money bills to authorize an executive officer, who may be changed to-morrow, to go on and expend that money, not only so far as the appropriation is concerned, at will, but to expend it in such a way as might necessarily involve the expenditure in addition of an enormous sum and carrying out improvements and changes on a gigantic scale that no one has ever considered?

Is not, in the opinion of the gentleman, the Committee on Naval Affairs acting in a wise and conservative way when it comes to the House and states what the House did not know before, that we are being committed to an enormous outlay, a gigantic operation, the limits of which are not hinted at, and asks the House as to the wisdom of having some proper, legal, regular method of investigating and determining what we are to do, the extent of what we are to do, and the manner in which it shall be done?

I assure the gentleman that so far as my knowledge is concerned, and I have studied the question with all the ability that I could bring to bear, I have no knowledge of any authorized limit to what may be done under the guise of rebuilding or under the guise of removing and replacing unfit buildings at Annapolis. I do think there ought to be a limit, and I think the gentleman from Nevada thinks so himself.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that I have heard no suggestion about revolutionizing the Academy.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. When I say revolutionize, I mean to pull down every vestige of what is there, and replacing it with something else, located in different relations to each other from what the buildings now are. I mean it is to be re-created on some basis which is not presented to Congress, and which Congress knows nothing about, and the expense of which I understand can not, in its outer limit, be estimated, but which will necessarily involve anywhere from six to ten million dollars.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that it is one thing to re-create the buildings and it is another thing to re-create the Academy. We do not propose to re-create the Academy. We are satisfied with the Academy, with its professors, with the method of construction, with the high sense of honor that is taught there, and everything that pertains to it. We seek only to enlarge it, to extend it, and give it proper quarters. The question of quarters is simply one of administration. I contend that we have in the Navy Department a force of men more competent than any committee of Congress to determine the needs of these buildings, their general scope, and expend the amount of money that should be expended upon them.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The gentleman does not wish to give the impression that we should yield to the subordinate officers, without any authorization or any sanction, to determine how great an expenditure of public money should be made to re-create or remove the buildings of the institution now existing, and to replace them with others?

Mr. NEWLANDS. We simply leave to the Executive Department the plans for the buildings that are to be administered by that Executive Department.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. And we are to appropriate so many million dollars——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Not necessarily.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. And allow the Department to build whatever it sees fit.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MUDD. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] be extended for five minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I make the same request.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Now, the gentleman from Nevada certainly does not propose——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I certainly do not propose to turn over to the Navy Department the determination of the amount of money that is to be expended there. That is a matter within the control of Congress, of course. I propose that Congress shall exercise that control; it has already exercised it.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is not exercising it in this amendment, because the amendment proposes to give to the Secretary of the Navy authority to spend so many million dollars as he sees fit; and the only limitation upon the provision is that he shall spend that money in the vicinity or on the grounds of the Naval Academy; otherwise he may do whatever he sees fit. Now, I submit that this is not in accord with the custom of the Government from its foundation, and I do not think it safe legislation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The place for those buildings is determined; they are to be upon Government ground.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What I wish to impress upon the gentleman and the House is that that matter has never been determined by any authorized method.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I mean to say that the ground on which it is proposed to erect these buildings is now in the ownership of the Government, is it not?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I mean to say this: Just what Government property the Secretary of the Navy shall cause to be destroyed and removed to enable him to locate some new structure upon the site is not defined anywhere, and nobody knows what is to be the determination in that respect. We do know that under the orders of the Superintendent of the Academy within the last year the marine barracks were torn down and removed; that the boathouse and other structures, which have been appropriated for and built by the Government at great expense, have been removed.

The gentleman is a good enough lawyer to understand how much authorization there has been when I refer him to the language of the appropriation of last year, put on in the Committee of the Whole, which simply appropriates a block sum of $95,000 for electric light and some other items—preparing plans, removal of buildings, etc. And without the removal of any special building having been authorized anywhere, the Superintendent, or whoever else may have taken charge of this work, has proceeded under that appropriation to remove certain buildings at his will and discretion; and the marines have been transferred across the river because their quarters, which the Government built for them, have been taken away. This has never been authorized by Congress. Buildings have been torn down and removed without any authority of Congress, and the location of the new buildings to take the place of those removed or torn down has not been fixed. One of the items recommended to us in the estimates this year for insertion in this bill was for a new cadet barracks to cost $3,500,000. The location of this new structure has never been determined by anybody.

A bill which might be brought into this House to appropriate fifty or sixty thousand dollars for a public building in some community in this country would be doomed from the outset if it proposed that the money be put into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, who should locate the building wherever he saw fit, and who might proceed to do work which would involve a future expenditure enormously exceeding the original proposition.

The proceeding in the present case is entirely irregular. We are not complaining of the improvement of the Academy; we are not opposing it; we are in favor of it. But we want some method or plan laid down; we want to know something about the probable limit to which this work is to be carried, what it is to cost, and the manner in which Government property at Annapolis today is to be destroyed and replaced by new buildings.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now will the gentleman listen to me?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will not disturb the gentleman further.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say that I am not wedded to any particular form of amendment.

Mr. MUDD. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment? This amendment provides for the construction of three buildings which are specifically named, at an expense which is limited, in pursuance of a plan which the Secretary of the Navy has approved, and upon a location which has been fixed.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, whatever that may be, means that he is going to proceed to locate still more of these new structures according to this plan which has never been authorized by anybody. The gentleman understands perfectly well that when the Secretary of the Navy has appointed two or three officers to go down to Annapolis and look over the buildings and make recommendations to him, that does not authorize the design which they may report; there is no sufficient authority in such a proceeding.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, all I have to say to the gentleman is that if no plans have been authorized, we can authorize them now; if no Government board has been authorized, we can authorize it now.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. We have not the necessary information.

Mr. NEWLANDS. In my view the Navy Department is competent to take hold of this thoroughly executive matter. The parallel which the gentleman has drawn between an appropriation for a public building and this improvement is not a correct one. When a public building is ordered by Congress, does the Congress of the United States authorize the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee to determine the plans?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No; it is done by a commission.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is left entirely to the Treasury Department, and a provision is inserted in the bill allowing the Supervising Architect to make the plans, or providing for competitive bids from architects throughout the country.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That is precisely what we desire to provide here.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And that can be done now by adding to the provisions of the amendment which has been presented.

Now, if the gentleman from Maine and the committee are not satisfied with the plans which have been prepared——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I know nothing of them. I have not studied them.

Mr. NEWLANDS (continuing). We can authorize the Secretary of the Navy to invite bids from various architects, five or more, as the provision in the bill contemplates, to make sketches and suggestions.

Mr. CANNON. Now, just on that point, if my friend will allow me, I desire to state that I am quite in harmony with many of the suggestions he makes. It seems to me, if I understand his position, that I should not object to his suggestion. But what I wish to say, and I want to know if we understand it in the same way, is that the buildings, the entire plan of the construction and location, as they are liable to be, on the present site—that is, if you complete the whole thing to correspond with what is desired and is admitted to be necessary, I believe it is conceded that the cost will reach the sum of $12,000,000.

Mr. McINTIRE. Six or eight millions has been estimated as the amount.

Mr. CANNON. Well, whatever it may be, whether it be six millions or eight millions or ten millions, we ought to be able to devise a plan in advance of the prosecution of the work.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is the very point that I am suggesting.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me a moment.

I am quite content if you fix the limit at any sum which in the judgment of the House may be proper for this expenditure. That is the rule governing the Treasury Department. They can make the plans, but they can not break the limit of the appropriation.

Now, it seems to me that that provision ought to be applied here. I am inclined to think that five or six millions ought to be sufficient, and that the expenditure could not and ought not exceed that. The building of the Library of Congress, out here, cost only $6,000,000, though it was liable at one time to cost the Government $15,000,000; and yet it is an entirely satisfactory building.

Mr. BERRY. And that was built by the Army.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am inclined to think that an appropriation of $6,000,000 would be ample——

Mr. CANNON. It would seem so.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Provided we have, and we ought to have in advance, a comprehensive plan, so that the buildings will fit in with each other. But all of this can be provided for in connection with the amendment which is pending. We can provide all that is necessary to carry on the work; and I insist that we should not wait a year or longer, but should proceed with it now. We do not need to wait for a report from a commission, representing any of the Executive Departments, or any department of the Government anywhere. We know precisely what is required.

Mr. DAYTON. Do you think this body, or any other set of men, could go to work and in two or three or four or six weeks' time, with no information of any kind or character, formulate a general scheme or plan for rebuilding the Academy buildings, involving an expenditure of six or eight millions of dollars, without the assistance of architects, men competent to prepare plans and specifications for such work? That is the reason the Naval Committee reached the conclusion it did reach, that a commission should be appointed for the purpose of investigating the matter and determining upon the character of the work to be performed. It is a reasonable suggestion, and one that seems to me should commend itself to all of the members of the House.

Now, the delay is but for six months altogether, if the plan of the Naval Committee is pursued, but if you strike out that provision it may be two years or longer before the work may proceed.

Mr. McINTIRE. I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia if there is not already a matured plan for this work, a plan which was prepared by the Matthews board, which is before the Committee on Naval Affairs, which was considered by the committee and by the Secretary of the Navy, and the expenditures involved are specified, running from six to eight millions of dollars, upon which plan Congress voted two years ago and authorized the expenditure of certain sums of money in the direction of the pursuance of those plans? Is it not also true that the work already done—the improvements inaugurated at Annapolis—are in accordance and in conformity with that plan—the Matthews plan, to which I have referred?

Mr. DAYTON. It has been asserted over and over again that no matured plans had been prepared and adopted. There was no Matthews plan accepted——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No plan was authorized by anybody who had a lawful right to make a plan.

Mr. McINTIRE. But was not the plan, which was prepared by somebody, approved by the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No, sir.

Mr. DAYTON. Let the facts be plainly stated, so that there can be no mistake about it. The Secretary says and admits that he knew of no plan but the Matthews plan, and the Superintendent of the Academy admits that a Mr. Flagg, at the instance of somebody, formulated a general sketch, at the cost of nobody, with a view to get a job, undoubtedly, by which, if the "plans" were adopted, he might receive a commission of $200,000 or more in connection with the proposed work. That is about the substance of it.

Mr. MUDD. Here are the signatures of six naval officers, who state that they did formulate a plan.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. But they had no authority to formulate a plan.

Mr. MUDD. That may be true. I do not admit that. But we gave the Secretary of the Navy authority last winter to do it, and he did it in this way.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] put a question to me as to whether I thought a committee or a commission could, within four weeks, determine plans. I do not believe that a committee could.

Mr. DAYTON. Then how can we have present action, as you suggest?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do believe that a naval board skilled in engineering and familiar with the requirements of the Naval Academy could do so, and I do not care whether that naval board has been authorized or not. I only want to know whether it has deliberated upon the matter. If it acted wisely when it had no authority, why, we can ratify its action now.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. How are we to know whether it acted wisely or not when it had no authority?

Mr. NEWLANDS. What I want to do is to refer this thing to the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do not believe Congress will do that to any head of a bureau.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not believe in waiting six months or a year.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Maryland to this fact, and he is no greater friend of this Naval Academy than I am. I want to call his attention to how this plan came to be called the Matthews plan. Here is the statement made before the committee. I quote from the hearings.

Mr. HILBORN. Who made the statement?

Mr. DAYTON. It was made by the Superintendent of the Naval Academy himself.

> The CHAIRMAN. They do not say anything there about the plans.
> Secretary LONG. This is very long.
> The CHAIRMAN. There does not seem to be a recommendation of any particular plan there. Is there any recommendation?

Then the Superintendent of the Naval Academy immediately spoke up and said:

> They did not themselves formulate any plan, but it was formulated later by the Superintendent with the assistance of an architect.

In other words, the Matthews board did not formulate any plans of any kind or character, but the Superintendent, with the assistance of an architect whom he had selected, formulated a general sketch, without any authority of law and without any cost to the Government.

Mr. MUDD. What Superintendent was that?

Mr. DAYTON. Superintendent McNair.

Mr. MUDD. I hold in my hand the signatures of six naval officers who did present a plan.

Mr. DAYTON. Is that the Matthews board?

Mr. MUDD. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. You can not find one word or syllable in that Matthews board report adopting a plan. The Secretary of the Navy in the hearing himself says so.

I will tell you what was done. Just as Superintendent McNair has stated here, after the Matthews board had adjourned the Superintendent and this architect did formulate a plan, and somehow or other it got bound up in the latter part with the Matthews board report, and therefore it is called the Matthews board plan.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The Superintendent, as I understand, was one of the Matthews board.

Mr. DAYTON. Well, that may be.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BERRY. I have listened to this discussion——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the time has arrived for the special order for to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio suggests that as to-day was fixed for the special order to pay tribute to the memory of the late Representative NORTHWAY, that the committee should now rise for the purpose of executing that special order. The Chair will entertain a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. BERRY. Was not that special order fixed for 2.30?

The CHAIRMAN. No hour was fixed. If the gentleman from Kentucky will yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], the Chair will entertain a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. BERRY. If the discussion is to go on, I wish to say a word; and if it is not, why of course I do not care to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky at a later period.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. If the hour for the special order has arrived, I move that the committee rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the naval appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

DEATH OF HON. STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolutions made the special order for to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House of Representatives has heard with profound sorrow that the Hon. STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY, a Representative from the Nineteenth Congressional district of the State of Ohio, died at his home in Jefferson, Ohio, on September 8, 1898: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Ordered, That the Clerk communicate the resolutions to the Senate.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. DICK. Mr. Speaker, STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY was born in Christian Hollow, N. Y., June 19, 1833, and died at Jefferson, Ohio, September 8, 1898.

The temporary suspension of the business of this House to pay tribute to the memory of a man of high character and splendid attainments must be productive of good, since in the presence of death "earthly passions grow cool, and holy purposes gain strength."

Mr. NORTHWAY'S untimely death, so deeply and so universally mourned, was a great loss to the district he represented and to the country, both of which he served with ability, fidelity, and patriotic devotion.

By reason of his talents and integrity he rose from the humblest walks of life to a position of eminence in his country's service. To recount in words of eulogy his early struggles, his success in his chosen profession, his steady advancement in the field of public duty, and his excellence of character will be an incentive to better and nobler effort.

For six years he was in your presence, an honored member of this great legislative body, representing the Nineteenth Congressional district of Ohio, of which Blaine, in his splendid eulogy on Garfield, said:

Garfield was especially fortunate in the constituency which elected him. Descended almost entirely from New England stock, the men of Ashtabula district were intensely radical on all questions relating to human rights. Well educated, thrifty, thoroughly intelligent in affairs, acutely discerning of character, not quick to bestow confidence, and slow to withdraw it, they were at once the most helpful and exacting of supporters. Their tenacious trust in men in whom they once confided is illustrated by the unparalleled fact that Elisha Whittlesey, Joshua R. Giddings, and James A. Garfield represented the district for fifty-four years.

I shall not dwell on the public services of Mr. NORTHWAY, except as directly connected with his own district and State. Others better qualified by reason of their association with him on this floor, and who doubtless early in his public career recognized his skill as a debater, and were impressed with his comprehensive grasp of public questions and his knowledge of public affairs, will pay tribute to his character and ability as a legislator and as a public man. To me is accorded the privilege of speaking of those personal traits and habits of life which, after all, go to make up the character of the man.

We shall not see his kindly face again, but the example of his life, his patriotism, his devotion to duty, both public and private, his untiring industry, his unassailable honesty, his rigid adherence to honorable purpose, and all the lessons of his splendid career as a private citizen and as a public man, will make us better for having known him. To his friends there remains the fragrance of a life in which was exhibited charming manners, a striking personality, great intellectual force, and the highest order of moral and physical courage. They are comforted by the thought that this noble man did not live in vain—that he recognized the great responsibilities which life imposes, and met and discharged them with ability, courage, and fidelity.

His family removed from New York to Ohio in 1840, where his father, like thousands of other fearless and aggressive men of his day who sought a home in the West, bought land and entered on the pioneer life of that time. A log cabin was built, the forest was felled, the seed sown, and the harvest gathered. The boy of tender years, with willing hands assisted in establishing a home amid the virgin forests of old Ashtabula and shared the privations and sacrifices incident to frontier life. The log cabin was not peculiar to any one section of the country, but the curling smoke from the rudely-constructed home of the pioneer, whether in the fertile valleys of the South, the granite hills of New England, the forest fastnesses of the Middle States, the rolling prairies of the mighty West, or the ore-seamed lands of the North was the harbinger of that resistless wave of a higher civilization before which in sullen protest receded a race that had long dwelt in undisputed possession of the land.

At the mother's knee, the altar of the pioneer home, Stephen received his first religious impressions, and from her gentle teachings the rudiments of an education. From his mother's side he passed to the rude log schoolhouse—that homely university of the young Republic—at which giants matriculated, and from which emerged some of the grandest characters in American history.

Young Stephen grew tall and straight and sinewy of limb; he grew in intellectual and moral strength, and in all amiable qualities; with these grew a desire for a more liberal education, with which to meet the requirements of his higher aims in life. In order to obtain the means to gratify this ambition, he again entered the log schoolhouse, now as a teacher instead of a pupil, and thus was enabled to enter upon an advanced course of study—first, at the academy at Kingsville, and then at Orwell, Ohio. When he had completed his academic course youth had ripened into manhood, and Stephen Northway was prepared to enter upon a career of usefulness honorable to himself and beneficial to the community and the times in which he lived.

He drew his political inspiration from the doctrines of William Lloyd Garrison, Elisha Whittlesey, and Joshua R. Giddings, and sat among their disciples with Benjamin F. Wade, James A. Garfield, and Ezra B. Taylor. He imbibed the spirit that actuated them in the great struggle between freedom and slavery, and though a thorough partisan, he was tolerant in his treatment of those entertaining opposite views. In every phase of life STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY was a Christian gentleman.

He entered upon the study of law and was imbued with an ambition to attain eminence in his chosen profession. The zeal and determination manifested by him as a schoolboy characterized him as a student of the law. After a thorough course of study he was, in the year 1859, admitted to the bar, and even then was so intrenched in the confidence of the people that clientage was soon gained and success was assured. Within two years he was elected prosecuting attorney of Ashtabula County, which position he held for two terms.

As a further evidence of the confidence reposed in him, in 1865 he was elected to the Ohio general assembly. That year marked an epoch, and was perhaps the most eventful in the annals of our history as a nation. That year the war of the great rebellion ended. Peace had been gained, but at a terrible sacrifice of blood and treasure. The great tragedy of the century was enacted. Abraham Lincoln was assassinated, and a change of administrative policy seemed imminent. His death had shrouded the nation in gloom. Doubt, unrest, and mutterings were prevalent on every hand. Dark clouds overcast our sky. The exigencies of the times demanded strong hands and cool heads in the adjustment of our affairs to existing conditions. Wade and Sherman were in the National Senate. Garfield and Hayes, and such as they, were members of the House. In looking for a man to represent them in the State legislature in those trying times the people of Ashtabula district turned to STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY.

Mr. NORTHWAY declined a second term in the legislature. With his mind broadened by legislative experience, and having already acquired a thorough elementary knowledge, he again took up the study and practice of law with renewed zeal and energy. He devoted himself to the great masters of jurisprudence. He knew the law and the reason for it. He knew its birthplace and the cause of its origin. The study of its history and development was a work of love which he pursued until he had mastered it in its largest, broadest, and deepest meaning, and in its most comprehensive scope. Step by step he advanced to a leading position at the bar. His reputation widened, and the ablest lawyers sought his counsel. He gained high eminence in his profession.

Mr. NORTHWAY had long cherished a desire to represent his district in Congress, and the people of Ashtabula County would at any time have been glad to give him their support; but there was a tacit agreement among the counties comprising the Nineteenth district that the representation in Congress should rotate, and that so long as a Representative served satisfactorily he would be continued in office. For more than three-quarters of a century this district was represented by six men. Elisha Whittlesey served fourteen years, Joshua R. Giddings twenty-two years,

James A. Garfield eighteen years, and Ezra B. Taylor twelve years. Whittlesey and Giddings both voluntarily retired from Congress; Garfield was elected to the United States Senate, and succeeded to the Presidency; and Judge Taylor declined a renomination.

Mr. NORTHWAY was elected a member of the Fifty-third Congress, and was reelected to the Fifty-fourth and Fifty-fifth Congresses; was nominated for a fourth term, and his reelection was certain had he lived. It was not ordained that he should complete his last term; yet the time he served was ample for judgment. His grasp of public questions was comprehensive; his knowledge of detail critical; his industry constant. Merit forced him forward, and his usefulness was early recognized by the Speaker of this House, who chose him for important duties, which he met and discharged with intelligence and unswerving honesty.

Fortunate though he was in professional and public life, he found his greatest happiness in the society of his loving wife, a woman of rare qualities of mind and heart, who was Miss Lydia A. Dodge, and whom he married on the 1st day of January, 1863. In his union with this accomplished lady there began one of the sweetest companionships that ever attested the beauty and holiness of the sacrament of marriage. Theirs was truly a union where love and devotion filled the home with sunshine, music, and flowers. It developed new phases of his life, and awoke the gentler sentiments of heart and soul to better, higher, and nobler endeavor and achievement. Their home life was ideal, and their happiness increased until the touch of death's icy hand upon their infant first born broke the spell, and sorrow entered where joy before had reigned supreme. The bitter cup was pressed to their lips, but no murmur escaped them. Christian fortitude sustained them in their sore bereavement. Then the coming of a baby girl again gladdened their stricken home, intensified their affection, and beautified their lives.

For a number of years Mrs. Northway was an invalid, and his unfailing devotion throughout her long illness was a poem of love. Until the time that he himself passed beyond the vale she had been to him a sweetheart as well as a wife. When Mr. NORTHWAY returned home at the close of the last session he found his faithful companion prone upon the bed of sickness, and when informed by her physicians that she could not survive he abandoned all interest in earthly affairs, and in words that showed the anguish of a heart under the shadow of a great sorrow, he exclaimed: "If she must die, I can not live."

Although himself rapidly failing in health, his every waking hour was spent at her bedside. Day by day he became weaker, until there came an hour when he could not rise, and the gathering mists presaged speedy dissolution. He met the dire enemy with the calm and Christian courage which characterized his whole life. As his strength was rapidly ebbing, his eyes for a moment rested upon a vase of flowers. With a smile, and in a voice almost inaudible, he whispered: "Beautiful flowers!" Then sinking into a tranquil sleep he entered the door to that life which has no end.

To him the summons came first—a link in the golden chain was broken—but only a few weeks elapsed when the wife whom he so tenderly loved was also beckoned to the other shore, and the broken link was reforged in that "mansion not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." "They were lovely and pleasant in their lives and in their death were not divided."

With the admirable qualities that made Mr. NORTHWAY a kind and affectionate husband and father was combined a keen perception of the beauties in nature. He was fond of flowers, and a portion of his premises was set apart for their culture, that with his wife and daughter he might to the fullest extent enjoy their beauty and fragrance. His earlier traits clung to him, and he was never happier than when at work in his garden.

The children of his home town knew and loved him. The scriptural declaration, "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven," was a part of his creed, and often as he passed along the streets of his home, the little ones would be seen clinging to his fingers, while they told him their stories and listened to his.

He loved his fellow-man. No hour was so busy that human want could not make its plea; no subject so engrossed his attention that the cry of distress was unheeded. The appeal that touched his heart opened his purse. As the one sympathized, the other responded.

Although eminently successful in his profession, and enjoying a liberal income from his practice, Mr. NORTHWAY accumulated little property. While not an improvident man, his quiet and unostentatious benevolence absorbed a large part of the income derived from his professional labors. With more than liberal hand his charities were dispensed, falling on the unfortunate and distressed as the "rain falls on the parched and weary land." He was imbued with that passion of Divine origin—that love for his fellow-man—exemplified in the manger at Bethlehem, and sealed forever on the heights of Calvary.

Mr. NORTHWAY had a keen sense of honor; his convictions were strong, deep, and abiding; the demands of duty were paramount; where they led, he followed. He tolerated no compromise with wrong. In the discharge of public duty he studied the best interests of the people, and sought to serve the rights of all in a spirit of equity. Nothing that was worthy was too small or insignificant for his attention; nothing so great or important as to exclusively command him. The minutiæ of life interested him equally with its larger affairs.

The cloak of charity, a garment that "doth befit a king or a peasant," was always on his shoulders, save when removed to cover the faults of others. He was not blind to error. Keen, accurate, and discriminating, but wise and considerate, he judged in mercy, encouraged the weak, and lifted the fallen. He was always for the right. He walked among his fellow men an object of admiration—a hero,

> On whom even God did seem to set his seal,
> To give the world assurance of a man.

Those who knew him well loved him. He won their respect, earned their confidence, and merited both. They recognized the amiability, honesty, and force of his character. Old members have told me that he had not an enemy in this body. I believe it. He was the most sterling character I ever knew to be without enemies. Those who love virtue, admire ability and sincerity, and hate the vile and insincere, were of necessity his friends. Conscience ruled all his hours and measured all his acts. He had no hidden ways. The sunlight was sufficient for all his purposes.

Near the town of Jefferson is a sacred spot, a spot where some one has said is—

> Neither solitude nor society—something human is there—but the folly, the bustle, the vanities, the pretensions, the pride of humanity are gone; men are there, but their passions are hushed and their spirits are still; malevolence has lost its power of harming; appetite is sated, ambition lies low, and lust is cold; anger has done raving, all disputes are ended, all rivalry is over; the fellest animosity is deeply buried, and the most dangerous sins are safely confined by the thickly piled clods of the valley; vice is dumb and powerless and virtue is waiting in silence for the trump of the Archangel and the voice of God.

In this spot are gathered the fathers of that beautiful hamlet—here sleep in dark chambers the high and the low, the rich and the poor. The passing years are adding to the inhabitants of that silent city. Its population never decreases, but constantly increases. Each year adds to the mounds, and so it will be to the end. Taste and liberality have beautified and adorned, and love has consecrated these sacred acres where death's trophies are laid. To-day it is a famous city—made so by its mighty dead. It is fit that STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY should be buried there. The place of interment is most appropriate. There, a few feet to the right of his mound, lie the mortal remains of Joshua R. Giddings, and near by, on the left, slumbers Benjamin F. Wade. Together these three are in the "long, long sleep" under a blanket of "beautiful flowers." Together they will make answer to the final summons: "Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth."

The circumstances and environments which surrounded Mr. Giddings and Mr. Wade were vastly more effective in the development of human character than were those which surrounded Mr. NORTHWAY. In his convictions, fixedness of purpose, and conscientiousness he was the equal of either. But the conditions which prevailed while the two great philanthropists were in active life did not surround Mr. NORTHWAY. We are thankful that this was so. He lived when the strife was over—when the wounds of civil war were healing under the magnanimous policy of the victor and the returning loyalty of the conquered—when, to quote Garfield:

> Under the crossed swords and locked shields of Americans, North and South, our people sleep in peace and rise in liberty, love, and harmony under the union of the Stars and Stripes, and in the strength of liberty and the restored Union, win the grander victories of peace.

Monuments are reared to the memory of our illustrious dead. Granite columns, kissed by morning sunbeams, tell the story of a nation's gratitude for conspicuous public service. Our public buildings are adorned with statues of spotless marble, on which are preserved the features of those upon whom the nation with lavish hand bestowed honors for services in the field and the forum; but greater and more enduring than all these is the impress of genius left by a public man upon the times and age in which he lived, and which, by reason of distinguished service rendered in the cause of the people, is enshrined in their heart of hearts. No shaft may be reared to the memory of STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY; no Parian marble may preserve his classic features; but his services will not be forgotten, nor will his image be effaced from the memory of the people he so ably and so faithfully served.

For this honored statesman, devoted husband, and kind father death had no sting, and the dark portals of the grave no terrors. The unbidden messenger was not unwelcome. With undaunted courage and serene confidence this noble son of Ohio joined the countless multitude who—

> Sustained and soothed
> By an unfaltering trust, approach their graves
> Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
> About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, this solemn convocation is something more than a meeting assembled to pay reverence to the dead. An instinct born of popular government inspires us to show due homage to faithful public services, whether rendered in the field or in the halls of legislation, and thus the rising generation is taught that noble service to country always commands its reward. These occasions bind us in stronger bonds as servants of the Republic—make us better citizens, better legislators, better men.

Uniting in these memorial services to-day, among others, are the great States of Pennsylvania, Illinois, and New York, all joining in tributes to the memory of our colleague from the sister State of Ohio.

Charged as are the representatives of this people with the enactment of the most momentous legislation, when a valued actor in this great drama passes from the stage of his former service we should remember him to the country, that others may profit by his example and imitate his virtues.

My acquaintance with STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY as a legislator was supplemented by an association when he was not busy with the cares of state.

His life and standing at home will be voiced by those who can tell from personal knowledge, as I have learned from others, of the tributes to his memory that were offered on his death, of the fragrant flowers that were lain upon his bier by his neighbors and friends as evidence of their gratitude and love. These are the highest tokens that can be shown to his worth as a legislator, as a man.

Our deceased friend was close to the common people, from whom he sprung and to whom he ever looked for support, and it was the ambition of his life to protect their interests and serve them well. He exemplified in his career that performance of duty and success go hand in hand. A love of his fellow-man was inborn in him, and that he had eminently shown this virtue among his people was attested by his first nomination for Congress. He was chosen to represent the Nineteenth Ohio district, which is famous for the length of service and the eminence of those who preceded him. Not noting the minor changes that came from redistricting the State at different times, the heart of this district for seventy-five years—from 1823 to 1898—had been represented in Congress by but six men, each of whom reflected a luster on his State. Elisha Whittlesey served from 1823 to 1837, for fourteen years; Joshua R. Giddings served from 1837 to 1859, for twenty-two years; John Hutchins served from 1859 to 1863, for four years; James A. Garfield served from 1863 to 1881, for eighteen years; Ezra B. Taylor served from 1881 to 1893, for thirteen years.

Mr. NORTHWAY was first elected in 1892, and was serving his third term in Congress at the time of his death. He had already received a fourth nomination and would doubtless have been elected to the Fifty-sixth Congress. These repeated indorsements, by a district that had so recently before sent James A. Garfield to Congress, more strongly than words speak of his fidelity to the high trust reposed in him. He rendered valuable service to his district and to the country in the Fifty-fifth Congress as a member of the important Committees on Appropriations and on Reform in the Civil Service. In close touch with the masses, no one in his district ever appealed to him in vain. Though not a soldier in the war of the rebellion, the soldiers had in him a faithful champion. A trait that came to him from the lessons of his early life was, that the humblest citizen was at home in his company, and this approachability made "STEVE" NORTHWAY, as he was familiarly called, win friends on every hand.

As his position was eminent at his death, so was his beginning modest, and he was an exemplar of the story often told, but that never grows old, of rise from humble obscurity to distinguished honors. The story of his early life upon the farm, his struggle for an education, his teaching school, his early entrance to the bar, his rise in his profession—these were often told, and gave him a hold on his constituency that was proven whenever occasion arose. He never forgot these favors, and through many weary hours of sickness and pain he labored to serve his people.

In late years Mr. NORTHWAY was not a robust man, but his ailment was unknown to many. Like others, he chose to suffer and bear his pain in silence, and many of his intimates who were brought under the sunshine of his cheerful disposition and were wont to hear his "flashes of merriment" did not know of the fatal malady that soon would terminate his life. He bore it all with fortitude, and his last act of love and devotion to his invalid wife, who, like himself, for years had been a patient sufferer, broke the thread that held him to human existence, and he predeceased her a few short weeks.

Our deceased colleague has joined that long list of Ohio's distinguished statesmen who have illumined her history by ability and faithful performance of duty.

Though our friend be dead, he still lives on and will live in memory, in kind recollection, till we ourselves shall join that invisible choir. The problem of life, the mystery of death, is shrouded in uncertainty and doubt, but to live in hearts we leave behind is not to die. This life, all told, is but the measure of a span, and in that space so fugitive we have a complication of obligations, responsibilities, and suffering. All are ended by death alone.

Our brother has passed from the woes of this world as well as from its joys. Though he has passed from the pleasures and happiness of this life, he is also free from its cares, miseries, and dissensions. We trust he has gone to that felicity the reward of the just.

A philosopher once said, "Be not grieved beyond measure for thy deceased friends; they are not dead, but have only taken that course which it is necessary for all of us to go. We ourselves must all go to that grand place of reception where they are assembled, and in that general rendezvous of mankind live together in another state of being."

The lessons of duty, whether in private life or public function, are severely taught by the end that must come to all, the occasion of which assembles us here to-day. While I speak these words of tribute, who among us can know but that in a year from to-day words in your memory or in memory of me may be spoken by others when our lips are still and our cold faces turned to the roots of the daisies that grow over us? These solemn thoughts, these occasions teach us our duty to ourselves, to our country, to our God.

Our departed colleague did his duty as a legislator, civilian, husband, father, and friend. What more can be said?

Monuments erected by man may crumble and waste away, but so long as liberty shall survive in this country so long will its archives record deeds of heroism in the field and acts of statesmanship in this Hall—undying monuments till the end of the Republic. A fame thus secured, to reach till the great book of state is sealed and delivered to the Supreme and Infallible Ruler of all, satisfies the ambition of man.

Lying in that village graveyard, within a circle that incloses other Ohioans who attained distinguished honors and renown, he rests after a well-spent life in the bosom of his constituency and friends. His people, whose chosen servant he was, will miss him as we will, but all will give him that grateful remembrance that follows a life well spent in the faithful performance of duty after the spirit has flown.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, I can not hope to add anything to the truth or beauty of the tributes with which love and esteem have garlanded the memory of the distinguished dead; but I crave the indulgence of a moment to mingle my voice with the swelling anthem of affectionate and eloquent eulogy, because I respected and honored our departed friend and feel a sincere and reverential regard for his memory.

In this world there is no other event so profoundly impressive as death, although we are all as sensible as were the Arabs that it is a camel that kneels at every man's door. It is useful to survivors only as they comprehend its lessons. It comes like a faithful schoolmaster with the open book of a closed life and assigns the lesson which we must study or lose its teaching.

Mr. NORTHWAY was no common man. Born in a cabin, cradled in poverty, schooled in adversity, apprenticed to toil, spurred by the incentive of difficulties, succeeding by tireless endeavor, until by bearing the cross of hard circumstances he won the crown of just applause for having deserved well of his country.

No finer tribute can be paid to our system of free institutions than such a career as this occasion presents for our contemplation. It is the glory of our social and political system that from the humblest origin man, winged with merit, can rise to the highest eminence. Our departed friend is only one of a long and distinguished roll who have made our history luminous with character which has had all base alloy melted out by the fires of adversity. No adventitious aids, neither birth nor rank nor fortune, helped him upward to the clear-aired heights he reached and kept. His allies were parts and poverty. He climbed with beak and claw. The spurs he wore in the tournament of life were fashioned by his own effort and buckled to his heels with his own hands.

From what I have heard to-day and from my own observation of his public career, not only on this floor but in the intimate relations of committee work and in social and public functions, among the attributes which summed up a strong personality there are some traits worthy to be set before the world as examples. Honor, courage, and duty were conspicuous jewels in the crown of his character; and over his new-made grave I place them before the public eye as the golden texts in the lesson of his life. Honor is the noble mind's distinguishing perfection; and it is a happiness to believe that in no other age has this perfection been so much in fashion in public life as now. Mr. NORTHWAY was the soul of honor. He belonged to that category of men who, like the virtuous Andrew Fletcher, would give their lives to serve their country, but would not do a base thing to save it.

His courage was conspicuous. The only Aladdin's lamp he ever knew was the quenchless fire of a heroic soul that no difficulty ever daunted. His courage never wavered before an adverse cast of fortune. He despised servility. His conscience was his harness, and he wore no other. He hated the thrift that follows fawning. He walked erect in the majesty and dignity of conscious rectitude. When inspired by conviction and commanded by duty he was a heroic fighter, and the man who broke a lance with him in the forum of debate was likely—

To know the joy that warriors feel
In foemen worthy of their steel.

To him a sense of duty was a "Thus saith the Lord." In this he was as true as the shipmaster in the story who prayed to Neptune: "Oh, god, thou mayst save me if thou wilt, or destroy me; but however it be, I will hold my rudder true." If Schiller's poetic soul had put to Mr. NORTHWAY the question, "What shall I do to gain eternal life?" his kindred spirit would have answered in the poet's own glowing words:

Thy duty ever;
Discharge aright the simple duties
With which each day is rife; yea, with thy might.

He did not live man's appointed time. The mysterious clock which the Angel of Life wound up to run three score years and ten before handing the key to the Angel of the Resurrection ran down before the lapse of the allotted time. But the bounds that are fixed to the duration of life do not always measure its worth. His career, though cut off in the midst of its usefulness, has not failed to teach that the path of duty is the upward way; that—

Not once or twice in our fair land's story
The path of duty was the way to glory.

His death was marked, I am told, by an unusual willingness to enter into rest on the other shore of that mysterious sea "that never yet has borne on any wave the image of a homeward sail." The foreshadowing of an anticipated grief made him indifferent to life. For him death had no sting, the grave no victory. He passed into the unseen, I can easily believe, with the exultant words of Whitman's death song upon his lips:

Joy! shipmate, joy!
Our life is closed, our life begins;
The long, long anchorage we leave.
The ship is clear at last—she leaps.
She quickly courses from the shore;
Joy! shipmate, joy!

Now, as we leave the contemplation of our departed friend, those who loved him can carry with them the consolatory reflection "that while green grass will cover his grave, blue skies bend over it, sweet birds sing near it, and the place will be hallowed ground, yet greener than the grass, fairer than the skies, sweeter than the birds, more hallowed than the grave itself will be his fragrant memory enshrined with supreme sacredness in their heart of hearts."

[Mr. CANNON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, when STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY died the public lost one of its ablest servants and the House of Representatives was deprived of one of its most diligent and conscientious members. His decease marked the end of a long and useful career. During my association with him upon the great Committee on Appropriations I learned to value his integrity of purpose, his capacity for detail work, and his fidelity to duty.

I regret that the exacting demands of committee and representative duties incident to the closing days of this short session have prevented me from preparing a suitable tribute to the memory of our friend and late colleague. I can not forbear, however, even though unprepared, from uttering a single word in eulogy of him.

He was free from malice or envy, noble and manly in his contact with the world, eminent in good works, stainless and exemplary in private life, and faithful and indefatigable in the public service. He lived worthily, and died gallantly at his post of duty. He was an unostentatious friend to humanity, courteous, gentle, and yet strong and courageous. Mr. Speaker, let us who yet remain upon the scene strive to fashion our characters in emulation of his, so that when with us

Life's fitful fever is o'er

we may be entitled, as is our late friend, to receive the plaudit, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant * * * enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with Mr. NORTHWAY, although confined to this Congress, was sufficient to disclose his possession of those splendid traits of character and that sincere devotion to duty which have already been so beautifully and truthfully portrayed. It was my good fortune to draw a seat in close proximity to his, so that each day I caught his cordial morning greeting, always accompanied with a smile that illuminated his pleasant, handsome face, making a new member feel that, although in a strange environment, he was at least in a realm where reign true courtesy and sincere friendships.

To him I often appealed respecting the business before the House, and I never left him without increased respect for his accurate knowledge and his clear understanding of the different views of every question presented. He was equally ready with reasons in support of his own opinions, unfolding them modestly, without emphasis or feeling, yet so earnestly and tersely that he easily won the attention and the respect of all who came within the radius of his individuality. Perhaps few men in the House exerted a greater personal influence with those associated with him on committees or who came often into his company in the cloakroom and elsewhere.

This was particularly noticeable during those long and trying weeks preliminary to the Spanish-American war. He made no set speeches, nor does his name appear in the RECORD among those who filled its pages during that eventful and now historic period; but day after day, quietly and calmly, in committee room, in lobby, and in corridor, he discussed every phase of every question with a patience that amounted to inspiration, and with a sublime faith in the man upon whom God and the people had placed the great burden of responsibility. Without seeming or apparently desiring to lead, he was readily followed, winning not so much by the force of learned or studied argument as by the good common sense that inspired his suggestions.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. NORTHWAY was born in Onondaga County, N. Y., a few miles from the beautiful city of Syracuse, his parents having emigrated from New England very soon after the first canal boat had threaded its way along the historic valley of the Mohawk, and through the narrow, picturesque pass that cuts a southern spur of the distant Adirondacks. But a knowledge of his nativity or of his ancestors was unnecessary to a perfect understanding of his rich and splendid inheritance, for a single day in his company was sufficient to prove him a type of that Puritan stock which gave him his sound and stalwart endowments of mind and character. He had a touch of that sweet gentleness and refined courtesy which, combined with his great integrity and firmness, made him ideal as a friend and legislator.

Mr. NORTHWAY'S leave-taking at the close of the last session was freighted with gratitude for the past and hope for the future. Of his return to Congress he spoke with the assurance of one having conserved the energies of life and with the faith of one whose clear vision and sound conclusions were based upon perfect health; yet within a three-month he fell by the way, illustrating again with startling effect the great uncertainty of our tenure upon life. His death, however, so deeply regretted by all who knew him with intimacy, has been but the unveiling of a most gentle and loving spirit upon which little of the world's dross was allowed to cling.

[Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, in all ages of the world a humane and refined sense of justice has demanded that nothing but good shall be spoken of the dead. The poet has crystallized this beautiful sentiment into the charming couplet:

Be to their faults a little blind,
But to their virtues very kind.

It adds therefore a melancholy pleasure to the sad duty we are so frequently called upon to perform in passing judgment on the merits of those who have played their little part on the stage of life and made their exits when we can truthfully feel and say that broad-minded charity is called upon to cover but few defects in the life and character of the one who has departed, and that the finger of detraction can point to few or none of the incidents of his life or the elements of his character as worthy of its condemnation.

This in an eminent degree is the case with our departed friend and colleague, on whose memory we are to-day to sit in judgment, as it were, and whose record as a man in private and public life we are called upon to review. For it is not in a spirit of fulsome flattery nor of that partiality which springs from an intimate personal friendship with our deceased friend that prompts me to say that few men who have sat upon this floor have displayed higher qualities of mind and heart or have been more entitled to freedom from adverse criticism for acts done or words spoken than STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY. He had his faults, no doubt; for perfection is incident to divinity and frailty is the lot of humanity. But his faults were few and his virtues were many, and when the balance shall be struck by the recording angel most surely will he be entitled to the commendation, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY came of that sturdy pioneer stock which two generations ago was gradually extending into the then Far West, the borders of civilization, and carrying its blessings with the course of the sun from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific.

He was a child of that vast immigration into the wilderness which was then the home alone of savage beasts and savage men, that leveled forests and built up churches and schools. Hardy and rugged, inured to privations and hardships, the children of these pioneers grew up sturdy and self-reliant, cherishing the traditions of their ancestors, breathing in with every inspiration a love of liberty under the beneficent influences of our free institutions, and earnestly seeking, by means of education and industry, to better fit themselves for the struggle of life which lay before them.

STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY was the offspring of parents who formed a part of this movement. He came with them, while yet a lad of tender years, into the sparsely settled State of Ohio, and found his home in that portion which had been and was then being largely settled by the children of New England, and which even to this day displays the characteristics of the section from which they came in their thrift, their intelligence, their love of liberty, and their regard for religion.

Surrounded by these influences, striving against the difficulties and embarrassments which hampered the opportunities of even the most favored of his class, he succeeded in acquiring a fairly good academic education, and in due course of time entered upon the practice of his profession as an attorney at law. In this he was more than usually successful, and became one of the leading members of the bar in northeastern Ohio. He was honored by his neighbors with public office. To whatever positions of public duty he was called he was painstaking, conscientious, and above reproach. Paraphrasing the poet, we might say of him:

> The secret consciousness
> Of duty well performed; the public voice
> Of praise that honors virtue and rewards it;
> All these were his.

As a natural result of the struggles and hardships through which he had to pass as a boy, he grew up as a man rugged, earnest, and strong. Unswerving in his convictions, he was ever ready, though he stood alone, to maintain and defend them; but withal, there was associated with this sturdy manhood a tenderness and consideration as gentle and beautiful as that of a woman. Hearty and genial in his friendships, "his little, nameless, unremembered acts of kindness and of love" to those with whom he came in contact brightened many lives and smoothed and rounded up his own high character.

He was conscientious to an extreme and courageous without limit, and however great the odds against him, hesitated not to raise his voice and record his vote against measures which he deemed unwise, unjust, and unpatriotic. At the same time, while denouncing wrongs as he saw them, he was ever considerate and just to those whose views were not in sympathy with his own. He was devoted to his duty, and spared himself neither labor nor hardship in its accomplishment. To him more than to most men might be applied the beautiful words of Rogers:

> Generous as brave,
> Affection, kindness, and the sweet offices
> Of love and duty were to him as needful
> As his daily bread.

He came to this Congress from a district which had been made famous by great statesmen whom it had sent to the Halls of the National Legislature. To the heights of their reputation he did not and could not aspire; but overshadowed though he may have been by their fame, his position in the three Congresses of which he was a member was far from that of mediocrity. As a member of important committees he did his work conscientiously and well.

Private interests could not corrupt his judgment. His every effort seemed to be to search out that which was good for the interests of the whole country. He seemed ever to have before him as the guiding star of his conduct the beautiful maxim from Virgil, "The noblest motive is the public good," and having determined in his mind the course which he thought best subserved the public welfare, nothing could divert him from its support.

He took part in many of the important debates on the floor of this House. While friendly partiality could not claim for him the rank of a great orator, even adverse criticism must do him the justice to say that he was sincere and earnest in his advocacy of what he thought to be right and his condemnation of what he thought to be wrong, and his evident earnestness and sincerity carried conviction where the more flowery arts of oratory might have failed to impress the minds of his associates. He was an unselfish man, and while his noble ambition prompted him in an honorable effort to secure a place of rank and standing, he never by word or deed endeavored to detract from the just merits of others.

We see the sun at the close of day sink beneath the western horizon; but the twilight lingers long after the great orb which gave it birth has passed from our view. So it is in the case of our deceased friend and colleague. His day has indeed ended; his sun of life has set beneath and beyond the horizon of our vision; yet streaming upward with its milder radiancy toward the zenith lingers the sweet twilight of the memory of his good deeds and his good life, and it will abide with us for many, many days to come.

In the quiet city of the dead at his little home town, which was the scene of his struggles and his triumphs, all that is mortal of our friend reposes in that last long slumber into which we too shall fall. No stately mausoleum marks the spot to do him honor, but that silent grave itself does honor to the place in which it lies.

> The soil that would not lightly o'er him rest,
> Or to be under him would feel opprest,
> Were in the sight of earth and seas and skies unblest.

Rest to his ashes and peace to his soul.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure of forming the acquaintance of the Hon. STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY in the city of Zanesville, Ohio, in the summer of 1895. My first impressions of the man were indeed most favorable, and these impressions were fully confirmed after having been subsequently associated with him on numerous occasions during the past three years. When, on the 9th day of last September, I received a telegram conveying the sad intelligence that the spirit of STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY had taken its everlasting flight from earth, I was brought once more to a realization of the truth that—

> Death rides on every passing breeze;
> He lurks in every flower.

When, at the close of the second session of this Congress, some of us bade our genial friend and colleague, whose life and character we here commemorate, a hasty adieu, as we then supposed for the recess only, how distant the thought that this separation was to be final.

It is pleasant to remember him of whom we speak as one whose kindly manner and hearty greeting when he mingled with his friends and acquaintances were in the nature of an inspiration. With him the traits of good-fellowship abounded toward all about him, and were all the more prominent in contrast with the assumed dignity of some persons in official life whose greatness seems so burdensome that it almost prevents their observance of the rules of common civility when one perchance comes in contact with them. But STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY, like a gallant knight of old, was not only courteous in his intercourse with his fellow-men, but as courageous in his advocacy and defense of the right, as he saw the right, as he was magnanimous in the hour of victory, and ever considerate of the views and feelings of others.

In him we have another illustration of the possibilities open to the American youth. Born in a rural district of the Empire State, brought by his parents in early childhood to the then undeveloped State of Ohio, where he toiled in changing a portion of the wilderness of virgin forests into farming lands; attended the district schools in the meantime, and later the academy; taught school to procure means to prosecute his studies; read law, and finally developed into the brainy, cultured, manly man, lawyer, and statesman who so ably represented the district and former home of such intellectual giants and fearless champions of human rights as Giddings, Wade, Garfield, and others. It would not be strange that after having been reared in such an atmosphere his natural repugnance to shams, to all forms of political intrigue, to undue assumptions of power, or to slavish obsequiousness toward those temporarily in high position was somewhat intensified by his recollections of the examples and teachings of these great commoners.

While Mr. NORTHWAY might be classed as a strong partisan, loyal to the cardinal principles enunciated by his party, he was not blindly so, or deaf to the murmurs of discontent which are occasionally heard from the rank and file because of some occasional unpopular or perhaps unjust measure of party policy, even if incorporated into his party platform. In asserting that he had no sympathy with so-called civil-service reform as advocated and practiced in recent years, I state a truth which simply illustrates the fact that he was a true American, believing in and sympathizing with the great masses of the people with whom he was identified by birth, and whose interests neither education, association, nor promotion to a seat in the greatest legislative body on earth caused him for a moment to forget.

As an orator he was fervent, forcible, and at times very eloquent, but the latter accomplishment he did not seek to cultivate, his object being rather to convince by the use of strong language without resort to the ornate. I am here reminded of the last speech I heard him deliver on this floor, which was in opposition to the granting of certain privileges to a sectarian organization on the military reservation at West Point, in which he made a strong and convincing argument, showing that it was contrary to the spirit of the Constitution and a most dangerous and objectionable precedent. But it must not be inferred from his opposition to the measure referred to that he was not in sympathy with the religious sentiment of the country. For this sentiment and belief he had the most profound respect.

But he has passed over the dark river to test the realities of the unknown. Does he live again or shall he live again? We instinctively answer in the affirmative, else why this brief dream on earth, this mere preface to an existence? No, we do not—we can not—believe that death is an eternal sleep.

> The soul's dark cottage batter'd and decay'd
> Lets in new light through chinks that time hath made.
> Stronger by weakness wiser men become
> As they draw near to their eternal home;
> Leaving the old, both worlds at once they view
> That stand upon the threshold of the new.

[Mr. BURTON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. LENTZ addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. LYBRAND. Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay my tribute of respect to the memory of my colleague STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY, of Ohio, who departed this life on the 8th day of September, 1898.

> We must all die!
> All leave ourselves, it matters not where, when,
> Nor how, so we die well; and can that > Man that does so
> Need lamentation for him?

My acquaintance with the deceased began with my membership in the Fifty-fifth Congress. I knew him by reputation only, and did not know him personally until I met him as a member of the House of Representatives. I noted his official conduct here, and soon learned that he was not only held in high esteem by his colleagues, but by his fellow-members as well. He made no pretense as an orator, but his plain and forcible way of speaking always held the attention of the House. He never participated in debate, unless he had something pertinent to say. He was most efficient in his committee work, and his opinion on all public questions was sought for and commanded respect.

The character of a public man, one who has been aggressive, active, participating in and identified with the great questions pertaining to his State and country, can be safely estimated by the esteem in which he is held by his neighbors, associates, and fellow-citizens. Mr. NORTHWAY, in his young manhood, began his career as a school-teacher, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and located in the town of Jefferson, Ohio. He soon took rank among the leaders of his chosen profession. The Congressional district which he represented was and is noted for its patriotism and high order of intelligence. The Hon. Joshua R. Giddings and Benjamin F. Wade were his fellow-townsmen, and they, with James A. Garfield, were his illustrious predecessors as Representatives of his district. He was elected to the Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, and Fifty-fifth Congresses, and had been renominated to serve as a member of the Fifty-sixth Congress when his distinguished career was ended by his sudden death.

It was my duty as well as privilege to attend his funeral. I found the town in which he lived in grief and mourning. In respect to his memory all business had been suspended and the citizens of the town and county had assembled at his home to do honor to his memory. It was truthfully said of him that he had done his country great service, was always loyal to his party, and true to his friends.

STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY has gone from us to "that bourne from whence no traveler returns"—

> Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
> About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, as we look into each other's faces this afternoon and try with our lips to utter the thoughts of our hearts, speaking in memory of STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY, my colleague and my friend, words seem weak and speech feeble. We mourn a fellow-member gone. A statesman has passed out from this Chamber, fallen beneath the sickle of the grim reaper Death, but the memory of his kindly deeds, his loving ways, his conscientious and faithful performance of every duty coming upon him, will reach far on in years whose harvests we shall never garner, and speak for him eloquent eulogium.

To each of us there comes the sense of a personal loss. In our daily assembling we miss his presence. We look in vain for his coming—he in whose counsels wisdom and rare sweetness of spirit mingled, and on such a lofty plane of honor that rank partisanship and prejudice sank abashed.

In the nation's roll of honor there may be others whose eloquence was far beyond that of our friend, others whose vast depth of learning and broad statesmanship were greater than his. In the list of our heroic dead we have those whose brilliant genius outshone his unassuming greatness, those whose military achievements made a more lurid blaze than the light shed by his straightforward, honest discharge of every trust reposed in and imposed upon him, but in all the annals of our country's history there is not one whose whole life of high purpose, pure motive, and unquestioned integrity the youth of America could better choose as an exemplar, a model, and a guide.

We are but mortal. We breathe the breath of life here but a moment and are gone; our bodies die and the elements take back their own; the configurations of the earth, the strongest structures of the skill of man, are touched by the corroding finger of time and are changed, but the results and far-extending influence of a life like that of STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY reach out into eternity and never die.

There is much in life if we choose to make it; it is full of golden opportunities. Death is oft regarded as a calamity, and to us who are left behind it is; but who among us, if in our hands were placed the gift, would dare unlock the closed portal and call back to earth again our friend from the bosom of his God? To rest serene in the effulgent light and halo of his priceless memory of unspotted honor surpasses beyond compare all wreaths of bay and laurel the future might bring.

Others have portrayed in most fitting terms the incidents of his life and works: I wish only to pay this brief and simple tribute to a friend. I knew him well; I loved him. He was a man, honest, faithful, and brave; he was a friend, kind, loving, and true. In life's busy harvest, wherever the work was the hardest he was at the fore, taking up his burden as he found it, and only laid it down when the Master said, "It is enough." He has gone. The Lord has called him to a brighter world, to fairer skies, to sweeter, more glorious service, and there—

> In that same beautiful world,
> Under the same glowing sky,
> Led by the Father's hand
> To a home of light on high;
> Beyond this earth land of ours,
> May our greeting be as one,
> And the Lord of the harvest there,
> Accept us with the words "well done."

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with Mr. NORTHWAY began on the morning following my arrival in Washington to attend the extraordinary session of the Fifty-fifth Congress. He was the first Ohio member whom I had the pleasure to meet here. Very soon after meeting him he invited me to join him in a visit to the Executive Mansion to pay our respects to the President, which invitation I gladly accepted. Our acquaintance from that time on was most cordial. Our political differences were no bar to an exchange of friendly words whenever we met.

While I had not personally known Mr. NORTHWAY before meeting him here, I had known of him in Ohio politics. To represent the Nineteenth Congressional district of Ohio in the national Congress was itself sufficient to make his name known to everyone interested in Ohio politics. He had the distinguished honor to represent the district which had been represented for so many years by those great Ohioans, Giddings and Garfield. He came from a district famous for retaining her Representatives for a period of years in Congress. For a period of seventy-five years this district had but six Representatives in the House of Representatives. Is it any wonder that the men representing the Nineteenth district of Ohio have performed distinguished service in making the laws of the nation, and that the interests of the people of the district have been so well cared for?

It seems to have been the aim of this district from the beginning of its existence to be ably represented in Congress, and, recognizing that it requires much experience to equip members thoroughly for legislative duties, this district has pursued the policy of returning its Representatives term after term.

Mr. NORTHWAY was serving his third term in Congress at the time of his death. He had been nominated for a fourth term. It is not new information to the members of the Fifty-fifth Congress for me to say that Mr. NORTHWAY had become one of the very useful members of this body. He was a faithful and industrious member. He was so conscientious in the performance of his public duties that he was present in this Hall many times when he was scarcely physically able to be here. He had impressed me as one of the most interested members in the proceedings of the House. He was not heard to speak so often as some members who had been here a shorter time, but when he spoke his remarks were clear in thought, forcible in expression, and convincing in effect. He spoke not to amuse, but to instruct. He always seemed to me to show a proper regard for the rules of this House and the rights of its members.

The career of STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY is another worthy example of the possibilities of our American youth. He was of humble parentage, born in the country, reared on the farm, trained to habits of industry, self-reliance, self-denial, and economy.

Not blessed with the means to enter any of the celebrated colleges of the land, yet by hard work and perseverance he acquired, at such schools as he could attend and by self-study, a very good general education. He had learned what was of great importance, to be a student; yea, he had learned what was best of all, to be a man. He was a clean man, an honorable man. He was an honest man, incapable of willful and deliberate untruthfulness. He was true to himself, to his constituents, and to his friends. He was true to every trust reposed in him.

Mr. NORTHWAY was a modest man, yet he was firm and positive in his opinions. He was frank in stating his position on questions and was a person who, I believe, never meant to deceive any man. He was not narrow-minded, selfish, nor bigoted; he was broad, generous, and charitable. He was affable, genial, and courteous in his manners. It was a delight to know him and to be with him.

Mr. NORTHWAY belonged to the class of men who have achieved and are achieving the greatest and noblest results in all pursuits and vocations of life. He came from hardy pioneer stock. He was schooled in hard work and frugal ways of living. He had early learned to rely upon his own efforts. He knew no such word as fail. He could have won success probably in any of the professions or callings. He was a growing man. The sickle of death cut him down at the time of his greatest usefulness. Although he has been taken from us, he will live in our memories in the exemplary life that he lived, in the grand work that he wrought.

> We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
> In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
> * * * * He most lives
> Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, the brief statement in the Congressional Directory of the life and public services of the man whose memory we revere and whose virtues we this day extol sets forth sufficient data upon which to base much more extended remarks than I shall attempt to make upon this occasion.

His span of life was not so great as that of many men, covering as it did a little less than two-thirds of a century, and yet it covered a time when the progress of development in all directions was so swift and so comprehensive that the fullness of life was attained not alone by the measurement of time.

From 1833 to 1898 great events were in progress, great topics were discussed, and great principles elucidated and established. One of the products of these times was STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY. Without rank or wealth or lineage behind him to spur him on to still greater achievements or possessions, he, as sturdy as the soil upon which he was born and as gratefully responsive as that to which he removed while yet a child of tender years, brought forth the full fruit of rugged manhood. Educated by nature rather than by books, by toil rather than by teachers, he equipped himself for the contest with the world and became the master of many of its great problems and conditions. He was one of those men whose strength, as well as pride, lay largely in the fact that he was the son of a pioneer and was himself a pioneer. One of those whose duty it was to first subdue and then love and cultivate and stimulate adverse nature, plant fields where forests had stood, construct roads where straggling paths had been, build towns and cities where the waste of the wilderness had held sway, and lay the foundation, broad and deep, for the glorious superstructure of later and even greater civilization, culture, and refinement.

All through his life his work was of a character that others rather than himself should reap the benefit of it. To such a man mere worldly wealth or distinguished social environments or professional or political preferment was not a necessity for the procuring of happiness or the attaining of an honorable career. Those ends were both sought and attained by a strict adherence to duty, a loyalty to principle that never faltered, an aptitude and willingness to discern that which was right, and then to do it. In the great State where he was reared and spent all of the active years of his life he made his impress on the history of its progress, both in the halls of legislation and of the courts. Never was there a good cause he did not uphold; never a bad one he did not condemn. In his earlier life, charged with the official duty of prosecuting doers of evil deeds, he was swift, but sure and relentless, always remembering that he was the sacred minister of the State. He never forgot to hold himself in exact equipoise between an outraged public, the unjustly accused, or the hardened criminal; and likewise never forgot that the reformation of the vicious was the true object of the prosecution, and that justice tempered with mercy was ever a proper shield to be interposed against the exaction of the full pound of flesh.

Of his distinguished services in Congress—through successive terms—I do not intend so speak. Let that be done by those who were his colleagues and colaborers for a longer period than myself; or, better yet, give tongue to the silent RECORDS and the dead echoes of the committee rooms and let them say, as they both can and will, that he was always ready, always industrious and untiring, and ever brought to the faithful discharge of his duty a clear and comprehensive knowledge of his responsibilities and the needs of his country.

Just one word more and I have done. Many others in this House will agree with me that absolute injustice would be done to the memory of our friend if we did not mention his extreme kindness to all with whom he came in contact, and which was one of his most attractive traits. Unlike some, his years of public service, crowned with honor and replete with success, did not lead him to forget even for a moment that he too had at one time stood on the bottom round of the ladder and with trembling limb and faltering eye had hesitated to attempt to climb to a point of real usefulness until some one had given him a word of hope or inspiration or had patiently told him how to firmly grasp the round above and thus escape from the mist that obscured his vision. A kind word in season fitly spoken was ever on his lips, and many a heart, both here and elsewhere, has been made the happier thereby.

These are but plain words about a plain man. No word picture I could create would do him justice or adequately portray the feeling of personal loss we have on account of his death. The world would be better and life easier if there were more like him, and we can say with exact truth that his name will always be a fragrant memory to all who knew him.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Mr. Speaker, I shall find it difficult to add to the well-deserved tributes paid to the memory of STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY here to-day. I first became acquainted with him in the campaign of 1880, but our intimate acquaintance and personal friendship commenced when we entered Congress in the extraordinary session of the Fifty-third Congress. His was a most congenial nature, that made fast friendships within the circle of his associates and added zest and cheerfulness to life. At any social gathering of his friends he was the central figure, entertaining his eager listeners with a rare fund of story and reminiscence. It is rare that one is called upon to pay tribute to so generous and lofty a spirit.

STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY was not only great in heart, but strong in intellect. He was not only a loyal friend, but a faithful representative of the common people, courageous in the performance of his duty. His life began in the country, amid the rugged surroundings of a pioneer home, and largely by dint of his own efforts he came to be the recognized leader in a district famous for strong men. Had life and health continued he promised to become a leader in Congress. His second term of service found him a member of the Committee on Appropriations, where his faithful and efficient work gave him high rank among his colleagues. He was a working member. While not an active participant in the ordinary debate of the House, he was an accomplished orator, and the few speeches he made always commanded attention.

It was my pleasure to know something of the home life of Mr. NORTHWAY. It was a model of domestic felicity. His wife was a cultured lady of most lovable qualities, and the harmony of their lives and purposes was beautiful. The fact that a fatal malady had seized her so wrought upon his mind as to contribute largely to his illness and its result. Just three weeks after the husband's death the wife followed him.

The record of a life of kind deeds is made up. His gentleness, his gracious mein, his patient fortitude, his manly strength and courage, his love of home, of wife and child—these shall be his monument.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, I became personally acquainted with STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY at the beginning of the Fifty-fourth Congress. I can speak of him only as his personality impressed itself on me. His disposition was always cheerful, and my associations with him were most cordial and agreeable. He was in every sense a man and a gentleman.

He was a scholar, an able lawyer, and an earnest, honest, courageous, and painstaking representative, not only of the people of his own district, but of the whole country; conscious of his own powers, and with full confidence in his judgment of things and men, he was considerate and respectful of the opinions of others.

He was kind and courteous toward all, yet in his desire to please he did not permit himself to go beyond the point where duty to his constituents and his country began.

He was a forcible and convincing speaker, yet his talents in this direction were used only when some new and needed light could be thrown on a pending question. His nature was sympathetic, and in the performance of his public duty he always guarded with watchful eye the interests of those who are least able to protect themselves.

His character was such that he easily won and retained the confidence of all those with whom he came in contact.

We all have missed and shall continue to miss his genial presence, many of us his helpful assistance.

The country has lost in him an honorable, patriotic, and devoted servant, whose example, however, will not be lost on those who have been privileged to know him.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, my friend and colleague, Mr. NORTHWAY, possessed ability and capacity of so high an order, ability and capacity which for the mere purpose of display he never exhibited here, that I am moved by a special impulse to bear testimony to them to-day.

I think that no man in Congress possessing in so full measure the accomplishments of a debater so resolutely effaced himself as a public character as Mr. NORTHWAY. He was courageous, he was informed, he was of acute and agile intellect, he had great capacity for speaking and large experience in it, and his committee position gave him a suitable status. Yet, considering his ability and opportunities, he rarely spoke. His example is worthy of emulation.

I think he was strongest in the peculiar talents that make men conspicuously felt on this floor, and I do not think he was ignorant of his powers. He had fire, earnestness, quickness of perception, and fluency of language, wit, convictions, and a faculty for repartee. Yet he never offended the House, if that were possible, by too much speaking. He could do this safely. So far as his constituents were concerned, they knew him well, and they knew that it was not by pyrotechnics on the floor, but by solid work in his committee and in conference, that the great labors of legislation were borne and made effective.

The most valuable testimony of his usefulness is given by his colleagues on the Appropriations Committee. By that his career here may best be measured, and happy is he who can merit what has been said of Mr. NORTHWAY by these colleagues.

If I were to characterize in the manner most satisfactory to myself the impression made by Mr. NORTHWAY upon those with whom he came into contact, I would say that he seemed to clear the atmosphere of sham and humbug, that the air was purer and freer after he had spoken, whether in conversation or on this floor, and that one left him always with a sense of refreshed and invigorated intellectuality. He left nothing torpid, or sodden, or vacuous. There was a breezy, vivid healthfulness about his mental operations that insensibly invigorated his associates.

If I admired him much, I liked him more. His place, whether as a man or as a legislator, will be hard to fill. I have missed him. We have all missed him, but we remember his personality with affection and his abilities with respect.

Mr. MEEKISON. Mr. Speaker, to speak fittingly of the dead, of his character and virtues, one should have an intimate acquaintance with the person while living. I confess that I had not the honor of such an acquaintance. Although residents of the same State our homes were as far apart as State lines would permit. My acquaintance is limited to my observations on his public services in the brief time that I have served with him in this House.

But loving hearts are here to-day, bowed in sorrow for the loss of that friend, who knew him long and well, and with one accord testify to his genial nature, his cleanness of heart and purpose, his fidelity to every trust, and zeal for his country's welfare.

As has been said, STEPHEN NORTHWAY was born in the State of New York, and was tall and graceful, like one of her northern pines, and when he occupied the floor of the House looked like Saul among his brethren.

In his early youth he came with his family to the rich forest lands of Ohio, and with ax in his hand hewed a home for the family from the dense woods and converted a forest into productive fields.

From this fact and the struggles he had to obtain an education, we can say that he was of the plain, moral, and upright people of the United States, a rich inheritance to any man, and the hope and pride of our land.

This country is full of examples of the possibilities that lie before the gifted and ambitious youth of America.

In STEPHEN NORTHWAY they have another worthy example. To all of us he is a lesson and a hope; for I care not who sings our songs, so long as the American people send such men as STEPHEN NORTHWAY to write our laws the institutions of this country are safe.

[Mr. POWERS addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, when I came here four years ago to take a seat in the House STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY was one of the few members with whom I had a personal acquaintance, and my acquaintance with him consisted in a single meeting some years before, but the quality of his greeting was so kindly and so cordial that in the somewhat chilly atmosphere of this Chamber it has lived a most agreeable memory. His unexpected death last summer refreshed in my mind the kindly character of this trifling episode, and I felt I should not let this occasion pass without some words expressive of my deep regret at his death and in appreciation of his honorable character and distinguished career.

He came into the House at the beginning of the Fifty-third Congress and at a time when there was little opportunity for personal distinction and with a task, as Representative, of exceptional difficulty. For more than fifty years the people of his district had worshiped at the shrine of great men in the persons of their Representatives. Their ideals of statesmanship were colossal and upon the pedestals in their Valhalla giants stood.

In the Nineteenth district of Ohio old Ben Wade lived and wrought his way to that exalted and enduring fame which constitutes no inconsiderable part of the most important and illustrious epoch of our country's history. This district had been represented by Joshua R. Giddings, whose superlative courage and tremendous blows for freedom loosened the landslide under which slavery was buried forever. From the midst of these people to this Chamber came Garfield to tread, in very truth, the path to the perilous heights of fame and to his martyrdom.

A district which had been the home of Wade and which had been represented for a generation by Giddings and Garfield could not and would not be satisfied with talents and services which did not in some degree sustain the splendid reputation of its past. Mr. NORTHWAY'S predecessors had brought to the old Nineteenth district such renown that to represent it was to stand conspicuously in the public eye and inevitably to have his work and service measured by theirs.

Men of conspicuous attainments and position are measured by those who have gone before them and in whose footsteps they seek to tread. Upon the stature and within the outlines of the forms of Demosthenes and Cicero is marked the height and breadth of every great orator since. Every great soldier, before he receives his crown of glory, must stand back to back with Alexander and Napoleon. The sculptors and painters are measured by Phidias and Raphael and Michael Angelo, the philosophers by Socrates and Aristotle and Plato, the poets by Homer and Shakespeare.

In statesmanship no ancient standard suffices to receive and measure the sublime proportions of Gladstone and the German chancellor, but upon an isolated eminence these two great careers will stand an example and a measure for ages to come. Even the brave and heroic, to whom our hearts always go in generous impulse, must stand as the fierce blaze of Thermopylæ and Balaklava. And so, in accordance with the rule, NORTHWAY was compared and contrasted with Giddings and Garfield.

He may not have been as courageous as Giddings—he was never tried—he certainly was not as eloquent as Garfield; but when he entered the House the heroic age of American politics was passed, and the stirring events of the civil war, which had inspired Garfield to transcendent eloquence, were history. Time does not permit an analysis of the characteristic and moving forces of his life, nor to sketch with any justice the breadth and depth of his mental powers.

As he impressed me, his mental qualities, great and varied, as I believe them to have been, were not of the popular character in public speech; his disposition was toward utility rather than ornamentation; his temperament was essentially judicial, and his habits and methods those of a painstaking and accurate lawyer. Here much depends upon length of service. Had Mr. NORTHWAY come into the House at 50 or under and served twenty years, he would have become inevitably a leader—in many respects such an one as the other day resigned the leadership of this side with his life.

At his age practical statesmanship was merely a supplement to or rather a rounding out of his professional career. He practiced law in a country town, but with the narrow opportunities of such an environment he achieved high rank at a State bar which has contributed to the national juridical firmament such stars as Ranney and Chase and Waite and Thurman and Mathews.

Brought up on the Western Reserve Mr. NORTHWAY was a partisan, but an independent partisan upon questions involving morals as well as politics. In his section in the ante-bellum days party fealty was a matter of conscience and anti-slavery principles a part of the religion of the people. In those days, dark with the shadow of the coming conflict, the old Western Reserve Republican went to the polls with his ballot in one hand and his Bible in the other. Thus surrounded, breathing this atmosphere, the character of our departed colleague was formed.

No higher eulogium could be pronounced upon him as a man than to say that he was a true and genuine representative of that virile and patriotic manhood which had made the Western Reserve such a conspicuous and potent factor in the days of emancipation and regeneration. No higher eulogium could be pronounced upon his public career than to say that his services as a Representative were satisfactory to his constituency—a constituency which had been served and honored and glorified as no other single district in the Republic had been.

His life is ended; the book of his deeds is closed and sealed; fulsome eulogy will not add to and detraction can not take from it. His people knew him best of all, and his epitaph is written in their hearts. I write my tribute upon these records. He was a conscientious lawyer, a careful legislator, an honest partisan, and a good citizen.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, those who knew Mr. NORTHWAY for a long time, and who served with him here for many years, are qualified and entitled to place in the record a just estimate of his worth, and to express the true sense of the great loss which his death brought to this House, to his State, and to his country. I knew him personally less than two years. I first met him when I came to Washington as a member of the Fifty-fifth Congress. He was then entering upon his third term. I at once formed his acquaintance. His manner and bearing impressed and touched me. Though an old member, approach to him by the new member was easy and pleasant.

No air of lofty superiority, coming from the fact that he was an old member, was apparent in him. Old member that he was, he did not appear to look down in amusement or compassion on the new member. I often went to him for information, and always obtained it. He was frank, thoughtful, generous, and kind, and my first impression of him, that he was a good and noble character, soon grew into respect, regard, and affection, and if he is today where he can hear what we say he will know that this very brief and most imperfect tribute to his memory is at least as sincere as words can be.

One week ago this afternoon we heard in this Chamber eloquent eulogies on the usefulness and the beauty of the life of Hon. Nelson Dingley. On that occasion one gentleman quoted lines, which I here repeat as containing also a true picture of Mr. NORTHWAY:

> He seemed the thing he was, and joined
> Each office of the social hour
> To noble manners, as the flower
> And native growth of noble mind,
> And thus he bore without abuse
> The grand old name of gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, February 20, at 12 o'clock noon.

This is to certify that at a meeting of the American Public Health Association, held in Ottawa, Canada, September 27–30, 1898, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the American Public Health Association earnestly recommends that a plan be incorporated in the act to provide for the taking of the next United States census whereby reliable representative vital statistics may be secured for the nonregistration States."

Attest: C. O. PROBST, Secretary.

Memorial of the committee of the Public Health Association on demography and statistics in their sanitary relations, to the Congress of the United States, in behalf of improved methods of collecting mortality statistics by the Twelfth United States Census.

To the honorable Senators and Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, members of the committee on demography and statistics in their sanitary relations, of the American Public Health Association, and other members thereof, being, for the most part, executive officers of our several State and municipal boards of health, and as such charged with the practical administration of the laws relating to the collection and compilation of vital statistics as well as with the use of such statistics in the prevention and restriction of diseases as an essential part of the public-health service, have the honor to respectfully present the following statements and recommendations relating to the collection of mortality statistics by the United States census:

The collection of accurate mortality statistics for the "nonregistration States" is absolutely necessary to make the statistics of mortality of the United States as a whole and of the individual States of value for general comparative and practical sanitary purposes. These States comprised all of the States of the Union at the Eleventh Census, except Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, and Delaware, and the District of Columbia, which has "fairly complete" registration of deaths during the census year. (Eleventh Census, Part I, Vital and Social Statistics, page 1.) Only two or three more States will be available as "registration States" in 1900 than in 1890, so that the task of obtaining reliable mortality statistics for the country at large will fall as before upon the census.

The Eleventh Census, like its predecessors, failed entirely in establishing the general death rate of the country. It did not even satisfactorily determine whether the mortality of the country was greater or less in the census year 1890 than in 1880:

"The total number of deaths reported as having occurred in the United States during the census year is 875,521, giving a death rate of 13.93 to the thousand of living population. This death rate is lower than that given in the census of 1880, viz, 15.09, and higher than that given by the census or 1870, viz, 12.77. This does not indicate any actual change in the death rate, but rather that the enumerators' returns of the Eleventh Census are more deficient as regards the deaths than was the case in 1880." (Compendium of the Eleventh Census, Part II, page 3.)

The failure was, of course, even more complete as regards the nonregistration States than for the country as a whole, under the last census:

"The actual death rate for the nonregistration area in 1880, as based upon the enumerators' returns, was 13.42 per 1,000 of population, while the same class of returns now give a rate of but 10.79 per 1,000; hence there must have been either a great increase in the healthfulness of the country or the enumerators' returns must be more incomplete as regards the deaths than they were in 1880." (Compendium of the Eleventh Census, Part II, page 4.)

The results of the method of enumerating deaths at the close of the census year have been recognized as extremely unsatisfactory ever since their first employment under the Seventh Census:

"The tables of the census which undertake to give the total number of births, marriages, and deaths in the year preceding the 1st of June, 1850, can be said to have but little value. Nothing short of a registration system in the States will give these data with even approximate truth, and where such a system has been best established difficulties have continually occurred requiring a very long period of time to be removed. Against all reasonings the facts have proved that the people will not, or can not, remember and report to the census taker the number of such events, and the particulars of them, which have happened in the period of a whole year prior to the time of his calling." (Seventh Census of the United States, 1850, page xxxix.)

"It is manifest that neither in 1850 nor in 1860 was the entire mortality of any State ascertained and reported; nor was even such an approximation obtained as will permit any reliable calculation to be made of the rate of mortality or any safe estimate of the proportion of the deaths to the living. The proportions of the deaths reported in 1850 and in 1860 vary so widely—from over 2 per cent to less than one-half of 1 per cent—that not even the amount of deficiency can be estimated." (Eighth Census of the United States, 1860; Mortality and Miscellaneous Statistics, page xxv.)

"At no one of the three censuses taken under the act of May 23, 1850, has the aggregate number of deaths returned by the assistant marshals risen above two-thirds of the number of deaths probably occurring during the year of enumeration." (Ninth Census of the United States, 1870; Vital Statistics, page ix.)

"The fact that it is impossible in any large community to collect complete and reliable data with regard to births and deaths by means of an inquiry made only at the end of the year for which the data are desired is well known to all who are practically familiar with the subject of vital statistics, and the experience of the United States census furnishes no exception to this rule. The results of each of the four censuses in which an attempt has been made to ascertain the number of persons who died in the United States during the preceding year have shown that the enumerators did not obtain and record more than 60 to 70 per cent of the actual number of deaths, and the introductory remark to the statistics of mortality of the Ninth Census still holds good, viz, that 'if the value of the statistics of mortality in a census of the United States, taken under existing laws, depended upon the return of substantially the whole body of deaths occurring during the year covered by the enumeration, the results would not be worth the space occupied by publication, much less the expense of collection and compilation.'" (Tenth Census of the United States, 1880; Mortality and Vital Statistics, Part I, page xi.)

This discredited method, which has thus proved a failure for five successive United States censuses, is the method solely provided for the nonregistration States, and thus for the United States as a whole, in the bills (S. 4545 and H. R. 11815) under consideration by the present Congress. The experience of the past has been conclusive as to its futility, and the failure to present accurate and also timely mortality statistics for the country is fraught with great injury to the sanitary services of the States. Reliable mortality statistics are essential in practical public-health work.

It is perfectly practicable, within the reasonable limits of expenditure by the census for this purpose, to collect accurate mortality statistics for the nonregistration States; or, if the unreliable method of enumeration at the end of the year be retained, as at present provided by the bills referred to, then it is also even more feasible to provide for accurate registration in representative areas of the nonregistration States, to the end that the amount of deficiency in the returns obtained by enumeration may be approximately known and thus the data be rendered available for important comparisons.

To this end the American Public Health Association, at its last annual meeting, and after the subject had received a year's consideration from the executive committee, unanimously adopted a resolution "earnestly recommending that a plan be incorporated in the act to provide for the taking of the next United States census whereby reliable representative vital statistics may be secured for the nonregistration States."

In pursuance of the expressed desire of the association, and in behalf of the practical collectors and users of vital statistics included in its membership, we therefore respectfully petition that general authority for the collection of reliable mortality statistics for representative areas of nonregistration States, if not for nonregistration States as a whole, to the entire disuse of the obsolete method of enumeration at the end of the year, be incorporated in the organic census law to be passed by Congress, and that all provisions limiting the collection of mortality statistics of a reliable character solely to registration areas be stricken out.

Inasmuch as the beginning of the census year 1899–1900 is near at hand, and as the collection of reliable mortality statistics requires constant supervision during the registration year, it would be very desirable that the mortality statistics to be collected by the Twelfth Census should be for the calendar year 1900, instead of for the year 1899–1900. This would not only give the necessary time for preliminary organization of an efficient registration service as part of the general census work, but would render the mortality statistics more comparable with (1) the statistics of States, cities, and foreign countries, most of which are taken for the calendar year; and (2) with the population, as obtained by the census, for the very important purpose of computing death rates. The advantage in basing rates upon the mean population of the registration year, instead of the population at the end of the year, as has been done by previous censuses, clearly appears in the following extract from the Mortality and Vital Statistics of the Tenth Census, Part I, page 19:

"Still less is it possible to make useful comparisons of these death rates with those of other countries. They are in every case too small, for two reasons: The first is the failure to record all of the deaths which occurred during the census year; the second is that the calculations are based, not on the mean population of the year—that is to say, the number of living persons who actually furnished this number of deaths—but upon the number of survivors at the end of the year, which is greater than that of the mean population, and therefore gives a less death rate. With the exception of the life-table computations, to be referred to hereafter, all the calculations of death rates in this report and in the tables are based on the number of survivors at the end of the year, instead of taking the mean population, as is the rule in the statistics of other countries."

These representations are made with the confident belief that Congress will share our conviction that it is vastly important that the mortality statistics to be obtained under the approaching Federal census shall be accurate, and with the hope that the expression of our opinion, as practical sanitary and registration officials, whose everyday concern is the collection and use of such data, that it is entirely feasible to collect thoroughly reliable and useful mortality statistics for the United States, may have a special value at this time and lead to the incorporation of the necessary provisions in the pending legislation.

In conclusion, referring to the purpose expressed in the bills now before Congress that the work shall be completed at an early date, we wish to most heartily commend this purpose. It will add in a very marked degree to the usefulness of any mortality statistics collected by the census to have them promptly available for use. Indeed, by the adoption of a modern method of registration, reliable statistics might be available within sixty days after the beginning of the registration year. Ample postal facilities should be at the disposal of the census in order to secure prompt returns. With proper provisions for the collection of reliable representative mortality statistics in nonregistration States, we shall have made a beginning of placing our country on a plane in this respect similar to that occupied by most civilized nations, and a firm foundation will have been laid for sanitary improvement during the coming century.

Respectfully submitted.

S. M. CULLOM,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. A. HEMENWAY,
A. M. DOCKERY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CHILTON. It is not proposed to take the report up for consideration now?

Mr. CULLOM. I think we may as well dispose of it. I will say to the Senator that there is very little in it except that the Senate conferees gave away where we had increased a few salaries. We had to give them up pretty generally.

Mr. CHILTON. That part of it is a pretty good thing, but I am satisfied that there is not a member of the Senate who understands the report from the reading, and to vote on it now would be just a matter of trust.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not particular, if the Senator from Texas prefers that it shall go over.

Mr. CHILTON. Let it lie over until to-morrow. There will be no question about it.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is an agreement on the part of the conferees?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir; an agreement.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. A full agreement?

The bill (H. R. 8214) granting an increase of pension to Francis Scott was read twice by its title.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senate passed a bill identical with this bill, which was passed by the House on the same day. I entered a motion to recall the Senate bill from the House with a view to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed it. I ask that the House bill be taken up.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11683) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. When the bill was last under consideration the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] was speaking to some provision of the bill. The Chair understands that no amendment is pending.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, when the Senate on Saturday postponed until to-day the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, I was discussing the situation in which the Senate was placed on account of the Postal Commission appointed to investigate the whole subject of postal affairs not being able to report at this session of Congress.

A year ago, when the Post-Office appropriation bill was under consideration, I offered an amendment providing for a reduction of the appropriation for railway mail pay from $30,500,000 to $24,500,000, a reduction of $6,000,000. At that time I addressed the Senate at some length explaining why I offered the amendment, and attempted with facts and arguments to show why the Senate should adopt the same.

I called attention to the fact that the amendment was in the exact form of amendments heretofore adopted by Congress on Post-Office appropriation bills. I called attention to the fact that in 1876 an amendment in the same form was offered and adopted on the appropriation bill providing for a reduction of 10 per cent and instructing the Postmaster-General to rearrange and scale down the amount paid for railway mail transportation in accordance with that provision.

I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that again in 1878, only two years later, a similar amendment was again offered and put upon the appropriation bill of that year providing for a further reduction of 5 per cent, making a total reduction within two years of 15 per cent. That reduction was made as a result of an investigation by a special commission on railway mail transportation. That was the Gardiner Hubbard Commission of 1876.

That reduction that was made was a compromise, for I think I am safe in saying that the investigation showed that a greater reduction was justified. I have taken the trouble and time to examine to some extent the testimony taken by that commission. So we see that the last reduction was made twenty-one years ago. The child in its cradle when that reduction was made is now a grown man, more than 21 years of age. So during the time that our generation has passed away and a new generation has been born and grown up there has been no reduction or revision in the amount paid by the Government for railway mail transportation.

During that time passenger rates have been reduced about 20 per cent—voluntarily reduced by the railroads themselves, without any legislation by Congress. During that time freight rates have been reduced more than 40 per cent—voluntary reductions made by the railroads themselves, without any action by Congress to require them to do it.

I presented to the Senate a large mass of data which I had collected proving the statements that I had made, which statements were not contradicted. Not only were they not successfully contradicted, but no attempt was made by anyone upon this floor to contradict the statements of fact which I made then.

I may be pardoned for saying that there was no answer to those facts in the possession of any Senator sufficient to refute them—at least they were not produced; but my proposition for a reduction of 20 per cent was met by the proposition that we had better have another investigation by a commission to ascertain how great a reduction should be made. I think it was the general opinion of this body that a reduction should be made.

I expected, and I think every Senator expected, that we should have this information before we were asked to vote upon another Post-Office appropriation bill. It is not the fault of the commission, except those who took part in it, that they are loaded down with so much work, so that it is impossible for them to intelligently conclude their labors by this time. A number of us foresaw the trouble then, and regretted that the Appropriations Committee saw fit to so load down the commission.

But, Mr. President, I submit that while this investigation is being made, at least we should not in this appropriation bill increase the amount to more than it was in the last appropriation bill. It stands proven before the Senate at this time that a reduction of 20 per cent at least should be made. Unless the commission shall be able to gather information to prove that the data furnished here a year ago was incorrect, then it is proven, and will continue to be proven, and I think no one expects the commission to be able to produce data to prove that we are not paying enough for railway mail transportation; yet here we are met a year later on with an appropriation bill which increases the annual amount of the railway mail pay more than any increase which has ever been made at any one time heretofore.

I have before me the amount of the appropriation made every year for the last twenty-five years. The increases amounted sometimes to a few hundred thousand dollars and sometimes to $1,000,000, but have never amounted to as much as $2,000,000 in any one year.

But this bill brought in here now, while we are investigating the very question to find out how much reduction should be made, proposes to increase the appropriation by nearly $3,000,000 for railway transportation alone. I submit that at least we ought to keep the appropriation at what it was a year ago until this commission can report. The case is proven that there ought to be a 20 per cent reduction; and it would stand so proven before any court of justice on the evidence submitted.

Then, if the commission can not report now, why not keep down the appropriation for this year to at least no more than it was a year ago? A year ago we appropriated $30,500,000. This bill appropriates $33,275,000—the biggest increase that has ever been made.

Mr. COCKRELL. How much do I understand the Senator to say was appropriated last year?

Mr. BUTLER. Thirty million five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. COCKRELL. And how much this year?

Mr. BUTLER. Thirty-three million two hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars—the biggest increase that has ever been made in the history of the Post-Office Department in one year; and that, too, in the face of the fact that we are now, through a special Postal Commission, investigating the question to see how much reduction can be made in the railway mail pay.

Therefore, Mr. President, I simply offer this amendment now to hold down this appropriation for this current year to what it was a year ago, and not increase it while we are investigating to see how much we can reduce it. I submit, as a common-sense proposition to every Senator on the floor, that there is no shadow of excuse for increasing this appropriation more than we ever increased one before while we are investigating to see how much to reduce it.

I ask that the amendment I have offered, which is in the usual form that has been heretofore adopted in making reductions, be stated. That amendment simply provides for keeping the appropriation this year down to what it was last year until the commission shall report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the clause making appropriations "for inland transportation by railroad routes," on page 15, line 3, after the word "distribution," it is proposed to strike out "$33,275,000" and to insert:

Thirty million five hundred thousand dollars; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1898, for the transportation of mails on railway routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails at least 10 per cent per annum from the rate fixed in section 4002 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by act of July 12, 1876, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," and as further amended by act of June 17, 1878, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight; and the above amount appropriated shall cover full compensation for railway mail transportation.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, the amount appropriated in this bill for railway mail transportation is, it is true, increased from two to three million dollars above the appropriation of last year. That is about the ordinary increase in each annual appropriation bill. Probably some portion of it is due to the abnormal stimulus of business and to the existing war, which has increased the postal business immensely.

If it were right to pass the appropriation of last year at the figures then adopted by the Committee on Appropriations and agreed to by the Senate, it is right to pass the appropriation this year as the Committee on Appropriations has reported it.

It is true, as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] has stated, that he bitterly assailed the appropriation last year, alleging that we were paying to the railroad companies several million dollars to which they were not entitled. The Senator says he distinctly proved that to the satisfaction of the Senate, but I think he has not.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not say that.

Mr. QUAY. As I understood the Senator, he said he had distinctly proved that to the satisfaction of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. No; I did not say that, for I had no way of ascertaining that. I simply know, and I so stated, as my remarks will show, that I presented facts showing that there should be a reduction of at least 20 per cent. I stated that these facts were not contradicted or refuted, and I said I presumed if any Senator had had any facts in his possession to show that I was wrong he would have presented them to the Senate. I further stated that the Senate met the proposition of a 20 per cent reduction, which stood proved—proven because the facts and arguments presented were not refuted—by adopting the proposition made by the Committee on Appropriations to create a special commission to investigate the whole question and report to the Senate. That is what I stated.

Now, the remarks Senators made at that time, when the last appropriation bill was under consideration, will show that they stated that they would support the proposition of the Appropriations Committee for an investigation rather than my proposition for a 20 per cent reduction, because they were not sure that there should be that much reduction, or just what reduction should be made, but that we should investigate the matter officially and then act on the information so secured. That was about the substance of the discussion.

Mr. QUAY. The facts are, Mr. President, that the Committee on Appropriations last year had made a partial investigation of this subject, and the accuracy of the results of the investigation was challenged by the Senator from North Carolina. Thereupon a commission was appointed to take charge of this subject in addition to other branches of the postal service and to make an investigation. That commission is now in charge of the investigation and is progressing with it, but has made no report.

The contention of the Senator from North Carolina is that we shall now blindly strike out $3,000,000 this year from this appropriation without having any evidence before us to show that the railroad companies are or are not being paid too much.

Mr. BUTLER. The proposition is simply not to increase the appropriation while we are investigating, but to make the appropriation the same now as it was last year.

Mr. QUAY. If the appropriation made last year was the correct amount, then the appropriation ought to be $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 more this year in the ordinary course of business, which compels every year an increase of this appropriation for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course I understand that there is an increase of business each year. We have each year appropriated from $500,000 to $1,000,000, and sometimes over $1,000,000, but never as much as $2,000,000, to cover that increase of business following the old law—the old rate fixed in 1878, over twenty years ago.

As far back as 1883, Mr. Gresham, who was then Postmaster-General, realized that the rate of pay fixed by the law of 1878 was too high, and that under that law he would be forced each year to make estimates for increased appropriations that were too large for the service rendered. He was authorized by act of Congress of March 3, 1883, to investigate the matter and report to Congress.

This report is found in Executive Document No. 35, Forty-eighth Congress, first session. Again, in 1885, the Postmaster-General in his annual report called the attention of Congress to the fact that rate of pay for railway mail transportation was too high, and that the Department was powerless to reduce the rate unless authorized to do so by Congress.

Therefore, I submit that while we are investigating to find out how much to reduce the appropriation, surely we should not make the greatest increased appropriation we have ever made, and that it would be safe to stand on the amount appropriated a year ago.

Mr. QUAY. We are not investigating to ascertain how much we should reduce the appropriation, but we are investigating to ascertain how much should rightly be paid to the railroad companies, and whether the rate should be reduced or increased. That is my understanding of the duty of this commission.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly if we should find that we are paying the railroad companies too little, and that can be established to the satisfaction of Senators, no one will vote more cheerfully than I will to increase the rate of pay to the railroads, and pass a relief bill for them so that they will not be imposed upon.

Mr. QUAY. The commission is not instructed to report a reduction.

Mr. BUTLER. There never having been any evidence to show that the railroads were paid too little, or any such attempt made on this floor, I did not suppose that was in the mind of the Senator as a possibility.

Mr. QUAY. I merely mentioned it as an illustration of the duty of the commission, that they were not appointed to reduce the railway mail pay, but to ascertain the exact limit, the just limit, of this appropriation.

Mr. BUTLER. But the Senator will admit that since considerable evidence was produced here—or testimony, I will say, at least, but I think it was evidence, because it was not contradicted—showing that there should be at least a 20 per cent reduction, and that proposition having been met, not with facts and arguments in rebuttal, but by the appointment of a commission to investigate officially and report, that it is reasonable to say that the purpose Congress had in view was to see how much reduction should be made in the railway mail pay. But that is neither here nor there. That, however, explains why I used the language I did.

Will the committee accept the amendment?

Mr. QUAY. I will say that I can not accept the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the difficulty which the Senator from North Carolina must encounter is that in reducing the amount of the appropriation without changing the method of paying the railroads he saves nothing. This amount of $33,275,000 is estimated as necessary to pay for transporting the mails under the existing system of compensation at so much per pound for the mail carried.

As long as that method of estimating the pay goes on, then we must pay the amount, either in the regular annual Post-Office appropriation bill or in a deficiency bill. So if the service to be performed for the next fiscal year according to the present statutory rate of pay will require $33,000,000, the Senator from North Carolina knows we must pay it, and it makes no difference whether we appropriate $30,000,000 now and $3,000,000 in a deficiency bill, or whether we appropriate the $33,000,000 at this time. I can see no good myself in creating a deficiency to be appropriated for a year later. I see no wisdom in holding back from the railroads the pay which they earn under existing law in order to appropriate it as a deficiency.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CHANDLER. Only one word more, if the Senator from North Carolina will allow me.

Mr. BUTLER. I only wished before the Senator sat down to call his attention to a statement made by him——

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] has stated correctly the object of the commission. The commission did not assume that the object of its creation necessarily was to reduce the railway mail pay. The object of the commission is to ascertain what is a fair amount of pay for the railroads and by what method their compensation should be computed.

While I remain, I repeat, of the decided impression that the railway mail pay is too large, I am utterly unable—and so is the Senator from North Carolina—to determine how much the pay should be reduced, or by what system the pay should be reduced. I do not think it wise at this time to undertake to make, or to appear to make, an arbitrary reduction of the amount when we do not in fact lessen the obligations of the Government to the railroad companies during the next fiscal year by one single dollar.

Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from New Hampshire says it will accomplish nothing to adopt this amendment, because we will have to appropriate the money in a deficiency appropriation bill to pay what the railroads will earn under existing law if this amendment is adopted. The Senator has not read the amendment. Every point raised by the Senator I had considered before preparing the amendment. Of course, as is well known to Senators, if we, for an arbitrary or for a good reason, reduce an appropriation which is made according to the estimate under existing law, then there will most likely be a deficiency appropriation required.

Therefore I used in this amendment precisely the form which has been approved by Congress and by the Appropriations Committee itself and placed upon appropriation bills twice, once in 1876 and once in 1878, when a similar reduction was made.

The amendment provides for a reduction to the amount appropriated last year; but it further provides that in order that there shall not be a deficiency appropriation, the Postmaster-General shall rearrange and readjust the amount to be paid under existing law so as to scale the amount down 10 per cent. In 1876 we did exactly that thing; in 1878 we provided for a reduction and a scaling down of 5 per cent, and this scaling down of 10 per cent now, it happens, would reduce the proposed appropriation to just what it was last year. So, with that reduction on a 10 per cent scale, it would leave the appropriation proposed in this amendment just as it was last year. Therefore there would be no deficiency appropriation.

I have offered the amendment because it seemed to me, with all due respect to the work being done by the Postal Commission and with all due desire to get the information that it will furnish, there should not be the slightest doubt, with the data we have, that a 10 per cent reduction, which would only reduce the proposed appropriation down to $30,500,000, what it was a year ago, was too large.

Mr. President, should we adopt this amendment we would be simply doing now what the Postmaster-General recommended that Congress should do fourteen years ago. During those fourteen years the amount of the increase of railway mail pay has jumped from $14,000,000 a year to $33,275,000 in this bill; and since the Department appealed to Congress to reduce this pay in 1885 we have increased the amount of the appropriation bill 250 per cent.

Mr. President, it is the most unprecedented thing that has ever occurred in the legislation of Congress. I do not believe that the reduction is one-half what it should be, in justice to the taxpayers of the country and with ample justice to the railroads, but I have offered the amendment simply because we can not get the report of the Postal Commission, and because I suppose every Senator would be willing to admit that this small reduction is surely inside of the lines of justice.

Mr. President, if the committee is not willing to accept a small compromise measure like that, one that simply keeps the appropriation for the coming year at what it was last year, until the commission can report, then I shall feel it my duty to again put on record, and to give to Congress and to the people of the country, so far as it may reach them, the reasons why a reduction of more than 20 per cent should be made.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me a word now?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is due to the Senator from North Carolina that I should say that upon reading his proposed amendment I find that he does provide against a deficit by providing for an arbitrary reduction of 10 per cent of the compensation of the railroads of the country. In reference to that, until the Postal Commission makes a report, I am unwilling to make any arbitrary reduction or any reduction at all. When that commission does report I shall probably find in their report material for voting for a reduction in the amount annually paid to the railroads for transporting the mails.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator pardon me for asking him, what, from the investigation so far, has been his impression, gathered from the testimony before the commission, as to whether we are paying too much or too little for the Railway Mail Service?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have already stated that once or twice. My impression is confirmed that we are paying larger sums than we ought to pay, but if I were called upon to justify that impression by facts or evidence, and to propose a new method of making payment or a reduction in the rate of payment, I could not do it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, may I say a word respecting this subject?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from North Carolina makes the point that we are constantly increasing the pay of the railways for carrying the mails. That is true; but it is equally true that we are constantly deriving increased revenue from the service.

If you will take—I only speak from memory now—the appropriations of 1885 and 1886 in the aggregate, and also take the receipts for the same period in the aggregate, you will find that the receipts have increased quite as rapidly as, if not more rapidly than, have the expenditures, showing that from year to year and every year there has been an increase in the revenue from the mails.

Mr. BUTLER. To such an extent that we have now a surplus in the Post-Office Department!

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLISON. We do not have a surplus.

Mr. BUTLER. Probably the Senator thought from the remark I made that I was not aware of the actual condition.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know why the Senator should say that, but I will say, Mr. President, that we have a smaller deficit than we had in 1873, before the law which is now the rule of estimating the railway mail pay was passed. I remember that very well. In 1873 the revenues of the Post-Office Department were $22,000,000 and the expenditures were $28,000,000, in round numbers, making a deficit for that year of $6,000,000.

Now, twenty-six years later, instead of having a revenue of $22,000,000 in that period, we have increased our postal revenue to more than $90,000,000, and in the meantime we have reduced the rate of postage on letters from 3 cents for half an ounce to 2 cents an ounce, thus showing the enormous progress and development of our country in these twenty-six years.

The railway mail pay is fixed by the law, dependent upon the weight carried; chiefly upon the weight carried, and practically wholly upon the weight of the mails. Now, the Senator proposes an arbitrary reduction. I have seen enough of the testimony taken by the Postal Commission to believe, if I do not know, that in many cases the compensation paid to the railroads is less than it ought to be, and that applies to a vast majority of the mileage of the smaller lines of railroad, which carry a small weight of mail. They are not receiving the just compensation under the existing arbitrary method that they should receive, while it may be true that some lines are receiving more than they should receive.

Now, the Senator's amendment proposes an arbitrary reduction of 10 per cent, which, in my judgment, would be a monstrous injustice, or, at least, a great injustice to the great body of the railroad companies of the country. I need give no better illustration of that than the fact that only two days ago on this bill there were only 8 votes cast in the Senate against increased pay to one of the large railway systems in our country to the extent of $172,000 per annum, because this present method of estimating the mail pay did not give sufficient to enable them to conduct the fast mail service on the Southern Railway between here and New Orleans.

Mr. BUTLER. And the Senator would call that a case of Congress arbitrarily increasing the railway mail pay, and he would be right in calling it arbitrary action on the part of Congress, because the Department protested against it.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. BUTLER. That was done in the face of every particle of evidence that we could get from those to whom we looked for information, while in this case I am backed by the Department in standing here and asking for a reduction.

Mr. ALLISON. What Department?

Mr. BUTLER. The Post-Office Department as far back as 1885 appealed to Congress to do something to reduce this enormous increase in pay of the railroads. The next report, in 1887, did the same. If there should have been a reduction then, there should be a still greater reduction now.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to have the Senator point us to any recommendation within ten years from the Post-Office Department that the pay for the Railway Mail Service should be reduced.

Mr. BUTLER. I will put the recommendations made by the Post-Office Department into the RECORD.

Mr. QUAY. I will state that the amount appropriated by this bill is the exact amount estimated for by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] who has the floor will indulge me a moment longer, I wish to say that the Post-Office Department for years has recommended that there be a readjustment of the rate for carrying second-class mail matter.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. And the Department has stated that by such readjustment this deficit from year to year could be wiped out; but I do not know of such an instance, except that it is possible the late Senator Vilas, a former member of this body, when he was Postmaster-General made some question about the railway mail pay. With that exception, I do not know of a single Postmaster-General who has suggested a way to get rid of the deficit, except by means of an increased tax upon second-class mail matter.

Whatever the commission may do, and I do not know what they will do, I am, as the Senator from New Hampshire says he is, ready to modify any view I have had heretofore respecting railway mail pay. I have heard enough to believe that the present method of payment is an unjust one, and that it is, as to a large part of the railroad mileage of the country, a less sum than ought to be paid, whilst it may be more than ought to be paid to a few of the great trunk lines. I am not sure about it. Therefore it appears that the method suggested by the Senator from North Carolina would be an unjust way of dealing with the matter.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator think that the method adopted in 1876 to reduce the surplus to which he has referred as existing before that day is an unjust method?

Mr. ALLISON. I do. We readjusted it twice on the basis of the Senator's proposal, and it was conceded by everybody familiar with the details of the transportation of the mails that that was an unjust method of dealing with them.

Mr. BUTLER. I will ask the Senator if it was not a method recommended by the Postal Commission of 1876 and again by the special commission of 1883?

Mr. ALLISON. No, Mr. President, it was not. It was an arbitrary reduction.

Mr. BUTLER. Arbitrary? What does the Senator mean by "arbitrary?"

Mr. ALLISON. A given percentage applying to all railroads alike.

Mr. BUTLER. Why did not somebody propose a method different from what the commission recommended? It was discussed fully in this body.

Mr. ALLISON. It was not discussed very fully—I was in this body at that time—nor did they recommend an arbitrary reduction, as I remember. There is no question about the injustice of the amendment proposed by the Senator, and it will so operate. Why is it that the Senator makes this proposal when the commission specially designated for the purpose of making this investigation and other kindred investigations is at work, and why does he insist now that we shall change and investigate afterwards—change without sufficient knowledge to know whether the proposition is a just or unjust one?

Mr. BUTLER. This is a slight reduction proposed to be made while we are investigating, and one that it seems to me would come on the inside of any fair reduction that should be made.

I should like to call the Senator's attention to a matter. He referred to the year 1885, and said we have been getting increased revenues all the time, and therefore we were not paying too much since then. We were paying only $121.95 a mile at that time. To-day we are paying nearly $180 a mile, as the bill will make it. The only answer that can be made to those figures is that the amount of mail matter——

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator must know that the minimum rate is $42 a mile, and that it applies probably to more than half the mileage of the country, certainly to a third of it; and then the scale goes up according to weight over 5,000 pounds.

Mr. BUTLER. It is a very high rate.

Mr. ALLISON. It is constantly diminishing now relatively as compared with the rate of which he is speaking. In other words, a large additional amount of mail matter is carried, and when it is carried the rate is diminished as respects that additional weight, so that the average cost compared with the carriage of mail matter is less than it was two years ago or three years ago.

Mr. BUTLER. What the Senator refers to is due to the fact that we pile up a large amount on more roads that carry above 200 pounds. It is not diminished in any sense except that you are giving roads more mail matter than you did. There are more roads that carry over 200 pounds; there are more that carry over 500 pounds each year. The amount we pay per ton per mile when they carry only 200 pounds is $1.17. That is the enormous price which we paid the small roads.

The Senator said a few moments ago that there were a number of roads that were not paid enough, and that they were the small roads, and that possibly on the trunk lines there ought to be a reduction; but in the investigation made by the Appropriations Committee last year, which I have before me, they found that on these big trunk lines we were paying 6¼ cents a pound—on the lines that carried the largest amount of matter. So the kind of reduction that the Senator speaks of is to get up to the trunk lines, where we are reducing constantly; but even there the minimum is 6¼ cents a pound, and that is more than we pay for freight, more than we pay for express, more than any passenger in this country pays to be hauled as a passenger.

It never has been contended by the railroads or by anybody else that they ought to be paid more for carrying the mails than they are paid for carrying so much weight of passengers under similar conditions. In fact, with every commission which has been appointed to investigate this matter the railroads have started out by laying down the claim that they ought to be paid as much for mail as for passengers; that the comparison ought to be made with passenger fare. That has been their contention all the time.

To-day there is not a passenger in this country who pays as much to be carried in a palace car with his seat given to him, upholstered and cushioned, the cars lighted by electricity and heated, with every comfort, as we pay to have the mail in bulk hauled in a common mail car. More than that, we pay more for rent than the car is worth. We pay for the car more rent than it would cost to buy it, and then pay for the mail that is hauled in it more than any passenger back in the train pays to have himself hauled. That fact is proven. It is proven not only by the evidence which I presented a year ago, but it is proven by the investigation made by the Appropriations Committee itself.

Last year I made a calculation based on the investigation made by the Committee on Appropriations as to what it costs each passenger per pound to have himself hauled, and here is the statement I made. I presented it to the Senate, and while I was interrupted from the beginning of the speech to the end by Senators who thought they could correct me here and there, nobody attempted to correct the statement, though the attention of the Senate was sharply called to it.

I had Poor's Railroad Manual in my hand, and I took the facts gathered by the Committee on Appropriations with the facts presented in Poor's Railroad Manual, which is certainly a standard authority and is so recognized by all the railroads. This is what I said:

> Assuming a passenger and his baggage to weigh 200 pounds, each pound of a passenger is carried at less than 3½ cents a pound.

While we pay 6½ cents for dead mail matter piled up in bulk in the end of a car.

In connection with that I quoted what the railroad said before the commission of which Mr. Gardiner Hubbard was chairman, to investigate this matter, and every railroad president who appeared before him said, "You ought to allow as much as we get for passenger fare, and then we will be content." I said further:

> If these facts are correct, I want to ask how the Committee on Appropriations can ask us to delay another year in reducing this pay. Will they ask us to believe the statements of railroad attorneys rather than the facts from such a high authority?

Mr. President, the average amount paid to the railroads for freight in this country is eight-tenths of a cent a ton a mile, less than 1 cent a ton. It has been decreasing steadily for twenty years, and that represents a decrease of over 40 per cent since we have made any reduction in mail pay. The amount which the railroads get for carrying a pound of express matter is shown by the following calculations, which were made at the time, taken from the census reports and from the reports of the express companies themselves.

It was shown that the railroad companies and the express companies combined, two great corporations, both charging for express, together got only a cent and a half on each pound. Then the express matter pays only a cent and a half a pound, which is divided between the railroads and the express companies. Freight matter pays only eight-tenths of a cent a pound. Passengers, with 200 pounds baggage each carried free on what they pay for themselves, pay only 3½ cents a pound, and yet we pay 6½ cents for mail carried in cars that we buy every year by the enormous rent we pay for their use.

The passenger does not pay rent for the car in which he rides in addition to his fare. The farmer does not have to pay rent for the car equal to the cost of the car in addition to the freight he pays for his cotton or corn or produce. So we pay for mail not only twice as much as anybody else to the railroads when they do not pay for the rent of the car, but in addition to that we pay more rent for the cars than they are worth.

Mr. President, these facts I have presented to two successive Congresses. They have been argued and discussed, but no evidence has been presented here or before the Committee on Appropriations, or anywhere else, to prove that the railroads are not getting more for the mail than they do for passenger fare. When these facts were presented a year ago, we were met with the proposition to investigate. I am glad the investigation is going on, but I submit there is no reason why we should continue to increase the appropriation while the investigation is carried on.

The Postmaster-General himself has investigated this matter since last year. He sent the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to Europe and had him visit England, France, and Germany; and he made an exhaustive examination into the methods of compensating and the amount of pay. The report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General will be found on page 317 of the last Annual Report of the Postmaster-General. There is enough information in this report to justify a reduction if there was no other information given.

The Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who was sent to Europe expressly to investigate this matter and get all the information he could from foreign countries, commences his report by saying:

> Pursuant to your instructions I proceeded to London, Paris, and Berlin, in the month of July last, and made a careful investigation into the character and cost of railway mail transportation in Great Britain, France, and Germany, and have the honor to submit the following report of my investigations.

Now, on page 320 of this report, what does the Assistant Postmaster-General say? He is giving now the result of his investigation in Great Britain. He says:

> In reply to a question as to what was regarded a reasonable compensation for a mail train, I was told that it must not in any event exceed the revenue derived by the railway company from an average passenger train of like size.

So it seems that in Great Britain the post-office department charters whole trains and runs out a train of ten cars at night so as to reach the most distant part of the Kingdom the next morning, a train that has not an express car or freight car or passenger car attached to it. It is a whole train of ten cars, a special engine, every man on it—the conductor, brakeman, fireman, engineer, and so on—there simply to perform service for the post-office department, and not for a passenger train and incidentally to haul the mail. Yet in that case, where the post-office department has the whole special train put at its disposal, they say they never consider that they should pay more than what an ordinary average passenger train would get from passenger receipts on that trip.

That has been the contention, and the highest contention, which the railroads have made for themselves to my knowledge.

He continues:

> One of the contracts which I was permitted to see provided that the Postmaster-General and his officers may require the company to provide and run any express or special trains for the convoyance of mails, etc., for a payment at the rate of 3s. 6d. for each and every mile such express or special train shall travel. This would be at the rate of 85 cents per running mile.

Mr. President, that is 85 cents a mile for a whole train. What do we pay in this country for one car simply coupled into a whole train—a train carrying express, carrying passengers, and carrying everything else? We simply couple in one car, an incident, and one that costs no more to the railroad company than the coal to put up a few more pounds of steam. We pay 25½ cents a mile for each car.

At that rate 10 cars would cost $2.50 a mile, to say nothing of the cost of the engine, to say nothing of the salaries paid to the engineer and the fireman and the brakeman and the whole outfit, if run for the Government and nobody else. We pay 25½ cents for each car per mile, while for 10 cars, engine and everything supplied for the Government exclusively, Great Britain pays only 85 cents. Their post-office department is self-sustaining. Ours is not. The explanation is evident.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from North Carolina desist for a moment? The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and the Chair must lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1575) to amend an act entiled "An act to regulate commerce."

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, so that the appropriation bill may be continued.

Mr. QUAY. I rose to make that request.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask——

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object to its being temporarily laid aside.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside for the purpose of taking up the Army reorganization bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. To that I object, Mr. President.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. HAWLEY. I move——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Illinois.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army reorganization bill, House bill 11022.

Mr. QUAY. I shall be compelled to object to the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut, for it will interfere with the progress of the appropriation bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not my proposition. It is the proposition coming from the absolute necessities of the country, not from an individual.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Connecticut is in order.

Mr. QUAY. I sincerely trust the Senate will not take up that bill at the present time. I think within an hour we can pass the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum. I say frankly and kindly to my friend from Pennsylvania, I will not yield. I am at the end of my rope.

Mr. QUAY. I shall insist upon the continuation of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum is suggested by the Senator from Connecticut. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Gallinger,	Mantle,	Ross,
Bacon,	Gear,	Mitchell,	Sewell,
Bate,	Hanna,	Morgan,	Simon,
Berry,	Hansbrough,	Pasco,	Stewart,
Burrows,	Harris,	Perkins,	Sullivan,
Butler,	Hawley,	Pettus,	Teller,
Carter,	Heitfeld,	Platt, Conn.	Tillman,
Chilton,	Jones, Ark.	Platt, N. Y.	Turley,
Clay,	Kenney,	Pritchard,	Warren,
Cockrell,	McBride,	Proctor,	Wellington,
Cullom,	McEnery,	Quay,	White.
Deboe,	McMillan,	Rawlins,
Foraker,	Mallory,	Roach,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11022) for the reorganization of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAWLEY. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has the unfinished business been temporarily laid aside?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, if carried, will displace the unfinished business.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to inquire if the unfinished business takes me from the floor. As I understand it——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. BUTLER. This is not the unfinished business. The question is whether a motion is in order that would take me off the floor in the event the unfinished business is not laid aside. In other words, can I be taken from the floor?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from North Carolina is already taken off the floor by the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, which is to proceed to the consideration of House bill 11022.

Mr. BUTLER. But can I be——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator can not be entitled to the floor unless the motion of the Senator from Connecticut is voted down.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator lost the floor anyhow when the hour of 2 was reached, did he not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands. The unfinished business was then laid before the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. He lost it without any motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In place of the unfinished business the Senator from Connecticut makes a motion to proceed to the consideration of another bill.

Mr. QUAY. I do not desire to interfere at all with the Army bill; but it is my belief that we can conclude the Post-Office appropriation bill within an hour and a half. I sincerely trust the Senator from Connecticut will not press his motion.

Mr. HAWLEY. If that be so, it can be taken up and concluded at almost any time.

Mr. QUAY. That depends on when the Army bill can be finished.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have only to repeat kindly to my friend that as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs I have in charge this enormously important measure, and I will not wait any longer. I shall accept no terms but those of unconditional surrender.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I desire to say one word.

Mr. STEWART. I rise to a question of order. The motion to take up the bill is not debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not debatable.

Mr. BURROWS and others. Regular order!

Mr. CULLOM. I know it is not debatable, but I ask the consent of the Senate to say that I have been allowing the unfinished business to be passed over or set aside informally for some time, hoping that we would reach a point before the session ended which would enable us consistently to take up the bill for consideration. I believe that a day or a day and a half will be all that the bill will require for consideration before acting upon it. I sincerely hope that the Senate will allow it to be temporarily laid aside for the appropriation bills from time to time, including the Army bill. I am in good faith anxious to have the bill considered, and I hope the Senate will be inclined to be courteous enough to me to give me a chance to have a hearing upon it before the session closes. I am not complaining of the Senator from Connecticut, because he asked that the bill be temporarily laid aside for that purpose. That is all I wanted to say about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state to the Senator from Illinois that the unfinished business can not be temporarily laid aside except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CULLOM. I now ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is unanimous consent given that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The motion of the Senator from Connecticut to proceed to the consideration of House bill 11022 is in order, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. I will transfer my pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] and vote "yea."

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. I would vote "yea" if he were present.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. In his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BURROWS (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to inquire if the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has not voted.

Mr. BURROWS. I am paired with that Senator, and I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—44.

Allison,	Hanna,	Mantle,	Ross,

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11022) for the reorganization of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I intended to take the floor for a few moments.

Mr. CARTER and Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let the bill be first read.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is not the reading of the bill first in order, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so directed, but the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] interrupted the reading, and then the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] addressed the Chair.

Mr. HAWLEY. I yielded, Mr. President, to the reading of the bill.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think the bill ought to be read. It has to be read some time, and it might as well be read now as at any other time.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is not the bill debatable after it has been laid before the Senate and before it has been read?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not. The Senator from Missouri, however, is more familiar with the precedents than is the Chair. The Chair would decide that the regular order was the reading of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to inquire which one of the Army bills is now before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill (H. R. 11022) for the reorganization of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, which has been taken up on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. BUTLER. I did not understand the Senator from Connecticut to name any bill by number. I understood him to move to take up the Army bill. As I understand, there is no committee bill here, but there are two bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina is mistaken. The Chair distinctly named the bill moved by the Senator from Connecticut by its number before putting the motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator from Connecticut to move to take up one of the two bills on the table, five members of the committee having voted for one bill and five members of the committee having voted for another.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

Mr. QUAY. I now ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to resume the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was about to yield to the convenience of the Senator from Pennsylvania, reserving my right to take the floor again at any time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the pending bill be laid aside and that the bill (H. R. 11683) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, be taken up.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is it necessary to do that formally?

Mr. CARTER. That the Army bill be temporarily laid aside and the right reserved to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to call it up at any time if the debate on the Post-Office bill be protracted?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11683) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

Mr. QUAY. I move to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina is not in his seat.

Mr. QUAY. I see he is not in his seat.

Mr. BATE. The Senator from North Carolina is not in the Chamber. I think he ought to be present before we take any action on the amendment. I left the Senator in the lunch room a moment ago.

Mr. CARTER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania if there is not an amendment pending, presented by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]?

Mr. GORMAN. We can not hear a word on this side. We should like to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana inquires whether there is not an amendment pending offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. The actual pending amendment before the Senate is the one offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. The Senator from South Carolina has not yet offered his amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it would be only right, the Senator from North Carolina not being in the Chamber, and having been sent for, as I understand——

Mr. BATE. He is in the lunch room.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from South Carolina has an amendment he can offer at the present time.

Mr. TILLMAN. I can fill in the gap, I hope, until the Senator from North Carolina renews his interesting and instructive speech. I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the amendment will be received. The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move to insert the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert after the amendment adopted on page 14 the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the Postmaster-General, in making contracts for the transportation of the mail on star routes, is authorized to prescribe such regulations as will require the contractors to deliver mail into and collect mail from boxes located along the line of such routes, such boxes to be erected and maintained at the expense and risk of persons living on or near such routes who may desire to have their mail so carried.

Mr. QUAY. To avoid discussion and save time I accept the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate has heard the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina desire to discuss it?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not desire to discuss the amendment after such genial agreement to my proposition by the Senator in charge of the bill; but I am afraid when it goes into conference it will die, because the reasons which prompt its presentation will not have been submitted, and I do not want that to occur. If you will agree to take care of the amendment and see that it does not go out, I will subside at once.

Mr. QUAY. I can not make any agreement as to the action of the conference committee.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator can not give bond.

Mr. QUAY. I will say to the Senator that the committee of conference will give him a hearing on the question.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Pennsylvania says that the Senator from South Carolina can come before the committee of conference.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads state that this amendment meets the approval of the committee and would have been recommended but for the fact that we thought the Appropriations Committee——

Mr. BUTLER. Let the amendment be stated again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks that the amendment be again read. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads had this proposition before them for consideration. A similar proposition was recommended by the Post-Office Department, and I do not think there will be any objection to it. I will go before the committee——

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to suggest——

Mr. CHANDLER. I will go before the committee of conference with the Senator from South Carolina and——

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest——

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish the Senator from South Carolina would not try to talk until I get through. As I was about to say to him, I will go with him before the committee of conference and endeavor to induce them to stand firm upon this amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire as well as to the Senator from Pennsylvania. I will simply ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD, as an explanation of the amendment, a letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to my colleague, Mr. STOKES, of the House of Representatives, who is entitled to any credit that may come for this proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, January 28, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th instant, asking me for an expression of opinion in regard to bill H. R. 11682, introduced by you in the House on January 14, 1899, entitled "A bill to extend free delivery of mail along star routes," and in reply to state that the object of the bill has my entire approval and recommendation. I would, however, suggest several changes therein, so that the bill as changed would read as follows:

"That all contracts for carrying mail on star routes made after the passage of this act shall include the deposit in the proper boxes placed on the line of the routes for this purpose, without charge to the addressees, of any mail matter that may be intrusted to the carrier for such distribution by any postmaster on the route.

"SEC. 2. That it shall also be the duty of said carrier, in addition to the duties imposed by section 3993 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to take up such mail matter, properly prepaid by stamps, as he shall find in said mail boxes and deposit the same for mailing at the next post-office at which he arrives on his route without additional compensation.

"SEC. 3. That any person desiring his mail deposited along the line of any star route within the terms of section 1 of this act shall erect a box as convenient as practicable on the roadside and file with the postmaster at the post-office at which his mail is addressed, which shall be one of the two post-office on the route on either side and next to the box, a request in writing for the delivery of his mail to the proper carrier for deposit in said mail box.

"SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the postmaster at every such post-office, upon a written order from any person living on or near an established star route which comes within the provision of section 1 of this act, to deliver to the proper mail carrier for that route any mail matter, except registered mail, with instructions as to the proper mail box at which said mail matter shall be deposited; but no mail matter so delivered to a carrier for deposit shall be carried past another post-office on the route before being deposited in a box.

"SEC. 5. That all mail boxes along such star routes shall be numbered or marked, as may be directed by the Postmaster-General.

"SEC. 6. That the Postmaster-General may prescribe regulations for the proper performance of service under this act."

I think it is entirely feasible to combine a system of box deliveries and collections in connection with the existing star routes, now numbering about 22,000, in such manner as to largely increase the mail accommodation to people residing in rural districts without detriment to the star service or without a large increase in the cost thereof. We know that it is the practice now on many star routes for the carriers to take the mail and deposit it in boxes along the line of the routes, but in the absence of legislation it rests entirely with the pleasure of the carriers whether they will give the people this accommodation or not. It also puts it in the power of a carrier to discriminate against some people while accommodating others on the same route. The proposed law would give equal accommodation to all people living on or near the line of star routes.

I do not think it would largely increase the cost, because the distance traveled by the carriers would not be increased at all. It would require a little more time, of course, for the carriers to stop and deposit the mail or collect it from the boxes, and in some cases it would require more intelligent carriers than are now employed, as all carriers must be able to read addresses on the mail matter taken by them outside of the bags to be placed in the proper boxes. It is also possible that in those cases where carriers are now charging the people along the line of route a fee for delivering their mail into boxes that there would be a tendency to slightly increase the price under the contract if the law prohibited the charging of such fees; but as these star-route contracts are let after having been widely advertised, and as there is much competition in bidding for them, I think that the increase in cost would be but slight compared with the additional facilities rendered to the public.

If it should be found impracticable to get this bill acted upon in both the House and Senate during the present session of Congress, I suggest that practically the same object could be accomplished by introducing an amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill, now pending in the Senate committee, to the following effect:

"Provided, That the Postmaster-General, in making contracts for the transportation of the mail on star routes, is authorized to prescribe such regulations as will require the contractors to deliver mail into and collect mail from boxes located along the line of such routes, such boxes to be erected and maintained at the expense of persons living on or near such routes who may desire to have their mail so carried."

Very respectfully,

W. S. SHALLENBERGER,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. W. STOKES,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to understand what is meant by the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] that after the Senate has declared itself in favor of some policy they will go and endeavor to persuade the Senate conferees to stand by it. Now, I had supposed that if there was a single obligation of honor resting upon Senators—and of course such obligations are always resting upon all Senators—it was to stand by in conference anything that the Senate had voted, and to stand by with more scrupulous care those that the individual conferee does not agree with than those he does agree with. Otherwise we have to change our whole policy.

We appoint on a committee of conference the members of the committee who report the general bill, whereas in all other parliamentary bodies they appoint men who are on the side of the body appointing them in regard to the particular matter in dispute. I for one desire to object strenuously to the idea that the conferees, if they accept places on the committee of conference, are not bound to stand by the action of the Senate, whether they like such action or not, without any spur or any persuasion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is before the Senate. Is there any objection to agreeing to it? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] moves to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. QUAY. I withdraw the motion, and ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that a vote upon the final passage of the bill and any amendments pending be taken at 1 o'clock to-morrow. With that understanding the bill can go over. It seems to me it is scarcely possible to pass it now.

Mr. HAWLEY. Without further discussion this afternoon?

Mr. QUAY. Without further discussion this afternoon. It goes over at once.

Mr. BUTLER. Just a moment. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] I know has some remarks which he desires to make. I should not like to agree to an agreement without knowing how much time this afternoon or in the morning before 1 o'clock he can have. I wish a few moments to-morrow before 1 o'clock. I should like to have some understanding about that before an agreement is made.

Mr. QUAY. Will 1.30 o'clock answer the purpose of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BUTLER. The trouble about 1.30 is that if an agreement is made to vote at that hour, and morning business to-morrow morning, or some discussion, should continue to 1.30, it would cut off all chance to be heard.

Mr. HOAR. Take up the bill after the routine morning business.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will agree to nothing that will displace the Army bill. I can not hear what is being said.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest, as a solution of the matter, that the Post-Office appropriation bill be taken up immediately after the conclusion of the routine business in the morning, and that a final vote be taken, as suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, on the bill and all amendments then pending at 1 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. QUAY. Will that be satisfactory?

[Mr. BUTLER addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. PETTIGREW. On page 20 of the bill, in line 18, after the word "continued," I move to strike out "during the Fifty-sixth Congress," and insert "until March 1, 1900." I move the adoption of that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota moves the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I will say in that connection that we have tried for two years to have a proper readjustment of the railway mail pay. Two years ago the Committee on Appropriations brought in an amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill providing for the appointment of a commission for the purpose of investigating this subject. The amendment was discussed upon the floor and vigorously and bitterly attacked by one of the members of the Post-Office Committee, the then acting chairman of that committee, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me for a moment?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will have to correct the Senator's errors as he goes along. I was not acting chairman of the committee. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] was here then.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Very well. I had supposed it was during the time of the absence of the Senator from Colorado, but I know it was during that session that the Senator from New Hampshire acted as chairman of the committee or was the active chairman of the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. Only an active member.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator led the attack on this provision in the appropriation bill and succeeded finally in defeating it. Last year we brought it in again, and as it was understood that certain individuals were to constitute the commission, we succeeded in having the amendment adopted.

Eight months have rolled by since the commission was provided for, and we have no report. Those of us who believed that the railway mail pay is excessive used every effort to have the investigation limited to this question, the important question then before the Senate and before the country, but, instead of that, the amendment was loaded down with provisions for investigating canceling machines, pneumatic tubes, and every possible branch of the Railway Mail Service and the railway service and the postal service, star routes, and steamboat service. I thought then that the desire to investigate these other branches was manifested in absolute good faith, but it appears now that the purpose was to have so much to investigate that the investigating commission could never get through.

It is proposed to perpetuate the commission, which have been in existence for eight months, for two years more, taking them beyond the next Presidential election. It is objected that they shall make a final report in a year, while everyone knows if they are desirous of making a report at all they can make it in less than a year. Everyone knows perfectly well that if they desire to perpetuate their existence more than one year more there is a purpose to carry their investigation and report beyond the next Presidential election, a purpose to defeat by indirection that which they are afraid to defeat previous to a Presidential election. So this delay. We have a right, then, to insist upon our amendment, and particularly when we find it is bitterly opposed by the members of the commission themselves.

Mr. President, the commission began no investigation until November. The commission then began to take the testimony of the railroad lawyers of this country, and they have been at that interesting occupation ever since, occasionally, of course, looking into some other subject. Is this to go on during the whole next Congress, during the whole next two sessions, to the expiration of the next Congress? As this bill now provides, the commission are certain to be perpetuated and to continue their investigation beyond the next Presidential election.

Mr. President, I should have said nothing about the dilatory course of the commission if it had not been for the efforts to perpetuate the commission until after the Presidential election; and while I do not attribute to those gentlemen any motives, while I know they will have nothing to do with the transaction, yet I know how easy it is for the national committee which wishes to raise a fund, if this investigation is pending, to get out of the railroad companies of this country untold millions of money under a pledge that if they are successful this thing shall be continued in the future.

To-day we pay $37,500,000 for railway mail service in this country. We pay for carrying the mails per pound ten times as much as the express companies pay to the railroads for carrying express. In other words, the express companies would get the same weight of express matter as the mail weighs carried for $3,750,000, and we pay $37,500,000. And yet in the face of this fact it is proposed to continue to investigate forever and never to relieve the people of this country from this unjust and unfair burden.

We pay more than fifty times more per pound for carrying the mail than the people of this country pay for carrying freight. We pay twice as much per pound for carrying the mail as passengers pay, if the average passenger weighed 150 pounds; and yet it is proposed to continue and perpetuate this exaction and collect the money per capita—for that is the way this nation is supported; by per capita taxes, not a property tax—out of the people of this country to pay for it. We attacked this system two years ago, a year ago, and now again, and the answer is, "We will perpetuate the commission to take the testimony of the railroad attorneys of this country for two years more."

I am going very briefly to place in the RECORD some facts which I put into the RECORD last year on the subject. According to the census of 1890 the number of express waybills was 44,475,000; packages carried, not valuable, like second-class mail matter, 98,118,000; weight of same in pounds, 3,292,000,000; number of valuable waybills, 11,614,000; number of valuable packages, 17,258,000. The express companies thus carried 3,292,000,000 pounds of express matter, not counting the 17,000,000 packages of valuable matter, which were not weighed. Giving them the benefit, then, of the 17,000,000 packages of valuable matter which was not weighed, we find that the express companies paid the railroads for transporting everything, including the valuable matter, $19,827,000, which is 5¾ mills per pound.

In other words, the railroad companies received for transporting express matter in 1890 one-tenth of what we paid for carrying the mail matter last year, besides throwing in and counting of no weight whatever 17,000,000 packages of valuable goods, money and jewelry, etc., and where they carried money packages on every trip they carried a safe weighing hundreds and hundreds of pounds, which, of course, is not estimated at all. It is therefore absurd to suppose that we are not paying an excessive sum for carrying the mail when we pay ten times as much as the railroad companies receive for carrying express matter.

Now, I believe that the adjustment of the railway pay is wrong. I think that in the thinly settled portions of this country the compensation is not too great, as the quantity of mail matter carried there is exceedingly slight, amounting in weight to almost nothing; but we are paying upon the great trunk lines of the country enough money for carrying the mails to pay 3 per cent on the entire cost of the road, with all its terminal facilities—yes, on some of them 5 per cent of the entire cost of the road itself.

Mr. BUTLER. We pay the interest on their investment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. We are paying the New York Central Railroad, merely for carrying the mail, 5 per cent on a valuation of $60,000 a mile; and yet the Senate of the United States insists, year after year, in continuing these payments and refuses to make any reduction whatever. This is the third session at which they have made the excuse that it must be investigated, and now it is proposed in the pending bill to investigate through two sessions more.

The argument, and the only argument, made is that we must investigate. For my part I can not understand the unwillingness of the Senate to make this correction. For my part I do not believe any political party can afford to continue this exaction. The people of the country are coming to understand it. They want 1-cent postage. They could have it if we paid only what we ought to pay for carrying the mails on the railroads of this country. You could save on this item more than $20,000,000 and yet pay the railroads more than they receive for any other service they perform. There is no justification for the continuance of this system, and I predict that if the commission investigates for two years longer without reducing the amount of compensation the Republican party will collect from these railroad companies millions of dollars to help them to carry the next Presidential election.

Mr. President, I have here a statement upon this subject prepared by Mr. James Lewis Cowles, of Farmington, Conn. He is and always has been a citizen of Connecticut, and I desire to have it read. For the purpose of relieving myself, I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota requests that the paper mentioned by him be read. Is there objection?

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator to let the paper go into the RECORD as a part of his remarks without being read, if that is agreeable to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota desire to have it read?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to have it read because I have not had time to read the whole of it myself, and there may be portions of it that I should dislike to have go into the RECORD.

Mr. CHANDLER. How is the Senator going to avoid that when it is read?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I can stop the reading.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to its going into the RECORD as a part of the remarks of the Senator; but if it is read, I prefer that he should read it himself.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Very well, if the Senator objects.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not object to its being printed in the RECORD as a part of the Senator's remarks, but he himself says there may be some things in it which are doubtful.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If there are, I can have them omitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire objects to the paper being read from the desk.

Mr. CHANDLER. It ought to be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think the motion was made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to strike out, in line 18, page 20 of the bill, the words "during the Fifty-sixth Congress" and insert the words "until March 1, 1900;" and I now renew that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota renews the motion of the Senator from North Carolina that on page 20 of the bill, line 18, the words "during the Fifty-sixth Congress" be stricken out and that the words "until March 1, 1900," be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. QUAY. I move to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I raise the point that the motion to lay on the table is not in order. The Senator from South Dakota can not be taken off his feet in that way.

Mr. QUAY. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BUTLER. I give notice that I will renew it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent that on page 20, line 18, the words "during the Fifty-sixth Congress" be stricken out and the words "until March 1, 1900," be inserted.

Mr. QUAY. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendments proposed, it will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I make the point of order that the Senator from South Dakota has the floor, and that the bill can not be reported to the Senate while he is holding the floor to address the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHANDLER. Upon what does the Senator from South Dakota propose to speak, the amendment having been withdrawn?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I hope we will be able to reach an agreement by which we can vote on the bill to-morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. I agree to that.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like very much to have an hour fixed, so as to dispose of the matter, that the Senate may go on with other business; but the friends of the measure seem determined that we shall not fix an hour to-morrow to vote on the bill.

While we desire no delay and do not propose to talk for delay and are ready to fix an hour for a vote upon the bill, we do not propose that the bill shall pass, if we can help it, and allow the commission to be continued for two years more, with the old excuse that the railway mail pay can not be reduced until the commission reports. We have had three sessions of that already, and if we can prevent it we are not going to have it continued.

Mr. CHANDLER. Right here, will the Senator allow me to deal candidly with him?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire for the purpose of doing something that he never did before in his life.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the seed will find lodgment in good ground. I am perfectly willing that unanimous consent shall be given to take a vote upon the bill to-morrow. The Senator knows that very well. I am perfectly willing that he shall have a vote upon this particular amendment, and have the Senate adopt it or reject it, as the Senate chooses; but when the Senator says, "We will agree to a vote on this bill to-morrow, provided there is unanimous consent for the adoption of this little amendment," I say that it is an incongruity. I am willing that the amendment shall be voted upon now or to-morrow, when the rest of the bill is disposed of. That ought to satisfy the Senator.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The members of the investigating commission are present, and we seem to be unable to get out of them any statement on this subject. No one pretends that it is necessary to continue the commission more than a year, and yet members of the commission themselves insist upon continuing their existence during the next two sessions of Congress for the purpose of getting at this thing and getting at the facts.

Mr. CHANDLER. Why does not the Senator submit to the Senate his question whether it shall be continued during the Fifty-sixth Congress, or until the 1st day of March, 1900? Why does he get up here and lecture the committee and the Senate because it will not unanimously agree to terminate the powers of the commission on the 1st of March, 1900, in order to get a unanimous-consent agreement to vote upon the passage of the bill to-morrow?

I will say, Mr. President, that that is not a proper way to do business, and nobody knows it any better than the two distinguished parliamentarians from South Dakota and North Carolina.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask leave of the Senator from South Dakota to call up a local bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SELMA, ALA.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2657) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the city of Selma, in the State of Alabama.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will not object to this bill; but after it has been considered I wish to give notice that I shall object to the consideration of any other bill and also to the introduction of morning business. We may as well dispose of the matter we have on hand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in section 2, line 13, before the word "feet," to strike out "thirty" and insert "forty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site in the city of Selma, in Dallas County, in the State of Alabama, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, ventilating and heating apparatus, elevators and approaches, and fences, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices, the cost of said building, including said vaults, ventilating and heating apparatus, elevators, approaches and fences, complete, not to exceed the sum of $100,000, which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purposes aforesaid.

SEC. 2. That the money hereby appropriated shall not be used for the purposes aforesaid until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Alabama shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over said site, during the time the United States shall be the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein; and the said building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side thereof, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendmend was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I insist on the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is called for, which is the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11683) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW].

Mr. QUAY. I understand that the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota was withdrawn.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I withdrew the amendment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask what the regular order is?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is that amendment still before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands at the desk that that amendment has been withdrawn.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then I ask what is the regular order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I offered an amendment to the bill, which was read early in my remarks, providing for a reduction of the appropriation for railway mail pay from $33,275,000 to $30,500,000, a scaling down and readjustment of the pay of 10 per cent. That is the amendment which is pending. The other small amendment was the question upon which I was asking unanimous consent. The amendment I offered this morning is now pending, and I have not concluded my remarks on it. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota, and will continue when he is through.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand that the Senator from South Dakota has the floor. I understand also that the only amendment pending before the Senate is an amendment making a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent in the total amount appropriated for the Railway Mail Service for the ensuing year. I ask the Chair if I am correct in that statement?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that that is the situation. It certainly is after the statement of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from South Dakota, who is entitled to the floor, yield to me a moment?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. WOLCOTT. This gives me an opportunity to say that his statement that the members of the Postal Commission are here and that he is unable, or we, as he expresses it, are unable, to procure from them any statement as to when they will report is far from the fact. After this amendment was presented the Senator from North Carolina constantly had the floor. He was followed by the Senator from South Dakota, who has held the floor since. When those Senators are through with their remarks and have taken their seats, it will be in order for some member of the commission to make any proper answer to any inquiries which have been made. But it is not proper to criticise a member of the Senate, likewise a member of the Postal Commission, because he does not see fit to interrupt a Senator in the course of his remarks to make a statement as to what his conduct shall be or what his expectations are as to the fruit or result of an inquiry.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to say very briefly that my amendment to limit the time when the commission should report was pending. Unanimous consent to agree to it had been refused by one of the commissioners who is present constantly. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] then moved to lay my amendment on the table. It had reached that stage, and no one said a word except simply to stubbornly object to unanimous consent. Then I withdrew the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let us have the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. Is the Senate ready for the question?

[Mr. BUTLER addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to interrupt the Secretary for a moment. The reading of this document shows how much information has been carefully prepared by some of the brightest business men in the country and officially put forth by the National Board of Trade on this question. Therefore, in view of that information already gathered, and in view of the fact that they have a committee still at work gathering further information, I ask unanimous consent that on page 20, line 18, of the bill, it be amended by striking out the words "during the Fifty-sixth Congress" and inserting in lieu thereof "until March 1, 1900."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to have that question put now?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is asked by the Senator from North Carolina to amend the bill by striking out in line 18, page 20, the words "during the Fifty-sixth Congress" and inserting "until March 1, 1900." Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I object.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I ask for the adoption of the amendment. I do not care to discuss it if we can come to a vote. I hope a vote will be taken directly on the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. [Putting the question.] It appears to be lost.

Mr. BUTLER and Mr. PETTIGREW called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BATE. Let the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, line 18——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Which amendment does the Senator propose shall be voted upon?

Mr. BUTLER. The amendment I asked unanimous consent to be made and the amendment that is now before the Senate. I temporarily withdraw the other amendment in order that we may consider this amendment at the present time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment before the Senate is to strike out the words "during the Fifty-sixth Congress" and insert the words "until March 1, 1900," in line 18, page 20. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon agreeing to the amendment, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE].

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS].

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], and withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY].

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. Not seeing him present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM (after having voted in the negative). I have taken the liberty of voting, although I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I am satisfied that he would vote as I have voted, and therefore I will let my vote stand.

Mr. PROCTOR. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON], and that relieves the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and myself. I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who does not seem to be in the Chamber. I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and let my vote stand.

Mr. PASCO. I am paired with the Senator from Washington

[Mr. WILSON]. I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] that he and I exchange our pairs so as to enable us both to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). The Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] informs me that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], so I will withdraw my vote and announce my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. LODGE. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that we transfer our pairs, so that the Senator's colleague [Mr. CLAY] will stand paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. That will enable us both to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BACON. I vote "yea."

Mr. HANNA. I vote "nay."

Mr. PRITCHARD. For the purpose of making a quorum I have decided to vote as I think my pair would vote if he were here. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I will state that my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is of such a nature that I feel justified in voting, and I will vote "nay."

Mr. MALLORY. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], and vote "yea."

Mr. SHOUP. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 27, as follows:

So Mr. BUTLER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. QUAY. I ask unanimous consent that after the conclusion of the morning business, not later than 1 o'clock to-morrow, the Post-Office appropriation bill be taken up, and that at 2 o'clock the vote be taken upon pending amendments and upon the bill without further discussion.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not care to lose my opportunity at 2 o'clock. I have a right to take the floor at 2.

Mr. QUAY. At 2 o'clock we take the vote.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have a right to take the floor on the Army bill at 2 o'clock.

Mr. GORMAN. Then we can vote at 15 minutes before 2. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania to change the request to 1.45.

Mr. PETTIGREW. We can undoubtedly agree without any hesitation whatever upon the suggestion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BERRY. I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, yes; let it be agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Post-Office appropriation bill and all amendments pending be voted upon after the morning business to-morrow and not later than 2 o'clock.

Mr. GORMAN. And that the bill be taken up at 1 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At 1, or immediately after the morning business.

Mr. FRYE. And that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. For the purpose of taking the vote. The Chair so understands. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. That arrangement is agreeable to me with the condition that I shall have leave to have some matter of importance that I sent to the desk to be read, and the reading of which was not finished, put into the RECORD, and some other data that I have prepared which I wish briefly to discuss to-morrow. I wish about thirty minutes and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] wants about thirty minutes. We have agreed to this with the understanding that probably no one else wishes to speak, but we wish about thirty minutes each. Whatever matter I consider pertinent that I can not get through discussing I shall ask permission of the Senate to put into the RECORD. I should not wish the unanimous-consent agreement to prevent me from putting it into the RECORD.

Mr. QUAY. There is no objection to the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree to the unanimous consent with that understanding.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to have it distinctly understood that the unanimous consent given to vote at 2 o'clock to-morrow——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If not reached before.

Mr. CARTER. If not reached before, is not to operate to displace the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is so understood.

Mr. CARTER. Except temporarily, for the purpose of taking the vote.

PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. FRYE. I report back favorably from the Committee on Foreign Relations a proposed amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill touching the Pacific cable. I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Maine kindly state what the amendment proposes to do?

Mr. FRYE. It proposes that the Postmaster-General shall issue proposals and give the building of the cable to the lowest bidder.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it a resolution?

Mr. CHANDLER. No; it is reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I ask that it may be read.

Mr. FRYE. It is lengthy.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then the Senator will please state what it does.

Mr. FRYE. It authorizes the Postmaster-General to issue advertisements for constructing a Pacific cable to Honolulu, to be finished by July, 1900, and thence to Manila, and thence to Japan or Australia, and it authorizes the United States Government to pay $175,000 a year for twenty years, its messages to be free thereafter, one-third of the commercial messages, etc.

Mr. STEWART. It is so important to have information in regard to the amendment that I think it had better go into the RECORD. Many people will want to know about it. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. FRYE. I asked that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senator from Maine if he has any objection to the amendment being referred first to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, which is now considering a bill——

Mr. FRYE. Yes; I should object, because the Committee on Foreign Relations has had the matter under consideration for three years, and has finally come to a conclusion, and the amendment has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me to give a notice?

Mr. QUAY. Certainly.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill on Thursday morning immediately after the morning business is completed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 21, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that passed the House, and the Senate has passed the bill with amendments which simply provide that the Government shall detail an experienced Army officer instead of selecting a referee, and I think it makes the act more efficient. I therefore move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate amendments were concurred in.

LETITIA TYLER SEMPLE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1776) to increase the pension of Mrs. Letitia Tyler Semple, on which the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House and asked for a conference.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I move that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, Mr. WEYMOUTH, and Mr. SIMS as conferees on the part of the House.

GEORGE HUGHES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1154) for the relief of George Hughes, of Portland, Oreg., on which the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House and requested a conference.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I move that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, Mr. WEYMOUTH, and Mr. SIMS as the conferees on the part of the House.

SAMUEL TEWKSBURY.

Mr. GROW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10500) for the relief of the legal representatives of Samuel Tewksbury, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to the legal representative of Samuel Tewksbury, late of Scranton, Lackawanna County, Pa., deceased, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,697, in full compensation for the use and occupation by the United States Government of a brick building and premises owned by him in the city of Scranton, Pa., as a depot or barracks for United States troops by the provost-marshal of the United States from June, 1862, to June, 1865, inclusive.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, the facts in this case are these: The provost-marshal of the district of Susquehanna and Luzerne, which I at that time represented, took a new building that had been erected in the city of Scranton by Mr. Tewksbury for stores and public offices, and used it as barracks during the draft in 1862. An arrangement was made by the provost-marshal with Mr. Tewksbury fixing the compensation for the use of the building, with a promise that a written agreement should be signed by the parties. But it never was signed, the provost-marshal having failed to perform his promise in the matter.

But, as I have stated, he used this building for barracks for the drafted men. At the close of the draft Colonel Kerrigan, with two companies of soldiers, was sent to that district to suppress some trouble growing out of the draft, and he retained the building until the close of the war. This bill proposes simply to pay for the use of that building the consideration that was found to have been agreed upon between the parties, but which never was paid. The Department can not pay because there was no written agreement produced, but there is no question as to the facts in regard to the occupancy of the building. I know all about the facts as well as I know about anything in my neighborhood. Nothing having ever been paid by the Government for the use of the building, this bill simply proposes to pay the heirs the amount which was originally agreed upon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What action has the House committee taken on this bill?

Mr. GROW. They reported it unanimously. If there is any objection to its consideration, I would like to have the report read, as it fully explains the facts.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What committee reported it?

Mr. GROW. The Committee on War Claims.

I will state to the House that this bill was sent by the committee to the Court of Claims, which decided that it had not jurisdiction of the matter, it not being a claim arising in an insurrectionary State.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What court?

Mr. GROW. I say it was sent to the Court of Claims, which could not take jurisdiction.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It is a very old claim, I will suggest, and there may be some doubt of its validity.

Mr. GROW. Of course it is an old claim. It has been pending for a long time, but payment could not be made for reasons that all gentlemen understand here—the difficulty in getting claims through the House. We have many claims of the same character.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MADDOX. I object.

Mr. GROW. Well, Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill. It has been pending for many years—ever since the war—and the Court of Claims can not consider it, not having jurisdiction.

Mr. MADDOX. On the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I demand a second.

Mr. GROW. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. MADDOX. To that I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill will be read, and the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. GROW. I ask also that the report be read, as it is very short and explains the matter thoroughly, so that members can understand it before voting upon the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read after the debate has commenced.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. GROW, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. MADDOX, as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 83, noes 29.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will be recognized for twenty minutes and the gentleman from Georgia for twenty minutes under the rule.

Mr. BELL. What is the pending question?

The SPEAKER. The question now before the House is, Shall the bill pass under a suspension of the rules?

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the report read in my own time.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. FITZGERALD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10500) for the relief of the legal representatives of Samuel Tewksbury, deceased, submit the following report:

The claim is for compensation for use and occupation by the United States Government, during the late civil war, of a brick building and premises in Scranton, Pa. Claim stated at $5,697.

Samuel Tewksbury was the owner of a brick building in the city of Scranton, Pa., in 1861-63. The building was in about the center of the business part of the city; was 50 feet by 38, three stories. The first floor was for a store; the other two stories were partitioned off into 15 or 16 rooms to be rented for business offices. Cost of the building, about $12,000, and rented for from $100 to $150 per month.

In the month of June, 1862, Stephen N. Bradford, provost marshal Twelfth district of Pennsylvania, counties of Luzerne and Susquehanna, took possession of this building and used it for barracks for drafted and enlisted men before they were sent to the companies in the field. After some months' use by the provost marshal the building was used and occupied by Colonel Kerrigan as barracks for his men until June, 1865.

Samuel Tewksbury never received any rent from the Government for this building while it was occupied by the United States provost marshal and the soldiers of Colonel Kerrigan's command for the three years from June, 1862, to June, 1865.

The claimant brought a suit in November, 1867, in the court of common pleas for Luzerne County, against Capt. Stephen N. Bradford, for the use and occupancy of this building, and obtained a judgment in said court for $5,697.76, which judgment has not been paid.

The proof shows that when the Government vacated the building it was in a ruinous condition. The windows, doors, floors, and partitions were broken, defaced, and injured, and the whole building was in a foul, partially prostrate, bad, and untenantable state. The repairs alone to make the said building habitable cost the sum of $3,000, and that sum of money was actually paid by Mr. Tewksbury to make the premises tenantable.

He made claim for compensation to the honorable Secretary of War on or about August, 1865, which was rejected on May 10, 1866, on the ground that "claimant must look to the officers who took the building."

The claimant, believing said rejection to be unjust, subsequently petitioned Congress for relief, and said petition was, by the Committee on War Claims, on February 25, 1892, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the Bowman Act, and the petition was dismissed by said court for want of jurisdiction.

Your committee is of the opinion that the use and occupation of this property under such circumstances creates an obligation on the part of the Government to reimburse the owner to the full value of the service, and upon all the facts stated the estate of Samuel Tewksbury is entitled to the sum of $5,697. The bill is therefore reported back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to take some of his time now?

Mr. GROW. No; I would like to hear the gentleman from Georgia, as he objects to the claim.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I would like to inquire, before the gentleman proceeds, what committee this comes from?

Mr. MADDOX. The Committee on War Claims.

Now, sir, it seems that the claim, as I understand from the record—for this is the first information that I have had in reference to it—has been rejected heretofore by the Government. But notwithstanding that fact, as to whether the claim be a just or an unjust one, I take it for granted that the committee which considered it found that there was somewhere or somewhat of justification in the payment of the claim. I am not disputing that fact. The ground of my opposition does not rest at all on that basis. I know nothing of the justice or injustice of the claim, but I make my objection on entirely different grounds; and I call the attention, especially of gentlemen on this side of the House around me, to the fact. This is a question of discrimination, and that is the reason I oppose it. It may be just or it may be unjust. I repeat, I know nothing of the facts.

Now, what are the grounds on which I base my objection? You all know that we have claims which have been pending here for thirty long years and over, and yet we can not get consideration of them. Why should preference be given to this claim?

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee, my friend Mr. RICHARDSON, has time and again explained one fact to the House, and I know it to be true in my district, as I am sure you all know it to be true in your districts, that there were men just as true to the Union as God Almighty ever made who resided there. These men have had claims pending before Congress year after year, and time again, and yet no action can be had upon them. They can not even get their claims considered. Objection is always raised. They have been postponed over and over again, until these men have gone to their graves in poverty without a cent.

A MEMBER. Yes, to their graves as paupers.

Mr. MADDOX. Yes, as the gentleman says, as paupers, because their claims could not receive consideration from the Government.

Mr. BARTLETT. Have they not had their claims adjudicated?

Mr. MADDOX. Of course, the court has adjudicated them and approved them and we can not get any appropriation.

Mr. GAINES. Can the gentleman from Georgia tell us why that is?

Mr. MADDOX. I do not know; but I want to state one thing to you, that you are not going to get anything paid unless you fight for it. You might as well understand that; and you had just as well get up here and demand your rights, and not sit quietly in your seats. I ask you to vote against this proposition, not because it is an unjust claim, but simply because it is an unjust discrimination. Let us demand the rights that belong to us and fight for them in this House and then we will get them. We will never get them before we do that.

I have said all I desire to say, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MADDOX. I do not know how much time I have remaining.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman has two or three minutes.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twelve minutes.

Mr. MADDOX. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's reasons for not paying a just debt would justify the repudiation of all debts.

It makes no difference how a claim comes before this House, if it is a just claim when it comes here it is the duty of the House to pay it, and if it is unjust it is the duty of the House to vote against it, but not to say that because some other just claim has not been considered they will not pay this.

If I recollect aright, millions of dollars have been paid for the same kind of claims as this in the rebellious States. I know I have voted for four different separate bills here to pay for injury to institutions in the South. The bill for the relief of the Methodist book concern in Tennessee passed the House a short time ago. Now you claim you can not get any consideration. A bill is pending between the two Houses to-day involving some millions of dollars under the Bowman Act.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. GROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. When this claim was up before I made objection and it went out. Now, I want to ask you a plain, simple question. When the forces took possession of that house—let us get the point down so we can understand it—did not your claimant sue the marshal for the possession of the property?

Mr. GROW. I did not quite hear the gentleman, but if I understand him——

Mr. COX. I will make myself understood before I get through. When the marshal took possession of the property and used it for governmental purposes, did not your claimant sue the marshal for the occupation of the property, sue him as an individual?

Mr. GROW. No, sir; he did not sue him until after the war, and then as marshal of the United States.

Mr. COX. Now, the point I want to bring out is this——

Mr. GROW. Wait one minute. He did not sue the marshal until after the war was all over and his claim had been presented to the Secretary of War and the War Department had said it could not be paid because there was no contract before the Secretary of War.

Mr. COX. Now, my dear sir——

Mr. GROW. Then he brought a suit against him as marshal of the United States. The property was used by the United States marshal as barracks for drafted men and, after the draft, by soldiers of the United States under Colonel Kerrigan.

Mr. COX. And you got a judgment.

Mr. GROW. So I think it is a just claim.

Mr. COX. Now you want the Government to pay a judgment that you have recovered against a marshal. I say, now, what are you going to do with that judgment?

Mr. GROW. The marshal was bankrupt, and he is dead. So the judgment——

Mr. COX. There are a great many men who are dead who have had judgments rendered against them. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROW. If this claimant had not gone to court and had the amount adjudicated, gentlemen would be saying to-day that this was an exorbitant claim; but the courts have settled what is a just amount.

Mr. COX. You elected and decided to bring the case in the court against this marshal, and you got your judgment, and it turned out to be an insolvent judgment, and now you ask the Government to pay it. Is that right?

Mr. GROW. Took it from the officer.

Mr. COX. Is not that the proof?

Mr. GROW. No; it is not right. The officer of the Government took that property, and the party sued him as an officer of the Government. The Government used the building for the use of the Army; and are we to repudiate such an obligation of the Government?

Mr. COX. Oh, never mind about repudiation of the thing. [Laughter.] When you elected to sue the marshal, did you not assume the responsibility that the marshal owed the debt?

Mr. GROW. No, sir.

Mr. COX. But you sued the marshal?

Mr. GROW. The marshal as an individual did not owe any debt, but as a marshal of the United States he owed for the rent of this property.

Mr. COX. You sued him as an individual, and got your judgment?

Mr. GROW. Now, the gentleman must allow me right here.

Mr. COX. Why, of course, I allow anything.

Mr. GROW. This claimant waited until the end the war, expecting his claim for the use of this property would be paid. It was not paid. He used all due diligence, had it presented at the War Department, and their objection was that there was no contract made between the claimant and the marshal, and hence he must look to Congress or some other source. Then, after waiting a few years, he had it presented to Congress, and by the death of a member it was postponed. Then he brought his suit in order to have adjudicated what damage he sustained, and he obtained his judgment against an officer of the Government, not as an individual. Then that comes to Congress, and it is referred to the Court of Claims; but they decided that they had no jurisdiction, because it was not in an insurrectionary State. If it had been, they could have heard and considered the claim. Now, why make an objection to it after a duly authorized court of law has passed upon the claim and the Government has not paid it?

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. GROW. I yield first to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Why was not this claim paid by the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. GROW. Because there was no contract made for the use of the building. It was taken for use by the provost-marshal.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Under the act of 1864, according to my understanding of the law, the Quartermaster-General was authorized to settle all claims of this kind; and by the act of 1875——

Mr. GROW. It was never settled. I understand all the circumstances of this case. At that time I was Representative in this House of that district. The claimant never received any pay, nor have his heirs, for the use of this property, which cost $2,000 to put into a condition for use after the soldiers left. It was used for soldiers' barracks. Now I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COX. I broke up this claim once when a request was made for unanimous consent. Now, I desire to ask the gentleman, in the presence of this House, did not your claimant sue an individual and obtain judgment?

Mr. GROW. He was an officer of the Government.

Mr. COX. Oh, he was an officer; but he sued him?

Mr. GROW. He sued him as provost-marshal in a claim against the United States.

Mr. COX. Why did you not sue the Government?

Mr. GROW. You can not sue the Government without its consent.

Mr. COX. Oh! [Laughter.]

Mr. GROW. Without some law for it. Now I yield to the gentleman from Delaware for a question.

Mr. HANDY. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it is not a fact that the Government of the United States made an allowance to this provost-marshal to pay that rent, and the provost-marshal failed to pay the rent?

Mr. GROW. That is possible; but I do not know the facts.

Mr. HANDY. If that is the fact, the Government has already paid once for this thing.

Mr. GROW. No; they have not.
Mr. HANDY. They paid it to the marshal.
Mr. GROW. They did not pay the money to the individual. The Government is responsible for its officer, and responsible for paying to the citizen if its officer fails to pay. The citizen does not lose by fault of an officer of the Government.
Mr. GAINES. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.
Mr. GROW. Certainly.
Mr. GAINES. A United States officer took charge of this property, and used it as such officer for the benefit of the United States Government?
Mr. GROW. Certainly.
Mr. GAINES. Used it for some length of time?
Mr. GROW. Used it from 1863 to the end of the war.
Mr. GAINES. Did the committee unanimously report the claim?
Mr. GROW. They are unanimous in the report. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD], a Democrat, member of the committee, made the report.
Mr. GAINES. Now, then, this claimant sued this officer as marshal. Suppose they did sue him and got judgment and the judgment remained unpaid, has not Congress the perfect right to——
Mr. GROW. I do not exactly hear your proposition. I was just going to appeal to the Speaker for more order.
The SPEAKER. The Chair desires order in the House preparatory to asking for order in the galleries. All gentlemen will cease conversation.
Mr. GROW. Now I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.
Mr. GAINES. Now, this officer took charge of this property as an officer of the Government and used it, as I understand?
Mr. GROW. They had it for barracks for drafted men and for returning soldiers on furlough to and from their homes.
Mr. GAINES. He did not take charge of it to use for his own personal benefit?
Mr. GROW. Not at all.
Mr. GAINES. He sued the officer and got judgment against him?
Mr. GROW. Yes; in the county courts.
Mr. GAINES. And that officer is dead and his estate insolvent, even if the judgment was against him personally. Now, suppose that he and the Government were a joint trespasser, would not the right to recover at law be against either or both?
Mr. GROW. Certainly.
Mr. GAINES. And until a judgment in a joint tort is paid you can sue each trespasser and recover until the claim is actually paid; and that is the principle you invoke here?
Mr. GROW. That is the law, as I understand it. There never has been any payment in this case, and there is no question about the Government having used the property for barracks for drafted men, for returned soldiers coming home. Colonel Kerrigan held it two years after the draft was over and used it as barracks for United States soldiers.
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Has the gentleman got an execution on his judgment?
Mr. GROW. I do not remember exactly, but I think an execution was returned nulla bona. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] has stated the question, not only in regard to the law, but the equity. The officer of the Government is a trespasser. The Government can not be a trespasser, but somebody else must be. You sue the officer, and behind him stands the United States Government, and if a party can not collect his judgment of the officer, then he looks to the Government to pay, and if the party does collect it of the officer, then the officer looks to the Government to reimburse him. Now, the Government has never paid this claim.
Mr. MADDOX. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the reading of this report indicates no ground or reason why this claim should be presented to the House in preference to hundreds of other claims now pending, based upon the same reason and justice as this. We remember the many days of filibustering in this Congress by the other side of the House against claims like this. Friday after Friday was adjourned over to avoid claims similar to this, and it seems strange how one claim can percolate its way through the bulwark that prevents the consideration of claims due to loyal American citizens, while others are barred from the consideration of the House.
While it may be said that no just claim should go unallowed, yet when we come to a suspension of the rules on a measure of this kind, where we can not give it that consideration that claims thirty years old should have, I think it is a just ground of objection to the allowance of one claim that it is a discrimination against hundreds of other claims that are presented to this House. I simply want to emphasize the fact that hundreds of other claims, fully as meritorious, are denied a consideration.

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] at this point that it is well enough to go back to the language of the report. The report says that the claimant made a claim for compensation to the honorable Secretary of War on or about August, 1865, which claim was rejected on May 10, 1866, on the ground that the claimant must look to the officers who took the building. Why, there is no liability of the Government, and clearly was so held by the Secretary of War. It was an individual transaction. It seems that the claimant has exhausted his remedy, has secured his judgment, which proved to be worthless, because the party is dead and his estate is valueless. There is absolutely no equity in the claim, because there is no liability on the part of the Government.
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. As has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], at the time when the facts were fresh in the minds of the witnesses it was presented to the accredited agents of the Government, and at that time they denied it. Now, we are asked in twenty minutes' debate on either side to pass this measure involving an expenditure of public money and suppressing hundreds of other claims of like merit. I do not believe it is just, and I do not think the claim ought to have that vantage ground.
Mr. GROW. One word, Mr. Speaker, and I am done. It seems to be the idea of some members of the House that because we can not pay all the claims that are presented against the Government we should not pay any.
The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.
The question was taken; and the Speaker announcing that the Chair was in doubt, the House divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 44.
Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.
The question was taken.
The SPEAKER. Thirty-four gentlemen rising, a sufficient number.
Mr. GROW. I demand the other side.
The other side was taken; and there were 106 in the negative.
So the yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken; and there were—yeas 129, nays 76, answered "present" 10, not voting 136; as follows:

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. GRIGGS. I am paired with that gentleman. If he had been present, I would have voted "no."

EXTENSION OF THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 460) to extend the uses of the mail service.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be lawful for the postal cards and envelopes, with coupons attached, as patented and now or hereafter owned by the United States Economic Postage Association or its successors, a corporation created under and by the laws of the State of West Virginia, to be carried in the mails of the United States, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Postmaster-General, and the postage thereon, at the regular postal-card and letter rates, paid on presentation of the coupons from the said cards and envelopes when detached at the office of delivery; and the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, test the practical operation of this act in such one or more cities as he may select before extending it generally throughout the country, and if the result be unfavorable suspend its operation altogether.

SEC. 2. That before the said cards and envelopes shall be so carried through the mails the said association shall enter into a bond to the United States, with corporate or other sufficient security, to be approved in form and sufficiency by the Postmaster-General, in the sum of $100,000, or such larger sum as the Postmaster-General shall in the beginning or from time to time prescribe, conditioned for the redemption in cash when presented of each and every one of said coupons taken from cards and envelops at the office of delivery. Upon failure at any time for ten days to redeem said coupons in cash the Postmaster-General may, by order, stop the carrying of said envelopes and cards in the mails of the United States.

SEC. 3. That all cards and envelopes furnished by the United States Economic Postage Association shall conform in size to the requirements of the Post-Office Department; shall be used only for return messages; shall have printed thereon, and upon the coupon attached thereto, the address of the individual, firm, company, or corporation to whom such cards and envelopes are to be returned; and may also have printed upon the address side the penalty prescribed for any violation of this act, and upon each coupon such words as will indicate that the postage will be paid when the card or envelope is delivered to the addressee.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful to mail, and postmasters and other postal officials shall refuse to send or carry in the mails, any envelopes or cards of the said association on which the name of the individual, firm, company, or corporation imprinted thereon has been erased; and any person convicted of the violation of this statute shall be fined not exceeding $100 or imprisoned not more than thirty days on failure or refusal to pay the fine.

SEC. 5. That said association shall pay postage upon each and every piece of matter passing through the mails, which shall be patented or now or hereafter owned by said association or its successors.

SEC. 6. That said association shall, if required by the Postmaster-General, at all times keep a sum in cash, deposited as the Postmaster-General may direct, sufficient in amount for the redemption of said coupons daily or weekly, or monthly.

SEC. 7. That in every case where an envelope of the said association when mailed carries more than a single-rate message, the postmaster shall place upon the coupon attached to said envelope and cancel as many postage-due stamps as may be required by existing law, in the same manner as is now done with all other similar mail matter; and the said association shall redeem and pay for the stamps so added to the coupons at the same time that the coupon is redeemed and paid for.

SEC. 8. That postmasters shall cancel all coupons attached to the cards and envelopes of said association in the same manner as stamps are now canceled, and shall be entitled to the same compensation for canceling said coupons as is allowed for the cancellation or sale of stamps.

SEC. 9. That nothing shall be paid by the United States Government for or on account of any patent owned by the United States Economic Postage Association, and no claim for damages shall be made or exist against the United States for or on account of the alteration, amendment, or repeal of this act.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDOX. I would like to have some explanation of the bill, but shall not object.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then appoint tellers.

Mr. LOUD and Mr. CORLISS were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 104, noes 3.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California will be recognized for twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan, in opposition to the bill, for twenty minutes.

Mr. LOUD. I call for the reading of the report, which was made by Mr. CLARK of Iowa, who reported the bill to the House, and which is thoroughly explanatory of its purposes.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 460) to extend the uses of the mail service, and commonly known as the economic postage bill, have had the same under consideration and beg to submit herewith their favorable report upon the measure.

This is a bill to make it lawful for the postal cards and envelopes with coupons attached, as patented by the United States Economic Postage Association, to be be carried in the mails of the United States under the provisions set forth in the act. By the method proposed the sender of these cards or envelopes will pay the full rate as required by law, but he will not pay return postage unless the card or envelope is actually returned. As it is now business men and others who solicit trade or information by inclosing stamps, stamped envelopes, or postal cards to a correspondent say that only about 10 per cent are returned. This limits this use of the mails.

It is claimed by upward of two thousand business men, who have made statements submitted to the committee, that they would vastly increase the sending out of cards and envelopes if they could be certain their investments would not be lost. Under this bill, and by the use of the proposed cards and envelopes, a method is provided by which the difficulties business men have heretofore labored under in this respect will be obviated.

In a report made to the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, accompanying this same bill, the careful and well-informed chairman of the committee—Mr. LOUD, who drew up the report—estimated, from such data as he had, that it might not be extravagant to say that the stimulus given to mercantile and commercial interests throughout the whole country, under the operation of this law, would approximate $30,000,000 net revenue. The bill has been carefully prepared so as to guard fully the rights and interests of the Government. The Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, test the practical operation of this act in such one or more cities as he may select before extending it generally throughout the country, and, if the result be unfavorable, suspend it altogether. This is a matter that must be tested, as to its good or ill consequences, by administrative trial. The bill charges the Post-Office Department with the making of this trial.

If the American people are served, business promoted, popular convenience increased, and the revenues of the Post-Office Department multiplied by its operation without conflict with the rights of the Government, then the people and the Government should have these benefits. If it does not work these results, then the Post-Office Department and the statute books should not be burdened with it. The preliminary test under the supervision of the Postmaster-General will solve the whole problem with perfect safety for the Government and all concerned. Objections can easily be made, based upon hypothetical assumptions, to the bill and the plan proposed, but the committee do not deem it necessary to discuss these, in view of the fact that the Postmaster-General is to make a trial of the plan before adopting it. If these objections, based on presumptions, prove well founded, he will suspend the operations of the act; if they prove unfounded, the committee will but have wasted its time in discussing them.

A bill for the same purpose, but not so well guarded in its provisions, was introduced in the Fifty-third Congress by Mr. Henderson, then chairman of the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and was favorably and unanimously reported from that committee to the House. The bill was introduced in the Senate in the Fifty-fourth Congress by Senator Vilas, late Postmaster-General, and it was favorably reported and unanimously passed by the Senate February 18, 1897. The bill, being approved by Hon. William L. Wilson, then Postmaster-General, was introduced into the House in the Fifty-fourth Congress, and favorably reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. In the Fifty-fifth Congress the bill as now before the House unanimously passed the Senate March 15, 1898.

Your committee recommend its passage.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the House that this is not a new question for consideration in this body. It has received the attention of the Post-Office Committee for some years past. While for the past two years I have not given it close personal attention, yet when Mr. Wilson was Postmaster-General, in conjunction with him we carefully went over the bill, and such amendments were prepared as, in our judgment, were deemed to be necessary to perfect it.

The bill then proposed was gone over carefully and every interest of the Government protected. It provided for a minimum bond of $100,000 to be given by this company before it could enter into business as the bill proposes. An amendment was also provided, which is incorporated in the present bill, that the Postmaster-General should require a deposit of such sum of money as, in his judgment, might be necessary to redeem the coupons day by day at the principal post-offices.

We further suggested in the same connection an amendment, which is also incorporated in the pending bill, that this experiment might be tried in one or two of the cities of the country—not exceeding two—for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of the scheme proposed and its value to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. Speaker, most every business man in the country knows that there is a large field for the increase of existing business orders by means of postal cards or letters; and that is what this bill seeks to accomplish, and that is what the committee believes it will substantially accomplish and that it will result in large revenues to the Department.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I want to see if I understand the provisions of the bill. We have before us a copy of the return postal card, which is embodied in the report just read from the desk. Now, for business purposes this postal card may be inclosed in an envelope and sent to the customer, who may subsequently fill it up and return it, and the postage coupon is to be detached by the postmaster.

Mr. LOUD. That is correct; but when the card is sent out the party sending it may use such means as he sees fit. He need not send it by mail; but if it be sent through the mail it would be subject to third-class postage rates, or 8 cents a pound. But it is very probable that in the larger cities these cards would be delivered personally to the customers in many instances.

Mr. CANNON. And without the payment of postage.

Mr. LOUD. Certainly. If it is distributed by the company itself, there would be no payment of postage, but if sent through the mails it would pay the same rate as other printed matter; that is to say, 8 cents a pound, as I understand it.

Mr. CANNON. Now, let me see if I understand the gentleman. If I understand it, the postal card is sent to any one of the 75,000,000 people, through the 80,000 post-offices that we have, and if received, the party can turn it over on the other side and write an order or a message to be transmitted to the sender. It goes back then to the writer—we will say "Mr. Richard Roe," of Washington, D. C., or to whatever name may be written or printed on it—and it comes to the post-office at Washington or New York, or goes to Buncombe County Cross Roads—wherever this corporation, the Economic Postage Association, is located—and the postmaster tears off the coupon and transmits it to some place where this corporation is in business and presents it, and then the United States will receive 1 cent for carrying that card.

In other words, it would have passed through the mails and it would have come to the post-office in Washington, or Buncombe Cross Roads, or somewhere else——

Mr. LOUD. Oh, well, if the gentleman from Illinois is to make a speech I hope he will take his own time.

Mr. CANNON. I only want to see if I understand it. I was going to say that the postmaster must tear off the 1-cent coupon and transmit it to the company before he can get payment of the postage.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CANNON. Very well, then, I want to know precisely what this thing does.

Mr. LOUD. The Postmaster-General is authorized to provide means for taking up the coupons; and this bill only provides that he may establish this system in one or two cities for the purpose of making a test of its provisions, and if desirable, after experiments, he may extend it. That is all.

Mr. CANNON. Now, let me see if this is not possible and probable. There are 80,000 post-offices in the United States. To-morrow 80,000 postmasters get these cards on which the postage has not been paid and 80,000 postmasters tear off 80,000 coupons——

Mr. LOUD. Oh, but they do not.

Mr. CANNON. Eighty thousand postmasters tear off 80,000 coupons——

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman is going to make that kind of a speech, I should prefer to have him make it in his own time.

Mr. CANNON. I am asking for information. Would it not be done in that way?

Mr. LOUD. No; the bill permits the Postmaster-General to put this in operation in but one or two cities and the cards can only come back to one or two places.

Mr. CANNON. Why should not all have it, if it is a good thing? I am trying to test the wisdom of it.

Mr. LOUD. We thought it advisable to experiment with this thing before we embarked generally upon it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him where in the bill it states that it only applies to one city?

Mr. LOUD. That is my understanding of the bill.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I suppose the gentleman knows all about the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. The matter is left in the hands of the Postmaster-General, is it not?

Mr. BROMWELL. It is, in lines 13 and 14 of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] states that it is, in lines 13 and 14 of the bill.

Mr. LOUD. It authorizes the Postmaster-General, as I stated.

Mr. BROMWELL. I can answer the gentleman's question. It is in lines 13 and 14 of the first page of the bill.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That does not limit it to one or two cities.

Mr. BROMWELL (reading)—

And the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, test the practical operation of this act in such one or more cities as he may select before extending it generally throughout the country.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. But it allows him to extend it generally throughout the country.

Mr. BROMWELL. It says "in one or more cities."

Mr. FISCHER. Who pays the expense of the accounting between the company and the Government? It will require additional clerks, will it not?

Mr. LOUD. It will require some additional help, but let me say to the House of Representatives that the first-class matter, in which this will be included, is the only paying portion of the post-office business that we have. In other words, less than one-tenth of the mail matter carried returns to us more than $70,000,000 out of a total revenue of about eighty-eight million or eighty-nine million dollars, and anything that can be done to build up first-class matter must necessarily bring back into the revenues of the Post-Office Department a very large increase.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. RIDGELY. Has your committee made an estimate as to whether this will increase or decrease the receipts upon the same tonnage? Or will it increase the tonnage without increasing the receipts?

Mr. LOUD. It provides the regular rate of postage now prescribed by law.

Mr. HANDY. It will increase the paying part of the matter that is carried in the mails.

Mr. BABCOCK. It is all first-class matter.

Mr. LOUD. It is all first-class matter.

Mr. HEPBURN. How far will it diminish that which pays now?

Mr. RIDGELY. It has been stated that a large amount of this advertising is now done by postal cards, which never return. In that case the Government gets the pay for the card without carrying it, does it not?

Mr. LOUD. The Government does get a little revenue from cards that are never used, but it is not a very large amount of money. The merchants of the country seem to be perfectly certain that this will vastly encourage the transmittal of first-class matter.

Mr. RIDGELY. I was simply wanting to get the judgment of the committee as to whether it will increase the Government receipts for the business done.

Mr. LOUD. I think that it would encourage first-class matter, and hence increase the revenues of the Government.

I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, as I do not trouble the House frequently with my remarks, I trust I may have order.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order and gentlemen will cease conversation.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, this bill, upon its face and upon the reading of the report, would appear to be a very innocent little measure for the benefit of our commercial and mercantile interests and for the great advancement of our Post-Office Department. But when you stop to analyze and examine with care the objects, purposes, and scope of this bill, you will understand the character of it, the dangers of such legislation, and the purpose of the promoters of this project.

In the first place, this corporation claims, and it is stated that it has secured, letters patent of the United States for a particular character of postal card and envelope with coupons attached. To that extent they have enjoyed the privileges that are accorded to every other citizen of the United States, and secured for a period of seventeen years an absolute monopoly of an invention and the sole right to manufacture, use, and sell the same, and to that extent they enjoy an absolute control and monopoly of this patent——

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CORLISS (continuing). And can go into the market and use it as any other man may use his genius and his ability and the results of his labor and skill.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CORLISS. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman what advantage it is to the Economic Postage Association to have this patent and to get this monopoly, and get all the advantages the gentleman speaks of, when as a matter of fact unless this bill passes the House and becomes a law their matter can not be admitted into the mails. Will you explain to the House what advantage the patent would be to them if their matter was not admitted to the mails?

Mr. CORLISS. I did not suppose gentlemen advocating this measure would take the position that I was going to take in an argument against this measure. The gentleman now admits that the patent is worthless, and that the owners of it can not use it to advantage or profit without special legislation by Congress.

Now, then, the patent is absolutely worthless. Then, let me ask, Mr. Speaker, if that is true, why should Congress legislate so as to place in the hands of one corporation the power to use a patented article which is worthless, when perhaps some other genius may, and probably will in the near future, devise a better and more economical, more useful device, who would be compelled to come to Congress and ask for an act similar to this, giving the privilege of using the United States mails? But we can judge from the persistency of the representatives of this corporation that they would have difficulty in securing legislation for their relief.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. CORLISS. I prefer not to be interrupted, with all due respect, because I desire in my twenty minutes to present to the House such information as I have upon this question, in order that members may understand it; and I trust the leader of the House will give me his attention.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill authorizes this corporation, and this corporation only, to use the public mails of the United States on credit——

Mr. BROMWELL. Oh, no.

Mr. CORLISS. A privilege that is denied every other citizen of the United States. You can not send your letters through the post-office and have the postmaster at the other end collect the revenue from the man who has received your letter. Will gentlemen please give me a little order?

The SPEAKER. Will the House be in order?

Mr. CORLISS. I really think, Mr. Speaker, that if gentlemen would listen they would get more information than they will in discussing it privately.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumes gentlemen are discussing this bill privately. The Chair hopes they will listen to the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan with reference to discussing the bill privately.

Mr. CORLISS. With all due respect to the gentlemen who seem to be conversing around here, I am sincerely laboring for the purpose of preserving for the people what it seems to me they are entitled to. Now, if there is any Department of our Government sacred to the people of our country, it is the Post-Office Department. They care not whether it is maintained within its own resources. They want service, they want good service in all parts of our country, and here is a proposition in this legislation to transfer part of the business of the post-office into the hands of a private corporation.

How many members would consent to transfer the Post-Office Department into the hands of a corporation under contract to carry on the business of the Post-Office Department? Now, this to a certain extent does that very thing. It authorizes this corporation to distribute throughout the United States its postal cards, its envelopes, containing coupons, and it authorizes the men who receive them to send them back to the party who sent them. It enables this corporation to sell their cards at any price that they can get. There is no provision in the bill that you or I or any other man can buy these cards at the same price that they may be purchased by a large corporation that wants to use thousands of them. There is no protection for the masses of the people who may want to enjoy this privilege.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CORLISS. Not until I finish. I will try to save enough time to answer questions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. I am with you in your position against the bill.

Mr. CORLISS. Now, it seems to me there are three or four vital objections to this bill. It takes from the hands of the Post-Office Department a certain part of its business and enables this corporation to enjoy it. It grants such privilege on credit. Mind you, these coupons attached to these cards or attached to these envelopes are to be sent through the mail and the postmaster who receives them is compelled to tear off the coupons and send them to the office of this company for collection. This would entail upon the Post-Office Department of the Government in every city in our country the expense of an additional clerk to tear off the coupons, count them, and make up the account and settle with this corporation.

You may increase the volume of business, but I submit that today the Government of the United States is receiving a large amount of revenue from the sale of postal cards that are sent out and never returned, and by this measure the Government would be deprived of that revenue. Secondly, you give this company an exclusive control of the privilege for all time. There is no limit under this bill unless the Postmaster-General limits it. He is given the power, if he does not think it a success, to cut it off; but I submit that Congress ought not to permit the Postmaster-General under any Administration to determine whether or not this or any other scheme of like character be established when the corporation is granted a special privilege over other men.

If this is wise, authorize any corporation that has a device which it desires to use through the mails of our Government to go before the Department and submit its design. Are you not willing to encourage genius and skill? Then why select this device as the best? No instrument of any kind has ever been invented that can not be improved on by man. Why not give any other genius who has an improvement the right to go before the Postmaster-General and have it adopted? And in a little while these private interests would run the Post-Office branch of our Government.

There are two good reasons why this bill ought not to pass. First, it takes from the Government a certain branch of the post-office business. Second, it grants a special privilege that is denied to every other citizen of our country. It seems to me, after careful examination of this bill, that it was conceived in the greed of man, inspired by a wicked heart, and born through illicit cohabitation. It has grown strong, Mr. Speaker, with every returning Congress. It came here in the Fifty-fourth Congress, and was just as effectively presented. The chairman of the committee, from whom we have heard the features of this bill discussed, presented it in the same manner. The 2,000 business men whose attention has been cursorily called to this measure have approved of it, but what are 2,000 business men compared to all business interests of our country? What do they know of the effect of this measure? I dare say it was never submitted to any of them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Perhaps they have stock in it.

Mr. CORLISS. No, I do not want to accuse them of that. Mr. Speaker, how much more time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. CORLISS. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. PRINCE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] if he will not put a concrete illustration of the working of this bill. Suppose from your home you write a letter to me and inclose one of these cards. Will the gentleman explain the operation of the proposed bill?

Mr. CORLISS. I will. Suppose I was a large manufacturer and had a thousand customers or 10,000 customers, and I desired to sell my products. I would write to the 10,000 customers and put into my envelope, with my letter, a postal card addressed back to me, without any postage stamp, but with a coupon attached, and ask my customer to make me an order for my manufactures. Now, perhaps one-half of these customers would reply and order my goods. The object they seek to get here is this: Now, I am compelled to buy a postage stamp or a postal card that costs a cent and send it out with my letter and take the chance of my customers replying with an order for goods. This bill enables me, as a manufacturer, to send out the postal cards without a stamp and take my chance of a reply, and when it comes in the Government tears off the coupon and gets the postage from this company.

Now, that seems innocent on its face, and in some instances would work advantageously, but I submit that you ought not, by an act of Congress, to give to me that which you deny to some other man. I submit that the Government of the United States has, until the present time, maintained a cash basis of running the Post-Office Department. Whenever you desire to mail a letter or send out papers or other periodicals, you must go to the post-office and pay cash. "Cash on delivery" is the motto of the Post-Office Department, and it is a good business principle. Here you sell on credit, and I submit that the Post-Office Department ought not to be permitted to go into the credit business and trust to this corporation or any other corporation to redeem the coupons at the point where they are finally received. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, from a hasty examination of this bill I think it is to breed a great trouble if enacted and put in force. There are 80,000 post-offices in the United States and 75,000,000 people. If this bill was in operation to-morrow, this thing could happen: Any inhabitant in the United States could send these orders to all of the other 75,000,000 inhabitants. Now, then, any one of these inhabitants can mail the postal card with coupon attached to any other inhabitant at any one of the 80,000 post-offices.

Mr. LOUD. He can only mail it to the person mentioned on the coupon.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. It goes through the mail without the payment of postage. When it is delivered to the postmaster at that office, he tears off the coupon. The Government has not yet got its money. He must present that coupon to this Economic Association. This bill applies also to envelopes. Envelopes can be sent this way as well as postal cards. The bill provides that when the envelope, on being weighed, costs more than 2 cents, the postmaster at the office of receipt must put the necessary stamps on the coupon.

Mr. LOUD. Is there not a similar regulation now in regard to all ordinary first-class matter?

Mr. CANNON. But now the deficiency of postage is collected on the delivery of the letter. It is a cash transaction.

Mr. LOUD. But the stamp is never put on until the letter reaches the office of delivery.

Mr. CANNON. Now, my claim is that to keep in 80,000 offices an account of this work done upon credit for this Economic Association would cost, in my judgment, more than it does—I should not say more than it does, but I think it would cost quite a large percentage of as much as it now costs to keep the accounts in the various offices. I am afraid of the bill for this reason; and therefore, as it would enlarge this credit business done with this one customer at these 80,000 offices, the United States being compelled to keep the accounts and present the coupons, it seems to me it would not be in the interest of the Government to adopt this measure.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Before the gentleman sits down, I would like to call his attention to one thing. The provisions of the bill which purport to secure payment to the Government do not make it absolutely obligatory that this company shall pay at a certain time. The provision reads:

> Upon failure at any time for ten days to redeem said coupons in cash the Postmaster-General may—

Not "shall."

Mr. CANNON. That is true. The money may be paid or may not be. I think it would be paid; but still this business involves keeping an account at at least 80,000 offices.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And again, as to requiring the company to deposit a certain amount of cash, the bill provides that it shall be done if required by the Postmaster-General—not that it shall be done absolutely.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has half a minute remaining.

Mr. CORLISS. I will occupy that half minute by saying that I am credibly informed that Postmaster-General Gary gave his opinion upon this matter and was very much opposed to the measure before the House. I will ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether that is not true?

Mr. LOUD. I do not think that Mr. Gary recommended or opposed the bill. He wrote a negative letter. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, this proposition comes here with the indorsement of the Post-Office Department. The First Assistant Postmaster-General, who is one of the best-informed officers, as I think will be admitted, in the Department, has approved of this measure. He advocated it before he became an official of the Government and has made a report in favor of it. A few minutes ago he called me to the telephone and stated that after a careful examination he was earnestly in favor of the passage of the bill.

I have listened very attentively to the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS], based, as I understand, mainly upon the ground that there is some monopoly in this bill that is going to favor a corporation. I think a corporation starts out evenhanded with our people when it is of the practical character indicated here. I can see no reason why, under a bill so safely guarded as this, we may not venture to give the authority proposed. I find it provided in the first section that if the experiments which may be made in the actual operation of this measure do not prove satisfactory the Postmaster-General shall have the right to suspend absolutely the operations of the law. I do not think there is anything in the measure that need deter any of us from voting to give the proposition a trial.

Mr. CORLISS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question before he takes his seat. Does he not think that other inventive people who may get up something better than this, along the same line, ought to have equal privileges with this company?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, let them come with something better.

Mr. CORLISS. Would it not be best to incorporate a provision of that kind in the bill, so that if some other person or persons should devise something which it will be an advantage for the Post-Office Department to use they may have equal privileges with this company?

Mr. GROSVENOR. In that case the Department can use the device if it sees fit.

Mr. CORLISS. They can not use it now, can they?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Would the gentleman refuse to compel the use, for instance, of a particular railway brake because somebody else may devise a better one?

Mr. BROMWELL. Or a canceling machine?

Mr. GROSVENOR. We are now forcing the railroad companies to put into use a certain brake. We do not allow the killing of railroad employees to go on while we are waiting to see whether somebody else may not invent something better.

Mr. CORLISS. If the gentleman will examine the law on that subject, I think he will find that the railroad companies may adopt any device that will accomplish the purpose of the act.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think not.

Mr. HENDERSON. That matter is controlled by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CORLISS. Then there is a power on the part of Government officers to determine what particular device shall be used. On the same principle, if I or any other man or corporation should get up a better device than that here proposed the Postmaster-General ought to have authority to use it. Such a provision would relieve this bill of one of my objections to it.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the apparent opposition to this bill is not well taken. The bill is known as the economic postal bill, and if any gentleman will take the trouble to read the able and concise report of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CLARK] he will quickly and thoroughly understand the object of the bill.

All that the bill does, to state it briefly, is to make it lawful to send out envelopes and postal cards with a coupon attached. The sender of these envelopes and cards must pay the full postage now provided by law, but he will not have to pay return postage for the answer unless it is actually used and returned. That is all there is to it. Business men and others who use the mails to solicit trade or information say that by inclosing stamps or stamped envelopes or postal cards only about 10 per cent are answered and returned. This limits this use of the mails and none other.

A great many well-known business men in New York City have requested me to favor and vote for this bill. I agree with them, and shall do so. They claim that many difficulties they have heretofore labored under will be obviated by this bill.

It seems to me that the opposition to this bill is founded upon assumptions which are at variance with every principle of logic. The bill is a good bill in the interest of the Government and for the benefit of the people, and it ought to pass. I have carefully examined the bill in all its provisions, and I believe that it will not alone bring in additional revenue to the Government and aid the Postal Department, but will also be of immense service—a great boon and a great benefit—to business people and to the poor people all over the country.

It does not limit or restrict any right of the Post-Office Department that it now exercises. It infringes on no privilege which the Department can exercise under the present law. On the contrary, it lodges all the powers and responsibilities in the hands of the Postmaster-General, and in his discretion, after an investigation of the merits of the system by experiment, he can try it in a limited number of places. He can make an experiment of this economic postal plan, and if it does not inure to the interest of the Government under the law, he can suspend its operation permanently, and its provisions will be a dead law on the statute books. What harm, then, I ask, can be done by giving the economic postal system a fair trial? It promises valuable results to the Government and incalculable advantages and conveniences to the people. It may solve an intricate postal problem.

If it should do what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] suggests and assumes, of course it will immediately and promptly be suspended. But the argument of the gentleman from Michigan is untenable and based on false premises.

If, on the other hand, however, it operates in the interest of the people of the United States, if it proves to be a convenience and a material benefit to them, and at the same time brings in additional revenue to the Government, as its friends and supporters claim, then it will manifestly be a good law, and the Department will maintain it and keep it on the statute books.

I listened to the argument of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] and gave attention to the reasons he assigned for his opposition to this measure; and so far as I could understand he could find no valid reason excepting a specious and flimsy suggestion of a possibility which, to my mind, can never and will never materialize. If that contingency, however, should come to pass, as I have already said, the Postmaster-General will suspend the operation of the law, and there is an end to it. What injury, then, can be done? What harm can be sustained by the Government? Absolutely none whatever. In my judgment, let me say to the members of the House that we ought in all justice and all fairness give the people who own this patent an opportunity to test it and make a trial to honestly determine whether or not it will do what they claim. If it does, it is conceded by all that it will be a good thing for the Government and the people. If it does not, there will be no loss, and no harm can or will be done.

The bill has passed the Senate unanimously. It has passed this House also in several previous Congresses. It has been recommended, I believe, by every Postmaster-General for the last ten years. The present head of that Department should and wants to give it a trial. I am in favor of doing that. I want to see the test made; and if it is not satisfactory, then the law will be suspended.

Mr. Speaker, I stand with the distinguished chairman of the Post-Office Committee [Mr. LOUD]. He knows more about postal matters, in my opinion, than any other member of this House. He has said that he estimated from such data as he had that it might not be extravagant to say that the stimulus given to mercantile and commercial interests throughout the whole country under the operation of this law might approximate $30,000,000 net revenue a year.

The bill seems to be carefully drawn, and guards in every way the rights and interests of the Government. I shall vote for it, and I hope it will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, several gentlemen have suggested that they were in doubt about the question of the payment of postage when these cards are sent out. I will state briefly that they will be sent out under the operation of the present law and pay the same postage. I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, there are but one or two points to which I can refer in the brief time at my disposal. The first is to a reference made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to the fact that there are 80,000 post-offices and 75,000,000 people who will immediately come in touch with this legislation.

Now, in the first section of the bill it is provided:

> And the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, test the practical operation of this act in such one or more cities as he may select before extending it generally throughout the country, and if the result be unfavorable suspend its operation altogether.

The probability is that the whole system will be inaugurated in only one or two, or possibly three, cities at the outside, for the purpose of making the experiment; in which event the operation will be limited to a small number of citizens, while the radius of its operations, the business points to which these cards will be sent, will necessarily be of corresponding dimensions, as they will be forwarded only to those persons interested in the business operations in the immediate vicinity of the points where the cards are sent out. So, instead of there being 80,000 post-offices interested in the work, and instead of 75,000,000 people to whom these cards will be sent, it is possible that there may not be over a hundred post-offices and a correspondingly limited number of people.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio if it is not true that if, as the Post-Office Department believes, economy will result and increased facilities be furnished by this system to our business people, it will not be better to extend this service to all of our post-offices?

Mr. BROMWELL. Undoubtedly.

But there is another point, Mr. Speaker, to which I wish to refer. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] said this is to be a great monopoly. Now, as a matter of fact, a large bond is required of this company before it can commence operations, and this bond can be increased from time to time, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, to meet any increases in the business that may follow. The minimum amount of the bond is $100,000, and it may be increased to any extent to meet the necessities of the occasion.

In addition to that they are required to keep on hand at the post-offices of delivery, for the purpose of meeting current expenditures from day to day, any amount of money in the way of cash payments, and deposit the same with the postmaster, that may be required, in order to redeem the daily, weekly, or monthly accumulations, as the Post-Office Department may decide. The same system may be required as in the case of the great newspapers, which have money in the hands of the postmaster, and as fast as the papers are sent out they are checked up against the deposit, and the deposit is required to be made good from time to time to meet emergencies. If there is a failure in ten days to redeem the postage, the Postmaster-General can retract the privilege and suspend the operations of the act.

Gentlemen have said that this would be an advantage to a great monopoly. I reply by saying that any patent right is a great monopoly, and yet it is a constitutional right that we all recognize and whose value we appreciate. A man takes out a patent on any particular device. He has the right to make and vend and dispose of that patent to the exclusion of any other man in the country.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROMWELL. I have not time. This Economic Postal Association has a special device. The gentleman started out by saying they were going to make a great amount of money out of it, because they alone had the right to make these cards; but I call attention to the fact that without this privilege given in this bill this patent right is worthless, and there is nothing in this bill that will prevent any other organization or person from improving on that device and going to the Post-Office Department and getting a recommendation and coming before the Congress, just as this association has done, and securing the same right.

In other words, there is no exclusive privilege given to this association. They are permitted to use the mails. Where one postal card is sent out now under the present system by a merchant to his customers, there will be a hundred sent out if he knows that his postal cards, which go out to would-be customers, are not to be diverted and the return name scratched off and another name substituted at his expense. Where he sends out one card now he will send out a hundred. The Government will get the benefit of that when the cards go out, as they are carried as third-class matter, which is a paying class of mail matter. The Government will also get the benefit of the postage when the cards come back.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. May I interrupt my colleague for one minute?

Mr. BROMWELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. Let me also call the attention of my colleague on the committee to the fact that the owners of this patent get absolutely no profit from it except upon the sale of the cards.

Mr. CORLISS. Yes; and there is no price fixed.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. If there is any profit whatever, it will simply be because the American people and these business men and citizens use the cards.

Mr. BROMWELL. And because there are from 2,000 to 10,000 merchants to-day asking this privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. Debate is closed and the question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed?

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that he was in doubt.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 49.

Mr. BROMWELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, 33 members voted in favor thereof.

Mr. CORLISS demanded the other side.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes 33, noes 57.

Accordingly (more than one-fifth voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 125, nays 97, answered "present" 6, not voting 123; as follows:

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. A parliamentary inquiry. I ask for what purpose these bills are read, or pretended to be read, in this way?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. No man can hear a word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order that the House is in disorder. Gentlemen will please be seated.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask at this time that it may be in order to call up the business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia next Thursday morning. Last Monday was District day, and was taken by an appropriation bill. Last Thursday was assigned in lieu of last Monday, but the bill was still on the floor. It will take but a little time, but we have some important measures, and I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that Thursday be set apart, or so much of it as is necessary, for the consideration of business reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HULL. I object to that, unless it give way to the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Let the order be made, subject to appropriation bills.

Mr. BABCOCK. Let it be subject to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I shall have to insist on excepting the naval bill also.

Mr. BABCOCK. The naval bill is on now.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I wish it was.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to hear.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that District business shall be in order on Thursday, subject to the right of way on the part of appropriation bills. Is there objection?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I have arranged to call up the contested-election case of Brown against Swanson next Thursday, and I shall object. I now give notice to the House that that contested-election case will be called up immediately after the reading of the Journal on next Thursday.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not think it will take long to dispose of that, as I expect the House will refuse to consider it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask that this request be subject to the election case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the request also be subject to the election case. Is there objection?

Mr. BAILEY. Subject to the right of the gentleman to call it up, not subject to it, because the question of consideration will doubtless be raised, and I do not want that order made.

The SPEAKER. That will not interfere with raising the question of consideration, in any event.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that the gentleman has the right to call up the contested-election case at any time, as it is a matter of the highest privilege, and that it is not necessary to make that point to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would hardly be necessary; but it is arranged, unless objection is made.

There was no objection.

HOUSE BILL WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a House bill of the following title, with Senate amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

H. R. 10403. An act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REIMBURSEMENT OF GOVERNORS OF STATES AND TERRITORIES FOR EXPENSES IN RAISING VOLUNTEER ARMY.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the attention of the House for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, from the Committee on War Claims, moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report to the House.

Mr. MAHON. It is the Senate bill with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is a Senate bill with a substitute. The Clerk will read the bill, and will also read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to reimburse the governors of States and Territories for expenses incurred by them in aiding the United States to raise and organize and supply and equip the Volunteer Army of the United States in the existing war with Spain," approved July 8, 1898, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to reimburse the governors of States and Territories for expenses incurred by them in aiding the United States to raise and organize and supply and equip the Volunteer Army of the United States in the existing war with Spain," approved July 8, 1898, be so amended that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and is hereby, authorized to allow, in the settlement of the claims of States and of the governors of States and Territories for reimbursement under the provisions of the said act, expenses incurred after as well as before July 8, 1898: Provided, That no reimbursement shall be made for service of members of the National Guard or organized militia of any State or Territory who were not accepted into the Volunteer Army of the United States as of the same grade: Provided further, That compensation, at the rate paid to officers and soldiers in the Regular Army, shall be allowed to the States and governors of States as pay to such volunteers and Naval Reserves as appeared and remained at the place of muster and were afterwards received into the service, for the period between the date of assembly at the rendezvous and the date on which they were mustered in.

SEC. 2. That under the appropriation made by said act the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to reimburse the governor of any State or Territory, or the States and Territories, for reasonable expenses incurred by him in the actual transportation of the members of organized militia or National Guard of his State from the place of company, battalion, or regimental rendezvous to the State rendezvous or place designated for examination and acceptance of the members of such organization into the Volunteer Army of the United States, and the actual transportation from the State rendezvous to their respective company, battalion, or regimental rendezvous of such men as were rejected for lack of physical qualifications: Provided, That no reimbursement shall be made for the transportation of any man who did not in good faith present himself for enrollment in the Volunteer Army of the United States: And provided further, That the provisions of this section shall apply also to individual volunteers who presented themselves in good faith for enrollment in the Volunteer Army of the United States.

SEC. 3. That nothing in said act of July 8, 1898, shall be so construed as to prohibit the reimbursement of any State or the governor of any State or Territory for reasonable expenses incurred in the subsistence of the members of any organization of the organized militia or National Guard of his State or Territory after having been called out by the governor on or after April 25, 1898: Provided, That such organization shall afterwards have been accepted into the Volunteer Army of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the expenses incurred by the States or governors of States in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be reimbursed and paid to them, notwithstanding any unsettled accounts, claims, or indebtedness of the United States against their States, and without prejudice to such unsettled accounts: And provided further, That where an officer of the Army detailed as mustering officer for volunteers purchased equipment necessary for the comfort of the men in camp or rendezvous, and said equipment was subsequently taken into the United States service by said volunteers and no receipts given to such military officer, the certificate to that effect of the governor of the State or Territory to which the volunteers belonged shall be held sufficient to authorize the settlement of such accounts. And where the commander of a company or companies or troop or troops or regiment has purchased supplies necessary for the comfort or subsistence of the men in camp or rendezvous between the date of the enrollment under the call of the President and the mustering in of the company or troop, the certificate to that effect of the governor of the State or Territory to which the volunteers belonged shall be held sufficient to authorize the payment of such accounts to the parties entitled.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the just and proper account or claim of any railroad, transportation company, or person who has at the request of the Quartermaster-General of the Army or his agents, or at the request of any United States mustering officer or other officer authorized by the Secretary of War to enroll, muster, or mobilize volunteers for the war with Spain, for transportation of men or troops from place of enrollment to point of rendezvous, and also to pay such just and proper accounts as may be presented for transportation back from point of rendezvous to place of enrollment of men who volunteered in good faith and were rejected on account of disqualification as found by medical officers duly appointed by the War Department: Provided, That the amount allowed and paid for such transportation shall not be in excess of the rates charged for transporting troops of the United States under like circumstances.

All claims under the provision of this act must be filed in the office of the Auditor for the War Department, and must be supported by proper vouchers or other conclusive evidence of interest.

SEC. 6. That all claims for reimbursement under this act or the act of July 8, 1898, shall be presented in itemized form to the Treasury Department on or before January 1, 1900, or be forever barred.

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the act entitled 'An act to reimburse the governors of States and Territories for expenses incurred by them in aiding the United States to raise and organize and supply and equip the Volunteer Army of the United States in the existing war with Spain,' approved July 8, 1898, be so amended that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and is hereby, authorized to allow, in the settlement of the claims of the governors of States and Territories for reimbursement under the provisions of the said act, expenses incurred and paid after as well as before July 8, 1898: Provided, That no reimbursement shall be made for service of members of the National Guard or organized militia of any State or Territory who were not accepted into the Volunteer Army of the United States, and no reimbursement shall be allowed for payments made to any person in excess of the pay and allowances authorized by the laws of the State or Territory for the grade in which he was accepted into the Volunteer Army of the United States. That compensation, at the rate paid to officers and soldiers in the Regular Army, shall be allowed to the States and governors of States as pay to such volunteers and Naval Reserves as appeared and remained at the place of muster and were afterwards received into the service, for the period between the date of assembly at the rendezvous and the date on which they were mustered in.

"SEC. 2. That under the appropriation made by said act the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to reimburse the governor of any State or Territory for reasonable expenses incurred and paid by him for the actual transportation of the members of organized militia or National Guard of his State from the place of company, battalion, or regimental rendezvous to the State rendezvous, or place designated for examination and acceptance of the members of such organization into the Volunteer Army of the United States, and the actual transportation from such State rendezvous, or such place designated for examination and acceptance, to their respective company, battalion, or regimental rendezvous of such men as were rejected by the medical examiner or mustering officer: Provided, That no reimbursement shall be made for the transportation of any man who did not present himself for enrollment in the Volunteer Army of the United States as provided by law: And provided further, That the provisions of this section shall apply also to payments made by the governor of any State or Territory for the actual transportation of individual volunteers who presented themselves for enrollment in the Volunteer Army of the United States and who were rejected by the medical examiner or mustering officer.

"SEC. 3. That nothing in said act of July 6, 1898, shall be so construed as to prohibit the reimbursement of the governor of any State or Territory for reasonable expenses incurred and paid for the subsistence of the members of any organization of the organized militia or National Guard of his State or Territory after having been called out by the governor on or after April 25, 1898: Provided, That such organization shall afterwards have been accepted into the Volunteer Army of the United States.

"SEC. 4. That the expenses incurred and paid by the governors of States in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be reimbursed and paid to them, notwithstanding any unsettled accounts, claims, or indebtedness of the United States against their States, and without prejudice to such unsettled accounts: And provided further, That where any officer of the Army detailed as mustering officer of volunteers, or commander of a company or companies, or troop or troops, or battery, or battalion, or regiment, or brigade, has purchased supplies or equipments for the comfort of the men in camp or rendezvous, and said supplies were used and equipments were subsequently taken into the United States service by said volunteers, and no receipts given to such military officer, the certificate to that effect of the governor of the State or Territory to which the volunteers belonged shall be held sufficient to authorize the settlement of such account on investigation, if the Treasury Department shall be satisfied of the fact of such purchase of such equipments and supplies, and such use of such supplies, or such taking of such equipments into the United States service, and the voucher or vouchers of said officers be produced by said governor.

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the just and proper account or claim of any railroad, transportation company, or person for transportation of men or troops from place of enrollment to point of rendezvous, furnished at the request of the Quartermaster-General of the Army or his agents, or at the request of any United States mustering officer or other officer authorized by the Secretary of War to enroll, muster, or mobilize volunteers for the war with Spain; and also to pay such just and proper accounts as may be presented for transportation back from point of rendezvous to place of enrollment of men who volunteered and were rejected by the medical examiner or mustering officer: Provided, That the amount allowed and paid for such transportation shall not be in excess of the rates charged for transporting troops of the United States under like circumstances.

"All claims under the provision of this act must be filed in the office of the Auditor for the War Department, and must be supported by proper vouchers or other conclusive evidence of interest.

"SEC. 6. That all claims for reimbursement under this act or the act of July 8, 1898, shall be presented in itemized form to the Treasury Department on or before January 1, 1900, or be forever barred."

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of obtaining an explanation, I ask for a second.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, a second will be considered as ordered. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. DOCKERY. I simply ask the gentleman to make an explanation.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is in the interest of every State of the Union. In 1861 an act was passed which allowed a settlement between the General Government and the States on putting in volunteers. In that act is found the following language:

For troops employed in aiding in suppressing the present insurrection.

So that the act was not applicable to the war with Spain. Then, in July, 1898, Congress passed an act containing the following language:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the governor of any State or Territory, or to his duly authorized agents, the reasonable costs, charges, and expenses that have been incurred by him in aiding the United States to raise the Volunteer Army in the existing war with Spain, by subsisting, clothing, supplying, equipping, paying, and transporting men of his State or Territory who were afterwards accepted into the Volunteer Army of the United States.

You notice the language of that act, "have already been expended." That is to the 29th of June, 1898, and no expenses incurred by the governor after that comes under this act. Now, then, the act of 1898 did not cover the necessary expenses of putting men in the field,

Under the act of 1898 the States of Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Maine, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, South Carolina, Ohio, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Wyoming, Arizona, Oklahoma, and the Indian Territory filed their claims at the War Department.

Mr. HOPKINS. Under the law of——

Mr. MAHON. Under the act of 1898. The amount of the claims filed aggregates $2,066,172.11. Under that act the Treasury Department was only enabled to settle claims amounting to $496,881.61. One-half of the States have not received anything.

Mr. HOPKINS. Why could they not settle?

Mr. MAHON. Because the act did not cover all the expenditures made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to call attention here to the fact that I find on the sixth page of the bill, at line 12, the following:

That compensation, at the rate paid to officers and soldiers in the Regular Army, shall be allowed to the States and governors of States as pay to such volunteers and Naval Reserves as appeared and remained at the place of muster and were afterwards received into the service, for the period between the date of assembly at the rendezvous and the date on which they were mustered in.

Now, as I understand that, a company of militia or any number of militia called out by the governor of a State, taken to the State capital and there camped, retained there for a number of days before being mustered in, are now to be paid by the United States, and they are to be paid, as this bill provides, the pay of the Regular Army, which is about 52 cents a day. I have a statement that more than one-half of the States have already been reimbursed at the rate that the militia of the State is paid, which in my State is $2 a day. If that be true, it would be a most inequitable procedure to now limit the amount to the pay of the Regular Army.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. To what section of the bill does the gentleman allude?

Mr. GROSVENOR. To the provision beginning at line 12 on page 6 of the bill. I have a note here stating that over one-half of the States have already been paid at the rate of the State compensation, which in my State is $2 a day. Now, if that be true, we are now cutting down these unsettled accounts of that character to 52 cents.

Mr. MAHON. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that this was put in by the Senate. Some of the States have no law on that subject whatever. Their militia, when they go into camp, do so without pay, and they have no law on the subject. The States differ as to the amount they pay to their National Guard. This pays them from the time they reached the rendezvous until they were enrolled into the United States service and became United States soldiers the same rate paid United States soldiers. I will say that we could not ascertain what each State paid its militia.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If this bill passes it will go into conference, I understand.

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then it is not worth while taking further time, because it can be settled in conference.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. There are other matters, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, that will also probably be corrected in conference.

Mr. MAHON. The committee could not get at the data as to what the different States paid, and the committee thought they had better let it remain as it was in the Senate bill, and after getting the proper information in conference correct it there.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to have the information before the House is called upon to legislate about a matter of this importance, that takes millions out of the Treasury?

Mr. MAHON. If any gentleman asks unanimous consent to strike this provision out of the bill, I will not object.

Mr. ROBBINS. But there ought to be some provision in the bill as to the rate to be paid.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That would be worse, because some of the States have already been paid at the rate at which they pay their own militia.

Mr. HOPKINS. The point I was trying to make is that, according to the gentleman's confession, the committee is not prepared to bring the full information to the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Would it not be better to let the bill be passed and go to conference?

Mr. LANHAM. This can all be corrected in conference. All the States are interested.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is no reason why sufficient data should not be presented here, so that every member can vote intelligently on every paragraph of the bill at the time he is asked to do so. The proposition here is to let it go to conference and let the conferees gather the statistics and prepare the bill and have us accept it afterwards. That is not a part of the functions of the committee of conference.

Mr. DALZELL. I understand the passage of this bill would foreclose the claim of any State not included in it?

Mr. MAHON. No; this is a bill to cover all the States.

Mr. DALZELL. Is there no limitation as to what claims are to be presented?

Mr. ROBBINS. The bill limits the pay our soldiers shall receive and the amount that they shall pay. We paid our soldiers from Pennsylvania $1.50 a day. In Pennsylvania we have already paid out over $300,000 as expenses of assembling our National Guard.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the bill should pass in its present form and go to a committee of conference, the defect which gentlemen undertake to point out could be remedied by an amendment of two or three lines saying that the refund shall be on the ratio or basis of the accounts paid by the several States.

Mr. DALZELL. How could a committee of conference have jurisdiction of that question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think such an amendment might be incorporated by a committee of conference.

Mr. HOPKINS. Not at all. It would be impossible for a conference committee to remedy the fatal defect in the bill which the gentleman having charge of it now admits to exist.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, this substitute has been gone over very carefully upon consultation with the Comptroller and Auditor of the Treasury Department, who handle these accounts. As to the question which the gentleman from Illinois presents, they express no opinion one way or the other; they regard that as a matter entirely for Congress.

A bill of this kind, providing for the payment of these enormous expenses growing out of the war, should be right at the threshold carefully guarded. We have amended the bill so as to conform to the precedents growing out of the civil war, when the accounts in connection with the assembling of nearly 4,000,000 volunteers were settled in the Treasury Department.

The Senate bill provided for the payment of expenses "incurred." This substitute insists that before accounts for any expenses by the governors of the States shall be audited at the Treasury Department the money upon those accounts must actually have been paid out. That provision has been adopted for this reason: If you once throw open the gates and depart from the precedents established in the civil war; if you allow settlement of expenses which have been incurred by the State officers but not settled by them, you disable the officers of the Treasury Department from enforcing that great safeguard which they ought to be empowered to enforce—that is, that the governors of the States presenting their claims shall present them in itemized form and with vouchers showing payment. If a requirement of this kind is insisted upon, the governors of the States will be very careful not to pay any claim not warranted by law.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I should like to ask the gentleman what is the purpose of the provision barring all claims of this kind after the 1st of January next?

Mr. MAHON. The reason of that provision is this: In the settlement of accounts of this kind growing out of the civil war, under the act of 1861, which provided reimbursement for "expenses incurred," the Treasury Department had a great deal of trouble, running through years, with the governors who objected to the requirement that they should produce vouchers showing that the amounts claimed had been paid. This bill has been amended so as to avoid any difficulty of that kind and to make it clear beyond question that the governors of the States must produce vouchers.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is all right; let them be required to produce their vouchers, but what difference does it make whether that be done this year or next year?

Mr. MAHON. In the recent war there were only 275,000 volunteers, the great State of New York furnishing at the outside only twenty-odd thousand. There is no reason why the governor of any State should not be able to present his claim within one year, and if he does not present it in that time, it is reasonable that it should be barred.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. This bill does not allow a year.

Mr. MAHON. Under this bill there will be plenty of time.

Mr. ROBBINS. Suppose a State legislature in session during the present winter should fail to make provision to enable the governor to pay these claims, and then suppose that the legislature meets biennially and there is no meeting of the legislature for two years, such a State would find its claims barred under this bill.

Mr. MAHON. Officers of the Treasury Department do not care what action the legislature may have taken. If the governor comes with his vouchers from the colonel of the regiment, or other officer, in proper form to be audited at the Treasury Department, the Department can issue the warrants for payment, the vouchers being filed at the Department. The matter then becomes one between the governor and the men with whom he is dealing—his own constituents. In this respect the requirement of this bill is similar to that of the pension law—not a pensioner on our rolls can draw his pension at the Treasury of the United States until he has placed his voucher receipted on file.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is perfectly proper; we are not finding any fault with that; what we object to is the limitation that requires these claims to be filed before the 1st of January next.

Mr. MAHON. We are simply following the suggestion of the men who are to make these accounts; they say the time allowed will be ample; there is no reason why any governor should not present his accounts within that time.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And there is no reason for barring the accounts if he does not present them within the time.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] does not fully answer the suggestion of his colleague [Mr. ROBBINS], because in line 20, section 3, the word used is "reimbursement," which supposes the governor to have made payment.

Mr. MAHON. It is not presumed that the governor has paid out the money or has not. The Treasury Department has no controversy with the governor about that.

Mr. HOPKINS. But under that section the Treasury Department can not repay the money to the governor unless he has already paid the bills; if he has made payment, he is to be reimbursed. That is the language of the bill.

Mr. MAHON. And he produces the vouchers.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, take this condition: Suppose the governor has not paid them.

Mr. MAHON. I will answer the gentleman by reading from the report of the committee, which covers fully the point he has been making.

Mr. OTJEN. Section 4 would seem to cover that point——

Mr. MAHON. The act of 1861 covers precisely a similar condition of affairs and uses this language——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey (interrupting). Section 4, to which the gentleman refers, reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That the expenses incurred and paid by the governors of States in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be reimbursed and paid to them, notwithstanding any unsettled accounts, claims, or indebtedness of the United States against their States, and without prejudice to such unsettled accounts: And provided further, That where any officer of the Army detailed as mustering officer of volunteers, or commander of a company or companies, or troop or troops, or battery, or battalion, or regiment, or brigade, has purchased supplies or equipments for the comfort of the men in camp or rendezvous, and said supplies were used and equipments were subsequently taken into the United States service by said volunteers, and no receipts given to such military officer, the certificate to that effect of the governor of the State or Territory to which the volunteers belonged shall be held sufficient to authorize the settlement of such account on investigation, if the Treasury Department shall be satisfied of the fact of such purchase of such equipments and supplies, and such use of such supplies, or such taking of such equipments into the United States service, and the voucher or vouchers of said officers be produced by said governor.

Mr. HOPKINS. But I submit that does not meet the condition I have suggested.

Mr. MAHON. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, the act of 1861 covers the case exactly. It provides for the payment to the governor of any State, or its duly authorized agent, of the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such State in connection with the civil war.

Now, what did the Treasury Department do under that act? They made the following rules and regulations, in accordance with the act of 1861, which provided for these payments as to how they should be determined and what claims should be considered. The following rulings were made by the Department, to which I wish to call your special attention:

IV. Bills of particulars, with dates and rate of charge and the receipt of the party to whom payment was made, must, in all cases, be furnished. It is not sufficient to show that a gross amount was expended; still less that sums were turned over to individuals to expend, without evidence showing that they were expended by them and how they were expended. In short, original vouchers for expenditures of every description must be furnished. The expenditures should be classified, and separate abstracts, with the vouchers, presented for pay, subsistence, clothing, transportation, arms, and equipments, and other expenses; and they should also designate, as far as practicable, the particular regiment or corps on account of which the expenditure was incurred. Claims for pay of troops must be accompanied with complete pay rolls for each corps, properly certified and receipted, the same as are required in the regular service.

Now, it will be seen from this citation that these conditions are required before the claim could be considered at all.

Mr. HOPKINS. But if the gentleman will permit me, I think he misapprehends the point made by his colleague from Pennsylvania. According to the reading of the bill it must first appear to the accounting officer of the Treasury Department that the governor had paid the soldiers their transportation and all of the items which were read from the paragraph of the bill by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Now, suppose the legislature of the State of Illinois, which meets only every second year, fails to provide money by which the governor can make these payments; the State could not be paid under this bill.

Mr. MAHON. Then of course your remedy will be by an application to the Treasury Department, and a statement of the facts——

Mr. HOPKINS. But why put such a limitation in the bill at all?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Why not strike out the words "paid by"——

Mr. MAHON. I will state to the gentleman, if he will allow me to proceed, the reasons. These words were not in the act of 1861, but simply the word "incurred."

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH (interrupting). Or why not make it a year longer, to cover all ground of difficulty?

Mr. MAHON. If I can be permitted to proceed, Mr. Speaker, I will try to explain the reasons.

Mr. LANHAM. Let me interrupt the gentleman for a single suggestion. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania would insert the words "incurred or paid" in the section in controversy, would it not meet the objection which has been urged?

Mr. MAHON. I have no objection, of course, to making the bill absolutely specific, but I do not see the necessity.

Mr. LANHAM. If you consent to the insertion of the word "or" instead of "and" in the paragraph, so as to read "or paid," it seems to me it would meet the objection. Now, certainly, these expenses ought to be paid, whether they were incurred by the governor or not.

Mr. MAHON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this list of over $3,000,000, only about $400,000 worth of which is represented by proper vouchers. These claims have been in the Department since last July. The Treasury Department will not, and should not, pay a dollar out of the Treasury until the governors produce the proper vouchers.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman will understand——

Mr. MAHON. I have no objection to the gentleman's suggestion, but we can not make it here under suspension of the rules. I am perfectly willing that the conferees, whoever they may be, shall change that.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not want to embarrass the passage of this bill, but if a governor has not had an appropriation made by his legislature, and he does not happen to have the means himself, why, he would not pay these bills and therefore he would be barred.

Mr. MAHON. In a great many of the States the governors have already provided the money in some way and paid these claims.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] desire to be heard in opposition?

Mr. DOCKERY. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire any more time?

Mr. MAHON. I only want a few minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MAHON. I just want to say that the governor of South Carolina has provided this money——

Mr. DALZELL. I should like to see whether I understand this or not. Suppose the governor of Pennsylvania does not pay the expenses incurred until after the 1st day of January, 1900, then is not the Pennsylvania claim under this act forever barred?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; but why should he not file his vouchers before that time?

Mr. DALZELL. Suppose the governor has not had the opportunity to pay, has not had the means to pay. Suppose he has not paid the expenses incurred by the Pennsylvania troops, for whatever cause, until after the 1st day of January, 1900. Of course, he could not file a claim for reimbursement in itemized form, and would not the claim of Pennsylvania, under those circumstances, be forever barred under the language of your act, under section 6?

Mr. MAHON. I want to explain the method of settlement.

Mr. HOPKINS. Explain your bill. That is better.

Mr. MAHON. I will explain it, if gentlemen will give me a chance. It is the business of the governor to produce his itemized accounts and vouchers properly receipted.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And paid.

Mr. DALZELL. He can not present the vouchers until he has paid the money.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. No.

Mr. MAHON. Why not?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not suppose any man is going to receipt for money which he has not been paid.

Mr. MAHON. Do not the pensioners send in their vouchers two weeks ahead of receiving their money?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, that is a different case.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is not right to ask a man to sign a receipt until he is paid.

Mr. DALZELL. Under the terms of this bill, the money must be paid and vouchers presented before the 1st day of January, 1900, or the claim will be barred.

Mr. MAHON. How much time do you want?

Mr. HOPKINS. Extend the time two years.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Can we amend by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the bill can be amended by unanimous consent.

Mr. MAHON. I will ask unanimous consent to insert the words "and one" after the words "nineteen hundred." That will give them ample time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to amend the last clause on page 10 of the substitute. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after "hundred" the words "and one."

Mr. HOPKINS. Make it "and two."

Mr. MAHON. Make it "and two."

Mr. HOPKINS. That is better.

The amendment as modified was read by the Clerk, as follows:

After the word "hundred" insert the words "and two."

Mr. MAHON. The legislatures will all be in session before that time expires.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman if he will not ask unanimous consent to have another amendment placed upon this bill? In several States the governors have not paid these bills, they have only stood as sureties, and the word "reimburse" does not cover the ground. Would it not be well to use the word "payment" so as to cover the States where the governors have not actually paid the bills?

Mr. MAHON. I will state to the gentleman from South Carolina that the claim of his State is only $7,000, and this amendment now allows your legislature ample time to give the governor all the money he needs. It allows them nearly three years, so that there will be no trouble about it.

Mr. TALBERT. It seems to me that would not alter the effect of the bill in any particular. It does not answer it at all. The question is, How are you going to reimburse where the bills have not been filed?

Mr. MAHON. I insist that they ought to be paid before the Treasury pays them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman to allow an amendment to the bill in lines 12 and 13, on the sixth page, in the first section of the bill, by striking out the words "Regular Army" and inserting the words "National Guard of such State;" so that it will read in the first section: "That the compensation at the rate paid the officers and soldiers of the National Guard of such State shall be allowed to the State," etc.

Mr. MAHON. I want to call the gentleman's attention——

Mr. HOPKINS. What change does that make in the paying?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It makes a difference between where a State pays $2 and where 52 cents is paid.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the gentleman think that a fair proposition?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The payment has been made in over half of them. I am informed by the Auditor that over half of the States have settled, and have been paid their money on that basis.

Mr. MORRIS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. MORRIS. Under your amendment which you propose, if the State of Michigan or the State of Ohio should pay a private soldier $5 a day for the time, would he get from the United States Treasury $5 a day for the time between the time of the rendezvous and the muster?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is just what we have done.

Mr. MORRIS. And if the State of Minnesota only paid its soldiers $15 a month, the same as the Regular Army receive, the State of Minnesota would be able to draw back only what it has paid. Any State, under such arrangement, could afford to be generous to its volunteers; under those circumstances some States might give their volunteers $10 a day.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not care anything about it, but over half the States have already drawn their pay on the basis of $2 a day.

Mr. MORRIS. Put it not to exceed $2 a day.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the highest pay in the United States.

Mr. MORRIS. Put it to not exceed $2 a day.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am willing to put it at that.

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit a suggestion?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOODY. I suggest the only legal name of any body of troops the States are permitted to use is the "militia."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Nearly all these States call it by law the "National Guard."

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I call for order. We can not hear a word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again call the House to order.

Mr. MOODY. My suggestion——

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the gentleman from Ohio know what States have been paid?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; but I have a note saying over half of them have been paid on that basis.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think what the Regular Army is paid ought to be allowed. I am told by my colleague that Illinois pays $2 to her soldiers.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And she has got her pay. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. And it ought to be limited, so that the Government of the United States does not have to pay any more.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That ought to have been so in the first instance, but a great many other wrongs got into this scheme, such as the taking of the old equipments, the old tents, the old guns, and dumping them on the General Government, and then drawing payment for them on the basis of some former cost.

Mr. HOPKINS. Under this practice a State can pay $60 a month to its soldiers, and when the volunteers go into war they get $17.50 a month.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is right; that is the trouble. I am representing nothing except an equitable proposition that has come to me. I think the State of Ohio has received her pay, which is $2 a day, from the General Government.

Mr. MAHON. No, sir; not from the General Government. Your State has got no money.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It has settled.

Mr. MAHON. Yes; Ohio got something over $68,000.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio, Is the purpose of your amendment to make it $2 a day?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. That is about the average cost of a Filipino for the whole period of his life. [Laughter.] I think that is what has been estimated. [Renewed laughter.] I think we ought to make this equal and let it be uniform throughout the United States. I have had a little experience in this business myself, and I have never learned yet that one soldier was worth more than another per capita, where they were properly handled; and I think we ought to act upon this same basis. Therefore I do not think it would be right to say that one State should receive a dollar and a half a day for its volunteers, another $2, and another, when no provision is made at all about the amount to be paid, should be relegated to the pay of a regular soldier.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But, as the gentleman suggests, this is an equitable settlement of this claim as between the Government and the State when over half of the States have already drawn their pay at the rate which they pay their militia at home.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I would make it equitable and fair upon all States alike and to pay to the governor the same amount that is paid to any other State.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, how are you going to do it now? We have paid several of the States in the ratios I have named. How are you going to do it?

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. If these States have all gotten their pay, I do not think it right for them to come in here and make a virtue of it by posing before the country and asking to be reimbursed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I care nothing about it, but I do not like to see one State pay $2 a day and another State only 52 cents.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Then we agree on the general proposition, which is that, so far as the Government is concerned, the pay should be uniform.

Mr. MORRIS. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me a suggestion?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. MORRIS. I suggest this amendment to the bill, that "compensation at the rate paid the officers and soldiers in the Regular Army, and no more, shall be allowed."

Mr. MAHON. That is what the bill provides now.

Mr. MORRIS. The words "no more shall be allowed" are not in there. I would not allow another cent more, and if they have been paid more than that let them pay it back.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] desire to resume possession of the remainder of his time?

Mr. MAHON. I do. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that some of the States have no law on the question; they pay their militia nothing whatever. Some States pay $1.50 a day and some $2 a day. Now, my State is as much interested in the matter as any one else. The committee took the position that the minute a man was enrolled as a United States soldier he should have the pay of a United States soldier. During the great civil war the citizens of some of our great States paid for bounties to volunteers as high as from $300 to $900, and have never yet been reimbursed, and certainly these great patriotic States and governors can afford to accept in payment what is paid the United States officer and soldier. I can not see any other way to make this bill uniform. If it can be done, I will not object. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT].

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be amended on page 6 by striking out the word "reimbursement" and inserting the word "payment," and on page 7, line 8, page 7, line 20, and on page 8, line 6, and wherever it occurs, so as to conform to the first amendment. My reason for this is that in a number of States the governors have not paid these bills in accordance with instructions. They have gone ahead and bought supplies and are now sureties for these bills, and I do not think this amendment will alter the force and effect of the bill at all to allow these to come in and conform to the conditions where the bills have not been paid.

Mr. MAHON. I can not consent to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the committee that reported this bill, although I did not concur in it in all respects. The end sought to be attained had my aid and support, and I voted to favorably report the bill. The facts of the case have been well stated by the chairman of the committee. Under the law of 1898 a number of States could not be reimbursed for the expenses they have been put to. Take my own State; there was neither authority of law nor was there an appropriation made by the State for the purpose of paying expenses incurred in providing for the soldiers.

This bill undertakes to cure that defect and reimburse the States for payments made. I offered an amendment in the committee to strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or" where the words "incurred and paid" occurs, because a number of States had incurred this indebtedness but had not paid it. The majority of the committee believed that the Treasurer, under the provisions of this bill, would have authority to pay these claims, notwithstanding they had not been paid. I yielded to that view with the expectation that in another forum, a branch of this Congress, whatever errors existed in this bill might be corrected. I refer to the committee of conference that is expected to pass on the question.

It is true it never may be passed upon by the committee of conference, but it is expected that it will be, and such crudities, irregularities, and ambiguities as exist in the bill can be corrected. Gentlemen on that side have called attention to the differential in the pay of the soldiers of the several States. There were no means of reaching this accurately and therefore the bill could not state it accurately. Some of the States gave no pay to their militia; others allowed their soldiers as high as $3 a day. The fairest means we could devise was to allow them such pay as we allow the soldiers in the Regular Army.

Mr. BRUCKER. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. BRUCKER. It has been stated that some States have already been paid.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Some have been paid.

Mr. BRUCKER. On what basis?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. For expenses incurred up to the 8th day of July, 1898.

Mr. BRUCKER. Were the soldiers paid so much per day?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I can not state positively.

Mr. BRUCKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] stated that States had already been paid, and in some cases $2 a day for the soldiers.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. They were paid the expenses incurred up to the 8th of July.

Mr. BRUCKER. Does that include per diem for the soldiers?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I do not know.

Mr. BRUCKER. Why could that not be taken as a basis—take the highest pay of any soldier in any State? Why could not that be taken as a basis upon which to frame this bill?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. That might have been taken as a basis; but in order to deal uniformly and fairly with all the States we took as a basis the pay allowed a soldier in the Regular Army.

Mr. BRUCKER. I understand that the States that have already been paid have not been paid on that basis, but have been paid at the rate paid by the State to the State militia.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The gentleman may be correct; I can not dispute his statement; I am disposed to think it is true.

Mr. BRUCKER. If that statement is true, a soldier in any one of the States ought to be worth as much to the Government as a soldier coming from any other State.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. It is my understanding that the State of Ohio pays her soldiers $2 per day while in camp or rendezvous, and the State of Texas does not pay her soldiers anything.

Mr. SLAYDEN. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. My understanding, like that of my colleague, is that in Texas we pay nothing to our volunteers while in camp or rendezvous. That being so, under this bill as now drawn, the volunteers from our State, as I understand, will be paid nothing from the time of their assembling at rendezvous until they were actually mustered in and received as soldiers by the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. My colleague is correct, except that under the provisions of this bill they will be paid at the same rate as soldiers of the Regular Army.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it mandatory that they be paid at that rate? Does not the bill say that they shall only be paid at the rate allowed by the State to its militia?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The pay is to be the same as that allowed soldiers of the Regular Army.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield the one minute I have remaining to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY].

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote against this bill, because it does not seem equitable and just as between the States. If we undertake to repay the States what they have expended in raising soldiers, we ought to repay to each State the exact amount thus expended. If a State has expended, as my State has, in the payment of its volunteers, $1.50 a day each for the time they were in camp before mustering into the service of the United States, that State should receive in repayment $1.50 a day for each soldier. But if a State—Texas, for instance—has paid nothing in this way, it should receive nothing. Where nothing has been expended there is no place for repayment.

Again, if the State of Ohio has paid to her soldiers $2 a day, in good faith, while they were in rendezvous, Ohio should receive back the $2 thus paid out. As this bill can not be amended, under this motion to suspend the rules, I shall vote against it, hoping that a bill may be brought in here that will carry out what I regard as simple justice. If we start out on the principle of paying back to the States what they have expended in raising soldiers for the National Government, there is no difficulty in getting at an equitable basis. We have simply to find out what the States have honestly expended and return that amount to the State treasuries. For the reason stated, I shall vote against the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the Senate bill with the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the amendment unanimously agreed to by the House.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 155, noes 15.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the bill as amended was passed.

PAYMENT OF $20,000,000 TO SPAIN.

Mr. CANNON. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12125) making an appropriation to carry out the obligations of the treaty between the United States and Spain concluded December 10, 1898.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purpose of carrying out the obligations of the treaty between the United States and Spain concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, A. D. 1898, to become immediately available upon the exchange of the ratifications of said treaty, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask——

The SPEAKER. Is there a second demanded on the motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. DOCKERY. For the purpose of debate and amendment, I demand a second.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

Mr. DOCKERY. Pending that, I ask the gentleman from Illinois to consent to the offering of an amendment declaring the policy of the United States in respect to the Philippine Islands. [Cries of "Oh, no!" and "Regular order!"]

Mr. CANNON. Having made this motion by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I have no power to assent to the gentleman's request. I could not if I would, and I may go further and say I would not if I could.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. He says that, acting under the direction of the committee, he can not consent to the request of the gentleman from Missouri. Does he mean to say that the Committee on Appropriations instructed him not to agree to this request?

Mr. CANNON. No. The committee instructed me to move the passage of the bill which has just been read.

Mr. BAILEY. But the committee gave you no instructions about the other.

Mr. CANNON. Under that instruction I could not submit to the offering of an amendment if I would, and I suppose I might go further and say that I would not if I could.

Mr. BAILEY. I know that is true.

The SPEAKER. Is a second considered as ordered?

Mr. PAYNE. I hope we shall get along with the debate.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from Illinois means to be understood that by direction of the majority of the committee he objects to the amendment? He does not mean all the committee?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly; a majority.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then, do I understand the gentleman to decline to accept the amendment?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. You ought to understand it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Under the rules of the House is it in order to offer an amendment to this proposition?

The SPEAKER. It is not. Is a second considered as ordered?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I demand the appointment of tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will take their places as tellers. As many favoring ordering a second will pass between the tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 157, noes 11.

Accordingly a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I ventured to prophesy that under the rules of the House, a little later on the House would have an opportunity to make the appropriation, if it saw proper to do so, of $20,000,000, under the treaty of Paris, payable after the treaty was ratified. The Committee on Appropriations considered a bill referred to it and directed its chairman to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill. At this time I do not desire to say anything further about it. In my judgment, nine-tenths of the House stand ready to pass the bill. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to read at the desk the amendment which I desired to offer to the bill and which was objected to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in charge of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, and the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands and asserts its determination, when a stable and independent government shall have been erected in said islands, entitled, in the judgment of the Government of the United States, to recognition as such, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights secured under the cession by Spain and thereupon to leave the government and control of said islands to the people thereof.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, the section which has just been reported at the desk is a combination of what are known as the McEnery and Bacon resolutions, and I now ask unanimous consent of the House to offer that section as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has had it read in his time. I would not desire to cut him off from such reading if I could. Further I can not go. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does the Chair hold that to be an objection? The Chair has not submitted the request.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to submit a request for unanimous consent where an objection has already been made.

Mr. DOCKERY. I accept the judgment of the Chair, but in my opinion the amendment should be incorporated as an additional section of the bill. The United States should declare its policy without further delay.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the amendment, and think that we have made a great mistake—that the Administration has made a great mistake. In the first place, the declaration of war contained a notice that we would not fight this war for the purpose of acquiring territory. That went to the civilized world. When we got over into the Philippine Islands, we found a great insurrection of the inhabitants in progress against the Spanish Government, a common foe. Our people went at once to forming an alliance with the insurgents. Our representatives consulted with the leaders of the insurgents. We armed and furnished them with ammunition.

We accepted their services in breaking the power of Spain in the Philippine Islands. The natives understood that we had gone to war not for the acquisition of territory, but to break the shackles of human oppression and to extend liberty. Understanding that, and we forming an alliance with them, they had every reason on earth to believe that we intended to free them as we did the people of Cuba. But what did we do? The moment we got possession of the islands, instead of treating them kindly, we denied them the right to use their own flag.

We denied them the right to negotiate with us as a tribe or people. We denied them any privileges except as obedient subjects of the United States, and at once made them suspicious of us. We made them believe—indeed, convinced them—that our object was not to give them liberty, but to take from them the control of a weak power that they had been in revolution against for a quarter of a century, and to put over them a stronger power; in other words, a mere change of masters. Now, the President of the United States, in Boston the other night, said that Congress was the power that ought to fix the relation of the Philippines.

If that be so, I want to say that Congress ought, at the first possible moment, to say to the Filipinos, "We do not want your country; we do not want what you possess; we want to give you liberty; we want to give you self-government," and stop all bloodshed and this enormous expense. If we had said that in the beginning, if we had said to the Filipinos, "We come as friends," if we had extended to them the hand of friendship, had insisted on their forming a government, we should not have had the bloodshed that is daily reported through the papers. And I want to say to you that before midsummer the Philippine Islands will become a great burial ground of American citizens. Who is responsible for it? The men will be responsible for it who did not treat with the chiefs representing the different tribes. They say that Aguinaldo is unfit to be trusted or considered.

The other day there returned from the Philippine Islands one of the staff officers of General Otis, the brilliant young Capt. Samuel Belford, who was invited to address the people in one of the great churches of the city of Denver. He stated to those people that he had visited Aguinaldo at his house, that he had had numerous conferences with him, and he says that the people of the Philippine Islands regard Aguinaldo as the father of their country as truly as the colonists of America regarded George Washington as the father of their country.

He says:

The war spirit is rampant in Manila, and one may see as many as 800 little children playing soldier and shouting at the top of their voices for General Aguinaldo.

The latter is a small man, but bright and quick, and it is folly to think of him as a light-headed fanatic. He should be treated with respect. He has great magnetism, and is looked upon as the father of his country.

The partisan press, purporting to represent the President, has stated from time to time that Aguinaldo was ignored by the soldiers and was seeking to sell out—a mere thing of barter.

Who taught the lower tribes of this country the idea of barter? There never has been a treaty with an Indian tribe during my recollection for a sale or change of their reservation that this Government did not bribe the chiefs; not only that, but they have bribed them in times of peace in order to keep them at peace. Why should not Spain be expected to follow our exalted example and bribe the chief of the Philippine tribes, as has become the habit of superior nations when dealing with inferior ones?

Is it preferable to go at them with shot and shell and exterminate them?

The partisan press, assuming to voice the sentiments of the War

Department, have boasted of the fact that General Otis was without instructions and would apply his Indian tactics to the Filipinos and give them a merciless thrashing in the very beginning.

There has been no attempt to extend the olive branch of peace to this unfortunate people or to offer to deal with them on the theory that they had any rights as a people or nation, but they were treated as though we had a right to buy them and Spain a right to sell them. This same question was fought to a finish in the rebellion in the United States, and our people had a right to believe that it had been settled for all time. The same issue was involved then as now—that of self-government.

Douglas contended that the white people of the Territories were admitted to be good enough to govern themselves, but that Mr. Lincoln believed them not good enough to govern a few thousand miserable negroes. Mr. Lincoln laid down the premises that when the white man governed himself, that was self-government; but when he governed himself and also another man, that was more than self-government—that was despotism.

The people of the United States established the doctrine of Lincoln by the sword, and the contention of this Administration is nothing less than the old Southern doctrine before the rebellion. It is a return to human slavery, though it be a political instead of a personal slavery.

Take the dispatches this morning from Havana and from San Juan, and the natives are asking this question, "Are we to pay for the services of the United States soldiers to misrepresent and make our conditions worse?" That is a question that I want to ask. Who is to pay the expenses of these soldiers in the Philippine and West India islands? The President may go down in history as a cruel and merciless warrior, but never as a sagacious financier.

It is heartrending to read the dispatches from day to day describing the mowing down of this half-civilized people on their soil in the Philippines, including women and children, the burning of their churches, convents, houses, etc. It is a crime to require the splendid young manhood of this country to be sacrificed unnecessarily in this distant land. It may seem brave and chivalrous for the President and the generals who stand on secure ground and command the young men of this country to follow these unfortunate natives into the tropical jungles with every chance of their destruction by bullet or climate.

It is absurd folly to attempt to deal with the people of Cuba, Porto Rico, or the Philippine Islands as though they were capable of appreciating or adapting our form of government, and the longer our soldiers remain in Cuba or any of these other islands the more difficult it will be to withdraw. Every time our soldiers kill a native or destroy their property or churches they add to the flame of hate that is now being engendered in every part of these possessions. On the 19th instant the mayor and the majority of the municipal council of San Juan tendered their resignations, declaring that it was impossible for them to work with the Americans.

The newspapers of the Spanish and Cuban sympathizers in Havana agree in stating that the—> United States sends men ignorant of the country's customs and needs and of the economical situation, whose first impressions will be acted upon at Washington. * * * Before we are taxed we should be informed if Cuba is to pay the expenses of the army of occupation. * * * If Cuba is not given scope to exercise her abilities for self-government, how can she advance, and how prove that she is able to govern herself?

We have certainly gotten into a comedy of errors that will bring sore regret upon the people generally of this nation. It has been the hope that we might maintain the manhood of this country for peaceable pursuits. Those who return from these distant islands will have their veins filled with the poisonous virus common to the inhabitants. As for me, I think the whole affair has been a craze brought on by those interested and by the English Government—not for the good of the masses of our people. [Applause.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER]. As I do not see him, I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRUCKER].

Mr. BRUCKER. Mr. Speaker, if this proposition to pay Spain $20,000,000 came to this House as an independent one for us to adopt or reject, I should certainly cast my vote against its payment. But we are simply asked to appropriate and pay this large sum of money, $20,000,000, to fulfill and carry out our treaty and contract obligations with Spain, and the question of amount and payment, as far as this House is concerned, is a "closed incident."

Our sole and lawfully constituted agents under the Constitution, the President of the United States and the Senate—the treaty-making power—have supreme and absolute authority and jurisdiction in the premises, with no right to question or appeal therefrom on the part of this House, and they having entered into this treaty, having ratified the treaty, having agreed absolutely to bind this country to the payment of this sum, there is nothing left for the House to do but to put its hands into the National Treasury and "shell out and pay." Were the proposition an independent one for this House to decide to pay Spain this money or not, I should never give my consent to its payment.

We are paying to his young Majesty the King of Spain $20,000,000 for what? "Absolutely nothing;" for a quitclaim to nothing. We do not acquire a foot of territory by the payment of this vast sum of money, but at the same time we are buying a war which will cost us many millions more before we are through with it. My judgment is that the stipulation in the treaty to pay Spain this sum of money should never have been a part of the treaty. My judgment is that we should have kept this money and with it taken care of the widows and orphans, made so by this war for humanity's sake. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to use a part of his time.

Mr. CANNON. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. MOODY. The only use that I personally shall make of the time yielded to me is to state that my colleague [Mr. MCCALL], who for some time has been detained from the House by illness, desires to have it stated that if present he would vote against the appropriation. I need not say that I do not agree with him in that position. I do not feel the necessity of justifying by any speech the vote that I am about to give, and I now yield the balance of my time to my colleague [Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts].

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote in favor of this bill because I believe that it is an honest obligation of this Government, but I very much regret that the parliamentary situation does not allow any amendments and that we can make no declaration of our policy in the new territory. I introduced a bill at the same time the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] introduced this one, which had a section declaring that when the Filipinos were fit for self-government we would give it to them, but I suppose that sleeps in the wastebasket of the Committee on Appropriations.

That committee, by the way, has not, in my opinion, properly jurisdiction over this bill, which belongs to the Committee on Foreign Affairs both by the letter and spirit of the rule; but that is a matter of little importance. What is of importance is that this has been ingeniously brought up in such a way that no amendment is in order. The passage of this bill is probably the last opportunity for any binding resolution as to the future of the Philippines. We all declare that we took them not from greed but from humanity.

I believe that the controlling motive which influenced the American people in desiring the acquisition was not selfishness, but an unwillingness to leave them to the oppression of Spain. But if that is our real motive, we ought, in justice to ourselves, to the Philippines, and to our standing before the world, to say so in some way which should bind us in the future. I do not see why we should shrink from it. Until we do that we can not complain if our sincerity is doubted. Now is our opportunity—probably the only one—and a rule of the House is invoked to prevent us. I do not think we ought to boast much of the purity of our intentions when we evade the only chance to express them in binding form.

If we had openly announced that our policy was permanent acquisition, that to the victors belong the spoils, few could criticise us. All the other great powers have ugly facts in their own past history which would prevent their throwing the first stone. But what I especially dislike is that we should expose ourselves fairly to the charge at the same time of greed and hypocrisy.

I believe that the Philippines will be a weakness and an expense to us. But I also believe that if we are to keep them for missionary purposes then our self-respect and our duty to the Filipinos demand that we should promise to release them when those purposes are fulfilled. We all believe that self-government is the best for those who are fitted for it, hence we can not consistently refuse to promise the Philippines self-government when they shall be capable.

We now claim to be acting solely for their good, but we are unwilling to let go the thing which can be used for our selfish advantage. I think the manly way and the wise way would be to declare now that we shall keep them until fit for self-government and then let them go, and not run on without any declared policy, subject always to the suspicion by other nations, and, more important, by the Filipinos themselves, that our only purpose is self-aggrandizement. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RIDGELY].

[Mr. RIDGELY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to print some further observations on this subject. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to take some time.

Mr. CANNON. I do not desire to consume time.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to inflict upon the House any views on the Philippine question. I do not think that question now before the House, but I find that I differ from some of my associates on this side of the Chamber. In the judgment of many wise men there has been but one thing to do since the signing of the treaty of Paris that concluded hostilities between the United States and Spain, and that was the ratification of that treaty. I do not think it was either necessary or wise for the Peace Commission, at the President's suggestion or without it, to put into the treaty the obligation of the United States to pay this $20,000,000.

I do not think it was wise in the President and the commissioners to insist upon the cession of the Philippine Islands. It is to be regretted that we have the Philippine problem to deal with at all. Perhaps it would have been better for the people of the United States had Dewey sailed away from Manila after the destruction of the Spanish fleet. I have wished that he had done so. And, Mr. Speaker, no man is more opposed than I am to a policy of imperialism, or to a scheme of colonization, or to the retention of the Philippine Islands.

But the approval of the treaty has never been for this House to determine. The treaty has been negotiated and been ratified. The Executive possesses this lawmaking function. Treaties made by the United States are expressly declared to be the supreme law of the land. This power is given to the President, and it has but one limitation, and that is the treaty negotiated by him shall be ratified by two-thirds of the Senate. The Government is constitutionally bound to pay this money. There is but one contingency, and that the improbable one that the Spanish Cortes will not ratify the treaty. In that event the money would not be paid.

So that, Mr. Speaker, we find the supreme law of the land requires the payment of this money. The contract to pay it, the law to pay it, have been made pursuant to constitutional methods. And that law must be obeyed or defied. If the law is bad, let those who made it meet with the censure of the American people.

It is to be regretted that the President has not had some definite policy toward the Philippines. What the President has not done in this regard furnishes much ground for just criticism. But he has correctly said in his speech at Boston that what shall be done hereafter with the Philippine Islands is now a legislative question and not an executive one. I believe it ought to be made known that the United States does not intend permanently to hold those islands, and I believe it is the duty of Congress to tender assurance to the inhabitants of the Philippines that the United States will encourage such a government there as the people of those islands desire. I stand ready to aid in such declaration.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote for this appropriation of $20,000,000, but not because I think we are buying anything. Spain was certainly unable to deliver anything, or she would not have begged us to deliver to her her prisoners, which she could not take from the Malays. If she had any title to that property, she would have gone in and taken home her own prisoners. I am willing to give her the $20,000,000 in charity, just as we have agreed to do by the action of the Senate in ratifying the treaty.

We are no longer confronted by a theory; we are facing a fact. In substance the Administration, acting as our agent, contracted for 10,000,000 human beings at $2 a head. This is cheaper than you can buy sheep in Ohio, and inasmuch as the world regards it as a debt, I am willing to pay it, notwithstanding I regret the fact that the gold-worshiping party of these United States has become so callous that it can rejoice in the purchase of slaves by the island full instead of the ship full—slaves not to pick cotton under the lash, but to pay taxes under Springfield rifles and magazine guns; slaves to relieve wealth from an income tax; slaves to justify a large standing army, so that the sons of Senators and Congressmen may wear shoulder straps and live in idleness and luxury; slaves to justify a large standing army which shall be a burden to the farmer and a menace to the liberty of the laboring classes, who have not yet forgotten how their brothers were shot in the back at Hazleton for meeting to discuss their misery, their grievances, and their rights.

Let us pay the twenty millions, not so much because the Senate has ratified the treaty, not because the President and his advisers have been swelled and puffed up with the conceit of empire, not because we could not use the twenty millions to better purpose for our own national family, but because it is the shortest and most economical route back home for the public mind. It is the shortest and most economical route by which we can divorce ourselves from foreign complications and foreign thoughts. It is the shortest and most economical route to return to the immediate consideration of the principles and purposes which inspired our ancestors to frame the Declaration of Independence and construct the Constitution of the United States.

It has been the trick of European powers to get into war with each other whenever the masses of the people began to consider and discuss the "rights of man." And so I fear in this country those who dictate the policy of this Administration became so thoroughly alarmed at the awakening which took place in 1896, and have been so much disturbed by the persistent and determined study and discussion of economic questions within our own land, that they have sought refuge temporarily from their impending fate by hiding their greedy purposes behind war clouds, hoping and preferring to involve this Republic not only in an entangling alliance with Great Britain, but also with prejudice and hostility against other nations, as well as to complicate us with oriental questions and difficulties.

Of the many thousands of years that man has struggled on earth for existence and civilization we know but little except through some brief scraps of sacred and profane history covering the last six thousand years. But all we do know teaches us that Deity himself has not been able to construct a man of heroic proportions anywhere on the face of this big round earth within 20° either north or south of the equator.

The Philippines lie between the parallels of 6 and 19 degrees from the equator; possibly MARK HANNA and William McKinley can, by shooting "benevolent assimilation" into them with 13-inch guns and by riddling them with Maxim rapid-fire and Gatling guns, do for them what God found himself too weak to do. As for myself, I have no more respect for that Christianity which projects itself through the agency of magazine guns than I have for that Mohammedanism which centuries ago carried on its process of "benevolent assimilation" with fire and sword, and recently projected itself with the insolence and arrogance of bigotry into Christian Armenia.

We have in this country one great American, William Jennings Bryan, who without any power reposed in him and without any patronage except the confidence of a great people, has formulated and declared his policy in graphic words when he said:

> I object to shooting Christianity into the Philippines with Gatling guns, first, because it does not do any good to those that are hit; and second, it keeps those who are not hit so busy burying the dead that they have neither opportunity nor time to profit by it.

If such a man were President everybody would know his policy, and the flag would not be made the dish rag of greedy syndicates and corporations who want to loot and plunder Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines.

Let us pay the twenty millions, and do it speedily and gracefully, and learn a little of philosophy at the same time. Let us feel about it as Ben Franklin did when he found that he had paid too much for the whistle. It will be money well expended if it teaches us in the future to say to ourselves as Franklin had been taught to say to himself: "Don't give too much for the whistle." And let us hereafter have Chief Executives who get their inspiration and instruction from the hearts of the people, and not from the schemes and greedy purposes of syndicates and trusts. Let us get away from wars and rumors of war, and get the public mind back to the first principles and the holy purposes of the American Republic, as set forth in the preamble of our great Constitution in these words:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity [not Philippines], do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

Let us read and learn again the full meaning of Washington's immortal words in his Farewell Address, wherein he said:

> Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. * * * In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded, and that in place of them just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. * * * Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. * * * So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils.
> Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter without adequate inducement or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld.
> The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. * * *
> Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. * * * Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice? It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world.

Neither should we ever forget that consummation and summary of political wisdom and philosophy left by Thomas Jefferson as a legacy to the American people in his first inaugural address, wherein he expressed the same thought as Washington in these immortal words:

Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations; entangling alliances with none.

What a misfortune to the names of Washington and Jefferson that they can not return to earth and have MARK HANNA and J. P. Morgan assist them in revising these addresses!

Our modern political jugglers, pretending to represent the honesty and national honor of our great Republic, persistently poison the wells of information through a subsidized press, and even a subsidized pulpit, with liberal harangues in favor of a British alliance, and at the same time instigate and poison the public mind with prejudice and hostility to Germany, until Carl Schurz, Secretary of the Interior in the Hayes Administration, recently declared as follows:

I have never witnessed a more audacious, reckless, persistent, and methodical effort to excite the public mind to hostility against a foreign nation by downright lying, artful distortion of facts, or crafty insinuation. Nor has this effort been without effect, for there are many otherwise reasonable persons in the United States who thus were made to believe, and who do believe even now, that the German Government, since the outbreak of the Spanish war, has been constantly plotting against the United States.

Every intelligent and candid man—must conclude that there has been a most outrageous attempt to gull and dupe the American people in this matter. It has been, to use a popular phrase, a bunco game of the most brazen kind, which every self-respecting American should indignantly resent as an insult to our national dignity. Most of the false or misleading stories came here through news agencies under British influence. The circumstances of the case fully authorize the belief that there were Englishmen who wished the American people to understand not only that England was the only trustworthy friend the United States had in Europe, but that other European nations were insidiously conniving against us, and that British watchfulness and power were needed to protect us against their hostility—all this to bring this Republic more and more under British influence.

Says Mr. Schurz—

It is becoming more and more apparent every day that a few men controlling the news agencies of the country may impose upon the entire Republic by falsehood with reference to conditions in remote parts of the earth and so prejudice the people that it may take years to overcome the pernicious effect and influence of the deception. How well we were warned by Washington and Jefferson against entangling alliances!

And if to the inspiration of Washington and Jefferson anything need be added that comes down to us with the solemnity and dignity of divine thought, it is contained in Lincoln's address at the dedication of Gettysburg Cemetery, on the 19th of November, 1863:

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth upon this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created free and equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But in a larger sense we can not dedicate, we can not consecrate, we can not hallow, this ground.

The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here; but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us, that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that the government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

I repeat the thought and reiterate the demand that we return to the consideration and prosecution of the great business and mission of the American Republic. Let us look after the bettering and ennobling of our own 75,000,000 of people and their posterity. Let us remember that a chain is no stronger than its weakest link, and let us remember that the Republic will be no stronger against the foreigner than our weakest and most remote island possession. And let us never forget that it was Abraham Lincoln, who had no desire for pomp or glory, who saw no hope in empire and militarism, who gave it as his judgment that—

All the armies of Europe, Asia, and Africa combined, with a Napoleon for commander, could not by force take a drink from the Ohio River or make a track on the Blue Ridge Mountains in a trial of a thousand years. If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of freemen we must live through all time or die by suicide.

For the past two years it has been conspicuous that the party which to-day arrogates to itself the name of Lincoln's party, and proclaims itself the guardian and conservator of honesty and national honor, does not dare to quote from Washington, nor Jefferson, nor Jackson, nor Lincoln, on any of the great questions which are before the American people.

And with the hope that the despotism and tyranny of a boss-ridden majority may not destroy free speech and free thought, let us turn our attention to the heathen after we have cared for our own family; let us create new pensioners after we have settled with the soldiers who saved the Union; let us Christianize the Malays after we have taught our own people not to tolerate a man in the United States Senate who secures his seat by bribery and fraud; let us Christianize the Malays after we have secured equal opportunities for the sons of the poor with the sons of the rich; let us Christianize the Malays after the business man of small means shall be restored to equal opportunities for existence with the syndicates and the trusts; let us Christianize the Malays after we have established in America that democratic doctrine of the labor organizations, "An injury to the least of us should be the concern of all of us." Let us attend to the business of the Malays when we have no business of our own.

For these reasons I want to go on record as favoring the $20,000,000 appropriation, because we can not afford to lose time quibbling about a few millions, when we can afford to spend hundreds of millions to murder Malays, instead of carrying "benevolent assimilation" to them. Why hesitate to waste these few millions while wasting so much? Let us say to the world that we do not need the money; we have money to burn. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Let us go on giving away the money of the people and tax them for more. The people who have to pay these taxes are not the people who would have to pay an income tax. Let the masses of the laborers come and fill up the Treasury, and let us pay it out. Our hope will be in the taxpayers realizing what is being done by this imperialistic Administration with the taxes which are coined from the sweat of the brow of the farmer and the mechanic. Let us go on and blow away our millions because we are about to have a new régime. We are to have a royal military establishment, and we are to teach the world how it is and what it is to have a President of the United States who is also King of Porto Rico, Czar of Cuba, and Emperor of the Philippines. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I certainly shall not occupy much time.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] would like a little more time, and I have only one minute to yield him.

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend desire me to yield him time?

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will yield him some time.

Mr. CANNON. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirteen minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri four minutes, and then I will yield to my colleague on the committee [Mr. LIVINGSTON] four minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, I have one minute, so I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, it seems to be fashionable for gentlemen to say how they intend to vote on this bill. I avail myself of this opportunity to say with great pleasure that I intend to vote against the bill, because I believe it to be wrong in principle and infamous in execution. And, sir, I can not understand how gentlemen can say they are opposed to the appropriation, they are opposed to the policy of the Government, they are opposed to the destruction of the lives of innocent islanders who are fighting for their homes and firesides, and yet, for a sentiment, for fear it will give offense to some effete and decayed monarchy, they propose to vote for this measure.

To illustrate the methods resorted to by the Administration—and no condemnation too severe can be visited upon the Republican party and the Administration for their action in connection with this whole affair—to illustrate their tactics, why did not the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations bring this bill before the House in the ordinary way, that we might have the opportunity to amend it and declare what the policy of the Administration was to be in regard to the Philippine Islands?

The truth of the business is that you are soldiers of fortune; you have not the nerve, the pluck, the courage to outline what you propose to the American people in regard to those islands. Micawberlike, you are "waiting for something to turn up." It is lack of statesmanship, lack of patriotism, lack of integrity, the old-time concomitants of Republicanism, that brings this bill before the House in this shape.

The gentleman from Illinois was well aware that if he secured the unanimous consent of his committee to move a suspension of the rules, no amendment would be in order, and in that way he could have this appropriation voted under the guise of national honor or keeping a national obligation, and thus prevent amendment. Sir, I esteem my sense of right, my sense of honor, even higher than my love for the Constitution of my country; and I believe it is dishonorable, unfair, and unprincipled to treat the people of the Philippine Islands as the Administration is now treating them. [Applause.]

I know we have the constitutional right to refuse to vote this appropriation, and behind the ægis of the Constitution I propose to exercise that right and vote against it, and to demand the yeas and nays, that the country may know how many there are of us in this body willing to go on record in defiance of the infamous penny-a-liners who are trying to drive every man out of public life who does not bow with superserviceable servility to their imperious dictates. I am not afraid of their criticism. I appeal to the enlightened, patriotic, and intelligent judgment of my constituency, confident that they will approve my action, based as it is upon my sense of right.

I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I venture to predict the time will come when those who are now so swift to give in their adherence to the policy of the Administration will be equally quick to swear that they were out of sympathy with it. And, sir, with all due deference and respect to some gentlemen on this side and some gentlemen on the other side, I can not refrain from expressing a superlative contempt for a man who believes a thing to be wrong, but for the sake of form will give in his adherence to it. [Applause.]

If I were in favor of this measure, I would say so. As I am opposed to it, "by the Eternal" I am willing to be recorded against it, it matters not what anybody else may say about it. When a man is governed by principle, it matters not whether his neighbor or anyone else agrees with him. I would rather commit an error following what I believed to be right than simply to join with the howls of the crowd because they were in the majority.

We have yet to test the sense of the American people on this question. A distinguished Republican once said—and let us give him credit for it—that "you may fool all of the people some of the time, and some of the people all the time, but you can not fool all the people all the time." And I believe, skillful as the Administration and the Republican party are in concealing their policy, eventually we will smoke them out; and when they are tried before the judgment of intelligent American public opinion, their policy throughout this entire affair will be condemned in no uncertain terms. Commencing as "a war for humanity," this contest has degenerated into the most disgraceful war of bloody extermination that has disgraced the pages of modern history. [Applause.]

A MEMBER. Or ancient, either.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I hope this House will not forget—I hope no man in it will forget—that generosity above all things becomes men and nations. In this spirit, when we are obliged to enter into a contest with any nation, whatever it may be, and the fight is over, let us deal with her in a way to save for her every particle of self-respect and honor that we can save to her. Let us be more than just; let us be generous.

Who is the man in this assembly who, having a contest with any one, great or small, wise or unwise, honorable or dishonorable, will not, when it is over, lift his late antagonist from the ground, set him on his feet, and honor him as highly as he justly can. What are $20,000,000 to us under the present circumstances? We, a great, rich, and powerful nation, having conquered Spain, we must be generous. We are to send our minister to her. She must send hers here. She is our associate among the nations. Let us deal generously, more than justly, with her under circumstances so adverse to her. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am ready for a vote. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] criticises the committee for reporting this bill, using various harsh words. He says there is no chance for amendment. That does not say much for the consistency of the gentleman from Kentucky, because this identical provision was upon a bill but a few days ago, where it was subject to amendment, and he, with one other gentleman upon that side of the House, made the technical point of order upon it that would not permit the Committee of the Whole either to amend or discuss it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Does the gentleman mean to inform the House that an amendment defining the policy of the Government was permissible on an appropriation bill?

Mr. CANNON. I said it was subject to amendment under the rules of the House. Now, under the rules of the House this pending provision is not subject to amendment.

Now, a word in conclusion. I read from the treaty of Paris with Spain:

> The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territory hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress.

Under that treaty of Paris, ratified by the Senate of the United States, the $20,000,000 that we appropriate to-day, so far as this House is concerned, is to be paid to Spain. Now, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER], as well as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], says they would have been glad to announce what was to be the policy of the United States. Why, an announcement in a resolution now or hereafter is but as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But this would be more. This would be a law, not a resolution.

Mr. CANNON. I can not yield. Until Congress is fully informed what ought to be done it is impossible for Congress to legislate under the law of the land, the treaty which I have just read. In the fullness of time Congress will be informed and Congress will legislate. At this time, with the military government now in the Philippines, and to remain there until the action of Congress, there is but one thing, in my judgment, for every patriot to do, namely, to sustain the Army and the Navy of the United States that are there to-day fighting to preserve order. [Applause on the Republican side.] And when we have preserved order, when the authority of the United States is acknowledged there as it is elsewhere in our territory, then, with due regard to our self-respect, to our own best interest, and the best interest of that people as well, Congress will be in a position to legislate and will legislate. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. CANNON. I will.

Mr. BAILEY. Then when that time arrives, will the gentleman say whether or not the legislation will be to move out and leave those people in full possession of their own country?

Mr. CANNON. Well, my friend, I said a moment ago that a barren declaration as to what our policy would be in the future, after we gain the necessary information, made now under the circumstances—and I say it again—would be as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal, useful only to people that are in arms against the people of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the joint resolution.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LENTZ. I should like to ask permission to extend my remarks to the extent of making a five minutes' speech in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BELL. I should like to make the same request, that I be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the pending question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill, and on that question the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 219, nays 33, answered "present" 4, not voting 95; as follows:

PAN-AMERICAN EXPOSITION AT BUFFALO, N. Y.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, I move to suspend the rules and pass the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12064) to encourage the holding of a Pan-American Exposition on the Niagara frontier, within the county of Erie or Niagara, in the State of New York, in the year 1901.

Whereas it is desirable to encourage the holding of a Pan-American Exposition on the Niagara frontier, within the county of Erie or Niagara, in the State of New York, in the year 1901, to fittingly illustrate the marvelous development of the Western Hemisphere during the nineteenth century by a display of the arts, industries, manufactures, and products of the soil, mines, and Sea; and

Whereas the proposed Pan-American Exposition, being confined to the Western Hemisphere, and being held in the near vicinity of the great Niagara cataract, within a day's journey of which reside 40,000,000 people, would unquestionably be of vast benefit to the commercial interests not only of this country but of the entire hemisphere, and should therefore have the sanction of the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas satisfactory assurances have already been given by the diplomatic representatives of Canada, Mexico, the Central and South American Republics, and most of the States of the United States that these countries and States will make unique, interesting, and instructive exhibits peculiarly illustrative of their material progress during the century about to close; and

Whereas no exposition of a similar character as that proposed has ever been held in the great State of New York; and

Whereas the Pan-American Exposition Company has undertaken to hold such exposition, beginning on the 1st day of May, 1901, and closing on the 1st day of November, 1901: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all articles that shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at said exposition, upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty, shall be admitted free of payment of duty, customs fees, or charges, under such regulation as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during the exposition to sell for delivery at the close thereof any goods or property imported for or actually on exhibition in the exposition buildings or on the grounds, subject to such regulation for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That all such articles when sold or withdrawn for consumption in the United States shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of importation, and all penalties prescribed by law shall be applied and enforced against the persons who may be guilty of any illegal sale or withdrawal: And provided further, That all necessary expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of this section, including salaries of customs officials in charge of imported articles, shall be paid to the Treasury of the United States by the Pan-American Exposition Company under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That there shall be exhibited at said exposition by the Government of the United States, from its Executive Departments, the Smithsonian Institution and National Museum, the United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries, the Department of Labor, and the Bureau of the American Republics, such articles and material as illustrate the function and administrative faculty of the Government in time of peace, and its resources as a war power, and its relations to other American Republics, tending to demonstrate the nature of our institutions and their adaption to the wants of the people. And to secure a complete and harmonious arrangement of such Government exhibit, a board of management shall be created, to be charged with the selection, purchase, preparation, transportation, arrangement, safekeeping, exhibition, and return of such articles and materials as the heads of the several Departments and the secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, the Commissioner of Labor, and the Director of the Bureau of the American Republics may respectively decide shall be embraced in said Government exhibit. The President may also designate additional articles for exhibition.

Such board shall be composed of one person to be named by the head of each Executive Department, one by the head of the Smithsonian Institution and National Museum, one by the head of the United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries, one by the Commissioner of Labor, and one by the Director of the Bureau of the American Republics. The President shall name one of said persons so detailed as chairman, and the board itself shall appoint its secretary, disbursing officer, and such other officers as it may deem necessary. The members of said board of management, with other officers and employees of the Government who may be detailed to assist them, including officers of the Army and Navy, shall receive no compensation in addition to their regular salaries, but they shall be allowed their actual and necessary traveling expenses, together with a per diem in lieu of subsistence, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, while necessarily absent from their homes engaged upon the business of the board.

Officers of the Army and Navy shall receive this allowance in lieu of the transportation and mileage now allowed by law. Any provision of law which may prohibit the detail of persons in the employ of the United States to other service than that which they customarily perform shall not apply to persons detailed for duty in connection with the Pan-American Exposition. Employees of the board not otherwise employed by the Government shall be entitled to such compensation as the board may determine. The disbursing officer shall give bond in the sum of $20,000 for the faithful performance of his duties, said bond to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. PETTIGREW presented a petition of the legislature of South Dakota, praying for the establishment of a branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and Sailors within the limits of the city of Hot Springs, Fall River County, S. Dak.; which was ordered to lie on the table.

TREATY WITH SPAIN.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I present a joint resolution passed by the legislature of South Dakota urging the Senate to ratify the treaty with Spain and also requesting me to vote for the treaty. This resolution was received several days after the treaty had been ratified, though I was aware at the time I voted against the treaty that the legislature had passed such a resolution. I deny the right of the legislature to instruct me in any particular as to my duties, although I am always glad to hear from that body.

This resolution was adopted by the third legislature that has convened in South Dakota since my last election. The legislature by which I was elected to the United States Senate, at least one of its houses, by a considerable majority, passed resolutions in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver. The next legislature passed resolutions through both houses in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver. The present legislature is in favor of the single gold standard. If I should undertake to follow the change of sentiment reflected by the successive legislatures of South Dakota, I would find myself voting on all sides of almost every question.

I observe further that the members of the various legislatures of South Dakota have almost always been so unfortunate as not to secure reelection at the hands of their constituents. Their course, in connection with our own local affairs, has been such that the people of the State have deemed it to their interest to relegate them to private life and to send a new aggregation of representatives to the succeeding legislature. Therefore I deny that, on great national questions, the legislators of my State are liable to be in the right. They are more liable to be in the wrong.

Further than that, I have taken an oath, and I have my own conscience to deal with. My constituents have the remedy, so far as I am concerned, if my course is unsatisfactory to them, for I represent the people of South Dakota and not the legislature of South Dakota. If I had known that every member of the present legislature was in favor of the ratification of the Spanish treaty, I would not have voted for it. I never have been and never will be a willing party to any proposition to blacken a page in my country's history. I believe the ratification of this treaty to be the turning of the road away from the time-honored principles of this great Republic toward the establishment of a different form of government. Viewing this question as I do, I would rather lose my seat, I would rather cease to hold any official position, than cast my vote for the ratification of the treaty with Spain.

A treaty that seeks to hold an alien race under the bondage of a government distasteful to them, that declares against the independence for which they have shed generations of blood, does not coincide with my ideas of justice, nor does it uphold the broad proposition that government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. The honorable course for a great nation like ours in its present predicament is to withdraw its troops from the Philippines and stop the butchery of its own sons and of the unfortunate natives of those islands, whose only offense is that they want to be free.

In the name of good faith with those who fought on our side in the conflict with Spain, the bloody work should cease, and this should occur through the dictates of the American conscience. It would be by far the more honorable course to admit that we have made a mistake than to continue in that mistake until our homes are filled with mourning for the stalwart youth of the land who left their firesides for humanity's sake and have gone to inhospitable graves in a conflict marked by all the inhumanity of the conqueror's greed. I could not vote for the possibilities of such conditions, even in the presence of a legislative resolution, and so I have gone upon the record against the treaty.

I ask to have the joint resolution read so that it may appear in the RECORD, and then that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

A joint resolution memorializing the United States Senate to give prompt and hearty support to the treaty with Spain now pending in the Senate.

Be it resolved by the legislature of the State of South Dakota:

Whereas our honored Chief Magistrate, President McKinley, has, through the Peace Commission, ended a war which gave to the world not only a shining example of humane sympathy with an oppressed people, but an exhibition of unrivaled courage and brilliant generalship; and

Whereas the terms of the treaty of peace have lifted the people of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands from the tyranny of Spain to the enjoyment of liberty and the opportunity for progress, enlightenment, and development under the beneficent rule of the United States; and

Whereas this treaty, if ratified, will vastly extend the influence of the United States in checking oppression, repressing the unjust aggressions of the European monarchies, and widening the sphere of liberty in the world; and

Whereas it will open to American commerce a vast field for expansion, and will furnish a great and expanding stimulus to our manufactures and natural production, thus conferring great benefits upon our farmers, laboring men, manufacturers, and business men:

Resolved, That voicing, we believe, the sentiments of an overwhelming majority of the people of South Dakota, we hereby urge our Senators in Congress to give prompt and hearty support to the treaty, now pending in the Senate, and urge both Senators and Representatives to aid the Administration in carrying the treaty into effect.

Speaker of the House.

PREVENTION OF SMALLPOX.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report a joint resolution and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 252) to prevent the spread of contagious diseases in the District of Columbia was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated, to be immediately available, one-half out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, and one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, to enable the Commissioners of said District to provide for the proper care of smallpox patients and to prevent the spread of contagious diseases in said District, including a house-to-house inspection, and such compulsory vaccination as may be deemed necessary by the health officer of said District in accordance with existing law; and for other extraordinary emergencies.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I have here a letter from the Commissioners of the District which explains the necessity for the joint resolution. I ask that it be read.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Or it can be printed in the RECORD just as well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, February 20, 1899.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to inclose herewith the draft of a joint resolution, with the request that the same be introduced into the Senate and that you will endeavor to secure its early passage in order that proper steps may be taken to prevent the spread of smallpox, the existence of which is now in the city and which the Commissioners have every reason to believe is likely to increase rapidly if heroic steps are not taken to stamp it out. From careful investigation of the whole situation the health officer reports to the Commissioners that there is grave apprehension of a spread of this disease in the community, owing largely to the fact that those persons already confined in the smallpox hospital are known to have been in close contact with others in thickly populated buildings and portions of the city. It would be the greatest possible misfortune if this disease should be scattered throughout the city at any time, but especially so at this time, when so many officials and strangers are here incident to the meetings of Congress.

The health and lives of the President and his Cabinet and of officials of all degrees, as well as of members of Congress and the residents, make it essentially important that nothing should be left undone to eradicate the trouble at the earliest possible moment.

The appropriation asked for is for the employment of the necessary physicians, watchmen to guard quarantined premises, food and fuel for such cases as may need it in quarantined houses, and for the maintenance of the smallpox hospital. The hospital itself has accommodations for about 40 patients, and is about half full. Should it be necessary to accommodate more than this number, the Commissioners would be obliged to erect a frame structure for the use of the additional patients. This expense would be met from the amount asked for in this resolution.

In the city of Alexandria, only 8 miles from Washington, there are reported to-day 212 cases in a population of 18,000.

The discovery of cases of smallpox among the inmates of the workhouse of the Washington Asylum has rendered it impossible to commit any more prisoners to that building. It has also been deemed inexpedient to permit the guards and other employees of the asylum grounds to leave the said premises until the period shall have passed during which any possible contagion may be developed. The duty has therefore been devolved upon the Commissioners to provide some other building for the detention of prisoners sentenced by the police court during the time that such prisoners can not be safely sent to the workhouse.

The female workhouse of the Washington Asylum is situated a sufficient distance from the male workhouse to avoid any danger of contagion therefrom.

The Commissioners have ascertained that certain changes can be made in the female workhouse building by the erection of partitions, etc., which will enable them to accommodate about 100 male prisoners in that building. Some new furniture will be required, and some additional guards in lieu of those now quarantined in the male workhouse must be employed.

The Commissioners have estimated that about $3,000 of the sum of $50,000 named in the accompanying joint resolution will be needed to fit up the female workhouse and to provide for the proper care of prisoners therein during the period of danger from smallpox in that vicinity.

Copy of the report of the health officer is herewith inclosed, to which attention is respectfully invited.

Very respectfully,
JOHN B. WIGHT,
President Board of Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. JAMES MCMILLAN,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
United States Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STAMP TAX ON LEGAL INSTRUMENTS.

Mr. ALLISON. I report back from the Committee on Finance unanimously, with an amendment, the joint resolution (H. Res. 358) to amend section 25 of the act passed June 13, 1898, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes." I ask that the joint resolution may be considered at this time. I think there will be no objection to it.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in line 8, after the word "mortgage," to insert the words "or deed of trust;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That an act passed June 13, 1898, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," be amended by adding to the end of Schedule A, section 25, the following: "Whenever any bond or note shall be secured by a mortgage or deed of trust, but one stamp shall be required to be placed upon such papers: Provided, That the stamp tax placed thereon shall be the highest rate required for said instruments or either of them."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The resolution was read the third time, and passed.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. HAWLEY February 7, 1899, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the statements of Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, United States Volunteers, and Maj. Gen. M. C. Butler, United States Volunteers, before the Committee on Military Affairs, be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; and that said committee, in considering matters coming before it during the present session of the Senate, is authorized to employ a stenographer to report any hearings that may be held, and to have such hearings printed for the use of the committee, such stenographer to be paid from the said contingent fund.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. SHOUP February 15, 1899, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the hearings on the bills to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and to be admitted into the Union, to authorize the refunding of indebtedness in certain Territories of the United States, and to provide a criminal code for the district of Alaska, before the Committee on Territories, be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

GEORGE A. DICKEL & CO.

Mr. CHILTON. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3425) for the relief of George A. Dickel & Co., at Nashville, Tenn., to report it without amendment.

Mr. BATE. I ask for the present consideration of that bill. It will take but a moment. The bill met with no opposition in the other House and with none in the Committee on Finance. There is no dispute about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let it be read for information, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

Mr. BATE. There is nothing in the bill to which there will be any objection.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to reimburse George A. Dickel & Co., wholesale liquor dealers and distillers, of Nashville, Tenn., for $1,227.38 expended by that firm for revenue stamps on the 2d day of April, 1897, to be affixed to serial packages 1 to 11 and 23 to 36, containing distilled spirits produced by Cashion & Brown, distillery 577, Fifth district of Tennessee, and sold to the said George A. Dickel & Co. in bond, which serial packages of distilled spirits were destroyed by fire on the night of the same day the stamps were purchased and before they were affixed; that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the said George A. Dickel & Co., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the said sum of $1,227.38 as restitution and reimbursement, and cancel the stamps so redeemed: Provided, That the stamps herein named shall first be returned to the Treasury Department.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING BILLS.

Mr. QUAY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 5547) for the erection of a public building at Annapolis, Md.;

A bill (S. 5535) for the erection of a public building at Elmira, N. Y.;

A bill (S. 5550) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Joliet, in the State of Illinois;

A bill (S. 5548) to provide for a building for the use of the post-office, office of the superintendent of the Hot Springs Reservation, and other civil offices in the city of Hot Springs, Ark.;

A bill (S. 5521) for enlarging the public building at Topeka, Kans.;

A bill (S. 5543) to provide for the erection of a public building at Elizabeth City, N. C.;

A bill (S. 5551) for the erection of a public building in the city of Elgin, Ill.;

A bill (S. 5552) to provide for enlarging and improving the United States Government building at Macon, Ga., and to appropriate $58,000 therefor;

A bill (S. 5542) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at the city of Eau Claire, in the State of Wisconsin;

A bill (S. 5540) authorizing the extension of the post-office building at Springfield, Mass.;

A bill (S. 5538) for the erection of a public building at Fitchburg, Mass.;

A bill (S. 5539) to erect a public building at Lawrence, Mass.; and

A bill (S. 5545) to increase the limit of the cost for the erection of a public building in Stockton, Cal., and making provision for the acquisition of additional land or a new site therefor.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to have the attention of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania. There are additional bills before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that have not been reported or acted upon.

Mr. QUAY. There may be some——

Mr. ALLEN. There are some which have been pending there for a year or more, and I have not myself been advised that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has even had a meeting. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if there is any purpose to report during this session of Congress upon those additional bills?

Mr. QUAY. The disposition of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska, is to report any meritorious bill. If the Senator from Nebraska has a bill pending which he thinks ought to be reported and ought to be passed, if he will so signify to the committee, it will give him a hearing and report his bill.

Mr. ALLEN. There have been no hearings on these bills.

Mr. QUAY. The committee was canvassed.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, the committee was canvassed. Why was it not canvassed upon the other bills?

Mr. QUAY. It can be canvassed, if the Senator so desires. There is no difficulty about that.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it necessary for me to go to the Senator from Pennsylvania and importune him to take up a bill which is before his committee? Am I compelled to pursue the Senator like an ignis fatuus to get action upon the part of his committee as respects a public-building bill?

Mr. QUAY. I do not——

Mr. ALLEN. There is no apology for it. That is all there is to it.

Mr. QUAY. It seems to me——

Mr. ALLEN. The order in which these bills have been reported is like the expert shuffling of cards. They are placed so for the express purpose of having a few of them passed and a great many of them defeated, while a great many meritorious bills, eminently more meritorious than these bills, lie buried in the secret closet of the Senator from Pennsylvania, with no purpose of presenting them and making either a favorable or an unfavorable report upon them.

Mr. President, I make this distinct charge. There has been no meeting of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that passed upon or recommended these bills. Here are a dozen bills or more. If there has been a meeting, it was a secret meeting; it was not at the regular time for the meeting of that committee.

I simply call attention to this not because I expect that it will eventuate in anything, not because I expect it will deter the honorable Senator from suppressing these other bills, but because I believe that the public ought to know how the public business in this respect is transacted.

Mr. President, there is a bill that passed the Senate two years ago, simply carrying with it an appropriation of $30,000 to purchase two sites for public buildings in cities in my State where the Federal court has been held for ten years. That bill, as I understand it, is ready to come here for approval. There is a bill that passed the House of Representatives but last week to purchase a site and erect a small building in one of the important cities in my State. And yet that bill disappears, it goes glimmering, and so all the bills that are not in the combination, at the head of which stands the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, are buried out of sight for all time.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next order is the introduction of bills.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to say in reply to the Senator from Nebraska that his intimation that there is any combination anywhere, in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds or elsewhere, in which the Senator from Pennsylvania is concerned is utterly unwarranted. It is not true.

As to the bills reported to-day, the fact in relation to their appearing this morning is that they were introduced on yesterday at the request of members of the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The Senators who introduced them are sitting all over this Chamber now. They were introduced with the understanding that the committee was to be polled at once and that the bills were to be reported to-day. What is going on in the House I am not prepared to say, and I am not interested in any of the bills that are reported this morning.

If the Senator from Nebraska had desired his bill to be included, it was not unseemly for him to mention the fact to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. He has done so before, and he has always been favored in any request that he ever made to that committee.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I know nothing about any understanding that these bills were to be reported without the committee being called together.

Mr. QUAY. It is not necessary for the Senator from Nebraska to know about understandings. I say there was no understanding.

Mr. ALLEN. If there was, was it understood that these bills alone should be reported?

Mr. QUAY. It was not.

Mr. ALLEN. Then, why are not the other bills reported?

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator from Nebraska had been attending to the business of his constituents, and had asked the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to further his bill, it would have been reported, I have no doubt, if meritorious.

Mr. ALLEN. I am attending to the business of my constituents quite as closely as the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. QUAY. Very well.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not need instruction from him as to the course I shall pursue, and I am not prepared to receive it. There are dozens of other bills, equally meritorious with these bills. Why were they not taken up and the committee polled upon them? I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania why were they not taken up and the committee polled?

Mr. QUAY. They were not taken up because the Senators in charge of the bills did not ask that they should be taken up.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, Mr. President.

Mr. QUAY. That was all.

Mr. ALLEN. So we have got to pursue the committee after a bill has been introduced. You have got to chase down its membership from day to day and importune them before they will discharge their duty.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to him that instead of lecturing the committee he move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of all the bills before the committee and that they be placed on the Calendar of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. No; I do not want to do that.

Mr. CHANDLER. That would be business.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want to do that. I want the committee to report upon those bills one way or the other.

Strange, Mr. President, is the order in which these bills are reported and the order in which they will appear upon the Calendar. If any man will take the Calendar to-morrow morning and look at it and observe the manner in which these bills have been reported, he will find that some of the newest bills in the history of this Congress are reported first, and he will find those bills bunched in a certain section of the country.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11186) to extend the laws relating to commerce, navigation, and merchant seamen over the Hawaiian Islands ceded to the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is the morning business through?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The introduction of bills is next in order.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I introduce a bill for the erection of a public building at Norwich, Conn. I wish to say with regard to this bill that it has several times passed the Senate and I think has been favorably considered in another place. I do not wish to subject myself to any criticism of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] in introducing it.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not hear the remark of the Senator.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I said I desired to introduce a bill for the erection of a public building at Norwich, Conn., a bill that has several times passed the Senate and, I believe, has been favorably considered in another branch. and I hoped I should not incur the criticism of the Senator from Nebraska in introducing it.

Mr. ALLEN. Perhaps the latter part of the remark was not germane to the bill or its presentation.

The bill (S. 5559) for the erection of a public building at Norwich, Conn., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 5554) for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the city of New Brunswick, N. J.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MANTLE introduced a bill (S. 5561) establishing the boundaries of the Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservation, Mont., and making appropriations for purchasing improvements thereon and certain lands situated therein, for purchasing cattle, fencing the reservation, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DEBOE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 253) to authorize the appointment of Charles S. Hatch a second lieutenant in the Marine Corps; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BERRY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $30,000 out of the appropriation for "Improving Mississippi River," to be used in improving the harbor and rectifying the banks of the Mississippi River at and near Helena, Ark., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TURLEY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 for the purchase of a tower clock for the post-office, court-house, and custom-house at Memphis, Tenn., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PETTUS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the city of Selma, Ala., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TURNER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $884 to pay Joshua T. Roberts for extra services rendered in the execution of surveying contract No. 425, Washington, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $40,000 to extend the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the examination and classification of certain mineral lands in the States of Montana and Idaho," approved February 26, 1895, to all unpatented lands within the land-grant and indemnity land-grant limits of the grants of lands made by Congress to certain railroads, and providing for the appointment of commissioners to execute the provisions of said act of Congress as herein extended, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOAR submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,500 for the chair of pedagogy of Howard University, Washington, D. C., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

C., regarding their claim for unceded lands, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Army reorganization bill; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

BUREAU OF DOMESTIC SCIENCE.

On motion of Mr. GEAR, it was Ordered, That 1,000 copies of the hearing before the subcommittee on Agriculture and Forestry relative to the establishment of a bureau of domestic science be printed.

BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 2,000 copies of the testimony of the following witnesses, taken before the Lyman investigating committee that investigated the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in 1897, be printed for the use of the Senate: Claude M. Johnson, Director of the Bureau; Thomas J. Sullivan, Assistant Director of the Bureau; Alexander G. Morgan, paymaster of the Bureau: Ernest Gibbons, paymaster clerk of the Bureau; J. McGill, chief of the bindery of the Bureau; Emile Huck, William McKinney, and Isaac Gerrodette, foremen in the plate-printing division of the Bureau; also Peter Bain, Peter McGirr, William Peck, Chris Bollinger, Nathan King, George P. Jackson, T. C. Ray, James Turner, James Erwin, William Hay, and Mr. —— Childs.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions is hereby authorized and directed, by a subcommittee appointed for that purpose, to carefully examine, during the recess of Congress, all general laws on the statute book granting pensions to soldiers, their survivors, and dependents, and to pursue such other inquiries in connection with the matter of pension legislation as may be deemed advisable, report to be made to the Senate, by bill or otherwise, at as early a day as practicable after the assembling of the Fifty-sixth Congress, the expense incurred to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF SHIPPING LAWS TO HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. NELSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to ask for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 11186) to extend the laws relating to commerce, navigation, and merchant seamen over the Hawaiian Islands ceded to the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill No. 11916.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] had asked unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill prior to the consent just asked by the Senator from Arkansas. If the Senator from Arkansas will yield a moment, the Chair will put the request of the Senator from Minnesota. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11186) to extend the laws relating to commerce, navigation, and merchant seamen over the Hawaiian Islands ceded to the United States. Is there objection?

Mr. VEST. I object.

Mr. ALLEN. I object to that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

RAILWAY THROUGH THE CHOCTAW AND CREEK NATIONS.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11916) to authorize the Fort Smith and Western Railroad Company to construct and operate a railway through the Choctaw and Creek nations, in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. PETTIGREW. We have passed a general law through both Houses, which is now in conference, providing for rights of way over all the Indian reservations in the United States. Therefore it seems to me entirely unnecessary to pass these separate bills. There is a large number of them, and I am sure the bill providing for a general law will become a law before we adjourn. Therefore I object to the consideration of any of these bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota if he feels sure that the general bill to which he refers will become a law at this session?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I feel sure it will. I have been informed that this afternoon there will be a meeting of the committee of conference on the subject.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then I withdraw the request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from Arkansas is withdrawn.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH SOUTH.

Mr. PASCO. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution in relation to the Methodist Episcopal Church South, reported by the Committee on Claims, be now considered. Last summer a letter was addressed by the bishops of that church to the Vice-President with reference to the disposition of the money paid to the Book Agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in settlement of their claim against the United States and it was referred to the Committee on Claims. It has been carefully considered, and a resolution has been prepared expressing the views of the committee as to the action that should be taken. It has been on the Calendar for some time, and it is important that it should be acted upon. The resolution is very short and will take only a few moments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution referred to by the Senator from Florida?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, reported by Mr. TELLER from the Committee on Claims January 9, 1899:

Resolved, That the report of the committee made July 8, 1898, be approved, and that no censure should rest upon the Methodist Episcopal Church South for the misstatements and concealments of the Book Agents in connection with the passage of the bill for the payment of the claim referred to in the letter of the bishops now under consideration; that the injury resulting therefrom affected only the beneficiaries of the fund and not the United States, and the Senate should take no further action in the matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PASCO. I ask that the report of the committee be published in the RECORD in connection with the passage of this resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The report referred to, which was was submitted by Mr. TELLER January 9, 1899, is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a letter from the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, dated August 20, 1898, relating to the claim of the Book Agents of that Church, which was authorized to be paid by an act approved March 11, 1898, entitled "An act for relief of the Book Agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South," submit the following report thereon:

The letter is as follows:

WEST NASHVILLE, TENN., August 26, 1898.

MY DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, held in Nashville, Tenn., July 4, 1898, with reference to the war claim recently granted by the Government to the church they represent, the following action was taken by them, of which it is made my duty to give you, as President of the Senate of the United States, official notice for presentation to that honorable body:

"While reaffirming the justness of our claim, payment of which has been sought for twenty-five years, we insist that the church can not afford to accept it as a gratuity or on conditions that reflect upon its honor. Inasmuch, therefore, as some Senators have affirmed on the floor of the Senate that they were induced to support the claim by misleading statements on the part of the representatives of the church—statements, however, which did not affect the merits of our claim—we hereby give this assurance: That if the Senate, by affirmative action, declares that the passage of the bill was due to such misleading statements, we will take the proper steps to have the entire amount returned to the Government."

ROBERT K. HARGROVE,
Secretary of the College of Bishops.

The bill referred to provides for the payment of $288,000 in satisfaction of the claim, and after it became a law this committee was authorized to inquire and report the circumstances connected with its passage.

The resolution authorizing this inquiry is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be directed to inquire and report to whom the money was paid under the claim of the Methodist Book Concern South, and also as to all circumstances connected with the passage of the bill providing for the payment of said claim and with the subsequent payment of the money under said act of Congress."

The investigation was made; a number of witnesses were examined, and the committee submitted their report to the Senate on the 8th day of July, 1898.

In the conclusion of this report it is stated:

"In conclusion, the committee deem it proper to state that no censure should rest upon the Methodist Episcopal Church South for the acts of its Book Agents. The church has been injured by the misconduct of its agents, but for such misconduct it is held entirely blameless.

"The committee has not thought proper to suggest to the Senate any action concerning this matter, it appearing to the committee that the governing authorities of the church must be allowed to take such measures as it may think proper after it has been fully acquainted with the facts concerning the passage of the bill and the final disposition of the money appropriated by it."

This letter of the bishops makes it appropriate and proper that there should be an expression of opinion on the part of the Senate in response to the conditional proposition to tender to the Government the money paid to the Book Agents under the terms of the said act approved March 11, 1898.

No new facts have come to the knowledge of the committee since their report was laid before the Senate, and in harmony therewith the following resolution is submitted and the committee recommend that it be adopted:

"That the report of the committee made July 8, 1898, be approved, and that no censure should rest upon the Methodist Episcopal Church South for the misstatements and concealments of the Book Agents in connection with the passage of the bill for the payment of the claim referred to in the letter of the bishops now under consideration; that the injury resulting therefrom affected only the beneficiaries of the fund and not the United States, and the Senate should take no further action in the matter."

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 20th instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 245) to provide for the removal of snow and ice in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

GEORGE W. WESTON.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 4870) for the relief of George W. Weston. It is a bill which will provoke no discussion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to George W. Weston, late postmaster of Exeter, N. H., $281.21, being the balance due him for moneys deposited in the National Granite State Bank, of Exeter, N. H., during the month of July, 1893, and immediately preceding the failure of the National Granite State Bank.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRANT OF LANDS TO WISCONSIN.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6551) withdrawing from entry and sale and granting unto the State of Wisconsin certain lands therein described.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the following lands, situated in the county of Juneau, in the State of Wisconsin, to wit, the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter and the west half of the southwest quarter of section 22, in township 17 north, of range 2 east, be withdrawn from entry and sale, and authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to cause a patent therefor to be issued to the State of Wisconsin; but the State shall pay to the United States therefor at the rate of $1.25 per acre, and shall first procure from all claimants or persons who may have filed or made homestead entries or other claims on or to the premises, or any part thereof, proper relinquishments of all their claims thereto, and cause the same to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. FRANCIS TUTTLE AND OTHERS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 329) recognizing the able and gallant services of Capt. Francis Tuttle, Revenue-Cutter Service, his officers and men of the Bear; also the heroic services of Lieuts. David H. Jarvis, Ellsworth P. Bertholf, and Dr. Samuel J. Call, composing the overland expedition to Point Barrow, Arctic Ocean, for the relief of imperiled whalers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read at length for information, subject to objection.

The joint resolution, which had been reported by the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, was read; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was, on page 2, line 12, after the words "each of," to strike out "them" and insert "said officers of the overland expedition;" so as to read:

That the thanks of Congress are hereby extended to the members of the overland expedition, landed from the revenue steamer Bear, composed of First Lieut. David H. Jarvis, Revenue-Cutter Service, commanding; Second Lieut. Ellsworth P. Bertholf, Revenue-Cutter Service, and Dr. Samuel J. Call, surgeon, for their heroic struggle of more than three months through the barren wastes of arctic Alaska, in the depths of an arctic winter, over nearly 2,000 miles of that desolate and dreary region, carrying relief and cheer to 275 distressed citizens of our country, and that in commemoration of the dauntless courage and heroic struggles of these brave men a gold medal of honor of an appropriate design, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, be awarded to each of said officers of the overland expedition.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I scarcely believe it is proper that we should extend the thanks of Congress to all of these gentlemen and thus entitle them to the privileges of the floor of the Senate. For what they have done I think the reward of a medal would be amply sufficient recognition.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. If this joint resolution is going to provoke discussion, I shall feel it my duty to call for the regular order. Unanimous consent was given yesterday to take up to-day at 1 o'clock the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the joint resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

BRIDGE ACROSS FLINT RIVER.

Mr. BACON. I regret to take up any time of the Senate on a very simple matter, but I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11867) to authorize the Georgia Pine Railway, of Georgia, to construct a bridge across the Flint River, a navigable stream in Decatur County, Ga., which was reported yesterday. The bridge is now in process of building.

Mr. QUAY. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. The bill will not take but a moment by the watch.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. I was cut off by the agreement to take up at 1 o'clock the Post-Office appropriation bill, and I do not see why other bills should be passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] objected to the joint resolution the consideration of which was asked by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the joint resolution be passed over until I can have time to examine it.

Mr. QUAY. Regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]?

Mr. QUAY. I object, Mr. President, and call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, accompanying the commercial relations of the United States for the year 1898, being the annual reports of the consular officers upon the industries and commerce of foreign countries. In view of the value of these reports to the manufacturing and exporting interests of the country, I indorse the recommendation of the Secretary of State that Congress authorize the printing of the usual editions of 10,000 copies of the general summary, entitled "Review of the World's Commerce," and of 5,000 copies of "Commercial Relations" (including this summary), to enable the Department of State to meet the demand for such information.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 21, 1899.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 12125) making an appropriation to carry out the obligations of the treaty between the United States and Spain concluded December 10, 1898, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REIMBURSEMENT OF STATE WAR EXPENSES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5260) to amend an act entitled "An act to reimburse the governors of States and Territories for expenses incurred by them in aiding the United States to raise and organize and supply and equip the Volunteer Army of the United States in the existing war with Spain," approved July 8, 1898, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I understood that there was a unanimous-consent agreement made yesterday which takes effect at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. So the Chair understands, but he is simply attempting to clear the table of bills sent from the House of Representatives.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Very well.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate bill No. 5260, and that a conference be asked of the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming that the Senate nonconcur in the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. WARREN, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. MITCHELL were appointed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill as sent to the Senate be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4936) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes, agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MAHON, Mr. OTJEN, and Mr. RICHARDSON managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11683) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is there not an amendment pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There was an amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], which was temporarily withdrawn last evening.

Mr. BUTLER. I reoffer now the amendment which was temporarily withdrawn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina reoffers the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the clause making appropriations "for inland transportation by railroad routes," on page 15, line 3, after the word "distribution," it is proposed to strike out "$33,275,000" and to insert:

Thirty million five hundred thousand dollars; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1898, for the transportation of mails on railway routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails at least 10 per cent per annum from the rate fixed in section 4002 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by act of July 12, 1876, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," and as further amended by act of June 17, 1878, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight; and the above amount appropriated shall cover full compensation for railway mail transportation.

[Mr. BUTLER addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the pending amendment except to say that I believe the railway mail pay not only is excessive, but that the method by which the money is expended or distributed among the roads is entirely wrong. While some of the roads perform service for which they do not receive adequate compensation, the great trunk lines receive a compensation twenty times more than they should receive. The vast sum which we appropriate goes to these great trunk lines. In the remote West, in the Rocky Mountain regions, many of the roads receive a compensation that is too small for carrying the mail, because they carry so very little mail—there is so very little to be carried. This is true with all roads where the amount of mail is very small. Therefore it is important that we should decrease the amount expended for this purpose and at the same time change the method of distributing the money.

I ask to have printed as a document the paper which I have in my hand. I do not care to have it go into the RECORD. It is a statement by Mr. James L. Cowles, of Farmington, Conn., relative to railway mail pay.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota, to have printed the matter referred to as a document? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is all I care to say on the subject, Mr. President.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is gifted not only with a remarkable facility of speech, but he has been blessed with an equally vivid and picturesque imagination. I do not suppose that between now and 2 o'clock, which is five minutes, he would expect anyone to meet any of the suggestions made in his somewhat voluminous remarks. I got up early this morning to look through the RECORD, thinking that I might peruse them before the Senate met, but I found that they were withheld, properly enough, for revision; and so if I were to attempt to answer him now, I must rely upon my memory.

But, Mr. President, to my mind there is but a word to say upon this whole question. The Senator stated yesterday that there were constant recommendations from the Department that these appropriations should be reduced. I venture to say, with all respect to the Senator from North Carolina, that there is nothing of the kind. I can not find them there. I have looked.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will pardon me. He asked me to put it in the RECORD, and I agreed to do it. I find on an examination that in the reports of 1885 and 1887 a specific recommendation was made, but no subsequent report has made it so specifically except by stating the facts and data which I used. I have given the facts on which I based my argument, some part of which the Senator has admitted to be correct.

Mr. WOLCOTT. There is therefore no such recommendation from the Department from year to year. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this increased appropriation is because of the enormously increased facilities extended, the enormously greater demands made for the transportation of mails, the stimulus of new enterprises, of new communities, of vast areas opened to settlement, of the construction of new roads, of the extension of mail facilities to sections of our country which have not been heretofore blessed with them, and because of the increased facilities from day to day between well-known and prominent cities which require increased movement of trains and increased movement of postal cars.

It is these demands, Mr. President, which have called for the increased appropriation. But this year the cost per pound of moving each pound of mail matter will be less than it has been in other years. The cost does not increase. The appropriation increases to the amount of mail carried, and the speed with which it is carried increases more in proportion than the amount of the appropriation.

Now, Mr. President, one word as to the commission. The members of the commission have taken testimony faithfully and patiently and industriously. There is not a member of the commission who is going to serve this coming summer who will not serve at very great personal sacrifice to himself. There is not one of them who would not be glad to avoid the obligation of serving on the commission if he was not held to it by his sense of public duty. There is not one of us who does not intend to report long before the 1st of next March, if it shall be possible. There is not a member of the commission who wants to delay a day longer than is necessary in the conclusion of the investigation which we are making.

And I can say, Mr. President, that the delays so far occasioned have been chiefly occasioned by the impossibility of getting the critics of existing conditions to appear before the commission. We have had no trouble in getting the railroads. They have come with their statements, and naturally enough they were ready to make them. They have not delayed. But we have reached out all over the United States wherever we could learn that any man had a criticism to make of the amount of railway mail pay or of the method of its computation. We have written him and asked him if he would appear before the commission and give his testimony, and the delays that have been occasioned up to this time are in procuring testimony in opposition to existing conditions.

Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina understands the question as to how this pay should be made and upon what basis, he is the only man in the world who does. We do not, and nobody else does. We have taken volumes of testimony of the most intelligent railroad men in the United States and of experts, and they differ. Some say it should be based upon space; some say it should be based upon weight; some say it should be compared with the express; some say it should be compared with freight. There are differences and troubles about making any known comparison. All of them up to this time have ignored the question of public utility and what should be paid for that, and how far, further, the roads ought to furnish a public service for the purpose of building up and populating the very country through which they run by the spread and dissemination of intelligence, and how far they owe a public duty to the country to transport this business without profit.

Mr. President, the commission is endeavoring to deal with this question in a fair spirit, reaching only for the light and for intelligence. The suggestion was made that there was in the action of the commission something political, or that there was pressure from railroads or otherwise. There is nothing of the kind. Mr. President, the suggestion has never been made except here, and I do not think it was ever made seriously here. We are all of us trying to find some fair basis for payment. We have got far enough to know that there are irregularities in payment, and that, if certain roads for certain classes of mail and certain large weight of mail are paid too much, there are certain transportations of small amounts in remote sections of the country where the pay is altogether too small.

That only indicates the absolute unfairness of seeking to make at this time a horizontal reduction. How can you reduce 10 per cent when certain of the roads carrying the mail are to-day getting a sum that does not even pay the expenses of the man who handles the mail, leaving alone the men who handle the mail for the railroads, leaving alone the question of its carriage.

Mr. President, the commission will endeavor to do its duty if the Senate shall intrust it with the province of extending its sessions, and it will complete its sittings and make its report at the earliest possible moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, before the bill goes out of Committee of the Whole, I desire to give notice that in the Senate I will offer the amendment, which was voted upon in Committee of the Whole, introduced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment before the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. HAWLEY. At the hour of 2 o'clock I think the unfinished business should be laid before the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. The unanimous consent given was that the unfinished business should be temporarily laid aside that this vote might be taken.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate, as a matter of form, the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. 11022) for the reorganization of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes. The Chair understands that under the unanimous-consent agreement the bill is to be laid aside and the vote is to be taken upon the Post-Office appropriation bill. The Senator from North Carolina has an amendment pending.

Mr. ALLISON. To vote on all the amendments pending at 2 o'clock was the language of the agreement.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think the agreement includes the pending amendments, and therefore the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is not in order.

Mr. ALLISON. All amendments pending at the hour of 2 are to be voted on.

Mr. BERRY. That is right.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Chair have the unanimous-consent agreement read?

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Chair to have it read.

Mr. MASON. Why can I not make my amendment pending?

It had been voted upon as in Committee of the Whole, and I understand the rule to be that I can have a vote upon the amendment in the Senate. That is all I ask.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit to the Senate, after the bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole and is in the Senate, whether amendments can be offered then in the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. If new amendments are to be offered, the afternoon can be occupied in offering amendments to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read from page 2098 of the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. QUAY. I ask unanimous consent that after the conclusion of the morning business, not later than 1 o'clock to-morrow, the Post-Office appropriation bill be taken up, and that at 2 o'clock the vote be taken upon pending amendments and upon the bill without further discussion.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not care to lose my opportunity at 2 o'clock. I have a right to take the floor at 2.

Mr. QUAY. At 2 o'clock we take the vote.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have a right to take the floor on the Army bill at 2 o'clock.

Mr. GORMAN. Then we can vote at 15 minutes before 2. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania to change the request to 1.45.

Mr. PETTIGREW. We can undoubtedly agree without any hesitation whatever upon the suggestion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BERRY. I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, yes; let it be agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Post-Office appropriation bill and all amendments pending be voted upon after the morning business to-morrow and not later than 2 o'clock.

Mr. GORMAN. And that the bill be taken up at 1 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At 1, or immediately after the morning business.

Mr. FRYE. And that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. For the purpose of taking the vote. The Chair so understands. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. That arrangement is agreeable to me with the condition that I shall have leave to have some matter of importance that I sent to the desk to be read, and the reading of which was not finished, put into the RECORD, and some other data that I have prepared which I wish briefly to discuss to-morrow. I wish about thirty minutes and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] wants about thirty minutes. We have agreed to this with the understanding that probably no one else wishes to speak, but we wish about thirty minutes each. Whatever matter I consider pertinent that I can not get through discussing I shall ask permission of the Senate to put into the RECORD. I should not wish the unanimous-consent agreement to prevent me from putting it into the RECORD.

Mr. QUAY. There is no objection to the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree to the unanimous consent with that understanding.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to have it distinctly understood that the unanimous consent given to vote at 2 o'clock to-morrow——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If not reached before.

Mr. CARTER. If not reached before, is not to operate to displace the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is so understood.

Mr. CARTER. Except temporarily, for the purpose of taking the vote.

Mr. QUAY. My understanding was on yesterday, when the agreement was made, and I think it was the general understanding of the Senate, that at 2 o'clock the discussion upon the bill would cease, and at that hour the voting would commence upon pending amendments and be carried on without further discussion to the final passage of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. That is it.

Mr. BERRY and Mr. FAULKNER. That is right.

Mr. QUAY. That is the understanding, or else it was nonsense to make such an agreement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. CLAY. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, lines 3 and 4, strike out "$33,275,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$30,500,000," and add the following words:

And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1898, for the transportation of mails on railway routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails at least 10 per cent per annum from the rate fixed in section 4002 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by act of July 12, 1876, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," and as further amended by act of June 17, 1878, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight; and the above amount appropriated shall cover full compensation for railway mail transportation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]?

Mr. BUTLER. On that question let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] and vote "nay."

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES of Arkansas was called). My colleague [Mr. JONES of Arkansas] has gone home sick. He is paired generally on all questions with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH]. He is not in his seat, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I will ask if the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Washington has not voted.

Mr. WARREN. I withhold my vote, as I have a pair with that Senator.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who is not in his seat, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. KENNEY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the negative). Although I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], who is absent, I am assured that if present he would vote "nay." As I have voted the same way, I will let my vote stand.

Mr. GEAR (after having voted in the negative). I transferred my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE]. The Senator from South Dakota has since come into the Chamber and voted, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BURROWS (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The senior Senator from Louisiana has not voted.

Mr. BURROWS. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CLARK (after having voted in the negative). As the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] with whom I have a general pair is not in the Chamber, I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. MANTLE. I wish to inquire if the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Virginia has not voted.

Mr. MANTLE. I withhold my vote, as I have a pair with that Senator.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Allen,	Chilton,	Pasco,	Tillman,
Bate,	Clay,	Pettigrew,	Turley,
Berry,	Heitfeld,	Rawlins,	White.

So Mr. BUTLER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. MASON. I desire to offer an amendment which I gave notice I would offer.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I regard the offering of an amendment at this time as a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement of yesterday. I should have objected to the unanimous consent asked if it had not been expressly stated that it referred only to pending amendments. This amendment was not pending, and therefore I object to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair feels himself to be without power to enlarge the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. MASON. If I had not anticipated a vote on this amendment when the bill came out of Committee of the Whole, I should not now ask unanimous consent to offer it. I have had, I think, no fair opportunity to discuss the amendment; and it will only take a very few moments to give us a vote.

There are only two ways in which we can get a vote. One of those ways is by unanimous consent, and the other is by a motion to reconsider. So far, I have found no one who voted in the negative willing to make the motion to reconsider. I should therefore like unanimous consent to have a vote upon the amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. QUAY. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is asked by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] to offer an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. QUAY. Regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate as amended.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill No. 11022.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11022) for the reorganization of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I do not propose to make what is called an oration, nor do I propose now to discuss the minute details of this bill. Those discussions will arise from time to time as we reach the provisions in question. But I wish again to state the general situation. I do not know how it is with others, but to me that is the most effective argument which can be made. I do not see how anybody could have voted against taking up this bill or some Army reorganization bill. Something has to be done. I do not see how anybody can decline to permit the President—to command the President—to enlist and put in the field a sufficient army.

On the 10th of December, 1898, the treaty with Spain was signed by the President, and in the last section of that treaty it was provided:

> The ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington within six months from the date hereof, or earlier if possible.

The Senate has ratified the treaty. The Cortes of Spain assembled yesterday and is, I suppose, in session to-day. I perceive by the reports that they have their own little difficulties at home and are engaged in some controversy; but I think there can be no doubt that they will, within a very short time, possibly to-day, possibly to-morrow, ratify the treaty. It will then be necessary to send a certificated statement of that action. It is not likely that we shall act upon a telegram. When that certification comes here, then in due time, perhaps in two or three weeks, the ratifications will be exchanged. The President, I suppose, could delay, because the treaty says "the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington within six months from the date hereof;" but they can be exchanged undoubtedly within two or three weeks. I see no reason why the President and Sagasta should manage a delay of that action. There undoubtedly will be no delay. Nor do I see how the President of the United States can delay a moment in issuing his proclamation stating the fact of the ratification on both sides, and proclaiming, sir, that thereafter there is peace between Spain and the United States.

What then? It becomes the imperative duty of the President under the statute to discharge about 75,000 volunteers. The waters will be covered with returning ships; and unless we pass this bill or one like it, there will be very few troops going outward as reenforcements to replace those who have come home.

Not the 75,000 men only, Mr. President, but all the regulars who enlisted for the war between the 26th day of May, I think, and the 26th day of October, or some date near there, will be entitled to be discharged. In short, as you all know, I suppose, would be the case, that will bring the Army down to a little less than the 27,000 men which the Regular Army was entitled to when the war troubles began.

Section 4 of the act of April 26, 1898, provides:

> SEC. 4. That the Volunteer Army shall be maintained only during the existence of war, or while war is imminent, and shall be raised and organized, as in this act provided, only after Congress has or shall have authorized the President to raise such a force or to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States: Provided, That all enlistments for the Volunteer Army shall be for a term of two years, unless sooner terminated, and that all officers and men composing said army shall be discharged from the service of the United States when the purposes for which they were called into service shall have been accomplished, or on the conclusion of hostilities.

The last section of the act of April 26, 1898, contains the following:

> Provided further, That at the end of any war in which the United States may become involved the Army shall be reduced to a peace basis by the transfer in the same arm of the service or absorption by promotion or honorable discharge, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may establish, of supernumerary commissioned officers and the honorable discharge or transfer of supernumerary enlisted men; and nothing contained in this act shall be construed as authorizing a permanent increase of the commissioned or enlisted force of the Regular Army beyond that now provided by the law in force prior to the passage of this act, except as to the increase of 25 majors provided for in section 1 hereof.

Under that provision, as I have said, we must reduce the Army to below 27,000, and it must be done instantly. The President and none of the officers under him would think of ordering into battle, or, indeed, even into the defenses, the men whose right to go home would accrue the moment the proclamation was issued—the injustice and cruelty of the situation not being taken into consideration at all. So he is by the touch of a pen reduced to an army of less than 27,000 men, when it is the deliberate judgment of as good a class of men as ever served the public, the officers of the Army now in the field, that we may require, shall require, and are liable to require at any time 100,000 or 98,000 men, as this bill provides. That is their judgment.

Why not? Have we any better judgment than they have? No; we have not so good a judgment on this question. We can deal with the resources of the country, we can decree as to the number of men and the time when they shall be discharged, and various things of that sort, but nothing is left for us but to give an army. Even the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] agrees that there must be a large army. He would allow us 62,000 of the regulars—for which the country ought to be grateful—but he wishes to add to it, knowing that that is insufficient, 35,000 of the inhabitants of the Philippines, Cuba, and Porto Rico, I suppose to serve only in their own countries.

Mr. President, I have a fundamental objection at the threshold to this kind of enlistment. It is provided, if I recollect aright, in the amendment reported by the Senator from Missouri, that the officers shall be citizens of the United States. I ask the Senator if it is not so, that the officers of our Army are to be the officers over the Filipinos?

Mr. COCKRELL. In the bill I presented?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. Are they to be officered by their own men?

Mr. COCKRELL. They are to be officered in the discretion of the President of the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY. We know what his discretion would be. It is proposed to take 35,000 such men as Aguinaldo has now lying, to the number of 20,000 or 30,000, around Manila, give them the good clothing and the excellent weapons of American soldiers, and, if the President should be so unwise, to give them officers of their own choice. We know from the long history of the South American Republics and we know sufficiently the history of the Philippines to realize how ready for an insurrection all those peoples are. All peoples of Spanish blood or extraction are excitable and ready at any time for revolution. That seems to be the chronic state of all those peoples. A very nice republic, which we are all familiar with, and a very worthy and acceptable republic in South America, has escaped with only seventy revolutions in the last one hundred years. I have not the statistics of all of those revolutions, the number of them, the number of depositions, and all that sort of thing, but they are almost countless.

Mr. COCKRELL. How many revolutions did the Senator say?

Mr. HAWLEY. Seventy.

Mr. COCKRELL. In a hundred years?

Mr. HAWLEY. In a hundred years, so I am credibly informed. I refer to Venezuela.

I think the result of putting into our Army twenty or thirty thousand Filipinos, very well equipped in every respect with what the United States furnishes its soldiers, the best of arms included, would be that in about forty-eight hours after they would join Aguinaldo. They feel under no obligation to us. I do not know how much of an oath they may take, or how much they would care for an oath after having taken it, but if this thing should unfortunately go through and an attempt be made to put it into execution, I will prophesy now here—and I shall look back to it, I am sure, hereafter with the feeling that I was a true prophet—that it will result in a grand and calamitous failure.

I do not think the executive department of this Government, which has the awful responsibility of the lead in this matter, would approve it. I think they want an American regular army of whatever size Congress shall see fit to grant. I would give the President the right under this bill to have as many as 98,000 men. I do not think he will abuse it. I do not think he will misuse that power. He has not exhibited any tendency of that description to go beyond his duty or beyond the expectations of the people. He naturally would desire to discharge the troops just as soon as he could so as to reduce expenses and be able to point to a settled close of the difficulties. That will be the height of his ambition.

Are we afraid of the Regular Army? Why, Mr. President, the Regular Army is as completely under our control as the key of a piano. The appropriation lasts but for a year. If you have overdone the numbers, you have but to withhold the appropriation. We adopted all the jealousies of our English forefathers as to a standing army, even after the time had passed when they were needed. In the olden time a king had supreme power over the raising of troops and over the payments for them. Finally, after very much agitation, the people very naturally, as they were growing in the centuries toward freedom, took this power into their own hands; and so money appropriated for the army in England is good for nothing after the expiration of two years, and it is good for nothing here after the expiration of one year. The Army live from hand to mouth by that which is voted to them by these two Houses of Congress. But yet we profess to be afraid of the Army. We can starve them; we can let them go hungry after a year, and undoubtedly we can discharge them at any time. We can repeal the act or order the reduction of the Army at any time.

Then, Mr. President, as a matter of fact, the difference of opinion between the Senator from Missouri and myself is not one of numbers. Sixty-two thousand and 35,000 make 97,000. This bill calls for only 98,000. The question, then, must be as to whether any army is needed at all; and if so, why one as large as 97,000? The Senator waives that question, for he provides for the possibility of 95,000, the chief objection that he raises being that he would take some of them from the Philippines, Cuba, and Porto Rico.

The question, Mr. President, is not whether we shall acquire a temporary sovereignty or whether we shall acquire a full sovereignty over and title to Cuba. Article I of the treaty with Spain says:

> Spain relinquishes all claim of sovereignty over and title to Cuba.

So that much is settled. The article continues:

> And as the island is, upon its evacuation by Spain, to be occupied by the United States, the United States will, so long as such occupation shall last, assume and discharge the obligations that may under international law result from the fact of its occupation for the protection of life and property.

That is well understood everywhere. The question is not whether we shall take Porto Rico and take the responsibility of government in toto, because Article II of the treaty with Spain, which we have agreed to, says:

> Spain cedes to the United States the island of Porto Rico and other islands now under Spanish sovereignty in the West Indies, and the island of Guam in the Marianas or Ladrones.

It is not, then, a question as to Porto Rico; it is not a question whether we shall take the Philippines or not. We have done it. Article III of the treaty says:

> Spain cedes to the United States the archipelago known as the Philippine Islands, and comprehending the islands lying within the following line—

I spare you the geographical description and outline of that great possession.

None of these things are in question. You may regret, as many people do, that our glorious sailor, Dewey, did not sail away from Manila after he had destroyed the Spanish fleet. He could not very well have done so, for various reasons. In the first place, the obligations upon a gentleman and a sailor forbade him doing so, for he would have left many Spaniards to be murdered, and he would have left the property of a friendly nation to be burned and destroyed. The city would have been looted—and what looting is among people of that kind you may imagine, for no man can describe it. I suppose also that he did not have coal for that purpose and had not the means of going away, even if he had so desired. Dewey stayed there and took possession. There is not a man I know of in the United States who would try to revoke all that he has done.

The responsibilities were on us in the face of the world, and they are upon us now. How shall we meet them? Shall we sell those islands to the people of the Philippines? Shall we undertake to give them away? You might plunge Europe in war by that. To whom shall we give them, under what conditions, and how would they permit us to give them? Nobody knows. Shall we abandon them and call the Philippine leaders together and say, "Here, this is a bad job; it is a very uncomfortable situation; exceedingly painful and expensive, and we have concluded to go home?" It would be better to do that than to refuse to raise a good army—far better to do that.

I have no fear of a standing army, sir. As I have said, it is the creature of our finger. We have had no reason in our history to fear it. We have never had a great one, except in the time of the civil war, when we had a wonderful army of a million and a quarter men. It is an interesting paragraph in the history of the world, and will so continue in all time, that all those men engaged on either side went home and became peaceable citizens; and they were better citizens than they would have been if they had not been in that war, for they had learned the duty and the beauty of obedience to command, which is obedience to law. They went home law-abiding citizens. They had learned, I say, the beauty of it. The green soldier came out, and when called by his general, who gave to him an order, he turned about with a sneer and said, "I knew that boy when he was 15 years old; we went to school together;" and he rather sneered at the idea of a command from him.

See that same youthful soldier six months afterwards and hear him receive before the tent of his colonel or his captain a command for a certain duty; see him salute and go upon it cheerfully, and come back and salute, proud of having done exactly what he was ordered to do, salute and retire. He is a different man from what he was when he went there, a more valuable man, a better citizen. He has learned a great deal. We do not fear such men—neither South nor North do we fear them. Many people said, of course, Your mountains will be filled with guerrillas, plundering everybody; we will have a stormy set of people gathered as they gather, I am sorry to say, in some European capitals, bent upon tumult, riot, disorder, possibly insurrection.

Unfortunately for those countries, their people do not all know that which is a very precious thing to the American people to know. We do not think of it very often, but we know how to hold a meeting. A body of Americans desire to do something or say something. They know how to call men together, to choose a presiding officer and a secretary, to appoint a committee on resolutions or recommendations, or whatever it may be; to discuss them, to amend them, to lay upon the table, to indefinitely postpone, to agree to them, and go and fight it out, if that be the thing, and then go home in peace. The privilege of assembling is almost as valuable as the privilege of voting—the ability to understand and discuss an act upon great public questions. I am sorry to say that there is not much prospect of the people of the Philippines learning that lesson immediately or instantly. It is not born with them, and this kind of instruction is born with a man.

So far as I can see, nothing is left but to go forward manfully to our duty of keeping the Executive power fully armed. That, before the world, is our duty. Any other course will be fraught with disaster, and will be the shame of the centuries. You can not deny it.

It seems to me, as I said, that this bare statement is enough, and so I think I shall wait for any further discussion of details until we come to them.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as a member of the Senate committee having under consideration the Hull Army bill, I think it due to myself to explain my position on it—to call attention to matters of commission and omission in it, and to express some opinions on features not fully covered, from my point of view, by the objections offered to the bill by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], on the part of the Democratic members of the committee.

The Hull bill is called "A bill for the reorganization of the Army." On examination, this title is found to be misleading. The title ought to read: "A bill for the increase to one hundred thousand and upward of the officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army of the United States." The only organic change in the service which the bill proposes is in the artillery, namely, to substitute corps for regimental organization. Even this improvement—if it be one—is not carried out, for the regimental officers are retained; also the regimental bands.

In the bill as it came from the House one other change in the military establishment was proposed. Undeniably there were hitches in the conduct of the last war. Legislative action was imperative. Reform hovered in the air and then swooped down upon the canteen. This institution was not completely demolished, but pretty nearly so.

The rest of the bill is merely a sum in arithmetic—in "addition."

The Hull bill was referred to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs on February 1, 1899, and was reported back to the Senate on February 10, 1899. A bill of such importance, in view of its departure from established usage, a bill making such a draft upon our resources, called for mature consideration. This necessary time has been denied us.

Nevertheless, the Senate committee, in my opinion, has strengthened the bill in some minor particulars. The Engineer Corps is made a part of the line of the Army. This appears to be in the direction of better discipline.

"Retired officers may be employed in time of war other than in command of troops." This is a measure of economy and efficiency. These experienced officers can take the place of officers on the active list at recruiting stations, arsenals, barracks, and at the Military Academy. The war investigation commission expressed itself on this subject in this way:

> Under existing laws the officers of the Army are retired when they reach the age of 64. We have had before us many suggestions made by officers on the retired list, who are men of experience and distinction, that this law should be so amended as to give to the President the right to call into active service any retired officers during the time of war. This right exists as to the retired officers of the Navy, and it seems to us there is no reason why it should not be extended to embrace retired Army officers.

It does not appear reasonable that an arbitrary law should prevent, during the existence of war, the use of experienced men merely on account of their age. We think it would be wise to make it discretionary with the President to use the officers on the retired list for filling positions during war, and not trench on the active organization that may be needed in the field.

During the recent war many positions were filled by the appointment of civilians, to which retired officers could have brought professional training, valuable knowledge, and large experience.

The Senate committee has increased the number of cadets to be appointed to the Military Academy by an addition of 2 from each State at large and 20 from the United States at large—a total increase of 100 over that fixed by the present law, or, say, 25 a year for the four years' course. This number will shrink to 10 or 12 through failure to pass examinations. Before the war with Spain, on our peace footing of 25,000 men, the Military Academy failed to meet the needs of the Army in the matter of trained officers. It seems reasonable that the membership in the Military Academy should be increased to correspond, in some measure, with the increase in the number of enlisted men in the the Regular Army.

On the other hand, the committee has not seen fit to make some changes that would seem to be advisable. The number of men to an infantry company has been left, where it stood in the Hull bill, at 145 enlisted men. On the question of the number of men, which should constitute a company for the greatest effectiveness in the field, experienced officers differ. For instance, General Miles believes in a company of 100 men for all arms of the military service. General Schofield prefers a larger company. The efficiency of a military unit in actual warfare would seem to depend in great degree upon the proportion of skilled officers to the number of enlisted men—the higher the ratio of officers, the greater the efficiency. It is expensive, perhaps, but it may mean the difference between victory and defeat. "The man behind the gun" is mighty, but the officer behind "the man behind the gun" is mightier than he. To quote an intelligent writer on this subject:

The Roman centurion was captain of 100 men. The company—the command of a captain—is the foundation of all good armies. There the men first learn obedience and subordination; their individual drill and guard duties; how to preserve health and strength and take care of themselves; how to cook and live as soldiers. On the books of the company is found the military history of the individual, the record of the changes and progress in his soldierly career, and the data on which is founded his claim for provision in impoverished infirmity and old age. The proper command of this unit means personal contact of the commander with his men, and such knowledge of their dispositions, habits, and previous occupations as will enable him to place each man's personality to the best advantage. This personal knowledge, essential to the efficiency of the company, is hardly to be had with more than 100 men.

Nothing in the bill, as it comes from the Senate committee, touches the question of the reorganization of the staff departments. The thinking soldiers of this country believe in a more cohesive organization of these departments, and the thinking people of this country at large appear to be of the same mind. During a time of peace, these semi-independent bureaus move smoothly enough along among their multitudinous papers. But with "the tug of war," we find them tugging in different directions. It may be a long pull, but it is not a strong pull, nor a pull all together. General Runkle writes:

It is certain there will soon be a reorganization of the staff of the Army. At present, while each department is independent, no one can carry on its work successfully without the cooperation of one or more of the others. There is no strictly military head having control over all and to whom each department is responsible for its conduct. Out of this condition has probably grown whatever of failure there has been during the Spanish war. There should be a carefully organized staff, with a chief who would control every department and should be to ours what Moltke was to the German army. Everything then would move with order and precision, and there would be an end of complaints that have their origin in the natural result of a badly organized system.

I give the views of another student of military matters:

The most important feature of the McClellan bill is the provision for a general staff. Few military men will deny the advantages of a general staff organization—not constituted through personal and political reasons. The tendency of the present bureaus is toward complete independence of each other and there should be a central military control.

The general staff should have its relations to the Secretary of War and the General Commanding the Army definitely prescribed. Assignments should not depend on mere favor, but should be determined by merit through the strictly military head of the Army or some properly constituted board.

Besides, the bill does not deal with the anomalous position of the Adjutant-General in his relations to the Secretary of War and the General Commanding.

Furthermore, as existing law does not fix the status of the General Commanding, any bill professing to reorganize the Army ought certainly to correct this unfortunate condition.

As to the situation generally, I read from an editorial in the Philadelphia Press:

It would be impossible to exaggerate the disgust and disappointment with which the American public as a whole regards the present situation at Washington with reference to the Army. In the wrangles and jangles between individuals, the scandals and charges, the denials and countercharges, the public has the least possible interest. These things absorb Washington; but after six months of crimination and recrimination, most sensible men see no way to reach an intelligent opinion without a good deal more examination and information than a busy life permits or furnishes.

But it is perfectly clear, and has been clear for months, that the organization of the Army is altogether faulty and needs reform. The war showed this, and every day since the war has enforced the same lesson. The working of the Army, considered simply as an administrative machine, during the war was altogether unsatisfactory. Throughout there was a lack of clear personal responsibility; of coherent cooperation; of ordered, systematic management; of prompt action, such a lack as in all enterprises indicates a poor organization.

Exactly the same deficiencies have been apparent since the war. In place of the swift, silent, efficient working of a big, well-knit, well-planned, well-run, highly disciplined machine, such as all men associate with an efficient army, the military service of the United States has been the scene of charges and countercharges, of wrangles and cross-purposes, of insults and intrigues which would disgrace a village barroom club.

Into the relative truth and justice of these wretched quarrels it is impossible to enter without a fuller knowledge of the facts than is possible at present, and the public really cares very little who comes out on top. No one at Washington begins to realize how little the country at large cares who holds a particular place as long as the particular job is done with silence, national self-respect, and efficiency. Men are nothing in these things; the Army organization, on which the national honor and safety depend, is everything.

Yet, with every evidence that the entire Army organization needs reform and improvement, nothing has been done. The entire system needs to be recast in the light of the latest military experience. Our own Army organization has remained unchanged for nearly a century. The war showed it to be most inadequate. Yet the War Department has had no plan for reorganization, and the various Army bills and the particular measure which has passed the House leave the organization of the Army substantially unchanged. The Army is enlarged, but, save in certain details as to temporary and permanent staff appointments, no radical change is made. No effort is apparent to use the best experience of the world to improve our Army organization.

If another war came it would find the Army in substantially the same condition as the last, and the same collapse of the staff, the same friction between line and staff, and the same lamentable scandals would succeed. No broad purpose is apparent in the War Department, the Army, or in Congress to cure these evils, and the country, as we have said, is disgusted and disappointed, and with justice and good reason. Instead of reform there are differences, disputes, and quarrels. The result is lamentable. It has lowered the national prestige abroad and diminished the national confidence at home. A grave mistake in public policy will be committed if this situation is permitted to drag on and personal bickering is allowed to hold the stage when there should be some strong, able, and vigorous effort to reform the organization of the Army by some one who has learned and profited by the plain lessons of the late war.

The kernel of the bill is the proposition to increase our permanent army to over 100,000 officers and enlisted men. To this there is a proviso—added under stress of circumstances—authorizing the President to decrease this force to something less than 60,000 men. But the proviso was put into the bill as a vote-catching device and is not to be taken seriously. A large standing army is contrary to the settled policy of our Government. Our uniform policy in the past has been to maintain a small regular army as a nucleus, and, in the event of war, to trust to the organized militia and volunteers to make up the necessary force. Who ask for this increase? Certainly not the producers of this country, who will have to earn the $100,000,000 which will be annually required to pay for it. It is not asked for by the Cuban patriots, neither do our fellow-citizens, the Filipinos, demand it. Perhaps it is asked for by the Army officers themselves. On a technical military question touching tactics, or the administration of the Army, I am disposed to listen to a military officer. But on the sole question of an increase in the Army I would hesitate to follow him implicitly. As well consult a toreador on the benefits of bull-fighting. With the Army officer, in the very nature of things, it is increase, more increase, still more increase!

To even approximate to the number of troops which is really needed is a matter of exceeding difficulty. General Miles thinks that 15,000 men are sufficient in Cuba. The army of Spain in Cuba at the outbreak of the last war for independence numbered 12,000. Our special commissioner, Robert P. Porter, is credited with the following statement, made at Havana on February 3 last:

While the situation here has been improved and simplified by the declaration of General Gomez that he will immediately take part in the pacification of Cuba, the advantage thus gained should be followed up by the American authorities. The entire policing of the island should be done by the Cubans themselves. The real police work is, in fact, now in the hands of Cuban soldiers, and law and order are well maintained. There should not be a moment's delay in the organization and equipment of these civil guards.

The bulk of the American soldiers must be taken out of Cuba by April. There is really no necessity for more than two regiments in each province, to serve as a background of support for the Cuban police. In giving the best of these people employment, all the more will be left of the relief fund for those who must be helped back to the island.

As there are five provinces in Cuba, Mr. Porter thinks 10,000 men sufficient. According to the opinion of those who have visited the island and understand the sentiment of its people, not more than 3,000 men will be required in Porto Rico. A regiment or two will be needed in Hawaii. As for the Philippines, if the present programme is carried out the number of men is a matter of pure conjecture—it may be 20,000 or it may be 200,000. For myself, I would say none; no soldiers should be mustered in for the purpose of shooting our ideas of liberty and justice into an alien people.

At home, there ought to be some increase in the artillery to adequately man the new seacoast fortifications. Aside from this there is no demand for more troops in the United States proper, as distinguished from the United States improper. [Laughter.] The Indians within our borders are no longer a menace. The constabulary and the National Guard are quite able to control domestic disturbance. Externally, Mexico does not threaten us. The Cuban question, now that Spain has evacuated the West Indies, has ceased to be a thorn in our side. It is inconceivable, in the light of recent occurrences, that any question can come up between Great Britain and ourselves not solvable by arbitration.

Never in the history of our Government could it so well afford to totally disarm. And yet, finding ourselves in this condition and standing on the threshold of a peace with Spain, we are urgently asked to quadruple the peace footing of our permanent Army.

Mr. PROCTOR obtained the floor.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Vermont is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator from Vermont yield to me a moment?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to give notice that at the proper time I shall offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for section 18 of the bill. I ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I now offer the five amendments of which I gave notice yesterday, and ask that the first one be considered. I do not care to have it read unless the reading is called for.

Mr. BACON. Let them be read. We desire to know what the amendments are.

Mr. BATE. Let the amendments be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Vermont merely desires that the amendments shall be laid before the Senate for the purpose of this discussion.

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let them be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). The first proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the proviso in section 6, commencing in line 2 on page 10, which reads as follows:

Provided, That all vacancies created or caused by this section shall be filled by promotion and appointment as now prescribed by law, but no person shall be appointed to the position of major and assistant adjutant-general until he shall have passed a satisfactory examination similar to that required for promotion to the rank of major prescribed by regulations made under the act of Congress approved October 1, 1890.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That after the passage of this act such vacancies in the Adjutant-General's Department, except that of the head of the corps, as can be filled by regular promotion of officers now in that corps shall be so filled in accordance with existing law, but no new appointments shall be made; and all vacancies not subject to be filled by such promotion shall be filled by detail by the Secretary of War of officers of the line of the same grade in which the vacancy exists. The chief of the corps, however, shall, in case of vacancy, be detailed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from the brigadier-generals, colonels, or lieutenant-colonels of the Army, and such officer, while at the head of the corps, shall have the pay and allowances of a brigadier-general.

The details shall be for the term of four years, unless sooner relieved, and officers below the grade of lieutenant-colonel shall not be eligible to another detail until they have served in the line for a time equal to their last previous service on staff detail. Officers above the grade of major shall be eligible to repeated detail without restriction. Officers serving under this provision on staff detail shall take rank in their grade according to the date of their detail. The detail of an officer, except when it relieves another officer to go back to service in the line, shall be treated as creating a vacancy at the foot of his grade in the line, which shall be filled by regular promotion, the purpose of this provision being not to deplete the number of officers available for duty in the line, but to maintain as many line officers as are authorized by law for companies and regiments, and a sufficient number in excess to fill the staff details hereby authorized.

Details shall be apportioned as nearly as may be among the three arms of the line of the Army in proportion to the number of officers in each, and the details shall be made from those officers who have been recommended for their special qualifications for the duties to which they are assigned, as shown by the efficiency reports of their superior officers forwarded through military channels and on file in the office of the Adjutant-General.

While on staff duty the officer's name shall still be carried on the register in its proper place, with a notation stating the staff department to which he is detailed, and when his detail terminates or when promoted he shall return to his arm of service, preserving his lineal rank therein: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall not be required to fill a vacancy in any staff department if, in his judgment, a less number of officers will suffice to perform the duties properly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Vermont offers this amendment at the present time?

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes; as an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. The amendments are part and parcel of the same proposition. Let the whole thing be read, so as to present the entire question.

Mr. PROCTOR. The other amendments referred to are as follows:

Strike out the proviso in section 7 of said bill, commencing in line 15 on page 10, which reads as follows:

Provided, That all vacancies created or caused by this section shall be filled by promotion and appointment as now prescribed by law, but no person shall be appointed to the position of major and inspector-general until he shall have passed a satisfactory examination similar to that required for promotion to the rank of major prescribed by regulations made under the act of Congress approved October 1, 1890.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That all vacancies in the Inspector-General's Department shall be filled in the same manner and subject to the same regulations and restrictions as is hereinbefore provided for filling vacancies in the Adjutant-General's Department.

Also strike out both provisos in section 9 of said bill, commencing, respectively, in lines 16 and 19 on page 12, down to and including line 2 on page 13, which read as follows:

Provided, That all vacancies in the grade of colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major created or caused by this section shall be filled by promotion, according to seniority, as now prescribed by law: And provided further, That persons who have served in the Volunteer Army in the war with Spain, and persons in civil life, may be appointed to positions in the grade of captain created by this section; and such persons, prior to appointment, shall be examined as to their moral, mental, and physical fitness for service; but no such person shall be appointed to the grade of captain after he shall have reached the age of 40 years.

And insert in lieu thereof the two following provisos:

Provided, That all vacancies in the Quartermaster-General's Department shall be filled in the same manner and subject to the same regulations and restrictions as is hereinbefore provided for filling vacancies in the Adjutant-General's Department: And provided further, That the Secretary of War may, when in his judgment it may be for the interest of the service, detail the same officer for duty in the Quartermaster's and the Subsistence Departments, but such detail shall create but one vacancy in the line.

Also, strike out the two provisos in section 10 of said bill, commencing, respectively, in lines 14 and 17, on page 13, which read as follows:

Provided, That all vacancies in the grades of colonel and lieutenant-colonel and major created or caused by this section shall be filled by promotion, according to seniority, as now prescribed by law: And provided further, That persons who have served in the Volunteer Army in the war with Spain, and persons in civil life, may be appointed to the grade of captain created by this section; and such persons, prior to appointment, shall be examined as to their moral, mental, and physical fitness for service; but no such person shall be appointed to the grade of captain after he shall have reached the age of 40 years.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That all vacancies in the Subsistence Department shall be filled in the same manner and subject to the same regulations and restrictions as is hereinbefore provided for filling vacancies in the Adjutant-General's Department.

Also, strike out the second proviso in section 14 of said bill, commencing in line 25, on page 18, which reads as follows:

And provided further, That all vacancies created or caused by this section shall be filled by promotion and appointment as now prescribed by law.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

And provided further, That all vacancies in the Ordnance Department shall be filled in the same manner and subject to the same regulations and restrictions as is hereinbefore provided for filling vacancies in the Adjutant-General's Department, except that they shall be taken wholly from the artillery arm of the service.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, these amendments, taken as a whole, change by a gradual process the present system of permanent appointments in five of the staff corps of the Army, viz, the Adjutant-General's, Inspector-General's, Quartermaster-General's, Commissary, and Ordnance, to one of detail, substantially like the Navy system, that of the English army, and, to some extent, of the armies of continental Europe. The status of the present members of these corps is not affected. They go on and receive their regular promotion until they retire, but the vacancies are filled by detail for four years instead of by appointment.

I make no attack upon any of our staff corps. On the contrary, I believe they have universally rendered faithful and generally excellent service, but no better, certainly, than the line, and at far less risk of life and health. But their good service has been a result of the ability and high character of the officers of our Army generally and in spite of a vicious system.

If the bill passes in its present form, we can not expect any reform in Army organization for twenty-five or fifty years, and we are already fifty years behind the times. The present evils will be intrenched stronger than ever. I am confident that the adoption of these amendments will aid the passage of the bill. A staff corps is a feature of all well-organized modern armies. These amendments, while they do not directly establish a staff corps, make it possible and feasible to do so within a few years. In fact, they go as far in that direction as it is practicable to go now without encountering interested opposition that would doubtless be fatal.

In advocating this change, let me describe briefly the present system which this bill continues, and state some of its evils. Each staff corps is entirely distinct by itself and its members permanently separated from service with troops or in another staff corps. When a vacancy occurs in the staff the promotions are made regularly and an appointment is made at the foot of the list. Less care is used than would be in an appointment to a higher place. It is a mere statement of fact to say that the man who has the strongest pull usually gets the place. It is oftener obtained on political influence; sometimes on personal or social.

Permit me to state the common method. There is a vacancy, or is to be one, of a captaincy in the Quartermaster's Department. The scramble for the place commences months before the vacancy actually occurs. There are about six hundred first lieutenants in the line of the Army, aside from the temporary increase; one hundred or more of them—sometimes three hundred, I am informed—are applicants for the place.

There are hundreds of others just as well fitted who do not, either because they have no influential political friends to back them, or in many cases, I am glad to say, because many of the most deserving officers of the Army, from a nice sense of honor and propriety, will never seek preferment or allow their friends to do so for them, resting their claims entirely, and, with rare exceptions, vainly, upon their record. The applicants in these cases file briefs giving their record, with letters from military officers, personal and political friends. These briefs are often printed pamphlets of many pages.

The wives, mothers, and sisters of the applicants in personal interviews appeal to the President and Secretary. This scramble to get out of the fighting branch of the Army is at least unseemly. Of course, but little consideration is given to most of these applications. Senator A or Representative B has a relative or a constituent with powerful influence behind him, and he demands the appointment and gets it. The appointee has received a promotion of a grade, not upon merit, but by influence, and in doing it has jumped many of his fellow-officers quite as good or better than he.

No system could be better calculated to kill ambition. The officer is certain of his future. He has his office and his clerks in a city, for quite a part of his service is in Washington and other large cities. Except in times of great emergency he has regular office hours, none of the hardships of frontier posts and unhealthful climes, none of the labor and responsibility of commanding and training and caring for men. He and his family have all the advantages of good society and his children of schools. Of course some of these men must become "bureauized," to coin a word. But if they keep within the lines of military law, which is easy, they are safe in their positions. A tour of duty with troops or a permanent return to the line of such men would be greatly for their good and that of the service.

I have a list here of the appointments for the last ten years. In many cases officers have jumped over a hundred of their seniors, and sometimes up to five and six hundred.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask a question? Is there not a difference between Secretaries of War?

Mr. PROCTOR. Human nature is much the same, and transgression is progressive. I think when almost any Secretary catches on to the points, he will fall into the rut. I was glad to notice that the first Secretary under Harrison's Administration was a little careful for a time, but it was for want of comprehension of his opportunities and not from any virtue. [Laughter.]

The purpose of these amendments is in part as follows:

First. To inaugurate a system of staff detail in substantial conformity to that of the Navy, which has given so good practical results there, and which has just been extended by the personnel bill. Let me quote the reply given by the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to an interrogatory of the Senator from Missouri in the debate last Friday on the personnel bill:

> The Senator knows that the difference which has always been maintained, and a very important and useful difference between the Army and the Navy, is that all of these corps and the heads of the corps are subject at any time for proper cause to removal, and that they only hold for four years at any rate. So the Secretary of the Navy does not find himself, as the Secretary of War does, confronted with bureaus over which he has no control, and whose positions last for life. There is nothing of that kind in the Navy.

Second. To make it possible in a few years to establish a staff corps, a leading feature of all the best modern armies, and to combine the Quartermaster's and Commissary Departments, if hereafter deemed advisable. These results can readily be accomplished when all the officers of these corps become detailed instead of appointed officers, as their staff service will then be temporary, terminable at pleasure, and their interests will not be affected. It is concentration of staff authority, and not division and distribution, that our service needs.

Third. To make the staff service in our comparatively small Army educational, and to train a much larger number of officers for staff duty, whose services would be available in an emergency. Now an officer in the staff is a fixture there, whether he proves to be the right man for the place or not. The line officer has no opportunity to be tried in staff duty. His juniors are appointed over him, and the time soon goes by when he could accept a place at the foot of a staff corps, where he must go if appointed. Under a detail system a good officer would doubtless be selected early and serve on different staff corps and have the all-around training so important for a high command. An opportunity would be given to test the qualifications of many officers for the peculiar duties of the different staff corps, and in the end those who proved best would receive the higher details; and there would always be a good number of officers in the line well trained in every staff duty whenever an increase is desired.

In this connection I wish to speak of the custom in the English army. I think the most prominent generals of the English army for years have served in both the adjutant-general's and quartermaster's departments. I have a list here furnished me by a general officer of our Army, in which he states that Sir Evelyn Wood, Lord Roberts, Sir Redvers Henry Buller, Sir Herbert Kitchener, and Lord Wolseley have all served in those positions. Lord Wolseley served in England, in Ireland, in Canada in the Winnipeg rebellion, and in China, India, and Egypt, and interspersed with this service he held inferior positions as quartermaster, and adjutant-general, and inspector, and finally as quartermaster-general, going back after his quartermaster-generalship to serve with troops, and then as adjutant-general, and now he is commander in chief.

Fourth. These amendments give the President and Secretary of War greater and proper power when they most need it, to form and re-form the staff to meet the demands of the service during their terms of office and to take away the power to make permanent appointments of young officers, before they have demonstrated their fitness therefor, to the serious future detriment of the service.

Fifth. They divorce politics from the Army and the Army from politics. The training of our officers at West Point is admirable; perfect in this respect. Political or other influence is of no avail there, but the cadet stands on merit alone. The Military Academy board can not be swerved in their action by Senators, Secretaries, or even Presidents. The officer is started right on his course, but soon learns that influence counts to secure staff appointments. These amendments remove the temptation to use influence, as the detail is temporary and gives no increased rank, except in case of the head of the corps.

In the natural order of things details would be made upon merit, while influence counts largely in appointments to lower grades, and when an officer is once appointed he rises by regular promotion to be the second in rank in the corps. If there is a vacancy at the head, he and his friends claim it as his right, and a President often appoints him chief rather than to jump him, when he would prefer another. These amendments leave the President unembarrassed by claims of rank, and equally free to select the chief from a large number of officers.

Sixth. The amendment providing that service in the Ordnance Corps shall be open to the whole artillery arm is clearly just. It is a parallel case to that of the engineers and line of the Navy. The men who use the guns ought to know how to make them, and the frequent infusion of fresh blood in that department, as in others, will be for the benefit of the service.

I appeal, Mr. President, in behalf of the line of the Army, the men who endure the hardships and privations, who are stationed on the frontiers, who often must be separated from their families, and must send their children a long distance away for education and incur large expense. Let us do simple justice to these men, the fighting branch of the Army, to the officers who expose their lives in battle and to the greater danger of pestilential climate.

Our victory at Santiago was won by the line of the Army. Over 20 of these officers of the line were killed there; 87 of them wounded. Some of these have since died, many of them are maimed for life, while I think only one of the permanent staff serving as such was wounded; that was an assistant surgeon. Let us give these officers an equal chance in all respects with the staff serving in a bureau office. These amendments will do much in that direction. The bill as it stands will perpetuate a great injustice to the line of the Army and a constant danger of inefficiency and friction in the staff.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, we have before the Senate two propositions for providing an army. One, the Hull-Hawley bill, is a systematic, carefully balanced measure, by which we provide definitely and quite minutely for the whole establishment—officers and enlisted men, staff and line, rank and file, artillery, cavalry, infantry, engineer, signal, and hospital corps, etc., the whole structure resting on the broad foundation of the knowledge gained in all of our past experiences, including the late Spanish war, and including the changes wrought by new inventions and modern tactics and knowledge of warfare at home and abroad. In this bill we have measured our necessities and our resources.

The other bill, the Cockrell or substitute bill, Mr. President, is at most a makeshift. It can be nothing more, because it is temporary and general, with no details worked out. It carries with it all the faults of the organization heretofore, and promises no improvements whatever. It supplies none of the wants and strengthens none of the weaknesses developed in our late experience. In this temporizing measure we will perpetuate all that is or ought to be obsolete and all that is faulty, while correcting no errors, reforming no methods, making no progress.

Mr. President, the world has made long strides and very remarkable progress of late in matters of war, in ordnance and armament of high power, in projectiles, in rapid-firing arms, in smokeless powder, etc., and therefore a different personnel, a different assignment and alignment of forces, is required; in fact, it is almost indispensable. Yet the bill offered by the Senator from Missouri recognizes none of these changes and provides for none of these necessities. The armies of to-day, with the newer inventions and more powerful machinery and munitions of war, should be differently constituted from the old. There should be less proportionately in the way of manual, physical strength in the number of enlisted men and more in the way of education, experience, and accurate training. In other words, it requires more commissioned and noncommissioned officers and privates of the first class and fewer private soldiers of the ordinary class than formerly, because of our different methods. Notwithstanding this acknowledged fact, the substitute bill proposes an inverse ratio, a greater proportion of uneducated, untrained enlisted men, and a less proportion of the educated and the trained.

To illustrate this and to be accurate, I will state that in 1853, before the civil war, the proportion of commissioned officers to enlisted men in our Army was 1 officer to every 9.63. After the increase of the Army some years ago to 25,000 men we had 535 general and staff officers and 1,629 line officers, giving a total of 2,164 commissioned officers, and this with 25,000 men gave us 1 commissioned officer to every 11.57 enlisted men. Bear in mind we had 1 officer to 11.57 enlisted men for the twenty years previous to the war with Spain.

We then increased the Army to 27,000, the increase being in the artillery. This change did not vary the percentage very much, except to leave our forces still shorter in general and staff officers. Then by the act of 1898 and during the war we increased the Army to 63,166, more than twice and a half as large as before, and in doing this added but 43 officers to the entire list of staff and general officers and but 249 to the line. This great increase in enlisted men and very slight increase in commissioned officers raised the proportion to 25.69 enlisted men to each officer, so that we then had less than one-half the percentage of officers to men that had prevailed before, notwithstanding the contention that with improved modes of warfare the percentage ought to change in the other direction.

But the Cockrell bill, Mr. President, would leave us still worse off, for at its maximum the percentage would be 1 officer to 31 men, more than three times as many men in proportion to officers as in 1853, nearly three times as many as in 1878 and up to 1898, and even a 20 per cent greater discrepancy than during the last year.

With the Hull-Hawley bill we would have, with the Army at minimum, 1 commissioned officer to every 16.6 enlisted men—not quite the regulation 16 to 1, but nearly enough to notice the coincidence. With the maximum in the same bill we should have 1 officer to 27.8 men. Surely not too many officers in either minimum or maximum, judged by any standard, past numbers, past experiences, near or remote, or present and prospective methods, all considered.

It is true that this substitute bill follows the regular establishment or Regular Army of to-day as to staff as far as it goes, but at present and all during the late war we have had a large volunteer force, practically unlimited in the number of officers and men, so that the War Department and the President have been able to provide from the volunteer forces for the shortages in the regular establishment.

But by this very bill proposed the Volunteer Army ceases to exist, and the regular establishment must then stand unsupported, and will be consequently crippled and hampered in its organization, particularly as to staff, and open to every criticism that has been made against the Army and its operations during the late war; yea, and more, because you intensify the weaknesses heretofore admitted as existing. With all the increase which the substitute bill proposes and which as to enlisted men is larger in its minimum by some 3,000 and smaller in its maximum by only about 1,000 than the regular bill, not a man (or but one only) is added to the staff, nothing to the corps of surgeons, no quartermasters nor subsistence officers, in fact no help at all as to the general and staff officers and noncommissioned staff corps, just where help is most imperatively needed.

The yellow journals, in their attacks upon the management of the war, have found all their ammunition for attack in alleged shortcomings of general and staff officers of the Army. Have the soldiers been neglected in sickness? Have they been short of food, or has the food been bad? Has there been failure in securing proper transportation facilities? Then the fault is surely not with the privates and the noncommissioned officers or with the officers of the line. They have been in sufficient numbers, with the assistance of volunteers, to be able to perform their duties and keep abreast the current work.

But in the staff it has been constantly shorthanded and tremendously overworked, notwithstanding the temporary relief supplied from the volunteer forces. As an instance, those who have had business with the Adjutant-General's Office—and who among us has not—know full well how overworked have been its officers and employees. Take its chief officer, the Adjutant-General. I assume that every Senator in this body will agree with me in conceding that if he had not been of iron constitution, tremendous will power, and great executive ability in transacting business, he would months ago have been in his grave, a most brutally overworked man. His office has been open almost night and day and thronged with callers, his desk piled high with telegrams, his whole suite of offices overflowing with letters, under all of which his regular and special forces have been struggling.

Night and day, Sunday and weekday, there has been no rest or let-up, no cessation; secretaries and confidential employees hardly leaving the building for weeks, scarcely removing clothing or reaching a bed for days at a time. There was a little repose upon a lounge or in a big chair for a few hours out of the twenty-four, and all of the rest of the time it was hurry and scurry and work. This was measurably true in the other Departments. And yet this proposed substitute bill seems to expect the same staff force, or rather a lesser one—for the bill will really reduce it—to go on handling all the affairs of peace and war of our forces at home, in Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines.

Mr. President, general officers and staff officers are the directing power of an army. They perform in the Regular Army establishment much the same functions that the brain does in the human system. The arm, the hand, the fist can administer a powerful blow, the foot can apply a most vigorous kick, great muscular power is possessed and enforced by different parts of the body, but the brain is the equilibrium. The organ has not in itself the muscular force which administers the blow or the kick, but it guides and governs all parts of the body.

So with the staff of an army. It maps out, it plans, it divides and subdivides, it connects all of the arteries and forces of the entire army in all its divisions. It directs and relegates authority. I do not mean to assert that individual members of the staff possess more brains or a higher order of intelligence than other officers of the Army, but the positions and duties are such that army success in peace or war must depend on its ability, faithfulness, and industry. Therefore any bill which does not carefully consider general officers and staff is faulty and incomplete. You can not treble or quadruple the numerical force of the Army and extend operations over the West Indies in the Atlantic and the islands of the Pacific—Hawaii and the Philippines—and successfully conduct it all with the same general officers and staff with which you handled an army of 25,000 men in times of peace in our own country, and that, too, before the installing of our growing system of coast defenses. It is preposterous to suggest it and expect anything but disastrous results.

Mr. President, I can not say too much in favor of the Army being provided liberally with educated, experienced officers of the line, commissioned and noncommissioned, and a high grade of men; for, no matter how patriotic the private soldier may be, he must have proper training and direction for his patriotism and strength in order to be effective in modern warfare. And this brings me to another question.

The substitute bill provides for private soldiers enough, but not enough officers—in fact, for no more officers—and this notwithstanding the present acknowledged shortage of officers all along the line. We have to-day the spectacle of troops at the front, where war or disturbance may ensue at any moment, with only, in one case, 7 commissioned officers and in another 12 for line and field duty in regiments of 12 companies each.

Yet, notwithstanding this present shortage of commissioned officers, we have no officers on detail duty that can be drawn in. Take, if you please, the matter of military schools throughout the United States. Not a single one of the State institutions or private institutions where military tactics are taught and cadets are instructed has a commissioned officer of the United States to-day. Is this right? Is this the way to make citizen soldiers? Is this the way to teach our growing boys the art of war, so that in cases of necessity when we call for volunteers we may have a reasonable number of them educated, in some slight degree at least, in military affairs? Look at your militia in all the States under the orders of the respective governors. There should be in every State on the staff of the governor a United States Army officer, one of the best and most experienced drill masters and disciplinarians, in order to assist the militia and its officers, and for that matter the governor himself, in educating the citizen soldiers as State militia. You have not an officer for this duty now. What is this country to depend upon in case of war with some great foreign power?

Where are you to get an army unless you depend upon the volunteers, the citizen soldiers? You have Germany with a standing army of nearly 500,000 men, Russia with an army of nearly 800,000 men, France, Great Britain, and others with powerful armies, while we, under either one of these bills, will have an army of less than 100,000 officers and men, staff and line, professors and all. What are you to do about your Indian agencies, heretofore according to law largely filled by Army officers? What are you doing now with your Army schools of instruction? Are they not now all closed? Are there officers enough to man them? The one at Leavenworth is closed, out of business. The one at Fort Monroe, the one at Fort Riley, all closed—no officers, no instructors. Is this the way we are to produce and promote an efficient army? What about all the costly structures throughout the United States in the way of forts, nearly all of them now without officers? A few sick men, with a corporal or a sergeant, at one; four or six soldiers and a sergeant at another, and so on.

We have instituted some six military divisions in Cuba and are collecting our customs and administering government in all of these with United States officers. United States commissioned officers are collecting taxes, carrying the accounts, in fact doing the work usually performed by civil government. In Porto Rico it is the same; in the Philippines it is the same. And yet you propose to leave the staff exactly where it is, and where it was when we had 25,000 men and only our own country to guard—no war or insurrection, but perfect and pleasant peace. Under the substitute bill the same general officers and staff that did only the work in this country in time of peace, and with only 25,000 men, are now expected to take care of this country the same as before, take care of the different divisions in Cuba, Porto Rico, Sandwich Islands, and the Philippines. Three major-generals, including the Commanding General of the Army, and six brigadier-generals for the whole United States and these outlying countries, and just the same number of colonels, lieutenant-colonels, etc., for the staff that have been found necessary in the United States alone, and with one-fourth the number of men.

Who are you going to put in command at all these distant points, and what officers will assist? Your staff officers are not numerous enough, and you have none that can be spared from the line. What about line officers for the native troops that you propose to enlist under the substitute bill? Will you leave that to the President? Where will he get them? Will he detail them from the Regular Army? If so, how will you fill the places of such officers so detailed? Can he appoint to the Regular Army as in the volunteer service? No; you do not give him that privilege under the Cockrell bill. You give the President the privilege of appointing, and that without confirmation or consultation, officers for the proposed native troops, but unless he takes them from the Regular Army, leaving the places thus made vacant unfilled, he must appoint all officers for foreign or outside service either from the natives themselves or from civil life.

Are you ready and willing at the present time to recruit a force in the Philippines, we will say, where all the officers and men shall be natives of that country? Are you willing at this time to trust implicitly in their loyalty, constancy, and ability? If not, do you think you will have as perfect an army there by appointing as their officers civilians and men uneducated in military affairs as if you had Regular Army officers and proper organization? Will such a force be effective? Will it be economical? Not at all.

In fact, turn it any way you will, there is not a single affirmative proposition in the Cockrell bill that is not contained in the Hull-Hawley bill or in acts already passed. There is not a single positive restriction in the substitute bill that is not contained in the other bill or in the present statutes. But there are scores of things left out of the Cockrell bill, and necessary provisions, too, that are included in the Hull-Hawley bill. The latter covers all the former and contains, in addition, that which is necessary to make it good legislation.

In the printed objections of the honorable Senator from Missouri, Document No. 123, which I have in my hand, he avers, first, that the reorganization of the Army is an important question, far-reaching in its effects, and that it should be approached with care. That is exactly our contention, and its importance has been duly weighed and carefully considered in the bill which we now propose and which is the result of long study and hard work. The departments, staff, field and line, rank and file, have all contributed; the Military Committee of the House and the House itself, and the Military Committee of the Senate as well, and the consensus of all is represented in this carefully prepared measure.

It is next affirmed in the Senator's bill of exceptions, or objections rather, that the reorganization of the Army should be done thoroughly and deliberately, to the end that it should be made superior to any existing military organization in the world. To this I agree. But deliberation does not require that men shall be born and die, and still other generations shall be born and die, and so on from year to year, generation after generation, without attempting to do anything in the line of betterment, without moving in the line of progress, constantly refusing to organize because we are deliberating, still deliberating. As an instance of this, note the delay in re-forming our infantry regiments to the three-battalion formation.

The matter was agitated for years and years, for decades, yet, Mr. President, these deliberators who are now deliberating on the reorganization of the Army never got to a point where they were ready to take on the three-battalion formation, simply because it added a few majors to the Army and they feared it would not be a popular move with some of their constituents. While other nations went on progressing, one after another adopting the three-battalion formation until at last the United States and China were the sole representatives of the old fashion, still we were unable, Mr. President, to do what other nations had done, or to do what it seemed as if everyone in this nation must approve of, namely, to get our infantry onto an effective fighting basis. Poor old China and we still trudged on together, glorying in the antiquity of our tactics and in the fact that we were the only two nations that revered the ways of the fathers. Finally, when war had overtaken us and we were compelled to legislate in other lines, we managed to incorporate a three-battalion clause, and our deliberations along that line were ended.

Of course, our forefathers had a different infantry formation and they had different arms. The flintlock was a great arm and a dangerous weapon in its day, but there seems no reason why we should not use a better and a more modern gun now; nor is there any reason why we should not at once reorganize our Army. Nothing will be gained by waiting except more confusion.

Further on in this bill of objections occurs the observation that the bill only changes the present organization in one particular, that of discontinuing the regimental organization of the artillery arm. Surely my friend the Senator from Missouri must have made this statement hastily, for there are changes all the way through. There are some changes in all lines—artillery, infantry, cavalry, signal, hospital corps, and others.

It may be said that some of these changes are slight, that they do not amount to anything; but, Mr. President, I maintain just the opposite. Every one of these changes, even though referring to the minor officers, or to the classification of first and second class privates, or to the creation of new positions under the heads of corporals and sergeants for the noncommissioned staff, etc., are yet details that have been carefully considered and are such as go to make up a perfect organization and a successful working force.

In the largest and most powerful engines there are small, almost infinitesimal, parts that are just as necessary to its mechanism as the more ponderous pieces. The machinery can not run without these small pieces, and each piece, large or small, is necessary to success. So in the working of the Army. The smaller matters of reform in the Hospital Corps, in the Subsistence and Supply Departments, and in others are just as important as some of the larger matters. There are innumerable changes and improvements in the bill we are advocating, and it can not be successfully maintained that it fails to reorganize the Army, as it proposes to do in its title.

Now, Mr. President, what does the Cockrell bill provide? First, that the Volunteer Army shall be discharged. That is provided for already by existing law, and I take it the law is mandatory in this; so that that much of the substitute law is unnecessary. Section 2 of the bill provides for the discharge of the last year's increase of the Regular Army, but that, too, is accomplished by existing law; so this section is unnecessary. Section 3 provides that the President may, in his discretion, organize a military force in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the islands of the Pacific of 35,000 enlisted men. Well, this is provided for in the Hull-Hawley bill, and, in my opinion, much more methodically and satisfactorily. There is no provision made in the Cockrell bill for officers for these men of the islands unless it be under the provision in the section which says, "and officers as the President may direct."

Now, Mr. President, if there are any who think that the Hull-Hawley bill goes too far and gives too much latitude and too much discretion to the President, they will observe that the Cockrell bill gives even more, as it authorizes the President to appoint for these outside military forces, without any restrictions whatsoever, all the commissioned officers he may see fit to appoint, without examination, without any qualifications as to age and fitness, and without saying "by your leave" to anybody whatsoever. Hundreds, yes, thousands, of commissioned Army officers may be appointed without submitting the name of a single one to the Senate for confirmation, as is the case of all other officers, military or otherwise, in times of war or peace.

While I may not object personally to such a wide discretion as this substitute bill contains in this particular, yet I submit that it does not comport with the usual precautions and safeguards that the author of the bill usually proposes. I may be willing, and so may the Senator from Missouri, to trust the present Executive; in fact, I hasten to state that I am willing to trust him in all these matters, for he has never yet betrayed a trust or taken undue advantage of discretionary power; but I yet contend that it is not good law nor good practice, and it would probably be burdensome to the Executive himself to load upon him such responsibilities and questionable privileges when there is another and better way.

Section 4 of the substitute provides for one promotion and one new officer in the Record and Pension Division. The Hull-Hawley bill provides the same. And in this invidious distinction of adding one more commissioned officer only, the Cockrell bill directly attacks or ignores, to say the least, every other department and staff of the Army. The Cockrell bill does not save money for the nation, for although it demands fewer Regular Army officers, it provides or leaves the door open for more provisional Army officers and more Regular Army enlisted men than does the Hull-Hawley bill at its minimum. Indeed, if the President should execute the authority given him, there could be more officers, so far as our foreign forces are concerned, than under the other measure; but the Regular Army staff and general officers would still be short, and the Army crippled accordingly. As I have said before, with a bigger minimum, with almost no less a maximum, and with the door wide open for appointments in the line, it can not be said that the substitute bill is an economical measure, so far as pay roll is concerned.

So far as effectiveness is concerned under such a bill, the Army would not perhaps merit the accusation of being top heavy, but it would be water-logged, dead-weighted, and handicapped with its over-much physical manual force in the rank and file, while light and unsteady in its upper story—its managing factors. It is not in the present age the mass of human flesh that we hurl at the enemy's works that wins the day. We have other and more subtile means. In our modern warfare improvement and progress are everywhere apparent. We now employ electricity to perform duties that were formerly executed by men and animals. We now, through our signal and engineer corps, have cable and telegraph lines everywhere, running, indeed, to the very firing line when our armies are in battle. While men and horses were formerly dashing headlong back and forth carrying dispatches and information, the telegraph and telephone lines now bring out such information, and it is instantaneously delivered and received.

We even inspect our enemies' camps through the agency of balloons; hovering over them in the air, photographing their situation and the position of their troops, reproducing as in a mirror their exact condition. And in the matter of our artillery, instead of the old muzzle-loading, slow-firing arm, with a projectile that would hardly make its way through a sandbag or the slightest earthwork establishment, we now send forth hundreds of projectiles where one could be sent before, each one having many times the force of the old, and yet handled with less men of the unskilled class than formerly.

From the old flintlock gun to the more modern muzzle-loading rifle which we used in the civil war, and from that to the breech-loading rapid-firing and dangerous gun, sending bullets 3 and 4 miles and doing greater execution at that distance than the old guns could do at a few hundred yards, has been our progress. And so all along the line in handling our implements of war the percentage of men of education and experience ought to be larger, and that of the ignorant and inexperienced smaller. We should have more commissioned officers, more skilled mechanics and first-class privates and less second-class privates. Yet the Cockrell bill reverses this order of things. It gives us a less percentage of general officers, a less percentage of staff officers, a less percentage of line officers, a less percentage, in fact, of everything, except in the number of private soldiers of the more inferior grade.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the assertion often made, that we do not want a standing army, or none of consequence; that we are a nation of soldiers, a race of national fighters; that we must not maintain a standing army; that its maintenance is a continuing menace to our people, and that we are in constant danger of drifting toward militarism, etc., and so on. But it must occur, it seems to me, to every thinking mind that the day has passed for us to talk of a standing army of only from 25,000 to 27,000 men. We have gone on from year to year appropriating money for fortifications; we have carried some of them to completion; very many more are under construction, and yet more contemplated. Costly cannon have been installed, tremendous engines of war put in place, and a great many millions of dollars invested in this armament and machinery, some of which is delicate and intricate and all of which must be protected.

All authorities agree that it requires about 21,000 officers and men to man and care for our coast fortifications. For years before the war it had taken 21,000 men in cavalry and infantry to man our posts and to afford protection on our frontier and outposts; and it will take no less hereafter, for many years at least, for our Western frontiers are not yet without lurking foes and the danger of savage outbreaks. So that with no further extension of fortifications and coast defenses than those already commenced, our Army can not be reduced below from 40,000 to 45,000 men in time of peace. If we do not expect to take care of them, we should not install our coast-defense guns. If we do not expect to man them, we should cease the construction of fortifications. I maintain that they are necessary, and being necessary, the force to man them must be forthcoming.

It seems to me that the Army has for a number of years been a sort of buffer or Peck's Bad Boy for demagogues and pessimists to rail against and attack and discredit when considering national affairs. Our Navy, and no one admires it more or is more willing to sustain it than I, is never questioned; appropriation bills for it scarcely create a ripple, and they often carry many times the amount that is set apart for the Army. It has been increased from time to time as found necessary, in officers and men, with hardly a question. It has general and staff force larger proportionately than the Army, and with higher-grade officers and better pay.

But the Navy sails smoothly along always with sufficient, generous, and prompt support. I am glad this is so, as I am proud of the Navy and its achievements; but let me say that in my opinion its magnificent achievements are the direct result of the generous treatment and constant support that has for years been given to it. Its officers are educated to command, accustomed to command, and supported when they do command. Its men in entering the service do so under conditions and certainties of protection that give them the necessary ambition to perfect themselves in their duties until their proficiency is a marvel not only to this country, but to the world. "The men behind the guns" at Manila and Santiago and elsewhere show the results of hard study and good discipline. The nation loves the Navy, and the men of the Navy appreciate and are grateful accordingly.

But with the vent that demagogy is accustomed to demand, the Army seems to have been opportunely near, and so we have listened in the past to disquisitions galore upon the danger of a standing army, until one would easily imagine that the Regular Army of the United States was a pestilence rather than a protection, a thing to be well rid of instead of a thing to be supported and encouraged.

Mr. President, the money paid to the regular standing Army is not money thrown into the sea. It is like the money paid to the veterans in pensions and is a distribution widely scattered, in small amounts, throughout the nation, all of which finds its way into the arteries of trade; and the money having done duty in the way places, on the frontier and elsewhere, works its way back to the central points and is again distributed and again returns, just as the blood in the human system passes out and in from the heart, to and fro, without loss in volume or the impoverishment of the system.

There is another feature. In this country every person is furnished with food and clothing, somehow or from somewhere. The tramp begs his, the thief steals his, the man in jail is furnished his, the confidence man flim-flams his, the deadbeat bums his, the workingman earns his, and so on; but every mouth is fed and every back is clothed. If we had employment for all our men at all times in every year, then to take large numbers into the Army would be to leave us short-handed along commercial and other lines; but it is a fact, whether admitted or not, that, taking one year with another, and the nation by and large, we have, owing partly, perhaps, to the bugbear overproduction, partly to the constant adoption of more and more labor-saving machinery, plenty of men and to spare for all vocations and for a competent, proper-sized standing army.

So in our Army we thus furnish employment to a sufficient number of men to permit all the others to be employed; we consume our own products; we pay the soldiers sufficient for their actual wants and perhaps a little more, and, as explained before, none of this money leaves the country so far as our home forces are concerned. Like the three brothers who traded jackknives and tops and playthings all day in a locked room, the sum total of the fortunes of the three were just the same at night as in the morning, notwithstanding the commerce they had been carrying on in the meantime, and that some of them had become richer and some of them poorer, and thus nothing had been lost to the family.

Is it indeed too much for a nation to have an army equal in strength to less than one man to every thousand? Are we in danger of impoverishing the nation when we support 4 men as soldiers for every 5,000 of our population? Think of it! Only an infinitesimal percentage of your total population proposed to be enrolled in the Army.

Mr. President, the Hull-Hawley bill gives all the discretion and authority that the President of the United States has asked for, and all that is necessary to perfect an army, whether of 50,000 or of 100,000. So it is not necessary to support the Cockrell bill, which gives to the President alone the power to appoint, without let or hindrance or confirmation by the Senate, all of our Army officers for foreign service; nor is it wise to vote for a substitute bill which does not practically lessen the aggregate number of men, nor, indeed, the total expense of the Army, but which, in an almost spiteful way, proposes a cut in general and staff officers amounting proportionally to but a few dollars.

Nor is there any force in the argument that we should wait until we know better how to reorganize the Army than now, for the substitute bill proposes over two and one-fourth years as the life of that measure, while we do not profess nor can we now provide the maintenance for more than two years of the measure we are advocating.

It is the better policy to improve and progress with the Army up to our latest and best knowledge, and then still further improve as we gain further knowledge, rather than sit supinely by, confessing ignorance or want of the ability and virility to accomplish what is the admitted desire of the nation—the highest possible standard of perfection for its Army.

Mr. President, the toilers and taxpayers are not protesting against this proposed and necessary Army bill. No petitions or letters are coming to the Senate or to Senators advising its defeat. The plain people of the country are not only loyal and patriotic, but jealous of the nation's honor and her standing among nations. They desire the liberation and return of the volunteers who enlisted for an emergency and the substitution of a sufficient force organized along modern and approved lines.

The citizens of the country will brook no trifling, no angling for political positions and advantages, in the consideration of the measure; nor will they forgive those who, having been first and foremost in bringing on war with Spain and its consequent responsibilities, now propose running away, leaving the President and Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy alone in the field without a sufficient army or one constructed on scientific and approved lines. American citizens are not triflers, neither will they be trifled with.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, without any drapery or any sentimentality, I shall come to some facts and an exact statement of the position we occupy.

The reorganization of the Army is necessary—absolutely necessary. The contentions and the bickerings and the commissions and the examinations that have been held show that there is a necessity for a change in the Army organization. Either the Army organization is deficient or the Army officers are inefficient, and you can not avoid the conclusion. A change is necessary, and in the ten days of this session now remaining there is not time sufficient to enable the Senate to discuss an Army reorganization bill as it must and shall be discussed before it can be passed. I say frankly there is not time in this session to pass a perfected and complete reorganization bill, and there is no necessity for it.

We propose ample measures to meet every contingency. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that there must be temporarily an increase of the military forces which would exist after the proclamation of peace. There is no question about it. The question is, Shall we have a permanent increase of the standing army to 100,000 men, and an appropriation of money for 100,000 men, and then leave the President to reduce it if he desires? That is the proposition of the pending bill. You propose to make an army of 100,000 men; you appropriate the money for them; and then you leave it distinctly with the President to say whether he will reduce that army and expend the money or not.

Mr. President, I shall not consume the time of the Senate in reading what we propose, but we will give to the executive administration every dollar, we will give to them every man—every soldier—that is necessary to sustain the Executive branch properly and legitimately. We do not intend to withhold anything that is necessary—not a solitary thing. I will have the bill printed in my remarks in the RECORD. It has already been printed, but I will have it printed again.

The bill introduced by Mr. COCKRELL is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That within —— days from the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty of peace with Spain all the officers and enlisted men of the Volunteer Army shall be mustered out of the military service of the United States and discharged: Provided, That enlisted men of the volunteers who desire to remain in the military service may, if found qualified therefor, be transferred to and enlisted in such batteries, troops, or companies of the permanent military establishment as may be below the maximum strength allowed by law, and when so transferred and enlisted shall be credited on their new enlistment with the periods of service rendered by them, respectively, as volunteers.

SEC. 2. That the act of Congress entitled "An act for the better organization of the line of the Army of the United States," approved April 26, 1898, be, and the same is hereby, continued in full force and effect until July 1, 1901: Provided, That men who enlisted in the permanent military establishment between the 10th day of May and the 26th day of October, 1898, shall be discharged upon their own application, respectively; but nothing herein shall be held or construed to require the discharge of any enlisted man in such permanent military establishment awaiting trial by or under sentence of a court-martial.

SEC. 3. That the President be, and is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to enlist and organize a military force in Cuba and in Porto Rico, and, whenever such conditions exist as in his judgment will justify him, in the islands of the Pacific, to be known and called the army of Cuba, the army of Porto Rico, and the army of the islands of the Pacific, and to be composed of the inhabitants of such islands, respectively, for the purposes of establishing and maintaining peace and order, enforcing laws and regulations, and protecting life and property in such islands, respectively, and not elsewhere, under such rules, regulations, and limitations as he may prescribe in such islands, respectively, as to age, term of service, qualification, and number of officers and men in each organization.

Such forces in said islands, respectively, shall be organized in companies, battalions, or regiments, and officered as the President may direct, and shall be entitled to such pay and allowances as the President may prescribe, in such islands, respectively, not exceeding the rates now allowed by law, to be made and paid from the revenues of such islands, respectively, or from the Treasury of the United States, to be subsequently reimbursed to the United States from such revenues. During the occupancy by the United States of such islands, respectively, the forces of such islands, enlisted and organized therein, shall be under the control and subject to the orders of the President and the officers assigned to duty by him in such islands, respectively: Provided, That the number of such military forces in all said islands shall not exceed 35,000 enlisted men at any one time, and shall not be considered a part of the permanent military establishment of the United States herein authorized: Provided further, That when such military forces shall be enlisted and organized in such islands, and have shown such efficiency as, in the opinion of the President, to be sufficient for all military purposes in such islands, and there is no longer any necessity for the presence of the United States military forces therein, they shall be withdrawn, and the permanent military establishment shall be reduced to a peace footing.

SEC. 4. That the Chief of the Record and Pension Office of the War Department shall hereafter have the rank, pay, and allowances of a brigadier general, and the President is authorized to appoint an assistant chief of the Record and Pension Office, by selection, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a lieutenant-colonel.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now I will discuss what we propose. We propose that the volunteers shall be mustered out within so many days after the ratification of the treaty of peace. No one can object to that, for it would be done in any event. We give to the volunteers the right to be transferred to and enlisted in the Regular Army, with credit for the length of time they have served in the Volunteer Army. Nobody can object to that. There can be no criticism of that. Then by section 2 we continue until July 1, 1901, public act No. 70, entitled "An act for the better organization of the line of the Army of the United States," approved April 26, 1898. That continues the present Army organization, 62,000, up to July 1, 1901—two years and a half. It authorizes the volunteers who volunteered between the 10th of May and the 26th of October to serve only during the war to be discharged, as they must be, and the Army can be recruited up to 62,000 men, and that can be maintained until 1901. We say that is ample for all emergencies—ample for all possibilities that may arise.

Then we authorize, in section 3, the organization of a force in the islands. The distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] have both criticised the provision which we offer here as section 3, and the War Department also criticises it. I will take the criticisms of the War Department and answer them as well as the criticisms of the two Senators. I have in my hand a copy of the Washington Post, which contains a prepared criticism of my bill by the War Department, prepared and published from a statement issued by the War Department, in quotations. Now, in the first place, after praising the Hull bill and telling what my bill proposes, they say:

> No organization is provided in the bill for this force, nor does it determine what relation it shall sustain toward the permanent military establishment of the United States, and no professional, educational, or other test is prescribed for the persons who are to officer it.

What does this say? It says:

> That the President be, and is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to enlist and organize a military force in Cuba and in Porto Rico, and, whenever such conditions exist as in his judgment will justify him, in the islands of the Pacific, to be known and called the army of Cuba, the army of Porto Rico, and the army of the islands of the Pacific, and to be composed of the inhabitants of such islands, respectively, for the purposes of establishing and maintaining peace and order, enforcing laws and regulations, and protecting life and property in such islands, respectively, and not elsewhere, under such rules, regulations, and limitations as he may prescribe in such islands, respectively, as to age, term of service, qualification, and number of officers and men in each organization.

What does the Hull bill say now? Let us see what it says. The two distinguished Senators and the War Department seemed to forget that there is any provision in the Hull bill which they were praising. I will read it as it is proposed to be amended by the Senator from Connecticut:

SEC. 20. That organizations for service in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the islands of the Pacific may, in the discretion of the President, and under such limitations as he may prescribe, be recruited from the inhabitants thereof, respectively, to whom the legal restrictions upon enlistments in the Army, as regards term of service, age, citizenship, and educational qualifications, shall not apply, and who shall be entitled to such pay and allowances, not exceeding those now authorized, as the President may direct. Such forces shall be organized in companies and battalions and officered as the President may direct, and shall constitute a part of the total force provided by this act.

You have noted what my provision says, and now I will read what we say of organization in section 3:

Such forces in said islands, respectively, shall be organized in companies, battalions, or regiments, and officered as the President may direct, and shall be entitled to such pay and allowances as the President may prescribe, in such islands, respectively, not exceeding the rates now allowed by law, to be made and paid from the revenues of such islands, respectively, or from the Treasury of the United States, to be subsequently reimbursed to the United States from such revenues.

Mr. President, the Hull bill gives exactly what this bill gives. The Hull bill makes the forces organized under it a part of the hundred thousand. It leaves the President unlimited up to a hundred thousand. We limit it in our bill, in what we propose. We restrict and make it more beneficial and more plain than the bill advocated by the Senator from Connecticut. We say these troops shall be in the islands organized respectively; that they shall be known as the army of Cuba, the army of Porto Rico. Now, there is no restriction or limitation in regard to the formation of military forces in the Philippine Islands in the Hull bill. Not a word. What do we say about that? Do we authorize the President to go down there and swear in those people and arm them and let them turn around and fight against us, as the speech of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut would indicate? His bill does that thing. The very bill he is advocating gives the President the power to do that without any restrictions. What do we say? We say:

And whenever such conditions exist as in his judgment will justify him—

he can form military organizations in the Philippine Islands. We do not give him authority to do it now. We make him the judge. He must find there that the conditions are such that he will be justified in enlisting a military force in the islands of the Pacific. Now, can we trust him? Are the two Senators distrustful of the President and willing to withhold from him discretionary power? It would seem so from their criticism of the bill. The War Department forgets, in its criticism of the bill which has been presented here in behalf of a portion of the Committee on Military Affairs, to offer a word of criticism in regard to the Hull bill, when it is open to the same objection exactly.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. Wait a moment. I want to finish my statement.

Mr. MASON. I merely wish to ask a question.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will yield directly. I desire to finish this statement. Now I go on with the criticism of the War Department:

The bill does not provide for any additional general officers, greatly needed in the administration of affairs in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. It would leave the Army as now organized, with but 3 major-generals and 6 brigadier-generals, which allows but one general officer for each of the military departments in the United States and one for Commanding General of the Army.

That is a criticism of what would be done if we continued the act of 1898. Not enough officers? I hold in my hand a statement submitted by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], which gives the general officers and general staff officers of the United States Volunteers in the service, including those holding commissions in the Regular Army. Here they are: Thirteen major-generals of volunteers, who belong to the Regular Army; twenty-five brigadier-generals of volunteers, who are members of the Regular Army——

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. SEWELL. They have a rank in the Regular Army, but they immediately go out as——

Mr. COCKRELL. I will explain that, my dear friend. Do not think I would ignore any question like that. Everybody knows that. I did not say they were brigadier-generals or majors in the Regular Army.

Mr. SEWELL. I understood the Senator to make that statement.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are officers in the Regular Army and hold rank in the volunteer service as brigadier-generals, and majors, and colonels, etc. There are 214 of them. Two hundred and fourteen officers of the Regular Army are holding commissions in the Volunteer Army, and upon the muster out of the Volunteer Army they return to duty in the War Department and Regular Army. I think that would be ample.

Mr. President, I will reserve for future discussion the question of the number of troops and the number of officers that might be necessary in Cuba and Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, but I can not forbear saying that in my humble judgment one brigade is all and even more than is needed in the island of Cuba, and that any greater number would be a menace to the peace and quiet of that island. I challenge anyone who knows what is going on there to say that any man—I care not whether he is white or black, yellow or red—can not go through the island of Cuba from one end of it to the other without meeting disturbance, and he needs no soldiers or a bodyguard, none in the world.

I can show from the testimony of men that the Cuban soldiers, insurgents, as you call them, are under as good discipline as the soldiers of the United States Army, and that they are maintaining that discipline from one end of the island to the other, and that they can be implicitly trusted to maintain peace and order, to protect life and liberty, and enforce all legal rights in the island of Cuba. There is not a particle of trouble about that. There is no army needed there. Give the people the right to govern themselves and they will do it and enforce law and protect life, protect liberty, protect property, and maintain peace and order. There is no doubt about their ability to do it.

Now, they criticise this provision in the bill which I am advocating because it does not furnish staff officers enough. There is the milk in the cocoanut—a permanent increase in the staff department. Then they add a criticism that there is not enough artillery. We do not want to cripple the service. We want to perfect it. We do not want to throw any obstacle in the way of executive administration successfully and properly.

If it can be shown that there are not enough staff officers in the Army organization, then we will give a retention of the existing volunteer staff officers until 1901, sufficient in numbers. Who can object to that? Who can refuse to accept that? You say you have not enough staff officers. We say we will let you continue enough of the volunteer staff officers to do until 1901. What more do you want? You say we have not artillery enough to man the forts. That is a question about which Army officers differ. Some say we have. Some say we have not. Show us that you need another battery, two batteries, three batteries, four batteries, or a half a dozen batteries around the coasts to man the guns there and we will give them to you right in this provision.

We will give you every man you need. We will not give it in a bill permanently increasing the standing army indefinitely. We are willing to-morrow to make provision, ample, abundant, superabundant, but we are not willing at this short session of Congress to pass a bill fastening upon the people of this country a standing army of a hundred thousand men, and an increase of from seventy-five to eighty million dollars in expenditures every year to be wrung from the taxpayers of the United States to maintain that increased army.

The measure must be discussed. All we want is legitimate and fair and proper discussion, and that must be had. Now, we offer you whatever is necessary. Why do you insist upon this other measure? We give you everything. The Hull bill makes the troops in the islands a part of the hundred thousand. We only authorize 35,000. The President can go up to that number by the Hull bill. We are offering everything that is fair and just and right; all that is necessary. We have no disposition to force an extra session. We have no intention to do it. We say to you frankly every bill necessary for a successful administration of the executive branch of the Government can be passed at this session, if you do not force the continued discussion of the proposition to increase the standing Army.

If an extra session is called, it can be called for one purpose only, and that is to fasten upon the people of the United States a standing army of a hundred thousand soldiers. There shall be no other occasion for it, no other necessity in the world. We will do right. We will do what is just. We will give you every man you want. We will give you every officer you want up to 1901. Then we can determine what is necessary, what is best, how large the Army shall be, and how it shall be organized. We will have ample time between this time and then.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. I simply wish to ask a question. I am very much interested in the change of rules in the United States Senate——

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no time to discuss that matter, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator will pardon me, I am not going to ask him to discuss the question. I merely want to ask a question, that I may understand his proposition.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. Do I understand that ten days will not be sufficient to discuss and dispose of the Army bill, unless we agree to the Senator's bill? Mind you, I raise no question as to the correctness of the Senator's intention, because I believe a filibuster is the proper thing. The rules here not only permit it, but encourage it. I sometimes indulge in a filibuster, and I always give regular notice when I am going to do it. I ask the Senator simply to say what is the purpose. I think the Senator is right about many of the propositions he has made, if he will only make the language plain, so that we can understand that there shall not be any vote——

Mr. COCKRELL. I am always plain and frank. I do not filibuster, and never have. I believe in fair and legitimate and full discussion; and that is exactly what I mean to say, that in the ten days remaining there is not time for a full and fair discussion of the Army organization bill and the passage of the appropriation bills, and every Senator here knows it.

Mr. MASON. Then, I understand it is not an announced filibuster?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know what the Senator means by "filibuster." I am not conscious of anything of the kind.

Mr. MASON. I gave a sample the other day. I made the statement plainly. When I make a filibuster I give notice in advance. If the Senator does, I shall not find fault with him. But being an open enemy of the present rules of the Senate of the United States, which permit the majority to be whipped by the minority, I want the rules amended. I have no desire to criticise, but I should like to have a frank statement if the discussion is simply to take the place of a vote. I only ask the Senator to make a statement so that I can understand it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will make it at the proper time, when the matter comes up again.

Mr. MASON. All right.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from North Carolina withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. PRITCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to state that I desire to take a few moments of the time of the Senate when the bill comes up again. I will not do so now, if the Senator desires an executive session.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I renew the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 22, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SIOUX CITY AND OMAHA RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5076) authorizing the Sioux City and Omaha Railroad Company to construct and operate a railway through the Omaha and Winnebago Reservation, in Thurston County, Nebr., and for other purposes.

The bill was read at length.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and accordingly it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MAXWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that my colleague Mr. CARMACK was detained from the Chamber yesterday afternoon on account of illness when the vote on the $20,000,000 appropriation was had. Had he been present, he would have voted "aye." I wish further to state that my colleague Mr. GAINES was detained from the Chamber on account of the illness of his son. Had he been present, he would have voted "aye" on the $20,000,000 appropriation, and "no" on the appropriation for Buffalo, N. Y.

I wish also to ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague Mr. GAINES, on account of the illness of his son.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

CLAIMS UNDER THE BOWMAN ACT.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Speaker, I present the following conference report on the bill (H. R. 4936) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes.

The report was read, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4936) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

THAD. M. MAHON,
THEO. OTJEN,
JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.
H. M. TELLER,
WM. M. STEWART,
S. PASCO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement and ask for a further conference.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The report ought to be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The report is simply that the conferees disagree.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the report should be adopted and then the House insist further on its disagreement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hardly sees how the House can agree to a report in which nothing is done.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think that is the usual course, to agree to the report and insist further. Of course the Chair can take any course that he sees fit. Otherwise it leaves the report unacted upon. I simply make the suggestion that the report is unacted upon and not agreed to. I think the usual course is to agree to the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the precedents examined, but his impression is that there is nothing to agree to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Very well. It is immaterial, as there is no legislation in it.

The SPEAKER. There is no legislation in it. The Chair will see that the Journal is put in the proper form. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that the House further insist and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.
